SIR H. ROSCOE (Manchester, S.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it is the intention of the Government to grant a Royal Charter to a new University for the Metropolis, to include University and King's Colleges, London, in the latter of which a religious test is imposed upon all teachers, with the exception of the Professors of the Modern and Oriental Languages; and whether, in the event of such a University being founded, all such restrictions upon the teaching staff will be abolished?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The question as to the grant of a Charter is still under the consideration of the Privy Council Office, and I am unable, therefore, to give the information asked for.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE FRENCH REPUBLIC.

MR. P. STANHOPE (Wednesbury): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether Her Majesty's Government would take steps to convey to the French Government the satisfaction which would be given to the people of this country if the President of the French Republic could be prevailed upon to pay a visit to England?

MR. W. H. SMITH: It is not in accordance with usage for Her Majesty's Ministers to convey invitations of this kind; but the head of the French Republic or of any other friendly nation would always receive a cordial welcome in this country.

SEIZURES ON IRISH HOLDINGS.

MR. P. J. POWER (Waterford, E.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if it is the duty of the Constabulary in Ireland, when a seizure is about to be made either by a landlord or by the sheriff, to report to the landlord or sheriff as to what stock or property there is on the holding where it is intended to make the seizure?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): It is not the duty of the Royal Irish Constabulary to report in the manner indicated in this question.

POLICE BARRACKS AT BELFAST.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if he can explain why, although the contract for the new central police barracks at Belfast was entered into three months ago, and part of the site had then been cleared, the building has not yet been begun; whether he is aware that the Inspector General of Constabulary has informed Messrs. Musgrave and Co., Limited, who are at present in occupation of the other part of the site, that the statement made by the Secretary to the Treasury to a question on the same subject on 2nd March last was at variance with the arrangements made; what is the explanation of the discrepancy between the statement of the Secretary to the Treasury and the statement of the Inspector General of Constabulary; whether he will lay upon the Table of the House copies of any Correspondence which has passed between the Secretary to the Treasury, the Inspector General of Constabulary, the Board of Works, or any member of the late firm of Musgrave & Co. the subject of the proposed buildings; and whether he can give the date when the part of the proposed site now occupied by Musgrave & Co., Limited, will be taken possession of by the Government?

MR. MADDEN: I am informed that the delay has arisen from difficulties experienced in connection with the foundation. The discrepancy between the two statements referred to is due to the fact that the Secretary to the Treasury was not aware of the original arrangements. No advantage would be gained by laying on the Table a copy of the Correspondence, and I am unable to state when the proposed site will be taken possession of by the Government.

MR. SEXTON: When will the new building, which we were told in March was about to be commenced, be proceeded with now that we have reached July?

MR. MADDEN: The exact date cannot at present be fixed.

MR. SEXTON: I will raise the question again on the Votes.

BELFAST TELEGRAPH OFFICE.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he has received any protests from the telegraphists of Belfast against the proposed revised scheme for the Belfast Telegraph Office; and whether the scheme will be further revised to meet the views of the clerks?

MR. RAIKES: I have received a representation on the subject referred to by the hon. Member, and will examine the statements which it contains.

IRISH MAILS.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he is aware that letters for the towns of Drumshambo (Leitrim), and Ballyfarnan and Keadue (Roscommon), arriving by the limited mail from Dublin, are delayed in Carrick-on-Shannon 22 hours before despatch in the cases of Drumshambo and Keadue, and a longer time in the case of Ballyfarnan; whether he will endeavour to provide a better service by arrangement with the Leitrim and Cavan Light Railway Company for conveyance via Dromod; can he explain why, having arranged with the Clogher Valley ^{and} ~~Tramway~~ ^{Glad} Company for conveyance of ^{some obs} ~~those~~ ^{to pu} ~~those~~ their line of 37 miles at £90 ^{offer} ~~offer~~ ^{only} £20 for the like service on their line of 48 miles, and, on their refusal, tendered parcels rates; and what he estimates to be the amount which would be payable under the latter proposal?

*MR. RAIKES: The limited mail from Dublin does not arrive at Carrick-on-Shannon till about 10.45 a.m., and at the small places named there is only one delivery, which goes out from Carrick-on-Shannon in the early morning. Their letters by the limited mail have necessarily to wait till the following day. The question of arranging for a mail service by the Cavan and Leitrim Light Railway via Dromod has been several times considered, but the expense involved has always been found to be much in excess of the available revenue. It is the case that a payment at parcel rates, amounting to about £20 a year, was offered the Company, who have not yet accepted it, but I am still in communication with them. The circumstances relating to the contract with the Clogher Valley Tramway Company were altogether different, and therefore the cases are not analogous.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES, 1891-2.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS II.

1. Motion made, and Question proposed,

(3.40.) MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I venture to thank the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) for having introduced the Triple Alliance. I am aware that there are Members of this House who consider that questions of foreign policy ought not to be considered by Radicals below the Gangway at all. That is an opinion with which I do not concur, because it is well known that the Radical Party are not only dictating the policy of the Government at the present moment, but that they are going to do so more and more in the future. In making this remark, I allude to the adoption of the Radical policy of Free Education, which shows how Her Majesty's Government are taking up the views of the Radical Party at the present moment. The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs told us last night that—"If the results of Lord Salisbury's policy so far were to be measured by its popularity and its acceptance with the country, he believed the Government could not wish to go to the country on a better issue."

I have no doubt that the policy of Lord Salisbury is thought very well of, but it is not because it is Lord Salisbury's policy. It is because he has given up the Jingo policy of the Tories and others, and has adopted the Radical policy. The Under Secretary went on to tell us—

"As the hon. Gentleman desired that the policy of Lord Salisbury should be contrasted with that of the right hon. Member for Midlothian, he would remind the hon. Member that, in 1888, after he had offered an explanation to the House, the right hon. Gentleman expressed his satisfaction with that explanation, and the Debate thereupon came to an end."

But that was only as far as it carried out the policy of the Liberal Party, and that is the reason why we are satisfied at present with the policy of a Tory Government. So far as both Front Benches are concerned, I think they have been equally bad in dealing with these matters, and we have invariably been unable to get any information from them. They may be fittingly described on one side as "Tweedle-dee," and on the other side as "Tweedle-dum." We have been told by the right hon. Gentleman opposite that our relations with France have been entirely cordial. Now, I do not agree with that statement at all, because there can be no doubt that the present Government have done a good deal to annoy the French Government and people. We refused to join with them in the Exhibition of 1889. And when I visited the Exhibition!

found from officials there that much dissatisfaction was felt at our action. I was told distinctly that Her Majesty's Government were not only offending the French Government but the French people. I know that the City of London took a different view, and Sir T. Whitehead and Sir Polydore Keyser did their best to show the good feeling of the City towards the French Republic. As the Government objected to take part in the Exhibition at Paris, I certainly cannot understand why they propose to join in that which is to be opened in the United States. I do not understand why they should be more friendly to one Republic than the other, unless they are in reality more afraid of offending the United States than France. What I desire is that all Governments should be treated alike—whether they happen to be an Empire, a Monarchy, or a Republic. I join most cordially in all the statements which were made last night by the hon. Member for Northampton in regard to the action of Lord Salisbury and the Government. I am afraid that upon the part of what is called the aristocratic class in this country there is a feeling against France because they have a Republic. But it is of no good to fight against the Republics. We are practically a Republic ourselves. I do not care what you call the head of the nation, Emperor, King, Queen, or President of the Republic, so long as the practical head is the majority of the House of Commons. In objecting to the French Republic we are really objecting to our own Government. We know that Republics are spreading, and before long it is not at all unlikely that there may be other Republics on the Continent with which it will be our duty to be on good terms. I am aware that to-day we are receiving the German Emperor in a most enthusiastic manner, and I have no doubt we should have been quite as enthusiastic if we had been giving a reception to the President of a German Republic.

*THE CHAIRMAN (Mr. H. H. FOWLER): The Question before the House is the Vote for the Foreign Office. Perhaps the hon. Member will confine his remarks to the proceedings of the Foreign Office during the past 12 months.

MR. MORTON: I apologise if I have been at all irregular. I may say, however, of the proceedings of the Foreign Office, that I think they have done a considerable amount of harm. I think we ought to have had less difficulty, and might have been more successful in settling matters in the interests of the stations of Newfoundland, if we had followed a different policy. With regard to the Triple Alliance, I object to it altogether. The sort of alliance I should like to see is an alliance between all the great Powers in favour of the principle of arbitration. In that case I think we might do some good. Perhaps I may be allowed to ask what the Government of this country have done in the interests of arbitration? I do not know what they may have been doing in the last 12 months, but I know they have been doing a little towards carrying out the policy of the Radicals and Democrats below the Gangway. I shall be glad to learn what it is they have done in that direction; which will be infinitely more satisfactory than the knowledge that they have joined, either directly or indirectly, in this Triple Alliance. The right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary told us last night that there is some understanding in regard to the Triple Alliance with which we are connected.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): I beg the hon. Member's pardon; I said nothing of the kind.

MR. MORTON: I accept the right hon. Gentleman's correction, but I must have misunderstood what he said. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman what the Government of this country are doing in the interests of arbitration, so that we may know what our foreign policy is to be in the future? Have we joined with America and two or three of the Continental Powers, big and little, in favour of settling the disputes of nations by arbitration instead of war? I am satisfied that in asking the Government to do something in that direction, instead of keeping up large armaments in order that we may be ready for some great war, I am representing the opinion of a very large majority of the people of this country. Instead of turning their attention to a Triple Alliance, they should cultivate an alliance of all the Great Powers in favour of arbitration. [A laugh.] The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord laughs. I know that he is not in favour of arbitration, but all I can say is that he has not got the same objection with him. The people of this House to whatever sect they belong, are in favour of settling foreign disputes by arbitration. As Lord Derby told us some years ago, the people are aware that that is their greatest interest, and that we can only secure permanent peace by inducing all nations, whether little or big, to go to arbitration rather than war. I would further ask the Government whether they will not allow the House of Commons to consider Treaties with foreign Governments before they are made, and not afterwards? There is no use in asking either House of Parliament to consider a Treaty after it has been made. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone) stated in Edinburgh some years back that he was in favour of some sort of policy of that sort, and I want to know if the Government have considered it. After a Treaty has been entered into it is made a Party question, and is taken as one of confidence or no confidence in the Government. It is all very well for the First Lord of the Treasury to laugh, but he does not know, perhaps, how little time may elapse before he adopts this doctrine, just as he has taken free education from the Radical programme. I want to impress upon the Government the necessity of our adopting in our foreign policy the good example shown us by the American Government and the American people. Indeed, I think we should do well if we asked the Americans to run our Foreign Office for a certain time. In conclusion, I say that our policy should be non-intervention and absolute friendliness with every Power on the Continent, little or big.

(4.0.) MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I do not propose to follow my hon. Friend in the remarks he has made. I am bound to say that I have not such an intimate knowledge of the doings and motives of foreign Governments and foreign potentates as is possessed by my successor in the representation of Peterborough. I wish, however, to make an inquiry respecting the Anti-Slavery Convention and the Brussels Conference. I gather from the Blue Books, and I congratulate

Mr. Morton

Her Majesty's Government on the fact, that the blockade of the African coast by the united fleets of Germany and England has been apparently very successful in diminishing the export trade in slaves across the water. I want to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he can hold out any hopes as to the likelihood of the general Act of the Brussels Conference being immediately signed by the Great Powers? The French Deputies declined the other day—I hope only temporarily—to allow their Government to sign that Agreement. I am glad, however, now to see that the French Government have agreed to the postponement of the matter. This shows that they hope ultimately to obtain leave from their Parliament to sign the Convention. Of course, the other Powers will be much hampered in their action if the French do not allow their vessels to be treated in the same way as those of the other Powers. I gather from the reports I have read that when the French Chamber arrived at their decision the other day they acted under considerable misapprehension as to the terms of the Convention, and the likelihood of what would ensue if it were signed. I cannot help thinking that when the Chamber of Deputies come to consider the matter more carefully, and when they see that there is no political question connected with the Convention, they will arrive at a different decision. The Convention gives no right of search to other nations over French vessels. All it gives is that in the case of a small native craft running up a European flag, if there is reason to believe that the vessel is acting fraudulently in using the French or any other flag, there shall be power to over-haul it and examine its papers. If there should be any doubt, the question would have to be tried by the Courts of the nation whose flag was used. I hope they will ratify the general Act of the Brussels Conference to which all the other Powers are ready to give their assent, and which will do very much indeed for the cause of Christianity and for the cause of humanity.

(4.5.) MR. P. STANHOPE (Wendensbury): With reference to the Triple Alliance, as the French people, whether rightly or wrongly, have chosen a Republic as the form of their Government there unfortunately seems to be an inter-tion in several parts of Europe, and especially among the great military Powers, to isolate the French Republic, but I hope no such feeling will influence our attitude towards France. The result has been that, when any question has arisen the effective treatment of which demanded concert on the part of Europe, it was found that France naturally did not join heartily in it. The Slave Trade is one of these questions. France, unfortunately, has for a long series of years been regularly wrought up into a condition of exasperation, and one of the causes of this has been the attitude and policy of England in Egypt, which country we have constantly pledged ourselves to evacuate, and as constantly broken those pledges. The particular circumstances in regard to England and the Triple Alliance, to which the hon. Member for Northampton referred last night, had had a similar effect, and justify, it seems to me, the feeling of distrust that prevails in France with respect to this country. It is true that we had a very satisfactory explanation from the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, but unfortunately the right hon. Gentleman is only the Under Secretary, and though we may listen to his statements with satisfaction, yet we cannot help feeling that there is a much greater man—if the right hon. Gentleman will allow me to say so—behind him, the Prime Minister, who assumes a rôle of independence with respect to foreign politics which has often led the country into difficulty. Hon. Members cannot have forgotten the unfortunate transactions some years ago with reference to our relations with Russia—the fervent assurances that were made on behalf of Lord Salisbury as to the attitude the Foreign Office had taken up, and the subsequent publication of the Schouvaloff Memorandum. In these circumstances, the House would certainly like to hear something more positive than it did last night from the right hon. Gentleman as to the intentions of the Government with regard to the Triple Alliance, so as to remove all doubt as to the existence of some secret understanding. I would call the right hon. Gentleman's attention to the telegrams on the subject in the Times of this morning. One telegram was from the Times' Correspondent at Berlin, and in it were these significant words—

"The emphasis of loyal English friendship for Italy in such circumstances bears the character of a pre-arranged demonstration which removes ^{the} ^{every} vestige of a doubt as to England's attitude ⁱⁿ ^{the} position towards the Triple Alliance, but, active and regardless of the fact whether ^{the} position be expressed by any written ^{or} ^{not}."

We have been glad to suppose that the visits of the British vessels to the Italian or Austrian ports were merely normal visits of a friendly character and in the course of ordinary naval manœuvres, and were not prearranged demonstrations made for the purpose of inducing public opinion in Italy or Germany to suppose that we have entered into some engagement which connects us intimately, in a naval sense, with the Triple Alliance. In presence of such words as I have read, I should like to hear from the Foreign Office some more definite assurance that this is not the case than has yet been made. The right hon. Gentleman said last night that our sympathies will be with those who kept the peace and not with those who break it, a remark which at the time might appear harmless, but when closely looked into may bear a dangerous construction. The sympathies of the Liberal Party will always be with peace and with those who struggle to maintain it; but is it to be said that if France—it may be unwisely and injudiciously—thinks it desirable to make some attempt to regain the provinces she lost in 1870, and which are overwhelmingly French in sentiment and aspirations, we are at once to give, not only our sympathy, but our moral support to Germany? I do think it very important at a time when the Press of Europe is filled with all kinds of insinuations as to the intentions of the Foreign Office of this country, and with all kinds of constructions put upon the manœuvres of our fleet and on the welcome now being given by us to the German Emperor, that it should be clearly understood abroad that the people of this country are absolutely opposed to any policy whatever which connects them with Continental quarrels in which they have no part; that, while they are anxious to make any sacrifice for the maintenance of purely British interests, they absolutely repudiate any secret understanding which may lead them into alliance with Continental military Powers for objects in which they have no national concern.

(4.15.) MR. PICTON (Leicester): I desire to call the attention of the Committee to another subject connected with the Foreign Office. I have already asked several questions as to what is being done by the Government to secure the safety and deliverance of Miss Kate Greenfield, an English girl of 14 years of age, who was carried off in May last from the village of Hajiabad, in Persia, by some disorderly Kurds. The case is one which ought to secure a great deal of sympathy. I hope that in this matter no indifference will be shown by the British authorities to what is due to the honour of this country, though I cannot help feeling that, if we had kept ourselves freer from the intrigues in which we seem lately to have been engaged with one country and another, we should have been able to speak out much more firmly and effectively in such an important matter as this. It appears that Miss Greenfield is the daughter of a gentleman, now deceased, who owned considerable property in certain villages on the borders of Persia. Her mother and three brothers lived with her. In May last, when her three brothers, who cultivated the estates, were absent on business, the girl went out with a servant for a walk, and was set upon by some Kurds lying in ambush and was carried off. When Mrs. Greenfield heard of the abduction of her daughter, she took horse and pursued the robbers, but lost sight of them. She then reported the case to the British Consul, who made representations in the proper quarter. The Ameer Nizam, Governor General of the province, telegraphed to So-uj-Bulak, the place where the girl was taken, ordering her to be set at liberty, but the Acting Governor of that place at first denied that the girl was there, and declared that she had been carried across the frontier into Turkey. This, however, was proved to be absolutely false; the girl was in the place. The next day a mock inquiry was held, and it was then alleged that the girl had declared herself to be a Mahomedan, the difficulty of religion being thus raised in the matter. I do not know how far the correspondent of the Daily News is correct, but he says that a person representing Kate Greenfield declared in her name that she had always been a Mahomedan, and desired to remain one. There may be ground for suspicion as to the truth of this, but whether it is true or not, it does not bear on the real question involved. Even if this girl of 14 had declared herself to be a Mahomedan, that would not justify the Kurds in violently carrying her off from the custody of her mother and the protection of her friends, nor would it justify any indifference of the English Government as to her treatment and fate. The British Consul, however, seems to have done the utmost he could in the matter. He persisted in his representations, and was then asked to go to the girl himself and ascertain what her feelings were. At first he thought it would be imprudent for the safety of the girl to take this step, but he afterwards went with the Turkish Consul, and then found that she was surrounded by armed men, who prevented access to her. They declared that she had turned Mahomedan, that it was simply a question of religion, and they threatened to slay anyone who interfered. I want to know from the right hon. Baronet what has been done, and what is being done, to secure the safety and emancipation of this girl? We are told that the Turkish Government are in fault. Here comes in the question how much influence has our Government with the Government of the Porte? It is said that we have rendered great services to the Porte—too many, in the opinion of many persons; but be that as it may, the Porte is, no doubt, under obligations to this country. But of what use is our friendliness with the Porte if we cannot get redress in a matter like this? If Her Majesty's Government had spoken with sufficient firmness, and said that this was regarded as a serious question by the people of this country, Turkey would not have allowed her officers to stand in the way of the girl's liberation. We are told that a Persian force has gone there, but that they are paralyzed by the communications which are going on between one Government and the other. If, instead of an English girl being captured in this savage manner and held in slavery, the British flag had been insulted, Her Majesty's Government would have been ready to go to war to protect the honour of the country. Surely the honour of an English girl is part of the honour of the British flag. If this country possessed the influence it ought to possess I cannot help thinking that the demand of the Government for the liberation of Miss Greenfield would at once have secured attention. I ask the Under Secretary to say whether the account in the Daily News of this morning is correct, and to tell us distinctly what has been done to make the Ottoman Porte and the Persian Government amenable to the righteous indignation of this country, and to secure the speedy release of this unfortunate young lady.

*(4.20.) SIR J. FERGUSSON: These discussions are necessarily somewhat discursive, and, of course, there are many questions as to which hon. Members desire information. Perhaps I shall best consult the convenience of the Committee if I answer the question of the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. Picton) first. I can assure the hon. Member that before the question of the capture of this English girl was mentioned in the House Her Majesty's Government had taken energetic action to procure redress in the matter. After the news arrived here, Her Majesty's Government addressed themselves both to the Persian and the Turkish Governments to urge the absolute necessity of having this British subject set at liberty and returned to her friends. There has been no delay, no hesitation, and no want of vigour. The result was that the Turkish Government withdrew all opposition, and the Persian Government has been informed that Her Majesty's Government expect them to take the necessary steps. The conditions attached by the British Government to the inquiry that must take place were that it should be in a place where the girl should be perfectly free and not be exposed to intimidation; and, secondly, that it should be in the presence of persons both of the Mahomedan and Christian religions and her friends, so that she should not be overawed, and that her statement as to whether she had gone over of her own consent or whether she remained a prisoner may be perfectly distinct and unbiased. There is a curious incident in the case of which the Foreign Office has been informed, and which does not appear in the Daily News, the account in which seems, so far as I can judge in the short time I have been ^{able} to give to it, to be fairly correct. It is that the mother of this girl ^{is} a Persian subject, possessed of ^{considerable} property, and by the laws ^{of} Persia it would seem that unless the girl became a Persian subject—that is to say, unless she married a Persian subject—she could not succeed to this property. I do not think Her Majesty's Government could possibly have done more in the case than they have done—and they did not wait for any pressure whatever from this House. The matter is now in a fair way of settlement. The hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Morton) no doubt represents the feelings of a great many people in this country who form judgments on foreign affairs without studying them very much. If the doctrine laid down by the hon. Member were adopted, it would be impossible to make any Treaty at all. A Treaty is the result of diplomacy, and if the House is to settle beforehand all the conditions on which our negotiators are to go into negotiations, I am afraid we should have shown our hand in the first place, and rendered the negotiations utterly unavailing. The hon. Member says that arbitration should be the rule in international affairs, and that there should be a general bond of nations to induce that method of settling all disputes. That would, indeed, be a golden age, but at the same time it would be attended with certain inconveniences. Supposing, for example, a foreign Power were to ask that we should refer to arbitration the possession of some territories we had acquired, but to which they thought they had an ancient right, we should not be willing to refer that to arbitration. There must be many things in which nations cannot agree upon the terms of reference. For instance, in the matter of the differences which exist between this country and Venezuela, the difficulty about going to arbitration is that neither Power as yet will concede that so wide a territory is in dispute. It is absolutely necessary, in the first place, to arrive at a basis of arbitration. But Her Majesty's Government have shown no indisposition to refer disputes in which they are concerned to arbitration. We have about three arbi-trations going on at the present time. We have been willing to refer all matters in dispute between us and the French Government in New Zealand except those which touch the sovereignty of the British Crown. We are willing to refer the question of the respective rights of the United States and England in the Behring Sea; also the differences between ourselves and Portugal last, for we had an arbitration with Germany on the East Coast of Africa, and so on. There is no indisposition to refer matters to arbitration, but there are certain preliminary conditions to be settled, namely, that we do not give up the indefeasible rights of this country. The hon. Member for Poplar (Mr. Buxton) has alluded to the Anti-Slavery Convention, and the attitude of France in relation to it. That Convention has been a work of much care and patience, and the result of a remarkable concurrence of agreement by the principal nations of the world. Much skill and credit attaches, especially to the British representatives, in the contracting of this agreement. Unfortunately, it has for the moment been interrupted by the vote of the French Chamber. Now, I utterly repudiate the assertion of the hon. Member for Wednesbury (Mr. P. Stanhope) that there has been, on the part of the French Government, any unwillingness to confirm that Convention, or that the failure is the result of strained relations. That is absolutely without foundation. I have before me the Report of the Committee of the French Chamber to which the Convention was referred. There is no word of imputation upon this country in that Report, but there is a reference to the jealousy which France entertains of a visitation in any shape of their vessels by a foreign marine. That is a principle that France has always maintained. She has not been a party to any of the old Anti-Slave Trade Conventions which gave a moderate right of visitation, and so she has seen in this modified power of visitation a certain infraction of the sanctity of her flag—a sanctity which she has always maintained. Without wounding the susceptibilities of the French it is possible we may have their co-operation; indeed, that we may give effect to this Convention, which will deal the greatest blow that has yet been delivered against the inhuman traffic which disgraces civilised times. It must not be forgotten that in this Convention we not only have made greater provision for extinguishing the Slave Trade by sea, but we have taken power to attack it at its source, and to remove the terrible miseries which afflict the people of Africa—miseries far greater than those which were connected with the seaboard trade. The hon. Member for Wednesbury is suspicious of the foreign policy pursued by Her Majesty's Government. I thank him for the generous sentiments which he ascribed to myself; but as he well knows, I am merely the mouthpiece of another, but I regard it as a privilege to represent in this House, as I have for the last five years, the judicious spirit which has guided our foreign policy. It is altogether inaccurate on the part of the hon. Member to describe the meeting of the Italian and British squadrons in the Adriatic as premeditated. It was altogether unpremeditated, as unpremeditated as will be the visit of the French Fleet to Portsmouth in a few weeks' time. These friendly meetings between our Forces and the Forces of foreign countries show that although we are well armed and able to protect our commerce and our liberties and our power, yet that armed force lies behind our moral force, and implies in no sense a belligerent disposition or any hostility to foreign Powers.

(4.37.) MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I have listened with great interest to the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman, and I hope this Convention will be carried through, and the adhesion of foreign Powers obtained. I think we must all feel that there is no matter to which the combined action of the Powers ought to be more earnestly addressed than the suppression of the Slave Trade; and I am certain that there is no part of the Government's foreign policy which will receive more hearty and more unanimous support. I rose for the purpose of calling attention to another matter—the refusal of France to ratify the Convention on the liquor traffic among deep-sea fishermen. There seems to have been some little want of diplomatic courtesy, for the refusal has not been conveyed through the ordinary channels, but seems to have been intimated in the French Chamber in the course of debate. I hope that the resources of diplomacy have not yet been exhausted, and that the ratification of France having been obtained, the Convention will be carried into effect. This liquor traffic in the North Sea is the cause of peril to the fishermen, and of the loss of many lives.

*(4.40.) SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): I wish to call attention to the case of King Ja Ja, now dead, I believe, through the action of Her Majesty's Government. The removal of Ja Ja was considered to be temporary, and there were discussions from time to time with reference to his detention in the island of St. Vincent. I asked questions upon the subject from time to time, and about 12 months ago a Member of this House was informed that the return of Ja Ja to his country, Opobo, was under the consideration of the Government. On August 13, 1890, a Despatch was sent to the administrator of the Island of St. Vincent, promising Ja Ja's liberation and his return to Opobo on condition that he conducted himself loyally to Her Majesty and abstained in future from all disturbances. Ja Ja, in a formal and written undertaking, at once accepted the conditions of the Despatch as preparatory to his transference to his native country. On the 11th December following the right hon. Gentleman informed me that Ja Ja's health was unsatisfactory, and added that his return was inexpedient before a more effective form of administration had been established at Opobo. But I hold that a promise deliberately given in Her Majesty's name ought to have been observed. If the condition of Opobo was not satisfactory, that was the fault of the Government, who had charge there for three years. This state of things lasted a little time, and then Ja Ja was removed to Barbadoes, and not to his native country. His doctors, I believe, had recommended a change. He sailed thence, some weeks back, on his way to Opobo, and got to Teneriffe on June 7th, and died there without reaching his native land. I think in this matter somebody has blundered, and blundered badly. Not to have fulfilled the promise made was most injudicious and unwise, and we shall have potentates on the West Coast of Africa placing less reliance on the representations of this country than ought to be placed upon them. I think the cause of the blunder ought to be brought to light, and I hope that in future our relations with the native races on the West Coast of Africa will be free from a repetition of such deplorable blunders.

*(4.52.) SIR E. BIRKBECK (Norfolk, E.): To return for one moment to the question of the liquor traffic among the deep-sea fishermen, I would observe that it is a crying evil which has been fully realised by the North Sea fishermen. Many lives have been lost in consequence entirely through the worst descriptions of liquors supplied by the floating grog-shops, though the evil has been greatly mitigated mainly through the instrumentality of the Mission to the Deep-Sea Fishermen. But if the French Government do not carry out the engagement into which they entered, I am afraid there will be a revival of this liquor traffic. I hope my right hon. Friend will do the utmost in his power to bring about a completion of the Convention.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I wish to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the exiles, Arabi and his friends, at Ceylon. I am not going into the merits or demerits of the question. I merely wish to point out that Arabi and the other exiles wish to be transferred to a more healthy place. I have here a letter from Sir A. Campbell to Sir William Gregory, Governor of Ceylon, stating that the exiles are in bad health. They might be removed to Aden or to the place opposite, but that would be a miserable place.

SIR J. FERGUSSON: They suggested Zeyla themselves.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Yes; but I think it would be a mistake, there being a great scarcity of water there. With regard to Cyprus, there is the technical difficulty that it is in the Ottoman dominions; but the exiles might give a pledge that they would not leave Cyprus if they preferred to go there. They have not any means of their own; they are educated Mahomedans with their families, and are dependent upon an allowance from the Egyptian Government, which is handed to the British Government to be doled out to them.

What they desire is, that they shall be removed to a place where the climate is better than that of Ceylon.

*(4.56.) DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I wish to call attention to alleged outrages inflicted on British subjects by the Portuguese authorities in South Africa. The seizure of the Countess of Carnarvon took place some months ago, and a statement has been made on the subject by a Portuguese Minister in the Portuguese Parliament. I have repeatedly asked questions in this House on the subject without getting a satisfactory reply. I have been told that the case has come before a Portuguese Court, and that the vessel has been released on the undertaking of the Vice Consul, that the owners will abide by any agreement come to between the British and Portuguese Governments regarding her. Beyond that, the right hon. Gentleman has told me that the information he possesses is still incomplete, and that he is unable to produce any Papers on the subject. Here we have the seizure of a vessel on the allegation made, on the one hand, that she was carrying a contraband cargo of arms, and, on the other hand, that the nature of her cargo by no means justified the seizure. Again, we have not had the facts given us; and I submit that when an event of this kind occurs affecting a great commercial nation like Great Britain, the House of Commons is surely entitled to a statement of the facts and to know what steps are being taken for the protection of British interests abroad. Then came the attack on Sir John Willoughby's expedition. Two or three vessels connected with that were laid hold of by the Portuguese authorities. Again we had contradictory statements of facts, and again the right hon. Gentleman told us he had not received complete information, although statements were made in the Portuguese Parliament. I think it is not creditable to the Foreign Office that this country should be so far behind Portugal in acquainting itself with the real facts of the case. This seizure by the Portuguese was followed in a few weeks by an attack on the expedition of Major Johnston, also on the Pungwé River. Here again took place the seizure of a vessel and the hauling down of our flag—a stereotyped form of outrage in these regions. The House of Commons, I maintain, is entitled to full information as to the facts relating to these cases, which involve the alleged violation of our flag and outrages upon subjects who may or may not have been pursuing a perfectly lawful business, but who are British subjects, in whose doings and sufferings the country must necessarily be interested. I trust that the right hon. Gentleman will be able to supplement the information on the subject, and to promise us Papers regarding it.

*(5.5.) MR. LEVESON - GOWER (Stoke-upon-Trent): I desire to direct the attention of the Committee to the omission of political economy as one of the compulsory subjects of examination for the Diplomatic and Foreign Office Service. These examinations have recently been amalgamated. Previously political economy was compulsory for the Diplomatic Service Examination, but not for the Foreign Office; but now it is altogether omitted from the list of compulsory subjects. Though it is true that the elimination of this subject has been recommended by the Royal Commission which recently sat on Civil Service Establishments, I yet consider it to be a subject worthy of the attention of the Committee, especially in view of the fact that many salutary changes proposed by the Royal Commission have been more or less studiously disregarded by the Government. In my opinion, it is quite as needful for our Representatives abroad to be equipped with the best knowledge practicable as it is needful for the Army and Navy to be equipped with weapons of offence and defence or for a barrister to be equipped with a knowledge of law and the contents of his brief. It is of importance to the great industrial centres of the country to know that this subject is not being overlooked. It is necessary that our Representatives abroad should be able to hold their own against foreign Representatives in regard to commercial matters. I noticed the other day that in an examination paper set by the Belgian Foreign Office commercial subjects held a prominent position, and I am sure the right hon. Gentleman would not wish that our Representatives should in this matter be at a disadvantage. We have already had some very able Commercial Reports by members of our Diplomatic Service, among them being Mr. Kennedy's on Italy, and Mr. Arthur Hardinge's on Spain. These are greatly valued in commercial circles, and the appearance of similar Reports is awaited with much interest. I do not know that political economy is a subject which is naturally acquired late in life, and it seems to me far better to interest a young man in it, whilst if he is taken through the elementary drudgery connected with it he is more likely to continue to study it than if it is left to mere chance. We have been told that for political economy an extra European language has been substituted—that a knowledge of either Italian or Spanish is required. I have not a word to say against the acquisition of extra languages by members of our Diplomatic Service, but I submit that it is far easier for a young man of intelligence and ability to pick up a language during a few months' residence in a country than it is to take up a subject like political economy. Therefore, I would urge that political economy should be retained as a compulsory subject. We who represent great commercial districts which send goods to every quarter of the globe cannot too strongly insist on the importance of this. I will give an illustration of how English goods get abroad. A friend of mine who was travelling in Africa was possessed of a handsome pair of revolvers which attracted the admiration of a Native Chief. The Chief first offered palm oil and ivory, but my friend not requiring such things refused. Then the Chief offered him a slave; that, too, he was obliged to decline, and at last by a happy inspiration the Chief produced a soup tureen, which on examination was found to have been manufactured by a firm in my constituency. I can only say, in conclusion, I hope the right hon. Gentleman will explain the reasons for the change in the curriculum.

(5.15.) MR. PICTON: I should like to say a few words in support of the appeal of my hon. Friend. The Reports on commercial matters which have of late years been produced by various members of the Diplomatic Service have proved of considerable value not only to Members of this House, but also to those engaged in business, and I venture to say they could not have been drawn up by anyone entirely ignorant of the principles of political economy. Again, labour questions are now very much to the fore, and everyone knows how political economy is involved in the consideration of them. I think we shall lose very much, indeed, if we allow young men to enter the Diplomatic Service without a substantial knowledge of political economy, and I cannot understand why in the world it was dropped from the list of compulsory subjects. As to the recommendation of the Royal Commission, all I can venture to say, speaking from experience, is that any recommendation by a Commission seems to afford a strong reason for the Government adopting a very opposite view.

*(5.20.) MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, E.): I should like to supplement the questions which have been put to the right hon. Gentleman by my hon. Friend the Member for the College Division of Glasgow. I understand that my hon. Friend has dealt particularly with the various attacks on British ships on the Limpopo and other rivers, and no doubt this was one of the most difficult points in connection with the recent settlement of South African affairs. I hope the Government will take care that it shall be made absolutely clear in future that there shall be thoroughly unimpeded communication by means of the South African rivers between South Central Africa and the Coast, and that the Articles in our Treaties will be fairly and thoroughly carried out for the benefit of our traders and settlers in that region. There is considerable ignorance as to the actual navigation of many of these rivers, and I hope Her Majesty's Government will take care that in the event of other discoveries being made the arrangements with Portugal shall be sufficiently elastic, so as to enable us to take advantage of the best navigable routes into the interior, and that they shall be effectively open to our commerce. I wish to ask the intentions of the Government with regard to the presence of Gungunhana's Envoys in this country. No doubt those Envoys represent accurately the feelings of their fellow-countrymen when they say they would be safer under our protection. I hope that whatever we may do, and whatever reception may be accorded to them, it will, at least, show that the Government been taken for the protection alike of British subjects and natives. Indeed, instructions, based on the principles to which I have referred, have been given to all the officers recently appointed, with the object, if possible, of avoiding the difficulties which previously beset us in Africa and of removing abuses which have long afflicted that part of the world.

*(5.47.) SIR WALTER FOSTER: I think the right hon. Gentleman's explanation with reference to the prolonged delay in dealing with ex-King Ja Ja is not satisfactory. I think that Major MacDonald ought long ago to have reached Teneriffe and taken Ja Ja to his own home. I wish all the more to call attention to the matter and to ask for information about it, because it has been stated that the Opobo territory is likely to become a British possession. If so, what a lurid light it throws upon the proceedings of the Government! Several years ago the King was kidnapped, placed on board a vessel of war, subjected to an irregular trial, and then sent to St. Vincent. At the end of three years—the British Government administering his territory in the meantime—it is decided that he shall return home on certain conditions, which are duly exacted from him. Still there is further and most unjust delay, and finally the King dies while in the hands of the Government without having received justice. Then it is that we hear for the first time that it is intended to make a British colony of the King's territory. I contend that the delay of which the Government is guilty in this matter and the whole history of the case are very discreditable. I hope we shall hear a repudiation of the rumour that it is intended to make this addition to our possessions in Africa, for the Oil River Settlement is not a healthy district, and its possession would not lead to either our commercial or general prosperity.

*(5.50.) MR. HENEGE (Great Grimsby): I think the real facts with regard to the delay shown by the French Government in observing and carrying out the regulations of the North Sea Fisheries Convention are hardly sufficiently before the House. Nearly four years have passed without any steps being taken by the French Government, although I believe all the other countries interested have promoted the necessary legislation. Now, we are told that France has not ratified the Convention, and Her Majesty's Government know nothing about what they are going to do. I should like to point out that we are likely to get into very serious difficulties because, under the 7th Article of the Convention, the citizens of any nation have a right to interfere with the so-called grog-boats. This is a very serious matter, and I really think the Government ought to see whether anything cannot be done to induce the French Government to carry out the Convention so as to prevent difficulties arising from conflict with French grog-boats.

(5.53.) MR. MORTON: I should like to say a word or two in favour of Arabi Pacha. It is all nonsense to say he was condemned by the Egyptian Government. It was the British Government that condemned him, and the Egyptian Government had no more to do with the matter than my umbrella. If it is a fact that the reforms of which we hear so much have been carried out by the British Government in Egypt, surely there ought to be no difficulty whatever in allowing this very able gentleman to return to his country, and spend the rest of his days there. I trust the right hon. Gentleman, who I know is not responsible for the detention of these exiles, will ask Lord Salisbury to reconsider this matter with the Egyptian Government.

(5.56.) MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.): I wish to draw the right hon. Gentleman's attention to the question of emigration to the Brazils. A considerable number of the emigrants who have gone there went from my own constituency, and the privations they have undergone are something terrible. It is desirable that something should be done, not only for those who are already sufferers, but to prevent others going to Brazil. Would it not be possible to put into the hands of intending emigrants the most reliable information as to the position in which British emigrants find themselves in Brazil?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I do not think that anything more thorough can be done than is being done now for the advice, the direction, and protection of emigrants. I am constantly in communication with the Emigrants' Information Office on the subject. That office sends out large posters to every Post Office in the Kingdom, and to a great many other buildings giving all the information they can, and warning emigrants against going to unsuitable countries. In spite of the plainest warnings against going to Brazil, emigrants have continued to go there in large numbers. It is extraordinary to see how large the credulity of some people is, and how difficult it is, short of using actual restraint, to prevent them going to unsuitable places. Charitable contributions have been forwarded from Bradford to distressed British emigrants in Brazil, and means have been taken, I think, to send some of the people home.

*(6.0.) MR. LEVESON-GOWER: I confess I am disappointed with the reply of the right hon. Gentleman in reference to the subject I brought under his notice, namely, the exclusion of political economy from the examination subjects for candidates for the Foreign Office and Diplomatic Service. The right hon. Gentleman says it is a subject which can easily be "got up," and that the knowledge derived from the study of text-books cannot be very valuable. But that is an argument which can be brought against any subject for examination. I cannot see that the right hon. Gentleman has met my argument that knowledge on the subject would be a useful equipment for candidates, and as a protest I shall move a reduction of the Vote by £100.

(6.2.) MR. BRYCE: If my hon. Friend desires to take a Division I may, before we pass from this subject, refer to another change in the regulations, which provides that examinations in history shall begin with 1789 and go down to 1871. This excludes knowledge of the events which led up to the Revolution, and the state of Europe before that time, and such an examination cannot, I think, be called eminently satisfactory. The right hon. Gentleman says political economy is only got up as a cram subject. Well, I remember a well-known tutor at Cambridge, who used to divide subjects into three divisions, translation, composition, and cram. The right hon. Gentleman seems to adopt a similar classification, for I do not know any other subject that would not come under his definition of "cram." It is only a "cram" subject in the hands of an incompetent examiner, but under competent examiners there is no subject which better tests a man's power of thinking and applying principles to facts than political economy, and it is a subject eminently suited for candidates for the Foreign Office and Diplomatic Service. There is no more important Department of the Foreign Office than that which concerns our commercial relations all over the world, and the Consular Reports, which are becoming increasingly useful to the commercial classes of the community, require for their preparation considerable knowledge of the underlying principles of political economy. I hope the Committee will take the opportunity of showing the importance attached to this study by expressing the opinion that it is a subject which ought to be included in these examinations. It is a subject not to be dispensed with, and which a man is well able to study at the age of 23.

(6.4) MR. LABOUCHERE: I hope the right hon. Gentleman will yield on this point. I think he must admit that it would be an advantage to the country if Consuls and members of the Diplomatic Service had some knowledge of political economy. I say this, not because I am myself a great believer in political economy, but if it is to be a choice between knowing and not knowing, I think it is better that a member of the Diplomatic Service should have the knowledge. There is, be it remembered, an enormous demand for places in the Diplomatic Service, and we may be quite sure there will be no lack of applicants if this subject is included in the examinations. A main point in the qualifications of a diplomatist or Consul is that he should know foreign languages, and, after that, what we want is an able, all-round man. The best diplomatists in the world are, I believe, admitted to be the Russians. I have a Russian friend, now a Minister, and I remember on one occasion asking him about these examinations, and he said, "I passed my examination very much to my own surprise, for I thought I displayed very little knowledge of the subjects in which I was examined. Still, I came out among the first. Having an acquaintance with one of the examiners, I afterwards asked him how it was I was passed, and he replied, 'We perceived that you knew nothing about the subject, yet so cleverly did you conceal your ignorance that we came to the conclusion that you were eminently fitted for a diplomatist.'" Well, the opinion was justified; he has been successful, and is an Ambassador somewhere now. This is a very small point the hon. Member has raised, and I think the right hon. Gentleman might as well yield it.

(6.6.) MR. PICTON: The right hon. Gentleman admitted what the hon. Member said as to the advantage of knowledge on this subject, but he said it was knowledge a man could acquire after entering upon his duties. Of course, we are all learning while our life lasts, but we have to consider what is most necessary as equipment before entering upon a profession. Subjects have degrees of importance. Composition is important, but proficiency is not to be obtained in a short time, and study in this branch must continue after entering the service. It is far more important that a candidate should be grounded in a knowledge of political economy than that he should be master of an elegant style of expression. The importance of the subject is admitted, and yet composition is given the first place. I am glad the hon. Member is going to take a Division, and I shall vote with him as expressing the opinion that political economy is an essential subject in the education of a diplomatist.

Original Question again proposed.

*(6.20.) MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I rise to move a reduction of the Vote by £200, part of the salary of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and I do so with the object of calling the attention of the Committee to the continued misgovernment that prevails in the Asiatic dominions of the Sultan, and especially in Turkish Armenia. Perhaps I shall be asked by some hon. Gentlemen why I confine my attention to Armenia; why I do not include within the scope of my observations all other parts of the Ottoman dominions that remain under the direct rule of the Turk? Everywhere, I may be told, where the Turk exercises authority and sway, there tyranny and oppression are to be found. That is perfectly true, and I have not a word to say in favour of the direct rule of the Turk over any Christian population in any portion of the Ottoman dominions. The Christians of Macedonia have wrongs to be righted just as much as the Christians of Armenia, and whenever the time arrives for the Slavs and Greeks of Macedonia to be re-united with their liberated brethren in free Servia, free Bulgaria, and free Greece, I, for one, shall very heartily rejoice. My hon. Friend the Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) told us last night that diplomatists were among the most ignorant of men. I do not know what may be the opinion of diplomatists in regard to this Eastern question, but men who do not close their eyes to facts must be aware that the Ottoman Power is, and has long been, on the decline. The Turk has been got rid of in Hungary, in Servia, in Bulgaria, and in the liberated portion of Greece. I trust the time is not far distant when the Turkish authority will disappear from Macedonia and Crete as well. But, on the present occasion, I desire to call the attention of the Committee to the case of Armenia, and I do so because in my humble judgment the case of Armenia is the most urgent case so far as the Turkish Empire is concerned, and because, also, it happens that in regard to Armenia we have fuller information than we possess in regard to the Christian populations in the European provinces of the Sultan. The Armenians, by universal acknowledgment, are an enterprising, intelligent, and industrious people. There are, I suppose, 5,000,000 of the race in various parts of the world, and of these we may say 3,000,000 are to be found within the dominions of the Sultan; 1,750,000 are subjects of the Czar, and 250,000 are under the authority of the Shah of Persia. It is with the 3,000,000 of Armenians who are subjects of the Sultan, or rather with that portion of them inhabiting Turkish Armenia, that I am now and here more particularly concerned. What is the condition of Turkish Armenia at the present time? Everyone who has made himself acquainted with the facts as they have recently been made known will agree with me that the condition of affairs is most deplorable. A description of the state of Armenia at the present time offers another exemplification of the truth of the proverbial saying, "Where the Sultan's horse-hoof treads grass never grows again."

"Byzantines boast that on the clod

Now, the elementary duty of every Government is to protect the lives and property of its subjects. If that be a proper definition of government, then the government of the Sublime Porte fails in its most elementary duty. Instead of protecting its subjects it joins in plundering them, and hence it has been said, and rightly said, that the rule of the Turks is not a government at all, but a "system of organised brigandage." In support of my contention that anarchy reigns in Turkish Armenia, and that the elementary principles of government are not to be found in that country. I can quote from the Blue Books recently presented to Parliament, and more especially from the Despatches of Her Majesty's Consuls. The late Mr. Clifford Lloyd was some time Her Majesty's Consul at Erzeroum, and when I quote his words I think hon. Members who remember incidents in Mr. Lloyd's earlier career will admit that that gentleman was not likely to have been influenced by an undue regard for popular sentiment and popular opinion.

"I regret to state," wrote Mr. Clifford Lloyd in October last, "the Armenian peasantry in the Passen Plain and the valley of Alashgird have suffered severely from the attacks of the neighbouring Kurds. I believe that every Christian village in the Passen Valley has been plundered, at least 2,282 sheep, 754 head of cattle, 20 horses, and 31 asses having been carried away to the mountains. The Mussulman villages are reported to have been exempt from the visits of these robbers."

It will be observed that these Kurdish robbers make distinctions, exempting the Moslem villages from their incursions, so that there is an organised system in their ravages. Mr. Clifford Lloyd goes on to say—

"In the valley of Alashgird, at a short distance from the Passen Plain, of which it may be said to be a continuation, the Kurds have acted in a similar manner, burning crops they could not carry away, and adding to their crimes the murder of at least three Christians. My information," continues our late Consul, "leads me to believe that the condition of the Alashgird Valley is one of extreme gravity, and that, in the hope of obtaining the protection of the Russian Government, the inhabitants are making arrangements to enter the Greek Church."

All this, it will be observed, is happening close to the Russian frontier and within easy reach of the capital of the province Erzeroum, where Her Majesty's Consulate is stationed. Now, if this is the case near the frontier and within the range of European influence, we may rely upon it that the condition of things in the interior is even worse than that which I have just described. Indeed, such we know to be the case, for in August last Vice-Consul Devey was sent by Mr. Clifford Lloyd to Bitlis and Van to investigate and report upon the condition of affairs, especially in the Moush Plain. During his journey he tells us he ascertained there had been of late an unusual number of crimes of violence and aggression on the part of Kurds plundering Armenians. He adds that—

"The Armenians generally seemed to be in a state of abject terror, afraid for their lives."

That the Armenians should be in a state of abject terror is, under the circumstances of the case, precisely what we should expect. They are unarmed and helpless; the Kurds are armed, and their proceedings are applauded or connived at by the authorities. Kurdish Chiefs were recently received in public audience by the Sultan, who conferred on them decorations and presents. The Under Secretary of State has compared the arming of the Kurds to the arming of some of the native tribes in India, but there is this difference, I think, that the native tribes in India have been commanded by European officers, whereas, in the case of the Kurds, they are not put under European officers at all. These brigand chiefs are themselves to command their own retainers. Well, to go on with the evidence, Mr. Clifford Lloyd wrote to Sir William White—

"As your Excellency is aware, the Kurds are armed, and the Christian peasants unarmed and helpless. The latter sow, and the former appropriate the harvest to their own wants, while, to gratify their instincts, they often burn and destroy what they do not appropriate. Owing to these circumstances, the peasants get into arrears in the payment of taxes, the collection of which proceeds by arbitrary and sometimes by cruel methods on the part of subordinate officials, and redress in the one case and the other being, for various reasons, refused or withheld, the Christian peasants are reduced to a state of abject poverty, fear, and discontent, and any combination for the purpose of petitioning the Government for assistance and consideration is met by the application of those measures only excusable in the case of a people plotting revolution. This the Armenian population in this country are far from contemplating."

There can be little doubt, then, that the Christians are being treated with the utmost cruelty in Turkish Armenia. I am informed that there are at this moment some 600 Armenians in the prisons in Cilicia (in Adana, Sis and other districts), 90 in prison at Erzeroum, and 9 exiled to Fezzan. More recent testimony declares that Vartan Caloustian died in prison at Constantinople in May after he had been detained six months without a trial. Some of the charges brought against these men are of the most trumpery character. For example, men are imprisoned because they have amongst their books and papers a "History of Armenia," published in Venice. The House will agree with me that petty tyranny could not go much further than the Sublime Porte has found the means of going in the Turkish Province of Armenia. But there is still more recent evidence than that of the late Mr. Clifford Lloyd. Mrs. Bishop, better known as Miss Isabella Bird, in the late autumn and early winter of 1890, traversed the country from one end to the other, from Urmi to Trebizond, from the Persian frontier to the Black Sea. In a couple of articles entitled "The Shadow of the Kurd," which were published in the Contemporary Review for May and June, she says—

"From the Persian frontier, a few miles from Urmi, along a more or less travelled route of several hundred miles, there was, generally speaking, no security for life, property, or traffic."

"15,000 sheep were driven off from the Gawar Plain, between June 1 and October 18, 1890, chiefly by the Harikis, a tribe of Kurdish nomads."

Mr. Summers

She agrees with Mr. Clifford Lloyd in holding that the Government abets and connives at outrage. Mr. Lloyd published a most important Minute on October 2nd, in which he proved conclusively the responsibility of the local authorities and the Imperial authorities for the misgovernment of this Province. He wrote—

"In all crimes of violence of which the Christians have been the victims during the past year in the Province of Erzeroum, no one has been punished, nor, with very few exceptions, has any effort been even made to bring the offenders to justice."

Now, I want to know whether the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs has any further information upon this question, whether he can tell us, for instance, if it is not the fact that the Mahommedans who butchered Christians in Erzeroum in June last still remain unpunished?

"There can be no doubt," writes Mr. Bishop, "that the local authorities always side with the Kurds against the Christians, and connive at their oppressions and outrages."

Nor is that all. Not only does the Turkish Government connive at these outrages, but when the Christians have been fleeced by the incursions of the Kurds, there comes along the Turkish taxgatherer, who cruelly maltreats the Christians because, after they have been robbed, they are unable to pay the taxes. Mrs. Bishop tells us—

"The cruel wrong inflicted upon the Christians is that taxes are demanded from them which the Kurds have left them without the means of paying. The villagers north and west of Lake Van complained that they were mercilessly beaten when they failed to produce money for the taxes. The Zaptiehs tied their hands behind their backs, plastered their faces with fresh cow-dung, threw pails of cold water at their eyes, tied them to the wooden posts of their houses, and beat them severely. In a certain village it was said that the Zaptiehs had tied 20 defaulters together, and had driven them barefooted round and round over the threshles of a threshing floor, flogging them with their heavy riding whips."

Well, I say I have proved conclusively my point that there is no security for life or property at this moment in Turkish Armenia. There is another crying grievance under which the Christians of Armenia are suffering. Their women and girls are being constantly maltreated and abducted. Here, again, the authorities give their assent:

and consent to outrage. A legal sanction is given to abduction. The process is this: when the relatives present themselves in court to claim the abducted victim the ravishers are ready with a brace of Moslem witnesses, who declare on oath that the kidnapped woman pronounced in their presence the regular formula of the Moslem faith, "There is no God but God, and Mahomet is his prophet." The evidence on the other side is not heard, or, if it is heard, no heed whatever is paid to it. My hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, at an earlier stage of this evening's proceedings, directed the attention of the Committee to the case of Miss Katie Greenfield, and it is a case which I hope will receive the careful attention of Her Majesty's Government, and as to which I trust they will be able to give some particulars to the Committee. Miss Katie Greenfield is the daughter of an English lady, who is a landowner in a village 45 miles east of So-uj-bulak, near the North-West Frontier of Persia. She is 14 years of age. Last May she was out walking with her servant, an old Kurdish woman, when she was suddenly seized and carried away by a horseman of the name of Aziz, who had been lying in ambush with three other Kurds. They profess that she has become a Moslem, and they refuse to allow the British Consul, Mr. Paton, to have access to her. Some of those who are detaining her are Ottoman subjects, and the Porte, according to its wont, declines to take effective measures for her release. But some hon. Members may say that, whilst the case of Miss Greenfield is one in which we can rightly and properly interfere, because she is a British subject, we have no right or title to interfere in the case of the Armenian Christians. The Under Secretary may get up once again and make another speech which practically amounts to asking the question—"What have we to do with the matter? Am I my brother's keeper?" The hon. Member for Leicester referred to a time—some 200 years ago—when the voice of this country in foreign affairs was a potent voice. The great protector had only to have brought before him cases of gross outrage and abuse, and he spoke out in thunder tones. Did Cromwell ask "Am I my brother's keeper?" at the time of the massacres in Piedmont? Did Milton, when in Cromwell's name he wrote the State letters to the Duke of Savoy, and penned the immortal sonnet beginning with the lines:—

"Avenge, O Lord, Thy slaughtered saints, whose bones
Lie scattered on the Alpine mountains cold!"

In these matters I say we have a right to interfere, and that not only on grounds of humanity, for the very simple reason that we have contracted distinct and definite responsibilities. Our responsibility is immediate and direct. The Turk is kept on his legs by the divisions, and rivalries, and jealousies of the European Powers. The 16th Article of the Treaty of San Stefano gave Russia the sole protectorate over Armenia. But on May 30, 1878, a Convention was made between this country and Russia, wherein it was agreed that the Protectorate should be jointly shared by the two contracting States. Then came the Treaty of Berlin, the 61st Article of which says —

"The Sublime Porte undertakes to carry out without further delay the improvements and reforms demanded by local requirements in the provinces inhabited by the Armenians, and to guarantee their security against the Circassians and Kurds. It will make known periodically to the Powers who will superintend their application, the measures that may be adopted for the fulfilment of this object."

Twelve years have elapsed since the signing of that Convention, and yet nothing has been done, and things have gone from bad to worse. How long is this state of things to be allowed to endure? It is a scandal and a disgrace to Christendom, and not a moment ought to be lost in inducing the Powers of Europe to put such pressure upon the Porte as will induce it to do justice to a long-suffering people, and let the oppressed go free. I beg to move the reduction of the Vote.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That item A, of £47,460, Salaries, be reduced by £200, part of the salary of the Secretary of State."—(Mr. Summers.)

*(6.43.) MR. LEVESON-GOWER: It is with a certain amount of regret that one feels the necessity of telling the same old tale of suffering and misery on the one side, and of oppression, apathy and inertness on the other. But if one is forced to do so, it is because the facts are still the same. There is no improvement, so far as can be seen, in the state of affairs in that part of Europe to which reference has been made—indeed, if anything, things have gone from bad to worse. Mrs. Bishop, who with an intrepidity, and at the same time I think I can say with an impartiality which do alike credit to her courage and her judgment, has traversed this wild country in pursuit of truth, and that without Party bias of any sort, as I think the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary will himself admit after hearing her very lucid and interesting exposition of her experiences given in a Committee Room of this House not very long ago. The Armenians are not the only persons suffering from the present state of things in that part of the world, but there is also a small community of Nestorian Christians poorer and more destitute of resources than the Armenians themselves. These people dwell chiefly on the Persian frontier, but are exposed to the same exactions and tyranny as the Christian Armenians. As far as I can judge, the origin of this evil is twofold. It lies in the activity of the Kurds and the hopeless irremediable apathy of the Turkish Government and those placed in authority under it. It is said that the Kurds are naturally a wild and nomadic race, whom it is impossible to reduce to subjection. I would point out, however, that on the other side of the Turko-Persian frontier there is a population of 30,000 Christians living in the plain of Urmi in comparative content and quiet, although there are Kurds in the same district, and their co-religionists on the Turkish side of the frontier are exposed to molestations and oppression. Now, what is the reason for this better condition of affairs here? The reason is that 10 years ago the Persian Government felt that the condition of affairs in the frontier provinces was so bad that they read the Kurds a severe lesson, and since then they have adopted agricultural pursuits, and have ceased to plunder the Christian inhabitants. I say, therefore, that what is possible in Persia is also possible in Turkey if the right means of going to work are adopted. Since the troubles in Erzeroum in October last, matters have distinctly and decidedly become worse. According to Mrs.

Mr. Leveson-Gower

Bishop, the Kurdish population are armed with modern rifles, a constant search is made for arms in Christian houses, and no disarmament of the Kurds takes place. Indeed, the Kurds are being enrolled by the Turkish Government and formed into a kind of irregular militia—a very irregular militia I should say. I quite admit that the intentions of the Turkish Government in this matter may be good. They may think that by putting these people under discipline, however irregular, they are conferring a benefit on the country they inhabit, but whatever the intention of the Government may be, it is not looked on by the Beys and Kurds in that light at all. We are informed that after being enrolled by Zekki Pasha, Commander of the Fourth Army Corps at Eryingian, many of these Kurds passed through the Christian bazaars making gestures in imitation of cutting throats, and told the Armenian merchants they now had the Government on their side. It is also the custom of these armed Kurds to go to the Christian villages to demand whatever they may think fit, practising a system of “forced loans” similar to the “benevolences” of Charles I., and to threaten to kill, and in many cases actually to kill, when their demands are not complied with. There is an impression in many quarters that the Kurds deliberately adopt this policy in the belief that a general massacre would call the attention and arouse the indignation of Europe to their proceedings, but that if they only kill individuals not so much notice will be taken of the matter. Instances of outrage are reported in consequence of which men who at one time were in affluence are now in the lowest depths of poverty, and reduced actually to begging corn for a livelihood. It should be remembered also that these scenes have not occurred in wild, unfrequented districts, but in fertile plains crossed by good roads and the telegraph. As an instance of how Christian villages are plundered, I may mention that from a group of Christian villages in the Pasin Plain, within a comparatively short time, 754 cattle were driven away by the Kurds, while the Mussulman villages were left untouched, showing that it is not merely plunder, but a systematic attack which is made on the Christian population. In that state of things it would not be surprising if there were some disloyalty among the Christians. But I am informed that there is not; that while among the educated Christians there may be some desire for a change of Government, among the lower or peasant order their whole desire is that they should be left to enjoy their property securely and in peace. They will welcome relief from whichever quarter it may come. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he can point to any amelioration or real act of protection during the past year; whether he can deny that the present state of things in Armenia is worse than it was in the summer of last year before the Erzeroum massacres? Our remonstrances are apparently disregarded because there is so little backbone in them. The Sultan's advisers know perfectly well that there is nothing behind those remonstrances. If it were otherwise a very different line of action would be adopted. I believe that if our Government saw fit to take decided action to show that there was something behind our remonstrance more than mere words, they would find a very appreciable difference not only in the tone of the replies but in the action of the Turkish Government towards the Christian populations.

*(7.2.) MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): I rise to express my sympathy with the Armenian nation in their sufferings, and to express my satisfaction that we have now before this House and the country the evidence of an absolutely impartial witness. The Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs has previously pointed out that there was a suspicion that our information with regard to the treatment of the Armenians came from a tainted origin. I now call attention to the independent testimony of Mrs. Bishop, who went to Armenia rather prejudiced against the Armenians. When, however, she saw the sufferings to which they are subjected, the quietness of their habits, and their devotion to agriculture, she changed her opinion entirely, and has written a very realistic and truthful account of what she saw. No impartial person can read the account in the Contemporary Review, or have listened to the address she delivered in the Conference Room of this House, without feeling indignation. Her account is one long narration of violence, arson, robbery, and murder, and I am glad to know that she has left the names of the individual cases to which she refers in her articles in the hands of the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs. She has not been able to give them publicly for reasons which can easily be imagined. In describing her journey, Mrs. Bishop says that at one place where she slept she heard "volleys fired all during the night." The Kurds, she says, took possession of nearly all the crops, leaving only sufficient to ensure that the farmers would have the means of furnishing a future crop when the Kurds should again come that way. The hon. Member for Huddersfield has mentioned a case in which 2,282 sheep and 754 head of cattle were carried off within the year in one valley. But I think the instances given by other speakers are quite enough to convince us that the state of Armenia is at the present time deplorable. The marauders do not call it robbery, but "making demands," and the Kurds imagine that by what are called "individual murders" rather than massacres they will not attract the notice of the great Powers. Mrs. Bishop states that many of these robberies and murders take place within the reach of the Army Corps of the Sultan, and that troops could easily be employed in overawing and controlling the Kurds. It seems to me that the force which is employed to obtain the taxes from the Armenians should be employed in defending them. Mrs. Bishop says that the cruel wrong is that taxes are demanded from the Christians which the Kurds have not left them the means of paying. It is hard to squeeze blood out of a stone, and it seems to me that the Turkish method of extracting taxes from the Christians is of the most cruel description. The position of affairs in Armenia cries out for a remedy, and I believe there are many ways in which Her Majesty's Government might bring pressure to bear upon the Porte—means which it may not be wise or politic to mention in debate. All I can say is that the question is no longer one of politics, but of humanity.

(7.10.) MR. LEGH (Lancashire, S.W., Newton): I think the position of this question in that part of the world to which the hon. Member has referred is in all probability worse than it is in any other portion of the Turkish Dominions. From my own experience, Christian subjects of the Porte in Europe are at all events well able to look after themselves, and if not they are carefully looked after. I think there is some slight exaggeration in the accounts we have received of these Armenian grievances. I have listened to Mrs. Bishop's account of her tour in Armenia, and I have come to the conclusion that there must be some slight pardonable exaggeration in her statement, and I infer that if her account were absolutely correct it would be practically impossible for any Christian to live in Armenia. [An hon. MEMBER: "It is so."] The hon. Member opposite differs from me. I have no doubt that what is going on now in Armenia has been going on for many hundreds of years. I think it will be found, if the Armenian Blue Books are carefully perused, that some of this agitation as to the Armenian atrocities is due to the Daily News correspondents at Odessa and other places, and also to a body of wealthy gentlemen styled the Armenian Patriotic Association, established in Manchester. I have no doubt that these influential Armenians are able to make their influence felt, and to get up an agitation in respect of their country. The hon. Member opposite found fault with Her Majesty's Government. I presume that the liability of the Government in regard to the Armenians of Asia Minor is owing generally to the Cyprus Convention and our occupation of Cyprus. Perhaps I may be allowed to point out that the Cyprus Convention was purely a conditional arrangement. We occupy Cyprus as long as Russia occupies Kars and Batoum; the moment she evacuates those places we shall evacuate Cyprus. We are supposed to guarantee the integrity of the Sultan's Asiatic Dominions on the condition that he gives reforms which everybody knows that he is not in the least likely to introduce—at any rate such reforms as will satisfy hon. Members opposite. Assuming we have any liability in this matter, I wish to ask how are we going to enforce our wishes?

We are, it is universally agreed, admirably represented by our present Ambassador at Constantinople, and there is no one who is likely to have as much influence with the Sultan as Sir William White. Still, it is not easy to convince a Foreign Government as to the course they ought to pursue, and the only means by which we are able to exercise pleasure is to cut off supplies or employ actual force. The first expedient is difficult, and the second is not to be thought of—at least I do not suppose hon. Members opposite will be inclined to advocate force. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian employed force in the case of Duncign, but fortunately in that instance, we were enabled to persuade the rest of the Powers to fall in with our views. It is difficult to persuade Foreign Courts to accept representations that are made to them. The House will recollect that we had representations made by an hon. Member of this House, and also by the Lord Mayor, to the Czar of Russia who, however, declined to receive either the representations made to him or the deputation it was proposed to send. In the same way the Sultan might refuse to listen to our representations, and our Ambassador would have no more right to interfere with Turkey than any other signatory Power which signed the Treaty of Berlin. We have not the means of bringing pressure to bear. If Russia wishes to bring pressure to bear she has the war indemnity at her back, and if the Sultan refuses to grant any wish Russia may express she has merely to remind him that the war indemnity is in arrear and she will get anything she wants. It should be pointed out to these Armenians in Manchester, and to other representatives of Armenia, that it is not the duty of this country to enter upon an Armenian crusade without the assistance of Europe, and that matters must be allowed to go on until Armenia at length becomes a Russian province, whatever we may say or do to the contrary.

(7.17.) MR. LABOUCHERE: I sympathise with a great many oppressed peoples; I sympathise with the Chinese as well as with the Armenians; but I cannot for the life of me understand why we are to look calmly on while the Chinese are oppressed, when at the same time we

Christian population. In that state of things it would not be surprising if there were some disloyalty among the Christians. But I am informed that there is not; that while among the educated Christians there may be some desire for a change of Government, among the lower or peasant order their whole desire is that they should be left to enjoy their property securely and in peace. They will welcome relief from whichever quarter it may come. I would ask the right hon. take any action in consequence? Mrs. Bishop has said little more than what has been stated in a briefer form by Mr. Clifford Lloyd. If the hon. Member will read the Report of Mr. Clifford Lloyd and the Minutes enclosed of October, 1890, he will see that they fully bear out the details of the reports made by Mrs. Bishop. I will ask hon. Members interested in this matter to compare Mrs. Bishop's account with Mr. Clifford Lloyd's Report. The hon. Member has compared remonstrance with the Sultan in regard to the Christians in Armenia with remonstrance with the Czar respecting the treatment of the Jews. But the two cases are radically different. The Jews in Russia are not under the protection of the Powers. We sympathise, of course, with the Jews, not only in Russia, but in other parts of Europe, and would all be glad if any Memorial or representation from this country could alleviate their suffering. But we clearly have no right to interfere. The treatment of the Jews by Russia is entirely a matter of domestic policy on her part, just as our government of Ireland is a matter of domestic policy on the part of the United Kingdom. We have no right, therefore, to officially interfere. As to the Sultan, the case is very different. The Christians of Armenia are under the protection of Europe. At first, by the Treaty of San Stefano, Russia undertook the protection of the Christians in Turkey. But that Treaty was objected to by Lord Salisbury. A Congress was called and met, and the result was the Treaty of Berlin, by which the Christians were withdrawn from the protection of Russia and placed, first under that of the Powers of Europe; and, secondly, under our own protection. We are much more bound morally than any other European Power, because we deprived these people by our action of the protection which Russia had guaranteed them. That is so under the Cyprus Convention, which, however, has been described as a lapsed engagement, and I hope that while the Government will lose no opportunity of impressing upon the Porte the fact that it is a lapsed engagement, it will not be forgotten that by it we undertook the protection of these Armenians. I submit, therefore, that there is a moral responsibility as well as a legal responsibility resting heavily on this country which amply justifies any representations that can be made to the Porte on the matter. There are one or two special points on which I should like to say a few words. The hon. Member for Huddersfield has referred to the arming of the Kurds. That act is a significant index of the attitude of the Turkish Government towards its Christian subjects. Here you have robber troops and fanatics living by plunder, and accustomed to descend upon their Christian neighbours, carrying off their flocks, abducting their children and killing them, chosen by the Turkish Government to be provided with a fuller equipment for their work of slaughter, pillage, and outrage. On a former occasion the Under Secretary compared the arming of the Kurds with what was done with the Highlanders of Scotland after the insurrection of 1745. But he should remember that these Highland regiments were sent to maintain the glory and increase the dominions of England abroad, that they were called upon to fight in all parts of the world, and that to them we owe many of our conquests. The case of the Kurds and the Highlanders cannot, therefore, be said to be parallel. For the arming of the Kurds it has also been attempted to find a parallel in Indian policy. But would not the parallel have been more complete if the fanatic troops of the Black Mountains on the borders of the Punjab had been planted in the North-West Provinces, and given an opportunity of murdering their Hindoo neighbours by the withdrawal of British Forces? I should like to ask whether the vacancy caused by the death of Mr. Clifford Lloyd in January has been filled up, and if not, why not? Is there any truth in the rumour that it is intended to make any alteration in the existing arrangements, and to transfer the Consulate from Erzeroum to Trebizond, having only a Vice Consul at the former place. Erzeroum is in the centre of Armenia; it is the place where conflicts have recently occurred, and we need there a man of force, of character and experience, and one who will have weight with the Pashas of the district. No doubt Trebizond is a good centre for the collecare to interfere in the case of the Armenians. If our representations as to the Armenians were to be listened to, I should have no objection to their being made, but representations have been made again and again on such subjects, and yet in all parts of the Turkish Empire Christians are oppressed. I admit that they are more oppressed in Armenia than in European Turkey, and for two reasons; one is that it is very difficult to get at the facts, and the other that Armenia is on the Russian frontier. In Armenia the people are divided between Kurds and Armenians. The Armenians are hostile to the Government of Turkey, and the Kurds are in favour of it; therefore, the Porte is necessarily obliged to accept the service of the Kurds to keep down the Armenians. The only way in which the Kurds are paid for their services is by allowing them to plague and oppress the Armenians. My hon. friend might have given the Committee some suggestions as to how he intends to remedy the present state of things. Representations to the Sultan are obviously useless. We do not, I presume, mean to use the Convention of Cyprus as a means of insisting on the establishment of good government in Armenia. We have to recognise on the other hand that we have guaranteed the whole of the Asiatic Dominions of the Turks. It is said we might bring all the great Powers unitedly to urge the Sultan to treat the Armenians better. But in the first place you would have great difficulty in the present state of Europe in getting all the signatories to the Berlin Treaty to act in the same way. In the second place, if you did this you would have the Turks saying they intend to do better, although in the end you would find they would not do better. What, then, will you do? Do you propose to give to Russia power to intervene, or do you propose to intervene yourselves? If we intervene we shall want troops, and that would involve enormous cost. The only way is to put a ban on the Turks in Europe. They should be cleared out of Asia Minor and European Turkey, where they are nothing more than brigands, and cannot be regarded as really governing the country. They have oppressed all the subordinate races, and will continue to oppress them. Are you prepared to do this? The present Government are not. What, then, can we do? We can only leave things alone. We regret that the Armenians are ill-treated, just as we regret that the Chinese are ill-treated. I have no objection to Russia laying hold of Armenia or the whole of Asia Minor. I believe it would be a desirable thing that the Russians should have an outlet to the sea, because, until she gets that outlet, she will be continually disturbing the peace. I believe that much as we desire to see the Armenians relieved of their oppressors they will not cease to be oppressed, and that the best thing we can do is to encourage Russia to go there.

(7.25.) MR. BRYCE: I wish to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs intends to answer the observations of my hon. Friend?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I will give way to the hon. Member.

MR. BRYCE: I was somewhat anxious to hear what the Government had to say on this subject; but if the right hon. Gentleman refuses to reply, I feel it necessary to make a few observations. The hon. Member for the Newton Division of Lancashire observed that Mrs. Bishop's account was probably exaggerated, and that the present state of things had existed for hundreds of years. I think he was hardly correct in that, although, no doubt, the state of things has not been satisfactory for a long time in Asia Minor, where the Christian population has had a good deal to suffer. I believe the extraordinary occurrences there and the exasperation and disorder which have occurred are mainly due to the late war. The Kurds were armed, their possessions were lost, and the Turks being annoyed because of what had occurred in Bulgaria, began to oppress the Christians more severely than before. If the Armenians are not entirely extirpated, it is not because the state of things is exaggerated. For my part, I have been unable to find the least exaggeration, and I believe that Mrs. Bishop has given to the Foreign Office a circumstantial statement of the names, places, and dates which she has referred to in her articles. I should like to know whether any attempt has been made at Constantinople to verify her facts and to knowledge of the principles of diplomacy would be a profitable study for hon. Gentlemen who counsel such approaches to a foreign Government, and at the same time fill their speeches with insults, threats, and menaces to that Power. Is it conceivable we should approach the Government of the Sultan with any advantage when that Government can point to speeches in the British Parliament by gentlemen who say they wish to see the Turks driven out of Europe, and provinces detached from the Turkish Empire? All I can say is, that is not my idea of the way to produce any good effect, and I believe it is more calculated—

MR. LABOUCHERE: I did not suggest that any representations should be made to Turkey. My contention was that we might just as well talk to a blind ass as to Turkey.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: That is most unfitting language—I will use no stronger term—to use towards a Power friendly to this country. It tends to deprive Her Majesty's Government of any hope of advantage in endeavouring to carry out the wishes of the House. I can only repeat that Her Majesty's Government have instructed our Ambassador at Constantinople to lose no fitting opportunity of counselling the Porte to carry out more efficient reforms in Armenia; and that Sir W. White has lost no opportunity of following those instructions. In my opinion, the suggestion of a Conference to concert measures for the better government of Asia Minor could not be followed with any prudence. We could not expect to be supported in the Conference by Powers which do not second our efforts at the Porte. With reference to the Cyprus Convention, I went too far, perhaps, on one occasion in speaking of it as a lapsed Convention; I should rather have said a Convention in abeyance, because it was a provision of that Convention that we should concert measures with the Porte for the better government of the Asiatic Provinces. The Porte, as is well known, is never willing to concert with any foreign Power in the government of its Provinces. We have always been ready to fulfil our part in connection with that Convention, and have gone, perhaps, beyond our rights in constantly offering counsel to the Porte, although we have not been admitted to concert. Nor do I think hon. Members are entitled to speak with such disapproval of measures that are intended to form some of the Kurdish tribes into regiments. I did not draw the parallel in this matter with what was done with the Highlanders, but, when others did so, I pointed out how clans which had at one time been infinitely troublesome to their peaceful neighbours had become useful subjects of the British Crown, and I believe it is the case that some of the hill tribes which fought most fiercely against us in India have proved orderly and useful soldiers. The discussion of this matter is rather apart from our own business, but I will ask whether these Kurds are more likely to be brought into order by being subjected occasionally to the punishment of the Turkish Governors, or by being brought under regular pay and discipline? I should say that the latter course, if properly carried out, is far more likely to keep them in order. The cautions that have been offered will, I hope, induce the Porte to take such precautions as will prevent the evil effects hon. Members fear. I have been asked whether any measures have been taken in consequence of the representations that Mrs. Bishop has made. Yes; Sir W. White was instructed to remind the Grand Vizier of the experience of Mrs. Bishop in Kurdistan, and the evidence she has brought of the necessity of much stricter measures for the repression of disorder. It would be difficult to ascertain the exact truth of the statistics given, but I have no doubt that in the main Mrs. Bishop saw districts exposed to the ravages of wild tribes. I think she has been more successful in bringing matters home to the Porte than those who have made previous representations have been, and I trust that the result will be that more efficient steps will be taken for the protection of the Christians in the unsettled Provinces. Here, however, we ought not to exaggerate our responsibility in connection with this matter. I strongly deprecate the use of unseemly language, which, if persisted in, is likely to render the Ottoman Government perfectly insensible to any representations that may come from this country.

(8.2) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I would not have risen to take part in tion of information, but that work can be done just as well by a Vice Consul as by a Consul. I have inquired the views of gentlemen of high official position on this point. I am not at liberty to mention names, but they have expressed to me in very strong terms their sense of the imprudence and unwisdom of making any such change. They hope that Erzeroum will continue to be the centre of British influence and authority in that part of the world. I have little more to say now. I hope the Under Secretary will tell us what special efforts the Government have made during the last six months on behalf of these Christian populations. I agree with the hon. Member for Northampton that it is not easy to get the Turks to listen, but I fear that the Foreign Office have never shown that they have made such efforts as we have a right to expect them to make, or that they have put sufficient pressure on the Turks. Mr. Clifford Lloyd and other high authorities have been of opinion that if sufficiently vigorous pressure were brought to bear on Turkey it would certainly have the effect of bringing about an amelioration in the treatment and condition of the Christians of Armenia, and we want Her Majesty's Government to use that pressure. The right hon. Gentleman is well aware that there are clouds on the Asiatic horizon, and that the only way of averting dangerous outbreaks is by bringing about reforms. I have endeavoured to present my case entirely apart from any question of Party politics. I have put it forward solely on the grounds of humanity, and I hope, under the circumstances, the right hon. Gentleman will feel it is not only our right, but also our duty to inquire from time to time what action the Government are taking, and how they are endeavouring to discharge the responsibility which this country has incurred, and by which, in the eyes of Europe, it is bound,

*(7.42.) SIR J. FERGUSSON: I am sure the hon. Member for Aberdeen will acquit me of any want of respect in not rising until he had spoken. It was stated by the hon. Member who preceded him that he was going to speak, and, therefore, I thought it was well, especially as I should be the only Member of the Government who would address the House on the subject, to wait and hear what the hon. Member had to say before I replied. The modern practice of taking Votes on Account has its advantages and disadvantages. One of the latter is that we have to state the case and discuss it twice over. The subject in question, for instance, was fully dealt with in March last, and the Reports of Mrs. Bishop were referred to in the Debate that then took place. I am afraid, therefore, I have not much that is new to tell the Committee on this occasion. There are, however, things said on these occasions which one cannot accept as seriously advanced. If we were to embark in the enterprises shadowed forth by the hon. Member for Huddersfield we should require a very large military establishment indeed. We are all aware that the state of administration in Kurdistan is deplorable, but wherever particular instances have been brought forward in which the administration has failed to preserve the liberties of the inhabitants, representations have been made to the Porte, and not without good effect. Measures have been taken to improve the administration, and I was disappointed to find that Mrs. Bishop in the journey she took saw so little proof of the more efficient Governors who, as our Representatives informed the Foreign Office, had recently been sent by the Porte to that part of the world. In Papers, which will no doubt be laid before Parliament, there is distinct testimony from our Representatives at Van and Erzeroum and elsewhere as to the benevolent intentions on the part of the local authorities. Wherever, I may say, representations have been made, either of misconduct or of want of efficiency in an official, those representations have been listened to. But what is it hon. Members ask? The hon. Member for Huddersfield says he looks forward to the time when Macedonia and other Turkish Provinces shall pass from the rule of Turkey. The hon. Member for Northampton used still stronger terms. He used language most insulting to the Government which the Foreign Minister is asked to approach in order to ameliorate the condition of its subjects. Reference has been made to the advantages of a knowledge of political economy for the Diplomatic Service; I venture to think that a rudimentary knowledge of the principles of diplomacy would be a profitable study for hon. Gentlemen who counsel such approaches to a foreign Government, and at the same time fill their speeches with insults, threats, and menaces to that Power. Is it conceivable we should approach the Government of the Sultan with any advantage when that Government can point to speeches in the British Parliament by gentlemen who say they wish to see the Turks driven out of Europe, and provinces detached from the Turkish Empire? All I can say is, that is not my idea of the way to produce any good effect, and I believe it is more calculated—

MR. LABOUCHERE: I did not suggest that any representations should be made to Turkey. My contention was that we might just as well talk to a blind ass as to Turkey.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: That is most unfitting language—I will use no stronger term—to use towards a Power friendly to this country. It tends to deprive Her Majesty's Government of any hope of advantage in endeavouring to carry out the wishes of the House. I can only repeat that Her Majesty's Government have instructed our Ambassador at Constantinople to lose no fitting opportunity of counselling the Porte to carry out more efficient reforms in Armenia; and that Sir W. White has lost no opportunity of following those instructions. In my opinion, the suggestion of a Conference to concert measures for the better government of Asia Minor could not be followed with any prudence. We could not expect to be supported in the Conference by Powers which do not second our efforts at the Porte. With reference to the Cyprus Convention, I went too far, perhaps, on one occasion in speaking of it as a lapsed Convention; I should rather have said a Convention in abeyance, because it was a provision of that Convention that we should concert measures with the Porte for the better government of the Asiatic Provinces. The Porte, as is well known, is never willing to concert with any foreign Power in the government of its Provinces. We have always been ready to fulfil our part in connection with that Convention, and have gone, perhaps, beyond our rights in constantly offering counsel to the Porte, although we have not been admitted to concert. Nor do I think hon. Members are entitled to speak with such disapproval of measures that are intended to form some of those Kurdish tribes into regiments. I did not draw the parallel in this matter with what was done with the Highlanders; but, when others did so, I pointed out how clans which had at one time been infinitely troublesome to their peaceful neighbours had become useful subjects of the British Crown, and I believe it is the case that some of the hill tribes which fought most fiercely against us in India have proved orderly and useful soldiers. The discussion of this matter is rather apart from our own business, but I will ask whether these Kurds are more likely to be brought into order by being subjected occasionally to the punishment of the Turkish Governors, or by being brought under regular pay and discipline? I should say that the latter course, if properly carried out, is far more likely to keep them in order. The cautions that have been offered will, I hope, induce the Porte to take such precautions as will prevent the evil effects hon. Members fear. I have been asked whether any measures have been taken in consequence of the representations that Mrs. Bishop has made. Yes; Sir W. White was instructed to remind the Grand Vizier of the experience of Mrs. Bishop in Kurdistan, and the evidence she has brought of the necessity of much stricter measures for the repression of disorder. It would be difficult to ascertain the exact truth of the statistics given, but I have no doubt that in the main Mrs. Bishop saw districts exposed to the ravages of wild tribes. I think she has been more successful in bringing matters home to the Porte than those who have made previous representations have been, and I trust that the result will be that more efficient steps will be taken for the protection of the Christians in the unsettled Provinces. Here, however, we ought not to exaggerate our responsibility in connection with this matter. I strongly deprecate the use of unseemly language, which, if persisted in, is likely to render the Ottoman Government perfectly insensible to any representations that may come from this country.

(8.2) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I would not have risen to take part in this Debate but for a sentence which fell from the right hon. Baronet. On this side of the House we have always strongly disapproved of the Anglo-Turkish or Cyprus Convention, because it binds Great Britain in the future to act in a warlike manner upon circumstances which it was impossible to foresee. In that Convention we made, what I consider, a most unwise and most monstrous and most mischievous condition, namely, that we were on certain conditions to guarantee the maintenance of the Asiatic possessions of the Porte. The language of the Under Secretary to-night with respect to that Convention may, I think, be regarded as satisfactory. The right hon. Gentleman has spoken of it as a "Convention in abeyance." Well, we know that titles in abeyance are often not called in abeyance; they cease to exist. I wish to note specially what the right hon. Gentleman has said as to the conditions upon which the Anglo-Turkish Convention is founded not having been fulfilled, for it is very important. The conditions of the Convention not having been kept, our hands are, of course, left perfectly and free unfettered. That was the view taken in 1880 by the Government of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian, and it is a view which I still hold very strongly.

*(8.7.) MR. BALLANTINE (Coventry): I desire to call attention to the agreement for arbitration with France in relation to the Newfoundland Fisheries. The first observation I wish to make is that the choice of arbitrators is not calculated to inspire confidence. The Board of Arbitration consists of a Russian, a Swiss, and a Norwegian, and by the terms of the arbitration agreement their decision is final. The only question left for arbitration is that relating to the lobster fisheries. These fisheries have only existed for the last seven or eight years; consequently, whatever the result of the arbitration may be, the main question will be left unsettled. I submit that this lobster fishery question ought never to have been submitted to arbitration at all. The Treaty gives France the right to catch fish and dry it on land, but it is not lawful for them to erect any buildings except stages made of boards and huts necessary and usual for the drying of fish. Assume the French have a right to catch lobsters. They cannot prepare them without erecting factories, which are plainly against the words of the Treaty, and our duty is to insist on the strict words of the Treaty on behalf of the colonists. Why do less than the French for their subjects? Mr. Waddington stated on June 21, 1886—

"A resolution has been taken by us to exercise to the fullest extent and with the utmost strictness rights which we possess by the Treaties."

Moreover, the effects of the arbitration in its decisions will be utterly disproportionate between the colonists and the French. The colonists have 70 factories and the French only six. So if the decision should be against the French six factories only will be closed, whereas if it goes against the colonists 70 factories will have to be closed, and great destitution and misery will thereby be caused. On several occasions our officers in Newfoundland have represented that if the lobster factories are closed very distressing consequences must ensue. By the Treaty of Utrecht, as hitherto understood, France is prohibited from erecting permanent factories; but the terms of the arbitration are so wide that the arbitrators can interpret the Treaty as they please, and, as a matter of fact, the French have already built permanent factories, as is shown in various Reports sent to this country. If the arbitrators' award is in favour of France, can it be doubted that these permanent buildings will be left standing and used as bases for further encroachments? As to the arbitrators themselves, I cannot see how the Government can have any knowledge of their qualifications. I remember that in a French opéra bouffe one of the chief characters was described as a Swiss Admiral, and it seems as if the Government had been imitating—

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I appeal to the hon. Member whether it is wise, when we are entering into an arbitration, to discuss the qualifications of the arbitrators. I think it would be against the public interest for the hon. Member to proceed with the argument which he is apparently about to submit to the Committee. I venture very respectfully, but earnestly, to suggest that it is against the interests of the country to engage in such a discussion as the hon. Gentleman is initiating.

*MR. BALLANTINE: I am glad to accede to the wishes of the right hon. Gentleman. But intimately connected with this subject is the question of the sovereign rights exercised by the French, owing to the negligence of our Foreign and Colonial Offices. The French merely possess by Treaties an easement, namely, the right to fish and dry fish on shore. King George III. made the following declaration:—

meaning, of course, that he would undertake all measures of police on the coast himself. Owing to neglect by our Governments the French have taken upon themselves this duty. Their war vessels are in the territorial waters; they claim to determine when any infraction of the Treaty is committed, and to take redress into their own hands in the absence of English cruisers. Speaking in another place the Prime Minister said that even if we were at war with France, France would not take the trouble to land in Newfoundland. The reason of that is that in consequence of the laxity of our Government they may land in Newfoundland in time of peace. This is what M. Waddington gave as his conception of the duty of the French officers—

“Our officers are directed to seize and confiscate all instruments of fishing belonging to foreigners, resident or otherwise, who shall fish on that part of coast reserved for our use.”

In obedience to these directions French officers have taken up the nets belonging to English subjects, causing great damage. The owners applied for compensation, but all the answer they got was a complete justification for the action of the French officers.

*MR. A. STAVELEY HILL (Staffordshire, Kingswinford): I sympathise most fully with the colonists, but

Mr. Goschen

I feel that, as the matter is entering upon the first stage of arbitration, it is unwise to discuss it. I appeal to the hon. Member for Coventry not to pursue the discussion, and let us see what will be the result of the arbitration. I much regret that the arbitration should have been of so limited a character, and I must say that one order I have seen with dismay—that instructions have been given to put down a certain number of English lobster factories. I should like to know whether the French factories will be put down also.

*(8.26.) SIR J. FERGUSSON: I should like to be permitted to say that I cannot imagine anything more unfortunate than a debate on this subject at the present moment. The matters are of the greatest delicacy, and they are only prevented from going into the acute stage by the mutual forbearance of each Government and their officers. We are now proceeding to submit one branch of this great question to arbitration. I venture to think that the House would do well to leave the question alone, hoping for the best—for the settlement which we hope to reach of this question. The closing of the factories referred to can only be to give effect, under the Act of Newfoundland, to the modus vivendi that no new lobster factories shall be opened by the subjects of either country.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I have always regarded arbitration agreements with the greatest satisfaction, and I agree with the Chancellor of the Exchequer that it would not be wise to enter into the details at this stage. I am extremely pleased that instead of a political arbitration we are to have a purely judicial arbitration. I do not know anything about the arbitrators, but I think it is probable that a very good selection has been made. I hope, too, we may appeal with confidence to our fellow-subjects in Newfoundland not to work against the modus vivendi. If 60 lobster factories have been erected, they must have been erected in opposition to the arrangement.

MR. MORTON: I should like to know whether we have had the same opportunity of considering the terms of the arbitration as the French Legislature? I feel that the colonists are in a bad position, and I should be sorry to say anything which would endanger that position.

*(8.30.) MR. SCHWANN: I desire to take this opportunity to ask the right hon. Gentleman if he can give us some explanation of the state of affairs on the Congo? Of course, I know we have no right to interfere with the internal government of the Congo Free State, but there are a number of English subjects there, and they, for a long time, have found their rights and position imperilled by the action of the Congo State Government. The general feeling among them is that the interests of the English traders are not sufficiently protected. The distance at which the English Consul resides involves a long and costly journey of some 400 miles, in some cases, before complaints can be placed before him. Commercial enterprises established for many years are prejudiced by the tariff imposed, and practically a large amount of capital and the result of years of commercial industry is confiscated by the State. The grievances under which these merchants suffer have come under my notice in correspondence from Mr. R. E. Dennett, of Banana, who carries on the business of a merchant there, who is the son of the Rev. Dr. Dennett, sometime attached to the Consulate as chaplain at Valparaiso, and now residing at Ashton Rectory, near Chudleigh, Devon, proves him to be a man of education and position, well entitled to belief. From the fact that he has authorised me to make his name and statements public, and that doing this is likely very much to prejudice his position in the Congo State, it is evident he feels a very strong sense of wrong. But there are points he draws attention to apart from the want of support received by English merchants on the Congo, acts of officials in the State, not at all such as are imagined by the outside world, and the facts are of such a character that, it seems to me, though we cannot absolutely interfere, they may well be made the subject of inquiry and remonstrance, through the King of the Belgians. Mr. Dennett refers to instances of actual slavery under the guise of commerce, and in a recent letter he says—

"The State send their soldiers out into the roads and fields to seize all the women that are planting; these are then exchanged for so many carriers. I actually heard an employé of the Belgian Company telling the Chief of the Magasins Generaux that the quantity of carriers the State received entirely depended on the quantity of soldiers they had;"

—that is to say, upon the number of women they could capture to exchange for carriers—

"A Mons. Bureau—a Belgian officer—as a ransom for a prisoner, claimed so many sheep and goats; her unfortunate relations had not the number and could not therefore pay the ransom. It was proposed that the relations should give the Commissaire du district Matadi, the said Mons. Bureau, two female slaves, to finish the palaver. The people brought two old women, but these were not accepted. Mons. Bureau now, however, keeps the young girl, eventually given to him, as his concubine. I have looked through the Code Napoléon, but cannot find anything there to justify Mons. Bureau. Mons. Deghilage, an official of the Congo Free State, murdered two poor negro boys in the short space of three-quarters of an hour by thrashing them to death. Even the Belgians inquired into this atrocity and found the man guilty. The Judge and Commissaire du district Vandorp publicly let out that he meant to fine the brute £10 per victim, and this three weeks before the case was actually judged. Mons. Deghilage, who was then chief of the station, has since been promoted, and is now busy recruiting and looking for a new route to the new slice of Portuguese territory the State has annexed. 'This beast dances naked with the natives by way of recreation.'"

Well, a great many other complaints are brought against officers of the Congo Free State by Mr. Dennett, but I will not weary the Committee by repeating them. I believe the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs has knowledge of some of the complaints which have been put before him, and perhaps he will be able to give us some explanation to-day, either a denial, or that he will say a proper remonstrance has been addressed to the Congo Free State. Personally, of course, I have no knowledge. I make the statements on the authority and responsibility of Mr. Dennett, who has no wish to have his name concealed. I do not wish to delay the Committee, but I hope the right hon. Gentleman will be able to give a satisfactory reply.

*(8.35.) SIR J. FERGUSSON: In the first place, I am rather sorry that the hon. Gentleman should have brought these charges in the House against the conduct of certain Belgian officers upon statements privately made.

2. Motion made, and Question proposed,

(9.26.) MR. LABOUCHERE: I propose to move to reduce the salary of the Secretary of State by £100, in order to direct the attention of the Committee to his conduct with reference to the Chartered Company of South Africa. I myself am opposed to all these Chartered Companies. I agree with the views which have been very ably expressed by the Under Secretary of State for India with regard to them. But assuming that there ought to be Chartered Companies, it is admitted that financial questions are a secondary consideration, and that their real purpose is connected with philanthropy or the development of the Empire or something of that kind. But I am sorry to say that the South African Company is a financial scheme in the worst sense of the words, and people are led by the connection of the Government with it to believe that its shares are a sound investment. They ought to know that the Government is not responsible, but they do not. I think the Committee will be astonished when it hears what the financing of this company has been. There is a territory called Matabeleland and Mashonaland, ruled over by Lobengula, a Chief rather than a King. A mining concession was obtained from him in regard to this territory. In 1888 two sets of financial gentlemen sent emissaries to Lobengula to obtain the concession, one of them consisting of a Mr. Bight, Mr. Cecil Rhodes, Mr. Rudd, and one or two other gentlemen.

THE CHAIRMAN: I do not quite see what the action of the Chartered Company in 1888 has to do with this Vote.

MR. LABOUCHERE: My contention is that the Secretary of State ought never to have recommended a charter to that company, and that because he has done so he deserves to have some reduction made in his salary for not having better fulfilled his obligations and duties. I am obliged briefly to show what the financial position of the company is, and under what circumstances the charter was given.

THE CHAIRMAN: The charter was not granted by the Department of the Secretary of State. What we have to discuss here is the action of the Secretary of State towards the company.

MR. LABOUCHERE: The Secretary of State, instead of finding out who the persons were who sought for this charter, and whether they would make good use of it, allowed it to be given to persons who had abused his confidence. Now, I hold that the Secretary of State ought to have been informed of all these facts, and that, being now informed, he ought to get up and say, "Now that I know what has taken place, I will make immediate inquiry into the whole matter. Give me a little time, and I will make full and ample inquiry." These gentleman and the Exploring Company obtained a concession for mining rights, and nothing but mining rights. Then the Central Search Company was formed, and the two sets of gentlemen sold their concession to that company for £92,000. In the Session of 1889 I was frequently told by the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary that no charter was to be given, and yet, as soon as Parliament broke up, I discovered that one had been given. In the following Session the right hon. Gentleman said he had informed Parliament of the intention to grant a charter in reply to a question put by the hon Member for Kirkcaldy. I certainly think that this was rather sharp practice. I maintain that the charter ought not to have been granted while Parliament was not sitting after the repeated statements of the right hon. Gentleman during the Session that a charter was not to be given. Then the Secretary of State said that gentlemen of importance must be connected with this concession in order that a charter might be given, and it was thought that the Duke of Fife and the Duke of Abercorn fulfilled this condition; but I am sure the Chancellor of the Exchequer will bear me out in the statement that it can hardly be supposed that those two noblemen are great financial geniuses. The charter is of a very large and wide description, as it gives the company full power of Government in Matabeleland and Mashonaland. The capital of the company is put down as

£4,000,000, of which £27,000 is the utmost that was ever paid in cash. This was done in order to foist the company upon the public, and investors in England actually gave £6 or £8 for shares for which only 3s. had been originally paid. I think, therefore, there is some cause for the Secretary of State looking into this matter, and openly stating that he and the Government are in no way responsible for this financing, and warning the public that, although there is a Chartered Company, all that glitters is not gold. The Secretary of State interfered actively to aid and abet the company in obtaining possession of Matabeleland and Mashonaland. Colonel Carrington was directed by Her Majesty's Government to aid in procuring a large police force, which was to be under the command of the Chartered Company in Matabeleland, and that gentleman told persons that if they joined the police force they would not only receive pay, but also a farm. The Under Secretary of State afterwards said, in reply to a question put in this House, that all the promise meant was that a farm would be given to the men when the company had a farm to give. The whole thing, therefore, is a perfect absurdity. Then the company prevented persons from entering Mashonaland and Matabeleland unless they signed an undertaking to obey the laws of the company, and, in addition to this, they exacted trade licences. What I want is an assurance from the right hon. Gentleman that he will look thoroughly into all these matters. When I asked the right hon. Gentleman from whence he obtained his information, the right hon. Gentleman admitted that he had got it from the employés of the company, who naturally gave a very favourable account of the doings of their own company and, therefore, one that ought not to be implicitly relied upon. Then, again, I have frequently seen it stated that there was a very large black population in these territories who might be put to useful work. He knows, however, what has happened in Cuba and other places where a black population have been put to useful work in the mines, and I shall protest against this large black population in South Africa being put to "useful" work of a similar kind. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will be able to tell the Committee that some reliable and independent person will be appointed to look after the interests of the black population in these districts, and to see that they are fairly treated, and that no attempt is made to force them to work against their will. I shall also be glad of an assurance that Her Majesty's Government will watch to see how the powers conferred upon the company by the charter are administered, and that nothing is done in the territories under their control which will be injurious to the Public Purse, to the public welfare, to commerce, or to industry.

*(9.40.) THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. DE WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): If the hon. Member will read the terms of the charter he will find that it contains ample provisions for the intervention of the Imperial Government in the event of the company violating the conditions it imposes upon them. I am afraid that I can give the hon. Member no information on the subject of the finances of the company, because, as I have already repeatedly stated, Her Majesty's Government are in no way responsible for the finances of the company, and I desire that that fact should be thoroughly understood. The hon. Member appears to think that the company has violated the conditions of the charter by acquiring further concessions than those which they had at the time that the charter was granted, but the fact is that they were expressly authorised by the terms of the charter to obtain further concessions. He also alleges that there has been something underhand in the way that the charter has been obtained, but I informed the House in 1889 that it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to grant a charter to the South Africa Company, and the necessary period prescribed by law in order to permit of objections to the granting of the charter having elapsed, the charter was granted in due course, after the objection to it made by the hon. Member had been discussed.

MR. LABOUCHERE: That was before the charter was granted.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: Certainly it was, because it would have been useless to have attempted to raise the objection after the charter had once been granted.

I will not follow the hon. Member in his objections to Dukes taking part in the management of the company's affairs, because it is possible that a high position may add to a person's capabilities for management, and afford an additional guarantee of their being in the highest degree respectable and responsible. [Mr. LABOUCHERE: No.] However that may be, up to the present time there was no reason to doubt that every condition that had been imposed in the charter had been fulfilled by the South Africa Company. The hon. Member said that he had been informed that every person entering the company's territories was bound to give an undertaking that he would obey the law, but that was a condition which it was usual in all civilised countries to require from those who sought to be domiciled in them. In uncivilised countries, where there was no law at all, such as that over which the company exercised its jurisdiction, it was certainly not too much to ask from those who sought to take up their residence in them that they should undertake to acquiesce in regulations that were intended to preserve law and order. That is a proposition which I do not think even the hon. Member will dispute. Then the hon. Member said that he understood that certain payments had been exacted from those who entered the company's territories. That is perfectly true, because a licence has to be taken out by such persons. I, however, do not think that the hon. Member, with even his advanced views, will consider that it is improper that he should be called upon to pay police or paving rates. The South Africa Company are bound by the conditions of their charter not only to maintain law and order, but also to make roads and telegraphic communications at their own expense, and certainly they are justified in recouping themselves for the expenditure which they have been compelled to incur by making a small charge for a licence. As far as the treatment by the company of the black population was concerned, the hon. Member has not brought forward one single case where the natives have been treated otherwise than with humanity. The hon. Member has complained that Colonel Carrington has been engaged in obtaining recruits for the company's police. The facts in connection with that circumstance are very simple. It was absolutely necessary, in the interests of law and order in the company's territories, that a certain number of police should be obtained, and nothing could be more natural than that the services of a military man like Colonel Carrington should be retained for the purpose of selecting the men who were most fit for the service, and who were to be employed at the expense of the company. I am sure that the hon. Member will agree with me that it would have been improper to have allowed the company under the sanction of a Royal Charter to have occupied such large territories without requiring them to find means for the preservation of law and order. The hon. Member may take it from me that Her Majesty's Government will have nothing to do either with the finances or with the administration of the company as long as they do nothing to infringe the terms of the charter. If it is brought to the knowledge of the Government that the company are violating the terms of their charter in any way the Secretary of State will at once act, and the company will be compelled to comply with those terms. I trust that the explanation I have given the hon. Member will be satisfactory to him.

*(9.55.) MR. MAGUIRE (Donegal, N.): I hope that I shall be permitted to state to the Committee what the financial arrangements of the company have been. In 1886 or 1887 various expeditions were sent out to Bechuanaland and other parts of South Africa with the view of obtaining mining and other concessions, and with the object of developing the country. Many of those expeditions were unsuccessful, but in 1888 Lobengula, finding that he was no longer able to control those who entered his country and seeing that it must be developed, placed his whole mining rights in a body of persons who were represented by Mr. Rudd and other gentlemen. This body of persons found that it would be necessary to include others in their group, who had either obtained personal licences to mine, or had acquired a position of influence in the country. Relations were established with Lobengula, and steps taken to accustom the natives to the presence of the white people. Various goodwills and interests were acquired. The amount expended was about £50,000 or £60,000, and for the purpose of convenience the whole thing was put into a private syndicate. It must not be supposed that £121,000, about £27,000 being working capital, which additional sum was also spent, was the real value of the concessions; it was merely a figure adopted for the purpose of apportioning the shares among the various people interested. Then the position in the middle of 1889 was that there was a private syndicate, with a concession and various good-wills and interests, and that syndicate had to consider what to do. Capital was necessary in order to develop the country. The syndicate had three courses open to them. They might have sold their concessions for a lump sum of money; or they might have formed a large company with a capital partly in cash and partly in fully paid up shares. But both those courses would have been open to the objection that the concessionaires were anxious to part with their interests before they had shown not merely the value of them, but that they had any property at all. They, therefore, adopted the third alternative of forming a company—the British South Africa Company—leasing to it certain rights, and themselves undertaking certain obligations. It was considered fair that the concessionaires should retain 50 per cent. of the net profits. There was no request made to the public for subscriptions, a capital of £1,000,000 was privately subscribed, the greater part of it by the concessionaires and their friends, and thus there was on the one hand the developing company with this fully paid cash capital of £1,000,000, and on the other side what may be called the founders' shares, with a nominal capital of £121,000, coupled with an obligation to pay £400,000 for constructing a railway into the interior of Africa. That was the financial position at the time the Charter was granted. It had always been intended to have floated a large company to represent the interests acquired under the concession, and some people had been promised shares or their value at par. Therefore the time came when it was proper to fix the value of this half interest. The thing had to be done somehow, and the figure arrived at was the £4,000,000 to which the hon. Member has alluded.

The shares of the British South Africa Company — £1,000,000 — were at that time changing hands at £4, and therefore it was considered that the par value of the other half might be put down at £4,000,000. The public got none of the shares. There was no subscription, and they have not been dealt in. The value of the shares may since have declined, no doubt. I have given the financial history of the company. The hon. Member says it demands 50 per cent. of the profits of the miners going into the country. That is not so, for alluvial gold mining small monthly licences have to be obtained, but for quartz gold, which it is well known an individual digger cannot work with advantage, the arrangement is to float a Joint Stock Company, of which the Chartered Company gets half the vendors' scrip.

(10.7) DR. CLARK (Caithness): I am not very much interested in the financial aspect of this question, but I admit we have had a very plain statement from the hon. Member for North Donegal, who probably knows more of the matter than any man living, because he himself went to Lobengula and got the concessions, and the chances when he went were three to one that he would never come back alive. I congratulate him that he is here, although I doubt if the shareholders in the Chartered Company have reason to be satisfied with what he has disclosed. Will the Under Secretary for the Colonies tell us what concessions the Chartered Company have got. They certainly have not got Lobengula's mining rights, because they are only the tenants of the persons to whom the concessions were granted. The hon. Member is quite mistaken if he thinks that Lobengula was not very well acquainted with white men. Lobengula's father had given concessions long before to the hon. Baronet the Member for Lichfield of the whole of the mineral rights in Matabeleland. My hon. Friend and his son were there for many years. Mr. Beathe managed a mine there for 10 years. Robert Moffatt was there, so were John Mackenzie and Francis Clarke, and many other white men, indeed, not a year passed without dozens of white men going to Lobengula's Court; there were permanent traders, and any number of hunters, so that the natives were well accustomed to the presence of white men. I wish, however, to deal with the policy we are going to carry out. Look at the past history of Chartered Companies. There seems to be some fatality in our connection with South Africa. I want to know what our future policy is to be, and what part the Imperial Government will take in it, for, notwithstanding all those millions on paper, the £4,000,000 my hon. Friend has got in his company, and the £1,000,000 they have got in the Chartered Company, these companies will before long burst up, and the territory will be thrown upon our hands. The company is already nearly at the end of its tether, and the Imperial Parliament will probably before a year has elapsed be asked to come to its assistance. We certainly ought not to follow a policy of handing over the natives to company promoters and company mongers. Mr. Mackenzie, who was a Commissioner in South Africa for many years, has suggested that we should aid in the development of the country by sending officials to see that the natives are treated fairly and are not plundered. You have in South Africa a migration of whites towards the North, and a movement of the black races towards the South, and surely the wiser and better policy for a country like Great Britain, which claims a kind of Suzerainty over the whole of South Africa, would be to send officers to see that the natives are not outraged, and that some kind of law is enforced. Lobengula cannot control, nor will he have anything to do with the government of white men. If we had sent a Resident to Lobengula to see that the natives were not plundered, that would have been better for the people than handing them over to adventurers. My hon. Friend got certain mineral rights from Lobengula, but I maintain that he does not hold from Lobengula, or from any properly authorised person, a single acre of land in South Africa. I also understand from what has fallen in the Debate that Mr. H. H. Johnston, our Consul, is partly in the pay of the Lakes Company, which is a puppet of the Chartered Company of which my hon. Friend pulls the strings. He is partly our servant, and partly a servant of the company, and I understand that he is going about hunting for more concessions in return for the half of his salary which the company pay; and then Colonel Carrington, who is paid by this country, has also been acting in the interests of the companies in getting certain guarantees on their behalf. What is the actual position of affairs? A company is formed which has not a single acre of land; under false pretences it gets a Charter from the Government, for it makes believe it has valuable concessions, whereas, at the most, it has only short leases. It promises farms to those who will develop the country, although it knows it cannot possibly fulfil the promises; but it relies on the fact that when these people take possession of Lobengula's territory they will have to fight for it; it hopes that Lobengula will be smashed and then it will claim to keep his territory. Further than that, the company has been attacking Portugal. These adventurers first took Matabeleland, and as Lobengula claimed to be Suzerain of the Mashonas, and the other tribes, they claimed also that they had a right to everything this Chief claimed; so they went on and claimed territory which the Portuguese were working, and in respect to which they had granted concessions to French and British companies. Three companies formed in London were working the concessions obtained from Portugal; but these adventurers went to one of the Portuguese vassals and made a Treaty with him, and in my opinion this was one of the worst things done by the filibustering company. I was glad to hear the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs state that the Government have had nothing to do with Gungunhana, but that as he is a Portuguese subject, communications have been made through the Portuguese, and that we do not intend to hand over Gungunhana's territory to the filibusterers.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I never said that Gungunhana was a Portuguese subject.

DR. CLARK: I understood the right hon. Gentleman to say he recognised that the territory of Gungunhana as within the Portuguese sphere of influence.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I said most of it was outside the British sphere of influence.

DR. CLARK: Yes, but we have delineated our sphere of influence by the Portuguese, and if the territory is outside ours, it must be within the Portuguese sphere.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I do not wish to be misunderstood. I observed that the matter did not come strictly within my Department. I added that the British Government have abstained from dealing with that part of the coast long recognised as Portuguese, and that the main part of Gungunhana's territory behind it is beyond our sphere of influence. But further I added my belief that part of the territory is within our sphere of influence and in respect of that we desired to be on the best terms with him.

DR. CLARK: I take it that the part within our sphere is Umtassa's District. What I wish to urge is that it would be unfair to steal Portuguese territory. I am sorry that the British Government, considering the filibustering we have had in South Africa, and the way in which some Republics have been formed, have aided and abetted these particular filibusterers to whom I am referring in attacking this territory. Bearing in mind the responsibility which attaches to us, we ought to have somebody in the country to see that the Chartered Company is fulfilling the conditions of its Charter. I do not think the country has turned out to be so valuable as was anticipated. The gentlemen who had got £4 and £5 for their shares in this company are well out of it, but I fear that a large number of less fortunate speculators will be considerable sufferers. It is a bad policy on the whole, and I regret that the Government have gone into a joint partnership with the Chartered Company. The sooner the Charter is withdrawn and this country takes charge of the territory the better it will be for everyone. As to the value of the concessions, Lobengula has repudiated the concession made to my hon. Friend, and the Chief has said that the wording of the concession was neither explained to him nor did he mean to grant it. From beginning to end the whole affair has been based on fraud. The large number of promises which have been made can never be fulfilled except by stealing the country. It is a most disgraceful episode in our South African history. It is to be hoped that this important territory will not be left in the hands of a company with £8,000,000 of capital, but that it will be taken charge of by officers responsible to the Government, while Great Britain will have the courage to vote the money needed for its protection and control.

(10.28.) MR. LABOUCHERE: I give the hon. Member for North Donegal full credit for his great pluck in obtaining the concessions, but I think that anyone who has heard the statement as to the floating of the Chartered Company cannot help coming to the conclusion that the manner in which the undertaking has been started is, to say the least, exceedingly remarkable. I think that everyone will feel that the Government ought to watch with special care what was going on in this great territory under the auspices of gentlemen who have been the authors of this financial undertaking. I maintain, notwithstanding the statement of the Under Secretary, that this country is responsible for the government of that territory, and I do urge the right hon. Gentleman opposite to thoroughly investigate the affairs of the company. The Colonial Office should send out some completely independent persons to stand between the natives and the governing powers in this portion of South Africa; and in view of what has been stated by the official defender of the financial character of the company I submit that some official ought certainly to be there in order to see due justice administered to all concerned with this territory.

*(10.30.) MR. W. A. M'ARTHUR (Cornwall, Mid., St. Austell): I have the greatest possible respect for the hon. Member who has just spoken. I like to hear him attacking the House of Lords, and Magistrates who exceed their duty. As an exponent of domestic policy and of Radicalism I generally agree with him, but I am bound to say, if I may do so without disrespect, that the hon. Member takes a somewhat parochial view of Imperial and Colonial questions. I do not object to the presence in the House of men with parochial minds, but I object altogether to gentlemen with parochial minds taking in hand the Imperial interests of this country, for I am bound to say I do not think anybody who approaches these great Imperial interests from the point of view of a vestryman is very likely to make a distinguished success of his task. What is the grievance of the accusation of my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere)? He objects not only to the South African Chartered Company, but to any company, or any measure, or any treaty, or any undertaking in the world which may extend British influence in parts of the world where it does not exist already. I do not agree with him. I do not know whether it will be said that in what I say I am influenced by my financial interests in South Africa. I have a very few shares in the British South Africa Company, and I am quite willing to sell them to my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I must decline to give any coin of the realm to the British South Africa Company.

*MR. W. A. M'ARTHUR: Having made that frank confession, having stated my tiny interest in the concern, I am all the more free to say that I consider these companies one of the most legitimate means of the extension of British influence and of our Empire in countries such as Africa. I do not see why we on the Liberal side of the House should be always opposed to the extension of British influence throughout the world. There cannot be a greater mistake made in this world. If the question were fairly put before the electors, and if they were really told who made the British Empire, and how it was made, I would not be afraid, as against my hon. Friend's great experience and wit, to take my chance in any meeting of English working men in urging that the maintenance and extension of the British Empire is a good thing for them. The creation of the British Empire and its present existence are due just as much to British working men as it is to any British Monarch or any aristocratic class. It cannot be fairly said that those of us who are Radical and Democratic in this House have no interest in the British Empire, on the contrary, we are all interested in the British Empire. As regards these Chartered Companies, I do not believe there is a more legitimate way of extending the British Empire. Any extension of British influence is good, not only for England, not only for the working men of this country generally, but it is the best thing that could happen to the unfortunate natives. There is no rule, on the whole, so just, so fair, so equal, as the rule of Englishmen and the English Government over native races. These companies will grow to such an extent, and our responsibilities in connection with them will so increase, that we shall in time find ourselves in such a position that we must take the territories they administer just as we took over the territory and administration of the East India Company. It is impossible that this country should refrain from legitimate annexation in a country like South Africa. My hon. Friend and Members who think like him talk very glibly about this military expedition. The hon. Member threw scorn upon the forces sent up to maintain authority in this territory, but I think it cannot be denied that in the end the taking up of a sufficient force for the maintenance of order is the very best thing that can happen to the natives themselves. My argument is one that can be borne out, not only in theory, but in practice, namely, that in taking over these territories by the Chartered Companies, or by direct annexation, we are doing, not only a good thing for the Empire and a thing which finds employment for our workmen, but we are doing the very best thing in the world for the native races themselves. I believe my hon. Friend is wrong, not because he wants to be wrong, but because he does not fully understand these Imperial questions, and I sincerely trust I shall find the House willing to assist aims which are good, aims which consistently carried out must inevitably lead to the addition of one of the best parts of the world to our Empire, a consummation of which is to be wished for, and which I hope will come about as soon as possible.

Mr. W. A. M'Arthur

(10.47.) CAPTAIN BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness): Whilst there may be no fault to be found with the action of the Chartered Company, I still think the company is doing what ought to be done by our own Government; but the Government could not undertake what the company is doing because the opposition that would come from the other side of the House would be so strong that the Government would not be able to get the necessary money. The company having been formed, and having commenced its operations, there is not much fault to be found with it, and, indeed, its administration seems to be satisfactory: but there is the prospect of trouble in the future.

The day will come when the Imperial Government will have to step in and occupy the position now held by the Chartered Company; and there will be difficulties when that has to be done. What I object to is the policy that appears to be pursued by the gentleman who is at the head of the company and also of the Cape Government. He has clearly placed before the world a policy which ought not to commend itself to this House. That gentleman's policy is that the power of the Cape Colony should be extended, if possible, up to the Zambesi. Neither the geographical position of the Cape, nor its history, justifies the ambition to govern so large a territory. There is another view of colonisation, and that is that colonies are to be limited in area, are to be given self-government, and then are to unite together in some sort of federal union. The policy of Mr. Rhodes is the converse of that—it is to extend the sway of the Cape Government up to the Zambesi. Does this policy meet with the approval of Her Majesty's Government? There is Natal, the South African Republic, and the Orange Free State, and their comparative inequality with a vastly extended Cape Colony would place great difficulties in the way of successful federation. The Government appear to have fallen under the influence of Mr. Rhodes, and to be disposed to give him a free hand. Let them be wise in time. Does not all experience show that a colony should be confined within a limited area? Does not the experience of Australia show that, although we did our best to go against the teaching of that experience last year, when we gave not only constitutional government but half a continent to a population of 40,000 persons? Would it not be well, before power is wrested from our hands, to put our veto on a policy which is really repugnant to our own views? I suspect the hon. Member for Caithness agrees with me [Dr. CLARK: Hear, hear!], and I believe the last speaker will be disposed to do so, in spite of the support he has given to the company. I hope that similar sentiments will be expressed on behalf of the Government.

*(10.59.) MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.): I have put down a Motion in order to obtain an opportunity of drawing the attention of the House to the position of the Zulu Chiefs at present confined in St. Helena. I do not take up this subject in any factious or Party spirit. I am not going to plead for making these people independent again or anything of the kind. I think when once white men come into relations with coloured races it is almost inevitable, however much we may regret it, that sooner or later the coloured men will come under the rule of the white men; but at least we should see that that rule is such as we need not be ashamed of. We first entered Zululand in 1843, but up to 1879 the Zulus were an independent nation. Then we came into conflict with Cetewayo, and he was imprisoned. Four years afterwards it was thought best that their King should be given back to the people. Mr. Osborn was the British Resident in Zululand from 1880, and I think it was a mistake that when the King was sent back Mr. Osborn should be left to carry out the new policy, to which he was opposed. After Cetewayo's death in 1884 the Dutch overran the country, and such confusion resulted that half the country was given to the Boers and we retained half under our influence. The manner in which we exercised that influence was not, I think, the best. Earl Grey, in a letter to the London Times on the 29th of January, 1889, said—

“The present Government adhered to the policy of refusing to assist the Zulus in making any effective arrangement for preserving peace in their country, and went even further than the preceding Government in doing them wrong by concluding a convention with the Boers, giving the sanction of this country to their taking a large part of Zululand from its rightful owners in order to form a new Dutch Republic in a territory to which the usurpers had no claim whatever, except that arising from their being in possession of much land acquired, for the most part, by fraud and violence. The injustice to the Zulus of this Treaty is manifest, and it has been rendered more injurious to them by the fact that, although the territory which was still left to them was eventually declared to be under British protection, nothing to this day has been done towards making that protection really effective, by providing means for maintaining order and security within its boundaries. The result has been what was to be expected—new disturbances have occurred, and quite lately it has been considered necessary to employ a force under British officers against those who are described as Zulu rebels. Some of these rebels have been killed, others have been taken prisoners, and are, it seems, to be punished for what they have done, though it would be hard to show that they are as much to blame as the British Government for the fighting that has taken place.”

Earl Grey shows that we were neither willing to leave the Zulus to themselves nor to take them under our protection and administer the country for their benefit, and the inevitable consequence was that great difficulties ensued. It was thought well to let another tribe of the Zulus, who were opposed to Dinizulu, the son of Cetewayo, into the country. There had previously been a blood-feud between the two tribes, and hostilities now took place. The result was that certain Chiefs were charged with high treason. We have very good proof that they did not intend to fight our Government. We had a small force of Zulu police under two or three white men in a fort close beside the place where the battle between the two tribes occurred, and they were entirely unmolested. If there had been any desire to call in question the Queen's authority, the police would have been entirely wiped out by the force of 3,000 or 4,000 Zulus. Another proof that no attack was intended on our Government is that the Zulus, who had carried off some cattle, permitted a few police to recover 250 of them. It was resolved to try the Zulu Chiefs for their complicity in the warfare, and the men submitted themselves to the Government to be tried. The constitution of the Court that was to try them was, of course, a matter of the first consideration. It consisted of three men—a Civil servant, Mr. Wragg, and two Stipendiary Magistrates.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: Mr. Wragg is a Judge of the Supreme Court of Natal.

*MR. WEBB: Well, it might have been better that some person less closely connected with the administration of the country should have been appointed. I am bound to say that the authorities at home showed the greatest disposition to secure a fair trial for the Chiefs. They sent various messages to the Natal Government impressing on them the desirability of making it apparent that the trial was a fair one. In one Despatch Lord Knutsford said that the proceedings would be watched by the natives with great interest, and it was, therefore, of the highest importance to secure as far as possible that the Court should be regarded by them as impartial and independent, and as one which would win their confidence. When the counsel who was engaged for the Chiefs inquired into the case he saw it was impossible within the required time to get up the evidence sufficiently, and it is greatly to the credit of the Government that a six weeks' adjournment was granted. There was, however, a strong body of opinion in the colony that the best was not being done under the circumstances. Here are extracts from the Times of Natal, of 6th and 7th December, 1888, a newspaper which, I believe, is on the Government side. I have carefully abstained from using extracts from opposition papers.

"We want to know why British justice has been travestied and its final principles ignored, and why, to crown all, the meanness of revenge has been allowed to usurp the dictates of fair play." . . . "It is time Zululand officialdom was put upon its trial, and we think the best order of procedure would be, first, a Commission—an impartial one—to inquire in the causes of the late outbreak and the conduct of the Zululand officials, and, afterwards, the same Commission to try the Chiefs who were forced or persuaded into rebellion."

The result of the trial was that Dinizulu and six others were sentenced to terms of imprisonment, and one Chief was condemned to death. The death sentence was remitted, and three of the Chiefs have since been released. I believe that at present two are in prison. Dinizulu and his two uncles are in confinement at St. Helena. The correspondent of the London Daily Chronicle wrote:—

"The sentence is regarded at Durban as thoroughly vindictive, the Court being accused throughout of having shown a strong bias against the prisoners owing to their having declined to adopt the views of the Court in regard to their own defence."

An appeal from the sentence was brought before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, but was rejected, not on the absolute merits of the case, but because the Committee thought they could not interfere in such a case. The following is an extract from the decision of the Lord Chancellor:—

"Their Lordships do not think it necessary to go into the question whether or not there has been any violation of the rules with reference to the forms of procedure; still less do they wish to hold out any notion that a violation of the forms of procedure constituted in the way we have been informed would be a ground for appealing to this Committee. It may well be that there are some things which it is right, for the regular conduct of criminal procedure should be observed. . . . It would be, therefore, inadvisable, their Lordships think, to examine the grounds, even if there were any more foundation for them than appears."

The men are now confined in St. Helena, and I understand that no native of Zululand not furnished with a special permit is allowed to land on the island. Would it not be better they should now be liberated than that at the expiration of their sentence in a few years they should return to their country carrying with them a sense of wrong? We all know how Miss Colenso with full knowledge of the case has taken up this subject, and how she has come over here and spent her time in trying to influence public opinion with regard to it. We know what this lady's father was; how he was beloved in the country, and what he did for the natives. She was brought up among them and understands their language. I do think it is a serious matter that we should do anything that is so much called in question by a person of her experience and self-devotion. She is not the only person who has felt strongly on the subject. Mr. Escombe, a leading man in the Colony of Natal, has spent £1,000 out of his own pocket in connection with the question. He was in England when the trial began, and he hastened back to South Africa to assist the prisoners. Then there is Mr. Fairbridge, a Cape barrister, who, writing on 20th December, 1889, says—

"It confirms the opinion I had previously entertained that the trial of Dinizulu was a scandalous farce—a device to give colour to a conclusion foreseen and fore-ordained. 'Oh! justice, what crimes are committed in thy name?'"

All that is desired now is that the case of these prisoners should be seriously considered by the Colonial Office with a view to their being liberated and sent back to their own country. They have surely suffered enough, and I believe nothing would tend more to the honour of this country or would increase our influence in South Africa than to have the matter fully and fairly considered. We must remember that there are 140,000 Zulus to 600 whites in Zululand, and that the Zulus are an increasing, not a dying out, people. I will conclude by reading the closing lines of the voluminous pamphlet on the subject drawn up by Mr. Escombe and Mr. Dumal, both of whom are lawyers. They say—

"If Her Majesty's Government will see justice done, they may remove every soldier from Zululand. There is not in the whole of Her Majesty's possessions a race more loyal and more wronged than the Zulus."

I beg to move the reduction of the Vote by £100.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item A, of £37,682, Salaries, be reduced by £100, part of the Salary of the Secretary of State."—(Mr. Webb.)

*(11.24.) BARON H. DE WORMS: This question is by no means a new one. The hon. Member has expressed the views entertained by Miss Colenso, who, I am sure, is thoroughly sincere, but who for many years has played a part in Zululand which has not been conducive to the welfare of the natives or the peace of the country. [Opposition cries of "Oh!"] If hon. Members will refer to the Despatches sent to this country from Africa they will find that I am not speaking without warrant. During the Administration of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, on the 7th December, 1882, Sir H. Bulwer wrote to Lord Kimberley—

"... It is impossible to resist the conclusion that it was upon the strength of what was said by her (i.e. H. Miss Colenso) to Ndabuko at Bishopstowe that the latter decided to take up arms on his return to Zululand."

If I had time I could quote other Despatches in confirmation of the views of Sir Henry Bulwer. We have not now to discuss the action of Zibepu, which followed on many hostile acts of Dinuzulu against him. The line taken in defending the Zulu Chiefs is that Dinuzulu, Ndabuko, Tshingana, and others collected their forces and raided from fear of Zibepu, and not from hostility to Her Majesty's Government. The answer is threefold:—First, that they committed acts which showed resistance to the British Government in 1887, before there was any thought of repatriating Zibepu—or, therefore, any fear of him. Secondly, Zibepu did not take any hostile steps against them, or do anything which should have caused them uneasiness before June 1, 1888, when he was called up to the Ndwandwe Magistracy to strengthen the forces there; but between April and June, Dinuzulu and Ndabuko collected forces, resisted the police, refused to give up men against whom warrants had been issued, and made raids on Chiefs solely because they were loyal to the Government. In the third place, after Zibepu had been utterly routed at the Unduna Hill, and after all fear must have been at an end, they kept their forces collected at Ceza, committed acts of violence, and kept the country in a state of unrest. The case of the defenders of Dinizulu and others appears based on two contradictory arguments: first, that their acts of violence are not directed against the Government, but against Zibepu; and, secondly, that their acts were directed against the Government, but that they ought to be condoned on the ground that the acts of the previous Government and of officials under the present Government drove them to commit the offences with which they are charged. These prisoners have in fact, defied the authority of the law, and, like others who do so, must expect to be punished. Not only have they rebelled against the authority of the Crown, but they have committed acts of great violence. They have been described as martyrs to British injustice and tyranny, when the fact is that they are rebels in the true sense of the word, and that some of them are actual murderers. In my hand I hold a list of the murders ascribed to them. On the 3rd June they murdered a Boer named Dirk Louw, near Ceza; on the 4th June, three men, a woman, and a child were killed by Dinizulu; on the 5th June two of Zibepu's men were murdered; on the 6th June Klaas Louw and a native boy were murdered; on the 8th of June one of Zibepu's men was killed; on the 18th June a native was murdered near Shalo, and three natives at Mabedhlana; on the 28th June were murdered Ashby (white trader), two native women, and two children; and on the 3rd July was murdered C. V. Tonge, trader. There is undoubted evidence before the Commission that these men were directly implicated in these murders.

CAPTAIN BETHELL: There was no evidence that the men were answerable for all these deaths which technically were murders.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: There were many cases beyond those with which they were actually charged. Evidence was not given in all cases; some charges were withdrawn; but there was evidence before the Commission that in many cases these men were more or less directly implicated. I am astonished to hear the statement that the tribunal which tried the cases was an improper tribunal. It was properly constituted, presided over by a Judge of the Supreme Court of Natal, and took evidence according to the rules of legal procedure. The sentences passed were extremely lenient considering the nature of the offences brought home to the prisoners, and even then the Secretary of State, anxious to err on the side of mercy, further reduced the sentences on the three Chiefs—Dinizulu and his relatives—and they were deported to St. Helena. It is said that the fact of these men being exiled from Zululand is the cause of the country being kept in a state of agitation and disquiet, but that is not so. From the moment they left Zululand, peace was restored, and the country has never been so quiet and prosperous as since these three men were removed. I think, then, we are justified in concluding that these were the disturbing elements. The hon. Member has spoken of these men suffering great hardships in St. Helena; but the fact is, they were never more comfortable in their lives. They have the ordinary comforts of civilisation, they have none of the hardships of barbarism, they are allowed to see their friends in the Island, and, as a matter of fact, these Zulu prisoners live in St. Helena under peculiar conditions of comfort. I really cannot see any case of hardship has been established. I can assure hon. Members that the case of these prisoners has been most carefully considered by Her Majesty's Government; their punishment is most lenient. What may be the action of Her Majesty's Government towards them after a lapse of time, and if they continue the good conduct which happily characterises them now, I cannot say; but at the present moment I cannot hold out any hope that their case will be re-considered by the Secretary of State.

(11.35.) DR. CLARK: I very much regret to hear the right hon. Gentleman say that the case of these Chiefs cannot be re-considered. I cannot agree with the right hon. Gentleman in his estimate of the result of Miss Colenso's action. Admitting that Dinizulu rose in rebellion, something can be said in justification of this rebellion. The Zulu nation were dissatisfied in 1887, before Usibepu went back, so dissatisfied that they came to the determination to oppose the great White Queen, and the Chiefs determined to do their level best to drive the British out of Zululand. Admitting that, and taking the case at its worst, yet something can be said in favour of re-considering the position. Rebellion, of course, is a very serious crime, but then, in 1887, Dinizulu was King of Zululand, recognised as absolute King of the country by us and everybody else. Without his knowledge and consent we annexed Zululand, and in 1887-88 Dinizulu, to maintain his position, rose in rebellion. He was absolute King one day, he became a rebel the next day. Well, rebellion is justifiable sometimes, and gets the name of patriotism. In 1887, at the time the partition of Zululand was going on, I happened to be in Zululand, and I saw Dinizulu, and I know that at that time Tshingana and Undabuko, the two brethren of Cetewayo, were anxious to get the aid of the Boers to drive out the British, or the aid of the British to drive out the Boers. They found themselves encompassed—the New Republic on the one side, the British on the other. A third of Zululand was in the hands of Mr. Melnotte Osborn, and called the Zulu Reserve, where the loyal Zulus were, and to the north and east were the Boers of the New Republic. Tshingana and Undabuko, the King's uncles, were anxious to get the British to drive out the Boers, and then they were willing that the British should remain, or to get the aid of the Boers to drive out the British from the Reserve, the Boers of the New Republic retaining the land they held as the price of their services. Of course, neither the British or the Boers would enter into any arrangement of the kind. They proceeded to divide the territory, and the interests of the Zulu King were ignored. I protested in this House in 1887 and took a Division—Sir Henry Holland being then Secretary of State—against the partition of Zululand and the handing over of a large territory to the New Republic. But the partition was carried out, and hundreds of miles where white men had never set foot—the ancient tribal lands of the Zulus—passed to the Boers. In 1884, when the Boers came in, they drove out Usibepu who, up to that time, had been Zulu King after Cetewayo had been put out. The pressure and agitation was such that the British Government sent back Cetewayo, but Usibepu was too strong for him. Cetewayo was defeated and driven into the bush, where he died. The Boers then came to terms with the young King Dinizulu and his uncles, Tshingana and Undabuko, and, with the aid of the Boers, Usibepu was routed and driven into the Reserve. Dinizulu remained King, but he found his new allies were eating up the whole of his Kingdom; their farms were covering the whole of Zululand. For years negotiations went on between the authorities of the New Republic and Mr. Ecott. He came to London and saw Mr. Stanhope and Lord Derby, but no terms were settled until 1887, when Sir Henry Holland came to terms with the Boers as to division of spoil, and the interests of the Zulus were sacrificed. Dinizulu protested, and when I saw him he, not without cause, was very discontented. We offered pensions to Dinizulu and his two uncles, £300 a year, but the King protested against the ancient tribal grounds of his race, the graves of his grandfathers, the burial place of the great Chief who was the Napoleon of the Zulu nation, being handed over to the alien Boers. But the annexation was carried out. I should not have objected to that course, which probably would have been the wiser course under the circumstances; but what can now be said in favour of these unfortunate men is that because they were dissatisfied Sir Arthur Havelock, knowing the evil that would result—and in Despatches he has admitted it, as the Usutos were dissatisfied—determined to overawe them, and to coerce them, sent Usibepu back with 1,000 men for the purpose. A portion of Undabuko's land, including his chief kraal, was given to Usibepu. Undabuko cleared out; but when he came to take away his corn from his pits, he found they had been rifled. Usibepu was ordered to pay a fine of cattle, but he refused, and the result was there was fighting between Usibepu and his followers and the Usuto section of the Zulus. The British took the side of Usibepu, the Usutos were driven across the border, and Dinizulu, Tshingana, and Undabuko might now be in a position of hostile independence; but yielding to the advice of Miss

Colenso they came to Natal and demanded their trial. Before a jury of white men and the Court at Natal the facts might have been brought out, but they were tried by a Special Commission on a charge of murder. Well, there had been a tribal war, and many lives were lost of course, and, technically, you may call that murder. They were charged with murder, that being the only crime under which they could be removed. But Dinizulu has never been tried for murder. He has been taken away on a false charge. It was a mere farce, a mockery of a trial, and Dinizulu's witnesses were not allowed to give evidence. Everybody knows this was so. [Baron H. de WORMS expressed dissent.] Well, everybody but the right hon. Gentleman—

*BARON H. DE WORMS: There is not a shadow of foundation for these allegations.

DR. CLARK: I have seen the sworn depositions of men who were prevented from giving evidence. On a false charge these men have been removed. They demanded a fair trial, and why did you not allow them this trial before the High Court of Natal and a jury of white men, who, if prejudiced at all, would certainly not be prejudiced in favour of the Zulus? But after the pretence of a trial they were condemned and sent to St. Helena. I think very harsh treatment has been used towards the Zulu reigning family. The course pursued towards Cetewayo was a mistake and a crime. When replaced in 1884 the Government should not have replaced him in the midst of his enemies to be driven out at once and practically murdered. The man who carried out the arrangement, Sir Henry Bulwer, was totally opposed to the Royal Zulu Family, and he employed Sir Theophilus Shepstone. Sir Henry Bulwer wrote Despatch after Despatch protesting against the policy pursued, but he should have resigned his office, and should not have pretended to carry out a policy his judgment condemned; he never should have been entrusted with the duty of carrying it out. Cetewayo was replaced under conditions in which it was impossible for him to maintain his position. Usibepu had a large army; Cetewayo had but few followers. When Dinizulu was recognised by the Boers we ought to have come to terms, but we allowed anarchy to reign, and when we divided the territory with the Boers the sending back of Usibepu was an incitement to civil war. Like Kilkenny cats, the Zulu people were allowed to fight to clear the land for white men to settle upon it. We are told there has been peace since the King and the Usuto Chiefs have been removed, and we have annexed Zululand. I think the wisest course would be to let bygones be bygones, proclaim a general amnesty, annex Zululand to Natal, and let it be administered under a responsible Natal Government. Send back these Chiefs, give them pensions, and settle them on their own tribal lands, make them British subjects. Let the matter be arranged, not by men like Mr. Addison, but by responsible neutral persons who have not taken sides in the disputes, and I think you will find that Zululand will comfortably settle down. I think we have been wrong from the beginning in our treatment of Cetewayo and his family, and if we continue our present policy we shall perpetuate the wrong. Lord Knutsford knows the question very well. I hope he will re-consider the whole question, re-settle the Usuto Chiefs on their tribal lands, annex Zululand to Natal, and give Natal a chance of developing a stable and responsible Government.

(11.55.) MR. T. ELLIS (Merionethshire): I am quite certain that if hon. Members generally devoted a little more attention to this Zulu question and the claims of these Zulu Chiefs, there would not be two opinions as to where our duty lies towards the Zulu people. But the conditions of our Parliamentary life are such that it is impossible for any large number of Members to pay close attention to the circumstances, the difficulties, and troubles connected with our distant possessions and dependencies. Concerning itself as the House does with the affairs of every parish in the Kingdom, as well as the government of a great Empire, I suppose it is impossible to induce any large number of Members to pay close attention to a question such as this. I feel certain that if an appreciable number of Members would give a small amount of time to inquire into the circumstances attending our conquest of Zululand and our treatment of it in 1886-7 until it was divided between the Boers and the English, and the circumstances attending the trial by Special Commission and the banishment of these Zulu Chiefs—I say if any appreciable number of Members on either side would look into these matters I am certain there would be such a pressure of opinion that the Government would be induced to re-consider their decision in this matter. The late Mr. Bradlaugh was one of the few who turned attention to the subject, and often in conversation did he express his extreme regret that in two Sessions he lost the opportunity of bringing it before the House; and again and again I have heard him say that, after taking a good deal of trouble in going into the case, he found there was a clear and complete case on the side of these Zulu Chiefs. His opinion was strong and decided that the only fair policy towards these three Chiefs—the only wise and just policy towards the Zulu people, and in the interest of that part of South Africa—was to liberate the prisoners, make them subjects of the Queen, and remove the soreness that must exist until the young King and his uncles are restored to their people. The Under Secretary has tried to put Miss Colenso out of court by dragging out of a Despatch from Sir Henry Bulwer in 1882 one sentence, showing that probably Miss Colenso had used some influence, arousing the Zulus to protest against certain forms of injustice which had been used against them. It seems to me that a mere isolated sentence in a Despatch, from one having such strong aggressive views as Sir Henry Bulwer, counts as nothing against that devotion and self-sacrifice with which Miss Colenso has taken up the Zulu cause, sacrificing time, money, and convenience in the effort to influence the Colonial Office and Parliament. I really think the right hon. Gentleman ought to find some worthier argument in reply to what has been said on either side than a mere isolated extract from a Despatch from one who adopted such an aggressive policy towards the Zulus as did Sir Henry Bulwer during the time he was at Natal. Altogether I think that our treatment of the Zulu people has been worse than our treatment of any native race—certainly in South Africa. I have always considered the conquest of Zululand a mistake and a crime. We made a lion of Cetewayo here in England; we made a fool of him again in Zulu-land, sending him back into the midst of his enemies. One of the worst forms of treatment England employs in the subjection of native races is the encouragement given to the enemies of the King or Chief. From the beginning Usibepu was a traitor to the Zulu King, and we did everything to support and strengthen him against Cetewayo, and afterwards against Dinizulu.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I wish to call attention to the question relating to the erection of the Central Police Barracks in Belfast, the money for which has appeared in the Estimates from year to year. I have asked questions from time to time, and the Secretary to the Treasury has stated that there would be no delay. The police of Belfast are at present housed under most insanitary conditions, and the men suffer in comfort and in health. The outbreak of an epidemic disease in Belfast is attributed to the insanitary condition of the police station. On the 2nd of March last the Secretary to the Treasury said that all the difficulties had been got rid of, that the site had been acquired, and that the building would be immediately commenced. This matter is a very serious one. The Corporation are the landlords of the site. Long since the Board of Works acquired part of the site, and the present tenants undertook that if the site was taken from them before March, 1893, the former tenants shall pay a fine of £3,000. The impression has got abroad that there is an intrigue between the Board of Works and the Corporation to procrastinate for two years in order that the fine of £3,000 may be escaped. It was mentioned to-night in answer to my question, that there was some doubt about the foundations, but there were buildings there before, and why cannot there be buildings there again? I trust that the matter will be attended to, though I know the difficulty of obtaining anything like diligence in connection with Irish affairs.

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): The hon. Member has addressed a question on this subject to the Chief Secretary, and I think it is hardly in accordance with Parliamentary usage that a question which has been put to one of my Colleagues should now be referred to me without any notice being given. The architect of the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland and the Inspector of Constabulary have come to the conclusion, I am informed, that the first thing to do in the interests of the Service is to proceed with the erection of the barracks for the men, there being no emergency with regard to stables. The poor man has died since, therefore I cannot refer to him. I think the hon. Member himself has given reasons why it is desirable to proceed with the barracks before May, and inquiry shows that is the arrangement which has been made.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): Year after year we find these sums not appropriated in a regular way, but spent by the Board of Works or the Post Office, or some other Department as they deem fit. The fact remains that the amount voted for the Board of Works is not expended in the manner the Treasury have represented it would be expended, and this is not an isolated instance. It is one of the cases that are always to be met with. Even the Secretary to the Treasury himself has told us that the Board of Works do not know how these things are done, and I think the matter one which is very properly brought under the attention of this House. I therefore ask the Secretary to the Treasury to give us some sort of assurance that the promises which have so often been made shall be kept.

HARROW ROAD AND PADDINGTON TRAMWAYS BILL.

Bill read 3^a, with the Amendments.

*LORD MONKSWEILL: My Lords, I have given notice of an Amendment for the re-insertion of a clause which was in the Bill as it left the Commons, but has since been struck out by the Chairman of Committees. It is to add a new clause after Clause 38, providing that persons employed by the company upon the tramways shall not be required to work for more than 10 hours per day. This was a clause which was inserted by agreement between the County Council of London and the Tramway Company. It was inserted after very much discussion in the London County Council, and after very full consideration. The discussion was renewed two or three times over. So much stress did the London County Council lay upon this provision that they required an undertaking from the company to withdraw the Bill if by any chance the clause should be struck out in Parliament. The clause was not struck out in the House of Commons, and if the Chairman of Committees in the House of Commons had taken the same view as the noble Earl the Chairman of Committees here, there would have been no chance of the Bill passing into law. Before the noble Earl took the Bill into Committee he asked the London County Council whether they laid much stress upon this clause or not. The answer was strongly in the affirmative. Indeed, as I have said on more than one occasion, the London County Council had discussed the matter and had determined to abide by this clause after full discussion. Unfortunately, before an answer could be obtained from the London County Council the Bill had passed through Committee, and the clause had been expunged. I do not in any way complain of the action of the Chairman of Committees personally in this matter. As I understand the objection taken by the noble Earl to this clause was not an objection on its merits, but he objected to it simply on the ground that it ought not to have been inserted in a Private Bill at all. I can perfectly understand that if the Chairman of Committees feels any doubt as to whether any clause ought not to be inserted in a Private Bill, it would be quite right of the noble Earl to take the opinion of the House on the matter, and to have the clause struck out in the first place. But I would say this, though it might be right for the noble Earl to do that when it comes before your Lordships' House, the House might take a different view, and think that the clause is one to be retained in this Bill under the circumstances, even though it is a Private Bill. The responsibility then, of course, rests upon the House, and is shifted off the shoulders of the Chairman of Committees. The question raised here is a very important one, and I think it ought to be decided and discussed by your Lordships' House. The Bill in its present form releases the company from an engagement which they have entered into with the London County Council as to the hours of labour of the persons employed by them, and the question, as I understand, that your Lordships have to determine is this—How far it is desirable that Parliament should exercise the undoubted right it possesses to see that the agreement between two parties who are capable of contracting an agreement, which does not militate against the general law of the country, should be interfered with by Parliament? As to that it does seem to me that such a power ought only to be exercised when an agreement entered into of the description I have mentioned is highly and exceedingly objectionable. I think it would be a very strong measure for your Lordships' House on that ground to object to the clause which was retained in this Bill in the House of Commons, because, as I say, this is an agreement entered into with the London County Council by the company proposing to construct these tramways. It was discussed over and over again in the County Council, and there is no question which is more interesting to the public or to the London County Council than this question of limiting the hours of labour. For this House to say that this is such an outrageous proposal as that your Lordships cannot sanction it would be to set your Lordships' House in absolute antagonism to the elected representatives of London if that is the ground on which your Lordships proceed. But I understand the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees takes up a somewhat different ground. I understand he says that in no Private Bill such as this for the construction of a tramway ought any special terms with regard to the working of the tramway to be laid down; that no Private Bill ought to go beyond the general terms of working within the powers conferred by the general law. That I understand to be the attitude assumed by the noble Earl the Chairman of Committees. Well, if that is the attitude of the noble Earl, it is perfectly clear that the Legislature has not endorsed his opinion. Now, I would refer your Lordships upon this point to the Dundee Tramways Act of 1872. That was an Act authorising the construction of a tramway in Dundee, and Clause 55 of this Dundee Tramway Act does interfere with the general powers given to work tramways under the general Acts of Parliament, and interferes in Section 55 in a very special manner indeed. Therefore, my Lords, it does appear to me on the authority of that Bill, and I believe there are other Bills in the same sense, that if the noble Earl is going to lay down a general rule that he will not allow in a private Act any special conditions of running or working to be inserted in the case of Tramway Companies, he will find himself at variance with what has hitherto been considered to be the settled law of the land, and I hope whatever view he may take with regard to the particular clause which I suggest should be inserted to-day, that the noble Earl will give the House the advantage of his opinion with regard to matters which may, or may not, be put into a Private Bill, and that he will tell us whether or not he adheres to the opinion, which I believe he holds, to the effect that in no Private Bill ought there to be any special conditions whatever limiting the company in the mode in which it should conduct its traffic. Now, with regard to the special clause here, I may mention that it is not really of a peculiarly startling or appalling character. It does not say that no man shall be allowed to work more than 10 hours a day. All the clause says is that a man shall not be compelled to work more than 10 hours a day if he does not wish to do so, which is a totally different thing. I can easily understand that it may be exceedingly important that Local Authorities should be empowered to make special running arrangements when tramways are proposed to be established in their midst. Tramways are, during construction, a great public nuisance, and it may be from the local conditions and from the circumstances of the case that the Tramway Company will make an enormous profit; and, if that is so, I do not see why the Local Authority should be prevented from putting special clauses into the private Act of Parliament obtained by the company, which should have the effect of reducing those profits within moderate limits, and of insisting that the company should take the tramways over or should construct the tramway on such conditions as should not be onerous to the inhabitants. I beg leave to move the Amendment of which I have given notice.

Amendment moved, in page 17, after Clause 38, to insert as new Clause—

"Every person employed by the company upon or in connection with any of the tramways by this Act authorised shall be employed on the terms of not being required to work for a longer period than ten hours per diem."—(The Lord Monkswell.)

*THE EARL OF MORLEY: My Lords, I am not sorry that the noble Lord has brought before your Lordships the clause which he has moved as an Amendment to the Bill which is now to be read a third time. I wish, in the first place, distinctly to take upon myself, as the noble Lord has very rightly put it, the whole responsibility for the omission of this clause, which was in the Bill when it came up from the other House, and to exculpate entirely the promoters of the Bill from being parties to the omission of this clause, which, as the noble Lord has said, was an agreed clause between the company and the London County Council. But I would like, in the first place, to entire and absolutely refuse to discuss the question of limitation of the hours of labour on its merits. I conceive that on that point I have nothing in the world to say. I do not express any opinion whether it is desirable or not to do so. My points are: in the first place, whether such a clause should be introduced into a Private Bill, practically without the knowledge of Parliament; and, in the second place, whether the Standing Orders of your Lordships' House and of the other House of Parliament, in regard to obtaining the consent of the Local Authority to making a tramway, should be used as a means of exacting from the Tramway Company such conditions as the noble Lord wishes to introduce into this Bill. Now, in the first place, I would meet one or two of the minor points to which the noble Lord has referred. He first finds fault with me, I do not say in any acrimonious way, but he disputes my action in interfering with an agreement that has been made between a Local Authority and a public company. The House must be perfectly aware that all such agreements embodied in an Act of Parliament are made distinctly subject to your Lordships' Standing Orders. There is a provision that they are subject to any alteration that Parliament may make in them, and it not infrequently happens that it is necessary for me to modify agreements, which appear either to be against the general course of Parliament or the practice under your Lordships' Standing Orders. The noble Lord then went on to ask a question as to my reading of the Standing Orders, requiring the consent of the Local Authority before any tramway is allowed on a public road. That Standing Order was, I think, passed in 1875; I am not quite certain as to the date, but I am happy to say that I need not give my own interpretation of the object of that Standing Order, because I have the decision of a very important Standing Order Committee which decided it in a way which entirely coincides with my own opinion of it. I imagine that the object of that Standing Order is to enable the Local Authorities who have the care of the public roads to state whether in their opinion a tramway would be convenient or inconvenient to a district, whether the roads are wide enough for it, or whether they are so narrow that a tramway would be an inconvenience and a nuisance to the district. Acting on that principle, the Local Authorities of some districts exclude altogether tramways from the districts over which they have jurisdiction. In other cases, and I think not unreasonably, they may say that the roads are too narrow, but that if the Tramway Company will help to widen the roads, either by contributing towards the expense of them or in other ways, they will then give their consent for the Tramway Bill to be passed. Those seem to me to be perfectly reasonable conditions; but when it comes to imposing other conditions not affecting the physical convenience of the district, or possibly the construction of the tramway, the thing is quite on a different ground. In confirmation of my view of the matter I may state that attempts have more than once been made by the Local Authorities to exact from Tramway Companies mileage rates. In two cases, I think it was in the very Bill from which the noble Lord quoted just now—the Dundee Tramways Bill of 1872, and I believe another Scotch Bill of the same year—such mileage rates were granted; but as soon as it was discovered they were invariably refused in all subsequent Bills. The same thing occurred in the case of Leeds, and in the following year in the case of Bradford; and ever since, with no exception, no mileage rates have been allowed as a condition of passing a Tramway Act. Only six years ago, in the case of the Edinburgh Bill, which came up from the House of Commons with such a clause in it, the clause was rejected in this House as being contrary to the practice of this House and to public interest. I mention that to show what are the kind of conditions which have been allowed, and which have not been allowed hitherto by your Lordships' House. There was a further case in 1883 of the Kingston, Monkstown, and Blackrock Tramways Bill. As far as I remember the case, there were two competing schemes, in one of which the Local Authority had imposed certain conditions upon the company as a preliminary condition for the Bill to be introduced into your Lordships' House. A very strong Standing Order Committee sat upon that Bill, and so strongly did they feel the force of what I have just urged upon the House that they positively dispensed with the Standing Order requiring the consent of the Local Authority. I think that is pretty strong evidence that, at any rate in the course I took, I have not been acting contrary to the precedents that have been established for the guidance of the House. So much for the interpretation of this Standing Order; it seems to me the Standing Order never for a moment contemplated the imposition of such a condition as the noble Lord would impose upon this company. I said just now it was as far as possible from my intention to express an opinion upon the policy of the clause, the insertion of which is moved by the noble Lord; but I do venture to express the strongest opinion upon this point: that if such a clause is introduced into an Act of Parliament at all it should be introduced by public legislation, and then the Local Authorities would be distinctly informed that they have the power of imposing such conditions after full discussion of the matter both in this and in the other House. But for Parliament to sanction a clause, for Parliament to give its approval to a clause which, though it may be only the result of an agreement between a company and a Local Authority in a Private Act, which has been passed without anybody knowing anything about it, seems to me to be entirely foreign to the practice of private legislation, and I earnestly trust the House will support me in the view I have taken. I feel confident the introduction of such a principle without the approval of Parliament by public legislation would be a most dangerous innovation on the practice of Parliament, and of your Lordships' House. There is one matter which I forgot to mention. The noble Lord referred to a clause in the Dundee Act making provision with regard to labourers' trains. That is a clause which is introduced, as far as I know, into all Tramway Acts brought into this House; and, therefore, there is no peculiarity in that. In any case, that precedent of nearly 20 years ago would, I think, hardly be sufficient to upset precedents which have been established since, and I venture to hope, for the reasons I have pointed out, that your Lordships will not sanction this Amendment, and will not allow the insertion of this clause.

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Viscount CRANBROOK): I hope your Lordships will agree with the noble Earl the Chairman of Committees in the course he has taken. This is not the time or place in which we should any of us feel called upon to discuss the propriety of limiting the hours of labour in the way it is done here. Whether it be right or wrong, that is a question which should be dealt with by public legislation if it is dealt with by legislation at all. After what has been said by our Chairman of Committees it seems to me perfectly clear that there is a great danger in allowing matters of this kind such as limiting the hours of adult labour in a merely Private Bill. The introduction of clauses of that kind per incuriam, and really without anybody noticing them, is a matter of very great danger indeed; and, therefore, I hope your Lordships will thoroughly support the noble Earl the Chairman of Committees in the course he has taken.

EARL WEMYSS: My Lords, I rejoice to hear the noble Viscount, who has just sat down, point to a very great danger in our Private Bill legislation, namely, that in a Private Bill such as this principles are sought to be introduced which are not observed at the time in passing that Private Bill, but which afterwards are used as stalking horses for the introduction of those principles into public legislation. I confess I knew nothing of this Bill or of its genesis until I came down to the House this evening. When I received my Parliamentary Papers this morning I saw there was a clause to be introduced which purports directly to clog adult male labour; and it seemed to me to be a clause which your Lordships ought to strongly and carefully guard against. I know nothing, I repeat, of its genesis, but we have heard from the noble Lord that it is begotten by the London County Council, and I am inclined to think that will not give it any greater recommendation, or make it more acceptable to your Lordships; and the more so when it has been shown clearly to be the object of the London County Council to limit adult labour whenever they can, and in every possible way.

LORD THRING: My Lords, I wish to say a few words upon this question. I should be the last man in this House to attempt to narrow the powers of the Chairman of Committees. I have known myself many instances in which fraudulent clauses have been introduced into Private Bills, and have been only discovered by the diligence of the Chairman of Committees. He is, in fact, the only guardian against the fraudulent legislation which is constantly being attempted. But with regard to this clause, I cannot understand why it is supposed to fall within the category of clauses which ought to be excluded from Private Bills. Why should not a Municipality say to a company that is going to make a tramway along its streets, "We do not wish you to travel on Sundays" if they like? I may say I am not myself in favour of it; but why should not they say that if they choose, if Sunday travelling is against the feeling of the town? Then, again, with regard to the imposition of low fares, why should not they say if they like, "You must run labourers' trams at certain fares?" Why is a Municipality to be deprived of the power of making that bargain? This is not a clause for the purpose of limiting adult labour. It is simply a clause saying that a particular company shall not compel the persons it employs to work beyond a certain number of hours. I give no precise opinion upon the advisability of the clause, but at any rate it is not open to the usual accusation against such clauses, that they are introduced by private individuals only. This is a clause which has been introduced by the Municipality, and consented to by the promoters of the Bill, and I cannot understand why such a clause should be excluded from discussion in this House. I trust, therefore, that your Lordships will discuss it.

LORD CLIFFORD OF CHUDLEIGH: My Lords, there is only one point upon this clause which I should like to press upon the House, and that is whether it is in any way a prohibition or restriction upon the hours of labour. It seems to me it is not, and that it is simply an agreement between the County Council and the Tramway Company that one of the conditions of employment offered by the Company shall be that of working only 10 hours a day. There is nothing in the clause to prevent any workman coming to the Tramway Company and making an offer to the Company to work any number of hours he likes. I quite agree with every word which has fallen from the noble Earl the Chairman of Committees, if this clause went in any way to restrict the hours during which any working man might work; but it seems to me to be simply an agreement between the two parties, and between themselves only, that a certain state of things shall exist; and I contend that this is entirely and in every way an agreement of a private nature, and in no way touches upon the public question of any restriction upon the hours of labour.

LORD MONKS WELL: I will not trouble the House to divide.

Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

Bill passed, and returned to the Commons.

SANDHURST AND WOOLWICH.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF STRAFFORD, in rising to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether it will be possible during the present financial year to carry out the recommendations of the Board of Visitors in 1890, at the Royal Military College, Sandhurst, and at the Royal Military Academy, Woolwich, said: My Lords, having been for six years a member of the Board of Visitors at Woolwich and Sandhurst, I have taken great interest in all I have seen there, and I venture for a moment to call the attention of the Under Secretary of State for War to the Report of the Board of Visitors of last year, and to ask him whether he can hold out any hope that during the present financial year it will be possible to carry out the recommendations of the Board. I may remind your Lordships that the Army Estimates for the present year amount to £17,540,000, and I hope the noble Earl who will be good enough to answer my question may be able to say that some small portion of that large sum can be judiciously employed in carrying out the recommendations of the Board of Visitors both at Woolwich and Sandhurst. With regard to Sandhurst, the Report of the Visitors in nearly all essential particulars was very satisfactory. They spoke in the highest terms of the discipline, of the College, of the health and physique of the cadets, of the commissariat arrangements, which are very good, and the arrangements in reference to the hospital. There are, however, one or two points which they hope may be favourably considered by those in authority. The first is that in the College there is no hot water laid on in any part of the building, that the gas is of a bad quality, and the chapel is so cold that in winter it is scarcely endurable; and there are none of the present improved sanitary arrangements. They also hope that the number of instructors may be extended from 20 to 25, and that a working party may in future consist of 12 Royal Engineers and 30 Linesmen. They also notice that the terms for the course of instruction should be extended to three instead of two, and that the time for the gentlemen cadets to remain at the College should be 18 months instead of 12. They consider that would be to their advantage. Then with regard to Woolwich, the Report is not so favourable, but there is nothing to complain of with regard to the health, discipline, and physique of the cadets, or in respect of the commissariat arrangements there; but they speak very strongly indeed of the want of accommodation, and with your Lordships' permission I will read two or three lines of their Report. After dealing with the accommodation for messing, and reading and sleeping rooms, they call attention to the fact that very large sums are paid by the parents of these young gentlemen, the accommodation for whom is in these respects so woefully deficient. They say—

“The Board are very far from wishing to recommend luxurious quarters to young men entering a profession in which comfort is so frequently to be sacrificed, but they are unanimously of the opinion that sufficient accommodation is not afforded. The fees paid by the parents of cadets have been already raised from £125 to £150 per annum; the rooms can only accommodate properly 211 cadets, and additional rooms are, therefore, urgently required for 63.”

I will not trouble your Lordships by going further into these Reports. They are very interesting reading, but I trust the noble Earl, when he answers the question which I put to him, will be able to give your Lordships a satisfactory reply, because I think a very small additional outlay from the enormous amount of the Army Estimates will contribute very much to the comfort and convenience of these young gentlemen, both at Sandhurst and at Woolwich, who I am certain, will be an honour to their country.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Earl BROWNLOW): My Lords, I will endeavour to explain to the House what is being done both at the Royal Academy at Woolwich and at the Royal Military College, Sandhurst, in the way of structural alterations. I may say that the Secretary of State for War takes very great interest in this question, and that he is very anxious, as far as he possibly can, to make the structural alterations which have been recommended by the Board of Visitors. The Board of Visitors complain of the messing arrangements at Woolwich not being satisfactory. Additional accommodation has been obtained by alterations and by re-arrangements, which include the enlargement of the dining-room, and it is hoped, therefore, that this difficulty will not be felt in future. It was proposed, as your Lordships may be aware, to erect a chapel at Woolwich, and this has always been, if I may say so, rather a pet scheme of the Secretary of State for War, but it was pointed out by the Visitors that it would be advisable to postpone the erection of the chapel, and to devote the money which would have been expended in that way to the erection of more single quarters for cadets. Single quarters for 20 cadets are now in progress. I should be very sorry to place any limit upon the duration of building operations, but it was hoped that they will either be finished or in a very forward state at the end of the financial year. The supply of gas is another thing to which attention has been called by the Board of Visitors. I am informed the gas lighting has been very much improved, and it has been hoped that what has been done will meet the views of the Visitors. With regard to Sandhurst, the first thing I think the Board calls attention to is the want of certain outhouses, and conveniences for the cadets. This work would have been carried out immediately, but the authorities of the Royal Military College at Sandhurst have begged that the work might be postponed until the Vacation. As soon as the Vacation arrives, the work will be gone on with, and will be completed as soon as possible, so that the place is to be ready for the cadets immediately after the Vacation. The next thing to which attention is called is the old laundry. The old laundry was in a very bad condition, with none of the conveniences which are required for a modern laundry. This work was taken in hand at once at a cost of £1,250, and I am informed that it is now completed. The supply of gas is another thing that has been complained of. It has been very much improved and very much increased, and it is hoped that now the supply of gas will be sufficient for the needs of the establishment. I may mention that the Board recommend that the working parties should be increased. That is a matter which I am afraid has not yet been settled; but it is now under the consideration of the Adjutant General, and the Adjutant General has promised me that he will look into the matter and will make the best arrangements he can for the increase of the working parties. As regards the education at Woolwich, the present scheme of education has not been sufficiently long in work to prove its advantages or its defects. It is not proposed to make any alteration at all, but according to the recommendation of the Visitors, it is proposed to get a Report next year upon the working of the education scheme at Woolwich. With regard to Sandhurst, it is proposed as soon as possible to increase the course of instruction and to extend it to three terms, as has been recommended. Of course there is one little difficulty, that by increasing the number of terms, young men will pass more slowly through the College than they do at present; but this difficulty will be partly removed by another proposal, which is that University candidates will no longer go to the Royal Military College. After they have passed their examination at the University it is proposed that they shall be attached to Militia regiments and pass through a

School of Instruction, and also pass a technical examination, but that they should not be required to go to Sandhurst. I think from what I have said your Lordships will see the matter has not been allowed to sleep, but that a good deal has been and is being done, and though perhaps everything is not quite satisfactory, yet still I hope, when the Board of Visitors next go to Woolwich and Sandhurst, they will find that a great deal has been done to carry out their recommendations.

LORD HARLECH: My Lords, as one of the Board of Visitors of these establishments, I should like to say a few words. I have very little to add to what the noble Lord has just said. The Board has made their inspection of these two establishments within the last month, and they were very gratified to find how much had been done towards carrying out their recommendations. I may particularly remark upon the additional rooms, which will accommodate 20 cadets in addition, and thereby release all the rooms which contain four cadets, a number which the size of the rooms cannot, either from a sanitary point of view or as regards efficiency, accommodate. Certain things have not been done, but they are in course of consideration. The gas supply and the ventilation are two very important things—I speak with regard to Woolwich. With regard to Sandhurst, there was a most disgraceful laundry established there last year; we were very happy to see that that had been removed, and that in place of it a most admirable laundry had been erected, with all modern appliances, and in a proper condition for carrying out all the work that was required of it. Also the sanitary arrangements have been added to, and in a great degree the requirements of that admirable establishment at Sandhurst have been met. There is no comparison between the two institutions, and I can say from observation during many years that the Woolwich establishment requires a great deal of remodelling, and probably removal to a different site.

CHARTERED ACCOUNTANTS BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to amend the Law relating to Chartered Accountants—Was presented by the Lord Herschell: read 1^a; to be printed; and to be read 2^a on Friday next. (No. 230.)

FACTORIES AND WORKSHOPS BILL.

(No. 195.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

Moved, "That the House do now resolve itself into Committee."

*THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: Before your Lordships go into Committee on this Bill I should like to make one or two short remarks, and to ask my noble Friend for an explanation of one or two points which appear to me rather difficult to understand. I do so now, because I was unable to be in my place when the Bill was read a second time. Perhaps the most important portion of the Bill is that which deals with sanitation. According to the principle of the Bill it appears to me that unless some alteration is made in it, sanitation will be in a worse condition than it was before. According to the principal Act, as your Lordships are aware, the sanitation of workshops is divided between the Factory Inspectors and the Inspectors of the Local Boards. By this Bill the whole of the sanitation devolves upon the Local Authorities; it is taken altogether out of the hands of the Inspectors under the Factory and Workshop Act. I do not wish to make any comparison between public bodies and public servants, but this I will say, that undoubtedly Her Majesty's Inspectors are a most intelligent and extraordinarily hard working body of men. I do not mean to say that the officers of the Local Authorities do not do their duties, but your Lordships must bear this in mind, that the Inspectors of Nuisances and other officers are appointed by public bodies, and rely for their tenure of office and for their living upon bodies, the members of which may be, and undoubtedly in many cases are, the very persons who are interested in the insanitary dwellings, and are the very persons against whom it may be the duty of the officers to take proceedings. I do not think that is a very fair position in which to place any men. I do not see what provision there is in the Bill, or that there is any means whatever of exercising any practical supervision over the Local Authorities, or any means of seeing that they do their duty. The ultimate Authority is the Secretary of State. How on earth is the Secretary of State to become cognisant of whether the local bodies throughout the country are or are not doing their duty? It would be impossible for the Secretary of State to be able to exercise any real or reliable authority. It is quite impossible for any administrative department to do so. It is out of the power of the Local Government Board to do it. The Local Government Board is a very excellent authority, but if your Lordships have ever had any personal experience of bringing any individual insanitary case before the Local Government Board, I think your Lordships will agree with me that that Board is the absolute negation of perpetual motion. It writes a good many letters, but nothing very particular occurs. Of course, if there is a very large area which becomes insanitary, or if there is a large outbreak of disease, the Local Government Board interferes; but it is absolutely impossible that it can interfere in a number of small cases happening all over the country. It is physically impossible it can do so, unless its staff were increased tenfold. As matters now are, according to the principal Act, it is the duty of the Factory Inspectors to attend to a considerable portion of the sanitation of workshops. According to this Bill that duty will devolve entirely upon the Local Authorities. There must be a great temptation in many cases to the Local Authorities not to do their duty in these cases, they themselves being very often personally interested, and I may say that it is utterly impossible to suppose the Secretary of State can exercise any effectual supervision over those Local Authorities. Then I should like to ask the noble Lord how it is supposed the Secretary of State is to become satisfied that the provisions have, or have not, been carried out. The Bill says that if the Secretary of State is satisfied that the provisions relating to the public health are not observed, he is to do certain things. But how is he to become satisfied? Who is to give him any information about it? I presume the Factory Inspectors. Then the only ground on which a Factory Inspector can enter a workshop in which no protected persons are employed, that is to say, where men only are employed, is in order that he may be satisfied that the sanitary regulations are carried out; but those sanitary powers are now taken away from him, and under this Bill the Factory Inspector would have no power whatever to enter any workshop where men only are employed. I am quite prepared to hear it stated that the fourth section is intended to apply to workshops where men only are employed, but at the same time that takes away from the Factory Inspectors the duty of seeing that the sanitation is properly carried out. That is, I think, inadvisable in regard to places where men only are at work. On those two points I beg to appeal to the noble Lord. That is all I wish to say on the general principle of the Bill. Though this House does not go quite so far as I should like, I desire to take this opportunity of expressing my satisfaction that Her Majesty's Government have brought, and have carried to this stage, a Bill which, if it is effectively administered, will no doubt prove of great benefit to the working classes of this country. I have myself put down a considerable number of Amendments, and there are a good many Amendments in the names of noble Lords. I should wish to say at once that I place myself to a considerable extent in the hands of Her Majesty's Government, who are to judge of the condition of the business in the other House of Parliament. We, in this House, are so situated that whenever we have plenty of time we have nothing to do, whenever we have something to do we have no time. We have been sitting about six months, and have had nothing to do; but now that we have business of considerable importance before us, the Session is drawing to a close, and I say at once I would do nothing whatever that could by any possibility jeopardise the passing of this Bill during the present Session; but at the same time there are some Amendments of great importance presented, and I trust Her Majesty's Government will give them their careful consideration, and will allow them to be added to the Bill.

LORD DE RAMSEY: My Lords, I will endeavour shortly to answer the two points which the noble Earl has put before us. I can very well understand that his whole object in his Bill, as we have seen it in print, was to make the power of inspection, both as regards sanitation and as regards hours of labour, a great deal more stringent than Her Majesty's Government thought was necessary. Therefore, it will be seen that throughout the noble Earl's Amendments—I think I might say almost all through them—he is asking for more stringent powers than we consider the state of our factories and workshops requires. He is alarmed at the proposal that we make with regard to the large transfer of power in the matter of sanitation from the Factory Inspector to the Local Sanitary Authority as regards workshops; but, my Lords, surely in these days, when we have local government creeping on in every way, there is no reason for denying the Local Authorities the power to look after the sanitation in their own particular districts. But let me go a step further, and point out to the noble Earl that if we were really to increase the number of Factory Inspectors or officers generally, the expenso would be so enormous that it would not be at all commensurate with the good which would be derived. I have no doubt if we could afford to put a policeman behind every criminal we should have much less crime; but the cost of doing it would be hardly made up, I think, by the result of the diminution in crime. So, I think, if we increased the number of Factory Inspectors we might do away with a certain amount of mischief; but I think that, whatever the noble Earl's requirements as regards sanitation are, he, in fact, wants to know how in the workshops we are to get at the matter of sweating. I think, when we come to consider that so many of the recommendations of the Sweating Committee have been met in the Government Bill, either in whole or in part, the noble Earl was right when he gave the Government credit for having introduced this Bill. I may also say that the labours of that Committee have gone very largely to help us in this House; but he doubts very much whether, under Clause 1, which is really the mainstay of our new scheme, the stringent powers given to the Secretary of State are sufficient, or whether the Secretary of State will be able to find out when anything wrong is going on. Our Inspectors will certainly in the future, as they have in the past, give us the very best information, and the Secretary of State, on the slightest idea being conveyed to him that anything wrong is going on—say that a breakage of the law is going on, or that sweating is going on in any particular district or trade—will at once take steps in that particular district or in that particular trade for a certain time, say for two years, or more if necessary, to put that district or trade under stringent regulations, in order to bring it into the state which the law requires. I have done the best I can, and as far as I can, to answer the two questions of the noble Earl. I much fear our Bill does not go quite so far as he would like; but I hope, at the same time, he will admit it is an honest and, so far, successful attempt in the direction of the reforms which he has so much at heart.

On Question, agreed to.

House in Committee accordingly.

Clause 1.

LORD THRING: I wish to point out that this clause will not work at all. What does it really say? It says, "Where the Secretary of State is satisfied of the condition of a factory or workshop." Why, my Lords, he has no power to be satisfied as to the condition of a factory or workshop. Instead of retaining the existing law that a certain workshop should be under the Inspectors of the Secretary of State, this Bill refers them to the Sanitary Authority. Then, again, with regard to the clause itself, one of the most important of all sanitary directions is that the drainage should be kept free, and that certain domestic appliances should be found in every factory or workshop. This clause does not extend to them at all, and I challenge the noble Lord to say how it extends the law in any way whatever. At the present moment, under the existing law, a Factory Inspector has full power, when the directions as to ventilation and overcrowding or with respect to limewashing are not obeyed, to enforce the law. The real effect of this clause is really to diminish the powers of the Inspector, and consequently to diminish the powers of the Secretary of State, and so far from being an extension of the factory and workshop law, it is, in fact, a very great diminution of the law.

*THE MARQUESS OF RIPON: My Lords, I really should like to have some further information upon this matter. I quite agree with the noble Lord who has just sat down that this clause, so far from extending the powers of the Inspectors with regard to the inspection of workshops, undoubtedly diminishes their powers. The noble Lord said just now that the Factory Inspectors are an excellent body of men on whom the Secretary of State can rely. I entirely agree with him, but I would point out that he is going to transfer the daily constant inspection of these workshops, in respect of sanitary matters, from those excellent officers and to leave that duty in the hands of local officers, who are not by any means of the same description; and he is going to rely upon a clause which says that if the Secretary of State happens to hear that in any district the workshops are not conducted in a satisfactory manner, he is to have the power of sending his Inspectors round to see into the matter. To propose that as a sufficient substitute for the present system of inspection of workshops is, I must say as it appears to me, a very great mistake.

LORD DE RAMSEY: I forget whether the noble Marquess was present at the Second Reading of the Debate, but the reason for the transfer of the power from the Sanitary Inspectors to the Local Authorities is in consequence of the number which would be required. It is utterly impossible, unless we raise the number of Factory Inspectors to an army, that we could inspect the whole of the workplaces and workshops of this country. It would be utterly impracticable. Those places are in thousands and tens of thousands, and it was considered utterly impossible to do so. The noble Lord who says this clause will not work gives various reasons for his statement; but I hope, at all events, your Lordships will allow us to try it, and if we find we fail it will be very easy afterwards to rectify it.

*THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: The noble Lord says that it would be impossible for the Inspectors to do this work, but I would point out that up to the present they have had to do all the work that has been done. It seems to me there is no more additional work for them to do, but, notwithstanding, the power is taken out of their hands. I fail to understand the strength of the argument that they cannot do the same work now without the Government increasing their numbers. If it be the fact that the factories and workshops have so largely increased, the argument, to my mind, would be that there ought to be an increase in the number of Factory Inspectors; and I do not, I confess, like to hear the argument put forward that the good gained would not be worth the additional expense. The good to be gained would be that the law would not be broken, and that the physical, mental, and moral health of the working classes would be preserved. I should be sorry to think Her Majesty's Government would grudge a little money for a purpose of that kind.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2.

LORD THRING: I should be glad if the noble Lord would tell me what the meaning of this clause is. I am extremely familiar with the law upon these matters, but I am utterly unable to discover what the principle here is. Section 4 says that an Inspector of a factory, when he finds the drains out of order, should tell the Sanitary Inspector, and that then the Sanitary Inspector should act. Then this clause says that Section 4 of the principal Act shall apply to additional workshops. But what is the use of it, because the Factory Inspector has no longer power to go into these workshops, and how can he inform the Sanitary Inspector of their condition or anything about them?

LORD DE RAMSEY: The special sanitary provisions which are referred to here relate exclusively to matters of cleanliness and limewashing. As I understand, the noble Lord is referring to provisions which relate to the ordinary sanitary matters of workshops, as well as places where workpeople are employed. That is the object of the sanitary clause.

LORD THRING: But Section 4 of the principal Act is to apply.

*THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: Can the noble Lord tell me whether a Factory Inspector has power to go into a workshop where no women or children or young persons are employed, and, if not, why?

LORD THRING: I think I am correct. Section 4 of the principal Act says where a Factory Inspector finds anything wrong he is to give notice to the Sanitary Inspector, who is to put the defective arrangements in order. That does not apply to this matter at all.

LORD DE RAMSEY: With regard to the question put by the noble Lord, I have only to say that the Factory Inspector would act.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I do not think the noble Lord has really answered the question put to him. Section 4 of the principal Act says that where it appears to the Inspector under the principal Act that there is any defect in any drain, water-closet, and so forth, he is to give notice to the Sanitary Authority in whose district the factory or workshop is situated. But, as I understand, the Inspectors appointed by the Secretary of State are no longer to visit these places, but they are to be put under the Sanitary Authority. What, then, is the meaning of the provision that notice is to be given to the Sanitary Authority? Because, as I understand, the Sanitary Authority is to be primarily the authority to deal with these matters, and all the Factory Inspector has to do is, if it is found from any information that reaches the Government that the Sanitary Authority is not doing his duty, he may act. I suppose the Factory Inspector may then step in and do certain things, but that does not seem to make this Section 4 agree with this Act. I should like to have some explanation upon that point.

LORD DE RAMSEY: It is just the other way. If any information comes to the ears of the Factory Inspector, he informs the Government; not that if it comes to the ears of the Government they inform the Factory Inspector. The information reaches the Government, and then special steps are taken.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I am sorry to contradict the noble Lord, but I think he does not quite understand the clause. Section 4 of the principal Act, which is embodied in this Act, says that the Factory Inspector, on becoming aware of a defect, is to inform not the Government, but the Sanitary Authority. Now, the Sanitary Authority is under this Bill, if I understand it, constituted primarily the Authority which is to deal with these matters. It is not the Sanitary Authority which is to call attention to it, but the Sanitary Authority is to act. I may be wrong about that, although I do not think so, and I am only asking for an explanation of it.

*THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: I am not quite sure that the difficulty which occurs to me is clearly understood by the noble Lord. My point is that I do not see how the Factory Inspector is to get into the workshop at all to find out whether or not it is in a sanitary condition. Under the principal Act, a Factory Inspector has no right to go into a workshop where no women, children, or young persons are employed except for the purpose of seeing that the sanitary provisions of the Act are carried out, which it has been his duty up to the present to see to. Now, by this Bill those duties are taken away from him, and consequently he will have no right whatever to go into any workshop where men only are employed. Therefore, I do not see how he can do anything in the matter.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 3.

LORD THRING: I rise again to point out, though of course I shall get no explanation whatever, with regard to Clauses 3 and 4, that they also are absolutely inconsistent and unintelligible. In fact, the whole of the Sanitary Law relating to factories and workshops is now in such a state that while it is impossible at present for any human being to understand it, it might really and truly be included in three sentences. There would not have been any difficulty in consolidating it. I shall be told no doubt that I am angry because my Consolidation Bill was not accepted. I am not in the least angry about it, but I do say this: that when the whole of the Sanitary Law relating to factories and workshops could be easily comprised in three sentences, it is rather astonishing that we should increase the difficulty, because when this Bill is passed we shall have three separate Acts of Parliament with different sets of clauses, which I defy any human intelligence to reconcile or to find the meaning of. With regard to this particular clause, we find that all these things are to cease to apply; but what they are I do not know. You will find in the 4th clause that what would have been abolished by the 3rd clause is not restored. Is that intended? If so, it is a great diminution of the powers which ought to be given. I speak with the greatest possible diffidence, but I have spent two days over this, and have failed to discover its meaning.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): I think it is very hard, when the noble Lord knows of a talisman that will solve all our difficulties—when in three sentences, as I understand, he is able to boil down the contents of three or four Acts of Parliament—that he has not revealed the secret to the House.

LORD THRING: It is the secret which I did reveal to the House.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: On which occasion?

LORD THRING: I drew a Bill which dealt with the matter.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: It is quite evident the noble and learned Lord did not draw the Bill which is before the House. I think, if I may venture to say so, there are distinctions on minute questions of drafting, as far as I understand from the noble Lord, which, if I shall not be accused, as I may perhaps be, of referring constantly to the same object, had better be dealt with by the Standing Committee than here. I think it will require a great deal of careful reference to the Acts of Parliament which are concerned, and there will be more possibility of testing there the noble Lord's criticisms (which I cannot but think have something of the bitterness of disappointed parentage) than there is at the present moment.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 4 and 5 agreed to.

LORD THRING: My Lords, after Clause 5, I propose to insert a new clause, giving to the County Councils supervision over the sanitary conditions of workshops. With respect to the argument which has been so often used against me, I cannot deny that for a great many years I was employed in drawing Acts of Parliament, and I cannot deny that I have sometimes endeavoured to criticise Acts of Parliament; but I cannot see that if I lay before the House a clause which the House thinks acceptable, it should be rejected simply because I may have been employed as a draftsman of Acts of Parliament. Therefore, I hope noble Lords will not be discouraged in accepting this Amendment by the fact that I have been a draftsman of Acts of Parliament. The clause only requires a very few words to explain it. Your Lordships have heard already that the greater part of the factory inspection has been handed over to the Local Authorities. What has happened? I had the honour of sitting on the Sweating Committee for two years, and what did we find? We found the plague spots of all our trade—the sweaters' dens, the miserable places where there was neither air to breathe nor cleanliness of any sort—were all under local inspection, and what happened was that there was no inspection at all, because they were all under the Local Authorities. I hope that at all events the law would be made plain, and that they would have been put under the County Councils. The whole object of this clause is that the County Councils which are already invested with considerable medical powers, and which are already really and truly entrusted, by the Act of 1888, with the responsibility of seeing to the sanitary condition of this country, should have a general superintendence of the Local Authorities. I do not intend to deny—I should be very far from doing so—that in many cases the Local Authorities perform their duties with assiduity, and keep their towns clean and the workshops in them healthy. The effect of this clause will be that in such cases the County Councils will not interfere with them; but I and my colleagues who sat with me on the Sweating Committee know well that this is not a universal picture. They know well that all over England there are places in which men work, especially in the smaller towns, in filthy and noisome dens, without the smallest attention to the needs or health of the people working in them. All I ask, then, is that the County Council should have the superintendence and the power of interfering with those noisome places where those who have the power of inspection neglect to interfere with them. I trust your Lordships will accept the clause.

“The county council of every county, except the county of London, shall be charged with the duty of superintending the inspection of workshops within their jurisdiction, and of seeing that the sanitary inspectors perform their duties efficiently; they may dismiss any sanitary inspector whom they find to be inefficient, and require the sanitary authority who appointed such inspector to appoint a fit person in the place of the official so dismissed; and if the sanitary authority fail to appoint, within a reasonable time, a person who is, in the opinion of the county council, a fit person, the county council may themselves make the appointment. A county council may, for the purpose of executing their duties under this Act, appoint such superintending inspector or inspectors and pay him or them such salary or salaries as they think just, and any expenses properly incurred by a county council in carrying into effect the provisions of this Act shall be general expenses properly incurred by them in the performance of their duties. An inspector appointed by the county council under this Act shall have all the powers of an inspector under the principal Act as amended by this Act and of a sanitary inspector under the Public Health Act, 1875.”
—(The Lord Thring.)

LORD DE RAMSEY: My Lords, let us see how the proposal of the noble Lord works. He proposes to give to the County Council control over the Sanitary Inspectors in inspection of workshops. He does this to prevent sweating.

LORD THRING: Pardon me, I did not say anything about sweating at all.

LORD DE RAMSEY: Then I withdraw that, though I rather gathered it from the noble Lord's observations. In the larger towns—that is to say, the county boroughs, such as Leeds and Birmingham, the Sanitary Authority is, of course, the County Council in the borough. The noble Lord's proposal to that extent is nugatory. In the next largest towns which are the non-county boroughs the Sanitary Authority is the Town Council of each borough. I do not think that the Town Council of a borough, with all the municipal arrangements of Mayor and Corporation, would like to submit to be under the Council of the county at large. Then we come again to the rural districts. The Boards of Guardians are the Sanitary Authorities in rural districts. I do not know whether the noble Lord would really like to press that point as regards the rural districts; but in London the noble Lord proposes to omit it altogether. Now, certainly, if it is anywhere wanted it might be in the County of London, but, generally speaking, we think it is very inadvisable to accede to the noble Lord's proposal, and I hope your Lordships will reject it.

LORD THRING: The reason why I did not think it necessary to include London was because London is under a perfectly different sort of management, and under different Acts. Of course, with regard to the larger towns, I shall be very glad to exempt boroughs of several thousand inhabitants. With regard to Boards of Guardians in rural places, if they do their duty cadet questio, and the County Councils will not interfere; but with regard to the smaller boroughs there are many very small places in England with less than 5,000 population; and there will be Urban Sanitary Authorities all over the place, some of them extending to only 200 or 300 people. There is no reason whatever why the County Councils should not interfere in those cases, in my opinion, when they do not do their duty. Of course, it is useless for me to divide upon a question like this after what the noble Lord has said on behalf of the Government. I have done all I can to carry into effect the recommendations of the Sweating Committee, which took so much trouble in these questions, and I think your Lordships will do well to accept this clause, with the modification that it should not apply to the larger boroughs.

*THE MARQUESS OF RIPON: I think something of this kind would be a great improvement in the Bill. We have, in the clause which we have just passed, undoubtedly diminished the efficiency of the inspection of these workshops as it exists under the present Act, because we have transferred the ordinary inspection of the workshops, in respect of sanitary matters, from the Factory Inspectors to the Local Authorities. It seems to me if the House is determined to do that it would be going simply in the right direction if we were to give to the County Councils the power suggested by my noble Friend in this respect. The County Councils have had conferred upon them general sanitary powers, and they have appointed sanitary officers, who have charge of the sanitary arrangements throughout the country. My experience of the arrangement is that these powers are very good and useful, and I think that, if we went in the same direction and gave the general inspection of workshops to the Inspectors of the County Councils, it would be an advantage. I do, however, think my noble Friend goes a little too far in this clause, and that it would be found to work with great friction. I think to give the County Councils power of their own mere motion to dismiss the Local Sanitary Inspector would be going too far, and that would be practically found not to work well. I should be glad to support the clause generally, but I think in some respects it would require to be amended on Report. Perhaps the noble Lord would re-consider the matter in that light, and bring it up on Report.

*THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: I do not quite agree with my noble Friend with regard to this power, because it does set up an authority which would exercise some effective control over the Local Authorities. What I object to is the extreme centralisation. I do not object to the whole of the sanitation devolving upon the Local Authority, but I do object that the new authority exercising control over them should be the Secretary of State. It is absolutely certain that if the authority is centralised to that extent no real supervision can be exercised, and I must say that the County Council would be a very good authority to exercise proper control.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I only rise to ask for an explanation. What I want to know is how the County Council is expected to do the work which they are required to do under the clause. It says "the County Council of every county, except the County of London, shall be charged with the duty of superintending the inspection of workshops within their jurisdiction, and of seeing that the Sanitary Inspectors perform their duties efficiently." I am a member of the County Council in my own county, and I know that the County Council have no officers to do this. The County Councillors will have to go round themselves. Am I to understand that the County Council is to appoint a subsidiary set of Inspectors to watch the other Inspectors? It appears to me that it is a very Japanese method of proceeding, which may be necessary if you find the Sanitary Inspectors utterly unworthy of trust, but it is so exceedingly expensive that I think we ought to be careful before adopting it.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY : The noble Marquess will observe, if he reads the whole of the clause, that it provides for the appointment of a Superintending Inspector. I would point out that that is not at all foreign to the ordinary functions of a County Council. For instance, the County Council Highway Inspector is very much in the same position, and I do not see anything unworkable in having a General Inspector, whose duty it would be to see that the Sanitary Inspectors did their duty. I agree with the noble Lord opposite (the Earl of Dunraven) that it is very necessary there should be some supervision of these Inspectors. I agree with my noble Friend behind me that it would be impossible to apply it to Municipal Boroughs. They must be exempted. But I have had some experience of the sort of people who are appointed as Sanitary Inspectors by Boards of Guardians, and I can assure the House that they will require very careful looking after in order to see that they perform their duties. Very often they are not people who are very able to perform the duties entrusted to them, nor are they very active in seeing that nuisances or causes of complaint are removed. The Secretary of State cannot exercise, to any large extent, supervision. If any gross case comes to his knowledge he has the power of sending a Sanitary Inspector down to examine it; but the ordinary duties to be performed day by day by those Sanitary Inspectors I feel very certain will be neglected or very cursorily performed indeed, unless you give some other power besides the Secretary of State the means of controlling them. For my part I do not think you could put the matter in better hands than those of the County Council. I hope, however, my noble Friend will not press this clause now in Committee, and if he will bring up another clause on Report I think it might meet with more support.

LORD THRING : I quite agree with the noble Lord's suggestion in reference to bringing up another clause on Report, but with regard to the noble Marquess' criticism that this is a somewhat Japanese method of proceeding, I can only say that nothing would be easier than to make the Sanitary Authority perform the duty cast upon them and do what has existed to some extent in Surrey, that is, to appoint some one to go throughout the county and see that the duties are performed by the officers who have charge of them.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK : I think it right to point out that there is a paragraph in this clause which seems to me wholly inconsistent with the ordinary rules of government; that is to say, that the Inspectors appointed by the County Councils under this Act shall have all the powers of Inspectors under the principal Act. That is to say, he is to take the place of the Government Inspector. So that there will be two sets of authorities or Inspectors having the same powers. That seems to me an absolutely impossible state of things.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON : This clause applies only to workshops, and you have withdrawn the inspection of workshops from the Factory Inspectors.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK : Then it is still more remarkable, because in the latter part of the clause the noble Lord gives the absolute and entire power of inspection to the County Council Inspectors.

LORD THRING : I withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN : The new clause which stands next on the Paper in my name is merely for the purpose of laying down a minimum of cubic feet of space that ought to be allowed to persons in workshops. Your Lordships will see by the 1st clause that when the Secretary of State is satisfied that the provisions of the law relating to overcrowding and so on are not carried out, certain things are to be done. But the difficulty is that there are no provisions in the law relating to overcrowding. We had a great deal of evidence before the Sweating Committee of the great difficulty and inconvenience which arises on that account. I remember one of the Inspectors saying that some authorities consider 400 cubic feet to be necessary, while another set of authorities might consider that not more than 160 cubic feet would be sufficient. It appears to be very hard on owners of factories and workshops, because they have not the least idea what space they ought to provide. They may be come down upon at any moment, and told that they are breaking the law, and in fact they may have been practically breaking the law for ever so long, without having the least idea of it; whereas if a minimum of any kind was laid down, there would be no difficulty. I have taken from the evidence given before your Lordships' Committee what is considered to be the absolute minimum, and if some definite figure is laid down, then a man would be able to construct his factory or workshop in accordance with that minimum, and would not be liable at any time to be told that his factory or workshop is "over-crowded." I hope Her Majesty's Government and your Lordships will agree with this clause, or at any rate as to the principle of it. I am not particular as to the 250 cubic feet by day or the 400 cubic feet by gaslight, but I do think that what is over-crowding should be, by some means or other, ascertained.

Amendment moved to insert the following new Clause:—

"Clause A.—(1.) A factory or workshop shall be deemed to be overcrowded while work is carried on therein in all cases where less than two hundred and fifty cubic feet of space is allowed to every person employed therein by daylight, and where less than four hundred cubic feet of space is allowed to every person employed therein by gaslight.

(2.) Provided that if an inspector, or in the case of a workshop a medical officer of health, is of opinion that efficient means have been adopted in any factory or workshop which is lighted by gas to prevent the atmosphere therein becoming vitiated by the gaslights, such inspector or such medical officer of health may give to the occupier of that factory or workshop a certificate to that effect and in the prescribed form, and where a certificate has been so given so much of this section as relates to the employment of persons by gaslight shall not apply in the case of persons employed by gaslight in that factory or workshop, and persons employed therein at any time shall, for the purposes of this section, be deemed to be employed by daylight.

(3.) Nothing in this section shall be read or construed so as to restrict the application of section three of the principal Act as amended by this Act, or so as to interfere with the powers of a Secretary of State under that Act as amended by this Act."—(The Lord Kenry [Earl Dunraven and Mount-Earl].)

LORD DE RAMSEY: The noble Lord, by his Amendment, endeavours to lay down a hard and fast line as to what is overcrowding. There is no sufficient reason for this proposal, or for such a very drastic remedy. It has not been found difficult to get convictions from the Magistrates upon satisfying them that overcrowding existed and where cases of overcrowding have been proved. There are manifest objections to this proposal. Overcrowding is only one element of the case. It is not applicable to all cases, or to the object at which the noble Earl desires to arrive. A room may be well ventilated when it has only two people in it; it may be ill ventilated if it has two, though it might be properly constructed as regards ventilation, say, for five. It is almost impossible to arrive at a proper figure in this matter. According to the noble Earl, a cobbler's shop, half open to the street, would come under his definition. Then, again, much depends upon whether rooms are used continuously or intermittently for a long or a short time. There are very many reasons against the proposal, and I cannot ask your Lordships to accept it.

On Question, disagreed to.

*THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: I now move to insert Clause B. It is a clause, as your Lordships see, affecting cellar workshops, and which I think is necessary, even upon the logic of our present legislation. The general tendency is to apply to workshops such sanitary rules and regulations as apply to houses and dwellings, and that is quite right and proper no doubt; but there are special requirements which apply to cellar dwellings, and all I wish to do is to apply them equally to cellars which are used as workshops. Many of your Lordships know very well what kind of places these cellar workshops are. You are also well aware that men work in them for inordinately long hours, sometimes all day and all night, and I think it is perfectly obvious that they ought to be at least in the same sanitary condition as the law would require if they were to be used as dwelling places.

Amendment moved, after Clause 5, to insert the following new clause—

"Clause B.—(1.) It shall not be lawful to let or occupy or suffer to be occupied as a workshop any cellar whatsoever, unless all the regulations which are prescribed by Section 72 of the Public Health Act, 1875, as the conditions under which cellars, which were let or occupied as dwellings at the time of the coming into operation of that Act, may be so let or occupied are complied with.

(3.) Where it appears to the Sanitary Authority that a cellar is let or occupied contrary to the provisions of this section, the Sanitary Authority shall give notice in writing to the owner or occupier that the same is let or occupied contrary to the provisions of this section.

(4.) Any person who lets, occupies, or knowingly suffers to be occupied, any cellar, contrary to the provisions of this section shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding twenty shillings, nor less than five shillings, for every day during which the same continues to be so let or occupied after notice in writing from the Sanitary Authority that the same is let or occupied contrary to the provisions of this section.

(5.) Where two convictions against the provisions of this section have taken place within three months (whether the persons so convicted were or were not the same) a court of summary jurisdiction may, in addition to any penalty, direct the closing of the premises forthwith, and may empower the sanitary authority to close the same forthwith and to defray and expenses incurred by them in the execution of this section.—(The Lord Kenry [Earl Dunraven and Mount-Earl].)

LORD DE RAMSEY: This is a proposal to extend to underground workshops the provisions which now apply to underground dwellings. There is, of course, a wide difference between a dwelling where a family is continuously living with young or old people, with the door and window perhaps continually shut, and a workshop which is intermittently used; sometimes only for a few hours in the day. Many workshops are used quite intermittently, for instance, a saw-pit is a workshop, and the conditions which the noble Earl proposes to apply would surely be relevant to that case. But, my Lords, the general provisions of the Public Health Act require that a workshop should be kept free from dirt or smell, and should not be over-crowded, but should be properly ventilated. Surely those words are amply sufficient. I take it the real difficulty is the enforcement of the regulations that we have now upon very poor people; but, at all events, I hope your Lordships will not assent to the proposal of the noble Earl.

*THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: I must say I think the noble Lord has not given any very strong reason why we should not apply to cellars used as workshops the same rules as are applied to cellars used as dwellings. You do apply rules to houses which are used as workshops; why not apply them then to cellars which are used in the same way? The fact that owing to the unhealthy situation of underground places, special regulations were advised as regards sanitation, and so on, to enable people to live in them, and I take it that is a very strong reason for applying the same rules to the cellars when they are used as workshops. I really cannot imagine any worthy reason against it, or any inconvenience or hardship that can arise from it.

EARL FORTESCUE: I do not think I shall be suspected of indifference to sanitary measures, but it should be remembered that the circumstances of a dwelling, whether a room or a house, and the circumstances of a workshop are very different. I remember when I was Chairman of the Metropolitan Commission of Sewers, I had instances of men who were working occasionally for a good part of the day in the sewers, and I never remember hearing of any particular ill-health being occasioned in those men, who were, of course, awake while they were at their work. It is notorious that you may travel by day through the Pontine Marshes while you are awake, although it is very dangerous to sleep there. I have known friends come to mine to spend a day shooting there, but they would have been almost certain to catch the Marsh fever if they had slept there. The circumstances differ in the cases of men who are at work, and, of course awake, and while sleeping. The conditions are very different indeed. A dwelling may be quite unfit for human habitation during the 24 hours, and for sleeping in, the conditions of which may not be too unfavourable for people to work in it for a limited time, for the reason that I have given. No one would think of sleeping in a sewer, or consider it other than a very deadly thing to do, but a certain number of men are habitually employed at work in sewers, and judging from my own experience, and from what I have heard since, without suffering materially or at all beyond others in health in consequence. I, therefore, though by no means indifferent to sanitary conditions, think that the principles which are applicable to a dwelling-house are not necessarily applicable to a place for working in.

On Question, disagreed to.

Clauses 6 to 10 agreed to.

Clause 11.

LORD SANDHURST: I have a small Amendment to this clause. The Bill states that a printed copy of the prescribed rules shall be given by the occupier to any person affected thereby, on his or her application. Our experience on the Sweating Committee was, as a rule, that whenever there were rules or regulations provided to be posted up, they were either wholly or partly hidden away behind doors or shutters as the case might be. Here you propose that they should be given to workpeople on application by them. Since the Sweating Committee sat I have made enquiries, and what I am told is that poor workers will never make application for such rules, in the first place, because such an application would be considered an affront to the master, and in the next because they are afraid of being, as they consider, "marked down." I do not think making it obligatory can impose any hardship upon the employer, and I therefore ask your Lordships to agree to this small Amendment.

Moved, in page 6, line 23, to leave out from "person" to end of line, and insert "so employed." — (The Lord Sandhurst.)

LORD DE RAMSEY: My Lords, the words inserted in the Bill were so inserted following more or less the precedent of an Act passed only four years ago—the Coal Mines Regulation Act—in which it is stated that the operative "shall apply for a copy"—that is to say, he does apply for a copy whether he likes it or not. That Act we have found to work very well during the last four years. In this clause it was thought it would be a hardship on the employer to compel him to give a copy nolens volens to everyone of some hundreds of operatives in his employ. The terms of the 78th section of the Act say that this notice of the Rules shall be affixed at the entrance of the factory or workshop, and in such parts thereof as the Inspector for the time being may direct, and shall be constantly so affixed. I think that is precaution enough. We have found it to act very well under the other Statute. I hope, therefore, the noble Lord will not press his objection.

LORD SANDHURST: I may point out to the noble Lord that we did not know quite so much four or five years ago about the hardships of poor workers as we know now. With regard to Clause 5, referring to piecework, it is made obligatory to provide the workpeople with certain Rules, and, considering that we know more about the hardships which they suffer now than we did formerly, and that poor workers may not dare to ask for them, I should certainly like to see this provision inserted. Therefore, I shall stick to my point, and ask your Lordships to support me.

LORD HERSCHELL: I cannot think the reason given by the noble Lord that this has been found to work sufficiently well with regard to coal mines is an adequate reason at all in this case, because the coal miners are well able to protect themselves, and are certainly quite well informed of the provisions of any Acts of Parliament which are made for their protection; but this Bill deals with people who have no such protection, and who are not able to protect themselves in the way in which the members of organised trades can do. They are, therefore, persons for whom Parliament must provide under such legislation as this, if the object is to be effected at all in the way in which it would be effected in well organised trades. I, therefore, shall heartily support the proposal of the noble Lord (Lord Sandhurst).

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 12 agreed to.

THE EARL OF ABERDEEN: My Lords, in the absence of my noble Friend Lord Leigh, who is detained in the country by County Council business, I rise to move the Amendment which stands in his name. I think it must be admitted that the object of this Amendment is reasonable and expedient, and it is not uninteresting to bear in mind that according to a Home Office Return presented last year, the proportion of female workers in the mills and factories in the United Kingdom to mill workers is as follows: The total number of workers is 1,000,361, of whom more than half are females.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: Would the noble Lord be kind enough to let us know where the appointment of female Inspectors is prohibited? because it is not prohibited, so far as I can understand at all.

THE EARL OF ABERDEEN: I have not said it is prohibited. Perhaps the noble Viscount will allow me to quote these figures. The number of female workers is 656,549, much more, your Lordships see, than half the total number of workers in mills and factories. Of course, this implies no disparagement on the existing Inspectors, but I think there are many matters in which a woman Inspector could act with more efficiency and discrimination than a man, and I believe those who are experienced in these matters will testify that women workers have often great scruples in making complaints to male Inspectors of various sanitary matters. If the object is to make the sanitary inspection as thorough as possible, I think that in itself gives some ground of support to this Amendment. No doubt, as the noble Viscount says, there is no actual statutory prohibition against the appointment of female Inspectors; but my point is rather that this is not readily done, although there is plenty of precedent for it. For instance, under the Local Government Board there are women Inspectors, and there are lady Inspectors also under the School Board. It may be interesting to your Lordships also to hear that in the State of New York, since last July, no less than seven women Inspectors have been appointed, and still more recently two have been appointed in the adjoining State of Massachusetts. I have no doubt it may be said, and with truth, that there are many portions of the inspection of working places which a woman could not perform—for example, with regard to machinery. If even a woman were qualified to give an opinion with regard to the condition of the machinery, or to make an inspection of it, it might be dangerous to employ her in that part of the work, but that difficulty might be got over by appointing Sub-Inspectors of different departments. That, no doubt, would mean a matter of money; but I agree with what the Earl of Dunraven said just now, that if we are to make this measure a success, we should not be deterred from doing so by a suggestion of some increase in the expenditure of public funds. I doubt whether anything would be more readily voted than an increase of money for such a purpose as this. This matter has been discussed to some extent in the other House of Parliament, and certainly without much disfavour being expressed, as far as I can understand. I think the recognition of this principle in the Bill certainly would be desirable. I am aware that this is a matter which can be discussed in Standing Committee, but, as it involves a question of principle, I am very desirous that the sense of the House should be taken upon the point, and I sincerely hope that the noble Lord who is in charge of this Bill will not disapprove of this very moderate expenditure. I purposely put it in a permissible form to avoid any appearance of aggressiveness, and I do so upon the suggestion of my noble Friend Lord Leigh, in whose name the Amendment stands.

Moved to insert, after Clause 2, the following new Clause—

("The Secretary of State may, if he thinks fit, appoint female inspectors for the inspection of factories and workshops wherein any women, young persons, or children are employed.")—
(The Viscount Gordon [Earl of Aberdeen].)

LORD DE RAMSEY: Why encumber the Bill with what is really quite unnecessary? That power now exists with the Secretary of State to appoint female Inspectors, and in the Interpretation Act of 1890, which was passed specially to clear up matters of this sort, words imputing the masculine gender, it was provided, should include females. Therefore, as the power exists, and as the male gender is supposed to include females, I think the noble Lord's Amendment is unnecessary.

THE EARL OF ABERDEEN: I hope the discussion will at least serve the purpose of drawing public attention to the necessity of the Secretary of State utilising his powers. I do not, of course, propose to trouble the Committee by dividing it upon this Amendment; but, in due time, I hope the course suggested will be adopted.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clauses 13, 14, 15, and 16 agreed to.

Clause 17.

LORD MONKSWELL: My Lords, I beg to move that this clause be applied also to domestic workshops and laundries. I do not see why it should not be just as much an offence against the law for women who have given birth to a child within four weeks to work in a laundry or a domestic workshop as in an ordinary workshop. It may not do much, but I hope it will do some good. I am told that laundry work is particularly trying to a woman under those circumstances, and I beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name.

Moved, in page 8, line 8, to leave out ("or,") and add, after ("workshop,") the words ("domestic workshop or laundry.") —(The Lord Monkswell.)

LORD DE RAMSEY: My Lords, as to the first part of the noble Lord's Amendment—that is, domestic workshops—domestic workshops are now included in Clause 17 of this Act as workshops. As to the laundries, Government Inspectors have nothing to do with the laundries. A laundry is a workplace outside this Bill, outside the factory and the workshop, except that it has been brought within Section 2 for a purpose which I will mention presently. As regards the proposal of the noble Lord, I think he might very well leave it to the special sanitary provisions which will be enforced by the Local Sanitary Authority in reference to laundries. I do not see that there is any great necessity for changing the form of the clause. Therefore, unless the noble Lord can give some good reason for its acceptance, I hope this Amendment will not be adopted. Of course, in this I have presumed that the noble Lord who moves the Amendment in no way wishes to raise the question of including laundries in this Bill.

The Earl of Aberdeen

LORD MONKSWELL: That is a totally different question. The words I propose to put in have not that effect.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I confess I am a little puzzled upon this. I do not know that I understand the full effect of my noble Friend's Amendment; but I am still more completely puzzled by the noble Lord's explanation, because he says that laundries are not in the Bill, but almost the first thing in it is, he will find at line 13, that laundries are mentioned, and also in line 19.

LORD DE RAMSEY: I said so. I stated I would explain that presently. They are included to a certain extent; but I do not wish to raise the question by including laundries in the Bill here. That is with regard to sanitation.

LORD MONKSWELL: But surely the question of sanitation does not touch my point, which is that women should not be employed in these places within a certain period after child-birth.

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: I do not see why the laundries should escape the primæval curse of man; and if it is not right to deprive women of employment in laundries at such times, the provision ought not to be applied to other places. I think this regulation ought to be applied to laundries.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON: I hope laundries will be included in this Bill before we leave it. But that is quite another matter. Nobody will be committed upon that point by the course which may be taken on this Amendment, but I do not quite understand what the noble Lord means. He says that Factory Inspectors do not go into laundries, but Factory Inspectors cannot examine minutely into the women's circumstances even in factories, or find out whether they have brought forth children within four weeks. In fact, there is no direct means of enforcing the clause. It comes within what is called an ordinary misdemeanour. It will be a breach of an Act of Parliament. But I think, as the Government have thought it reasonable to put this clause into the Act, it should be extended to the laundries. This is not a sanitary question properly so called, though it is a question relating to the health of workwomen; and to say that you will not allow women to be employed in a factory or workshop within four weeks of their confinement, but that you will allow them to be employed in a laundry, seems to me, I confess, to be somewhat illogical.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: It is in the Bill already.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON: My explanation is furnished by the Act. I used the word in the sense in which it is used in Clause 1.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: It is not material there, but in this clause it is very material. I want to know whether you are prepared to prohibit women within that period after their confinement from washing their own clothes?

Clauses 17 and 18 agreed to.

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: My Lords, I have to move as an Amendment the insertion of a new clause, after Clause 18, which deals with the difficult subject as to the age at which persons may be employed. It is an exceedingly difficult subject, and I have no intention of troubling your Lordships with a long speech about it now. I will only state that my proposal to raise it to 12 years is a matter which I think of paramount importance, especially in a democratic country like this in regard to the mental and physical health of the people. I think it will be better that children should not be employed in workshops and factories until the age of 12 years, when their education is more nearly completed. On the other hand, there is to be considered, no doubt, the great hardship that would be inflicted upon parents by depriving them of the wages earned by their children as half-timers. Her Majesty's Government have thought fit to fix a lower limit. In the House of Commons the age was raised from 10 to 11 years, the change to 11 years to come into operation in 1893. What I propose now is in addition that the age for half-timers shall be raised to 12 years, to come into operation in 1895. I have put it at 12 years because, practically speaking 12 years was the minimum age agreed upon at the Berlin Labour Conference at which children should be allowed to work in factories. I do not think we ought to be behind other European nations in that respect. At the same time, I recognise that if the age were raised from 10 to 12 at once, great hardship would be inflicted on parents; but in postponing the change until 1895, I do not think any hardship will follow which is sufficiently great to deprive the children of the benefit which they would derive if the age for their employment is limited to 12 instead of 11 years. I beg to move the insertion of this new clause—

Moved, after Clause 18, to insert the following new Clause—

(" (1.) On and after the first day of January one thousand eight hundred and ninety-five no child under the age of twelve years shall be employed in a factory or workshop.

(2.) Provided always, that any child lawfully employed under the principal Act, or any Act relating to the employment of children, at the time that the provisions of this section come into operation shall be exempt from its provisions.")—(The Lord Kenry [E. Dunraven and Mount-Earl].)

LORD DE RAMSEY: My Lords, I do not propose to detain you on this matter, which I have no doubt has been thoroughly well considered, as it is a matter which has created very great interest. I wish to point out to the noble Lord a matter which I do not know that he has taken into consideration—that is, that if his proposal to raise the age to 12 were to come into operation, it would virtually put an end to the half-time system. It would leave only one year for it to operate in, namely, from 12 to 13. Most children can then obtain their full-time certificate, and work full time instead of having to wait till 14. I do not know whether the noble Lord has considered that matter, but certainly the number of children who are employed between 11 and 12 is greater than those who are employed from 10 to 11. I hope very much that the noble Earl will not press this Motion. The history of the Government fixing the age of 11 is well known to the noble Earl, and I am confident from everything one hears that the age of 11 will give great satisfaction. I hope, therefore, the noble Earl will not press his Amendment.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clauses 19 and 20 agreed to.

Clause 21.

*THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: My Lords, I move to omit Clause 21, and to insert a new clause, which is practically a definition of a domestic workshop. I have thought this the most convenient place in which to insert this new clause, because Clause 4 deals with Section 61 of the principal Act, which recites the definition of what is a domestic workshop. Practically, what I wish to do is to define what a domestic workshop is, and then to go on to recite the rules and regulations which in that case are to obtain. What I object to in the definition of domestic workshop in the principal Act is that it is too vague and too large. Practically, a domestic workshop, to put it shortly, is a place where any number of people, members of the same family, work and dwell. We had any amount of evidence before the Committee of your Lordships' House on the Sweating System as to the way in which this law is evaded. We were told by any number of witnesses that work was constantly taken home after the factory and workshop was closed, and done at home by women and girls, and that strangers were brought in to help them who were called members of the same family. It is obviously impossible for any Inspector or anybody else to know whether those persons are members of the same family or not. My principal object all through has been to deprive these small workshops of any special advantages over the larger workshops and factories. Your Lordships will understand at once that where there is such keen competition among small manufacturers, and among small masters especially, they naturally endeavour to cut down the cost of production as much as possible; and it is obvious that the cost of production is lessened if no great expense is incurred in keeping the places where the process is carried on in a condition which should be in accordance with the Acts of Parliament—that is to say, these persons can manufacture an article cheaper in such sweating dens than they can manufacture it in a properly-ventilated and properly-conducted workshop or factory; and, therefore, the tendency is for work to go into these small places and to forsake the legally and properly-conducted workshops. I want to put a stop to that as far as possible. At the same time, I fully recognise that it would be most iniquitous to interfere with family work and with domestic workshops, and I do not propose to do so in any way whatever. What I propose to meet that is to provide that a domestic workshop should be a place where three persons, members of the same family, dwell and work. I propose, also, that where more than three, but not more than six, members of the same family work and live, they shall be able to obtain a certificate from the nearest Magistrate, saying that the place is a domestic workshop. I object very much to small provisions of that kind being inserted in a Bill; but, at the same time, I do not think any great hardship can arise in London or in any of our great towns where families exist, consisting of three and not exceeding six, by their having to go to the nearest Magistrate and explain what the place is, and having to get a certificate that it is a domestic workshop. In that case, when the Inspector visits them, they have nothing to do but show the certificate, and the Inspector sees at a glance whether or not there are more people working there than ought to be in the place; and he can tell at once whether the law is being broken or not. I do not see how it is possible that in that case home work would be interfered with in any way whatever, and I think if your Lordship's would agree to this clause you would, to a great extent, put a stop to one of the most prominent evils which came out before the Committee on the Sweating System, and you would put a stop to the temptation of sending work out to these small places instead of having it done in properly regulated workshops and factories.

Moved, to leave out Clause 21, and insert the following new Clauses:—

(Home Work.)

The expression ‘domestic workshop’ means a workshop to which this section applies.

(a.) Where not more than three persons are employed at home, that is to say, in a private house, room, or place which, though used as a dwelling, is by reason of the work carried on there a factory or workshop within the meaning of the principal Act, and in which neither steam, water, nor other mechanical power is used in aid of the manufacturing process carried on there, and in which the only persons employed are members of the same family dwelling there; or

(b.) Where more than three and not more than five persons are so employed, and the occupier of the private house, room, or place has shown to the satisfaction of a court of summary jurisdiction that the persons so employed are Members of the same family dwelling there, and has obtained from the court a certificate in the prescribed form setting forth the number of persons so employed, and the relationship between them, which the court, if satisfied that the persons employed therein are members of the same family dwelling there, is hereby authorised to grant, the regulations of the principal Act as amended by this Act with respect to the employment of children, young persons, and women, shall not apply to that factory or workshop, and in lieu thereof the following regulations shall be observed therein:—

(1.) A child or young person shall not be employed in the factory or workshop except during the period of employment hereinafter mentioned; and

(2.) The period of employment for a young person shall, except on Saturday, begin at six o'clock in the morning and end at nine o'clock in the evening, and shall on Saturday begin at six o'clock in the morning and end at four o'clock in the afternoon; and

(3.) There shall be allowed to every young person for meals and absence from work during the period of employment not less, except on Saturday, than four hours and a half, and on Saturdays than two hours and a half; and

(4.) The period of employment for a child on every day either shall begin at six o'clock in the morning and end at one o'clock in the afternoon, or shall begin at one o'clock in the afternoon and end at eight o'clock in the evening, or on Saturday at four o'clock in the afternoon; and for the purpose of the provisions of this Act respecting education such child shall be deemed, according to circumstances, to be employed in a morning or afternoon set; and

(5.) A child shall not be employed before the hour of one in the afternoon in two successive periods of seven days, and a child shall not be employed on Saturday in any week before the hour of one in the afternoon, if on any other day of the same week he has been employed before that hour nor after that hour if on any other day of the same week he has been employed after that hour; and (6.) A child shall not be employed continuously for more than five hours without an interval of at least half a hour for a meal.

Section sixty-one of the principal Act is hereby repealed, and it is enacted in lieu thereof as follows:—

(1.) The provisions of the principal Act as amended by this Act relating to factories and workshops with regard to:—

(1.) The cleanliness (including lime washing, painting, varnishing, and washing) or to the freedom from effluvia, or to the overcrowding or ventilation of a factory or workshop; or to

(2.) All children, young persons, and women employed in a factory or workshop having the times allowed for meals at the same hour of the day, or during any part of the time allowed for meals in a factory or workshop, being employed in the factory or workshop; or being allowed to remain in any room; or to

(3.) The affixing of any notice or abstract in a factory or workshop, or specifying any matter in the notice so affixed; or to

(4.) The allowance of any holidays to a child, young person, or woman; or to (5.) The sending of notice of accidents; or to (6.) The giving of notice to an inspector of the occupation of a factory or workshop; shall not apply where persons are employed in a domestic workshop.

(2.) Nothing in this section shall exempt a bakehouse from the provisions of the principal Act with respect to cleanliness (including lime washing, painting, varnishing, and washing) or to freedom from effluvia.

Section ninety-eight of the principal Act, which provides for the exemption of certain home work, is hereby repealed."—(The Lord Kenry [Earl of Dunraven and Mount-Earl].)

LORD DE RAMSEY: My Lords, it will be seen on comparing the two sets of provisions which the noble Earl has moved with Section 16 of the principal Act they are exactly in agreement as far as concerns the regulation of matters which are made applicable to domestic workshops. So far as concerns the general condition of a domestic workshop, they are in agreement. Well, then, the noble Earl and I are agreed as far as that goes—I mean that the workers should be members of the same family, and be dwelling together, and that no strangers should be employed. The only difference is that whereas in the Act of 1878 there is only one class of domestic workshops, the noble Earl would propose to constitute two classes. He proposes, first, that where there are not more than three workers, that shall be one description; and, secondly, that where there are more than three but not more than five, they shall constitute another class. But then, if we are agreed upon the first provision, it comes to this, that we are only in disagreement on the second; that is to say, in the matter of two persons, the difference between three and five, and I would ask whether it is advisable to make such a very stringent provision as the noble Earl moves in this case, for the sake of excluding two strangers. I can hardly think it is advisable, and I hope your Lordships will not assent to the proposal.

*THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: Let me explain. There is no limit whatever in the Act: the family may consist of 5, 10, 50, or 1,000 people. There is no definition of what constitutes a family. I say where there are more than three members of the same family and not more than five they must prove it before a Magistrate, and get a certificate that the place is a domestic workshop. The difference is enormous, because, according to the Act, there is no limit whatever, and what actually happens is this: girls and women having worked during their legitimate hours in the factory or workshop, are compelled to take work home and get other people to help them to finish it, contrary to the Act. Unless you give a definition limiting the numbers of the family who may work in their domestic workshop, it is impossible to put a stop to the evils of the sweating system.

Clauses 21 to 24 agreed to.

Clause 25.

*THE EARL OF DERBY: I have a proviso to insert at the end of this Clause 25. I have slightly altered the wording from the printed copy, in order to make it read more smoothly, but the change is only verbal. It is obvious that this proviso does not at all interfere with the object or the working of the Bill. It is simply a precaution to which the Lancashire manufacturers and employers attach a good deal of importance, a precaution against a possible abuse. The object is to prevent an operative who has obtained particulars of a process for a certain purpose—namely, in order to ascertain what wages he has a right to—using them for an entirely different purpose to the detriment of his employers. There are a great many processes in the manufactures of the North in regard to which trade secrets are maintained, and there is undoubtedly considerable apprehension that they might be endangered by the provisions of this Bill without such a proviso as is contained in the Amendment I have placed on the Paper.

("Provided always, and it is hereby enacted, that, in the event of anyone who is engaged as an operative in any factory or workshop receiving such particulars, and subsequently disclosing the same with a fraudulent object, or for the purpose of gain, and whether they be furnished to him directly or to a fellow employe he shall be liable for each offence to a fine not exceeding ten pounds.")—(The Earl of Derby.)

LORD DE RAMSEY: I think this is a most useful Amendment, and I hope your Lordships will accept it.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: I would merely point out that the words ("it is hereby enacted") are quite unnecessary. They are left out all through the clauses.

THE EARL OF DERBY: I took it from the Paper. I have no objection to leave out those words.

Amendment agreed to.

Clauses 25 and 26 agreed to.

Clause 27.

*THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: My Lords, at line 20 I wish to insert a new sub-section. This clause deals with registration of new workshops, but, by an oversight, I suppose, it does not provide for any registration of existing workshops. I do not imagine that it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government that of all new workshops notice should be given to Inspectors and so on, but that all workshops already existing, of which no notice has been given and which are unknown, should remain unknown.

Moved, in line 20, to insert as a new Sub-section—

(" (3.) In the case of workshops occupied at the time of the coming into operation of this Act, notice shall be served within one month after this Act comes into operation.")—(The Lord Kenry [Earl Dunraven and Mount-Earl].)

LORD DE RAMSEY: The noble Earl proposes that not only the occupier of a new workshop should send notice, but that also those persons who are already in possession of workshops should do the same. This sounds very logical, but it is not very practicable. The effect would be that at once from 100,000 to 300,000 notices would be sent in, and the clerical labour involved would be tremendous. The truth is, that it is almost impossible to keep up a register of workshops as a railway does of its shareholders. In fact, I do not think myself there is any great occasion for doing so. It will be difficult enough to get the owners of new workshops to send in notices, and for the same reason of avoiding such an immense amount of labour the Bill does not propose to insist on the occupier of an existing workshop sending in notice if work in that workshop is discontinued. I hope, therefore, having regard to the immense amount of labour which this would cause, your Lordships will not assent to the proposed Amendment.

*THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: I can quite understand that it would be very difficult to get occupiers of small new workshops to send in notices if the owners of existing workshops do not. They would naturally not want to be known; and it appears to me advisable that the Inspectors should know where they are situated, and should be able to visit them. It is equally necessary they should know where they are, and that there should be no advantage of that kind given to one class.

*THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: My Lords, the next Amendment is for the insertion of a new clause which is intended to remedy another evil which was very much complained of before the Sweating Committee. In many cases it was shown that foreigners are employed who do not understand English, and what I wish to add is that in factories or workshops where foreigners are employed notices should also be affixed in such foreign languages as the Inspector for the time being directs. That is to say, the notices shall be put up in the language which is understood by the people employed in the workshop.

Moved, to insert the following new Clause:—

(" In section seventy-eight of the principal Act, after the word 'directs' shall be added the words 'and in a factory or workshop where foreigners are employed also in such foreign languages as an inspector for the time being directs.'")—(The Lord Kenry [E. Dunraven and Mount-Earl].)

LORD DE RAMSEY: But how can that be done, when to-day there may be a German, to-morrow a Pole, and the day following a Russian employed in the workshop? The noble Earl's wish is that the operatives should be able to read and understand the notices. That would mean that you would require to have these rules put into every language that there is. I do not think it is at all practicable, and I hope your Lordships will not agree to it.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, I think this is really a very reasonable suggestion. It is only to be where the Inspector directs it, and he will not direct it unless a considerable number of foreigners are employed in the place. Supposing a considerable number of Germans are employed, it seems to me very desirable that such a power should exist. I think there is not much fear that it will be absolutely abused. They may be trusted not to do it unreasonably, and, considering the great pressure which may be exercised on foreigners who do not understand the English language, I think the insertion of this Amendment is very desirable, and I shall certainly support it.

*THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: I shall have to omit the first portion, because your Lordships have not agreed to define "overcrowding" in any way. Therefore I should move, first, down to the word "sub-section."

LORD HERSCHELL: I suggest putting in the word "languages" in the singular. It will, of course, include the plural, but it looks here as if it was intended to mean the plural.

Clause 27 agreed to.

*THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: My Lords, I move to add a clause to limit the work of the women employed in the nail and chain trade. Your Lordships will remember there was a good deal of evidence given before your Lordships' Committee on Sweating about the injurious physical effects produced on women, young persons, and girls by the exertion required in cutting large sizes of cold iron by means of a machine called an "oliver." What I propose to do is to limit it to a certain size, and to prevent females from cutting or working by means of a machine called an "oliver," or otherwise bars of iron exceeding a quarter of an inch in thickness. I admit that it is exceedingly difficult to know exactly what size to fix; but from the best information I can obtain from people on the spot, I think that a quarter of an inch would be a proper size, and I beg to move the insertion of this Amendment.

Moved, after Clause 27, to insert the following Sub-section:—

"(1) It shall not be lawful for any female to cut or work, or to assist in cutting or working, whether by means of the machine called the "Oliver" or otherwise, bars or rods of iron which exceed one quarter of an inch in thickness, whether for the purpose of making nails, nuts, rivets, or chains, or for any other purpose.

"(2) In the event of a contravention of this section in a factory or workshop, the occupier of the factory or workshop shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding five pounds and not less than forty shillings."—(The Lord Kenry [E. Dunraven and Mount-Earl].)

EARL WEMYSS: My Lords, I hope the Government are going to resist this Amendment with reference to the women working in the chain and nail trade. I have been asked to resist it on behalf of the Women's Employment Society, 22, Berners Street. I have here a communication from that Society from which I will trouble your Lordships with one or two extracts. They say that to restrict them to working only the smaller and worst-paid class of chains and nails would have the effect of confining them to work which men would not care to do themselves; and they go on to say that if a young girl were not allowed to work until 16 she would not be properly qualified for the work; that they have been working in this way for 200 years; that women and men have been employed in it; that they have worked at it side by side, and that there is no other industry suggested for the 3,000 women who are thus employed in doing this work. And then, my Lords, the whole secret comes out at the end. They say that much that is untrue or exaggerated has been said about the evil effects, moral and physical, of this occupation, especially in the evidence given before the Sweating Committee; but most of the witnesses are supposed to have been brought forward by the leaders of the Trades Unions, and that when people went down to the Black Country to see for themselves the conditions of this work they were only permitted to see the worst of it. In the interest of these 3,000 women they beg that your Lordships will resist this Amendment of the noble Lord's, which would have the effect, practically, of throwing them out of work and giving up the work to men working under the Trades Unions.

*THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: There is nothing in my Amendment with regard to prohibiting women from working at all. The noble Earl on the Cross Benches has alluded to something that is not in my Motion. I understood him to say that females under 16 were not to be allowed by this Amendment to work at all. Is not that so?

EARL WEMYSS: That is the secondary part of it. The main effect of your Amendment is that it will strike out of work 3,000 women and give it to the members of the Trades Unions.

*THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: There is nothing of that kind in my Amendment. The noble Lord assumes that I wish to prohibit females under 16 from working at all. I do not propose anything of the kind. I only wish to prohibit their working at cutting iron over a certain size. With your Lordships' permission, I would read you what one witness stated in evidence—Mr. Ker, the certifying surgeon of the Halesowen district. He says—

"I have no hesitation in saying that using the oliver is injurious to women, and that they ought not to use it. The lighter weight of oliver used for the smaller nails would be less injurious, but even this is injurious, especially to married women."

Then Mr. Bassano, a magistrate of Worcester and Stafford, formerly chairman of the Highway Local Board, used similar language. He said: "I say unhesitatingly no woman, married or single, ought ever to work with the oliver. The small oliver is perhaps less injurious." I only read that, and I pause there because I do not wish your Lordships to be deluded by the idea that the evidence was brought up, as the noble Lord has stated, by trade unions or associations interested in preventing women competing with men at this work. I have given your Lordships the evidence of a magistrate and a certifying surgeon in the district, to the effect that the heavy oliver is most injurious to all women, and I appeal to your Lordships whether you will not protect them from that physical injury.

LORD DE RAMSEY: The noble Lord has read evidence about the use of the oliver by women, but I am not prepared to admit altogether that the evidence is conclusive as to the oliver being such an instrument as that your Lordships ought to forbid its use absolutely up to a certain weight. It is worked by a treadle in some cases, I am informed, and it is very difficult for Parliament to make rules and restrictions in carrying on trades as regards the weight of an oliver, the size of the nails and chains, and so on. Those are all matters which are very difficult for this House to deal with. This is a very depressed trade. The women have to work long hours, and they work in some cases for small wages. This is well known. I pass by the subject of the trades unions, but there is no doubt that in the trade there is a considerable amount of jealousy felt against these women. Whether that influenced the evidence that was taken or not, as has been put forward, I will not say now; but there is no doubt about it, there was a large amount of jealousy shown against these women. The whole subject was carefully looked into by the Royal Commission of 1886, and they recommended that Parliament should not interfere, but that women should be left to their own good sense; that interference would be resented by the workers themselves; and they made recommendations evidently not approving of the interference of Parliament in these matters. The Sweating Committee, also, whilst recommending restrictions, did not undertake to say what those restrictions should be, and by Clause 8 of this Bill the Secretary of State will have power to make special rules in cases such as that we are now discussing. Surely this would be far better and more applicable to certain special cases than if we were to draw a hard and fast line absolutely forbidding it.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause 28.

LORD SANDHURST: My Lords, I have an Amendment to move in this clause, and I will read the clause as it would stand if amended—

"The occupier of every factory or workshop (including any workshop conducted under the system of not employing any child, young person, or woman therein) who has work done for the purpose of his factory or workshop elsewhere than in such factory or workshop, shall keep a record, and that the same shall be kept so as to be a substantially correct record of the description and quantity of the work done outside of such factory or workshop, and of the names and addresses of the person or persons by whom the same is done, and in default thereof shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding 40s. Such record shall be kept for the information of the inspectors, who alone shall be entitled to inspect the same, and who may at all reasonable hours examine the same."

With your Lordships' permission, I will just read the clause as it stands at present—

"The occupier of every factory or workshop (including any workshop conducted on the system of not employing any child, young person, or woman therein) shall, if so required by the Secretary of State by an Order made in accordance with section sixty-five of the principal Act, and subject to any exceptions mentioned in the Order, keep in the prescribed form and with the prescribed particulars lists showing the names of all persons directly employed by him in the business of the factory or workshop outside the factory or workshop and the places where they are employed, and every such list shall be open to inspection by any Inspector under the principal Act or by any officer of a Sanitary Authority."

Now, my Lords, I beg to ask whether it is rightly understood what bearing the word "directly" has. In many of the cases that came before the Sweating Committee, an occupier of the factory, besides the work done in his factory, sent out a large quantity of his work to be done outside. In many cases he employed an agent, who goes by the name of sweater. He keeps the address of the sweater directly employed by him, but the sweater or middleman, not being the occupier of any factory, is not obliged to keep the names and addresses of any person so employed by him. He keeps no record which can be inspected by the inspector under the principal Act, and, therefore, he is at liberty to sweat as much as ever he did, and to his heart's content. Then, what is the case of an employer, who deals directly with the workers, and does not employ any middleman at all? He is obliged to keep the names and addresses of the persons so employed, so that the lists shall be open to the inspection of the inspector. I remember very well one witness who came before us—I think he was a boot-maker—who was asked whether he had any idea of the people and places where the work was done for him, and on which he got a profit. He replied, "No, that is no business of mine, as long as the work is done up to sample and up to time. That is all that is required." I submit that the clause as it now stands, with the word "directly" in it, is distinctly a protection to the sweater, and that instead of defeating the sweaters we shall really, by passing the clause as it stands, be promoting the sweating which we are now attempting to defeat. I might mention that this clause comes from a Victorian Act of Parliament, which we were told before the Sweating Committee worked very well indeed. I hope the Government will agree to my Amendment, because I think it is a most important and necessary part of the matter, as the Bill stands, as regards sweating.

Amendment moved, in Clause 28, page 10, line 23, to leave out from ("therein") to end of Clause, and insert—

"Who has work done for the purposes of his factory or workshop elsewhere than in such factory or workshop, shall keep a record, and the same shall be kept so as to be a substantially correct record of the description and quantity of the work done outside of such factory or workshop, and of the names and addresses of the person or persons by whom the same is done, and in default thereof shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings. Such record shall be kept for the information of the inspectors, who alone shall be entitled to inspect the same, and who may at all reasonable hours examine the same."—(The Lord Sandhurst.)

Lord Sandhurst

LORD DE RAMSEY: This Amendment takes in a very large subject. It takes in this question: Can any legislation enable us to bring the middleman into a Factory and Workshop Bill? An owner of a workshop puts out his work to a middleman, that middleman sends away the work, not necessarily getting it done in the same place, for instance, in London; but he may send it to Scotland or Ireland, or anywhere else. Now, how can the middleman be responsible for all the workers in those distant places where the work is being done? The work is sent, of course, from factories and workshops to factories and workshops. The middleman may be an occupier of a factory or workshop, or he may not. Of course, if he is the occupier of a factory or workshop he would immediately come under this Bill; but, my Lords, to show you what a very large question it is, take, for instance, work going from shopkeepers, or contractors, or merchants, or middlemen. There are middlemen of every description. I quite sympathise with the noble Lord's idea that the middleman is very largely the cause, in many places, of sweating. I will go so far as this, and I will admit that it may be a blot on this Bill, that we have not been able to insert provisions which will bring that middleman into the net of a Workshop and Factory Bill; but I will submit to your Lordships that the noble Lord has made out no case for extending this Bill, which is essentially a Factories and Workshops Bill, to take in such enormous areas and such distant places as those in which the middleman's work may be done, by requiring that middleman to get returns for which he can positively vouch. I therefore, while strongly sympathising with a great deal that the noble Lord is saying, trust that on this occasion you will not adopt his Amendment; but I may go as far as this, and say, that if the wit of man can invent any process by which the middleman can be brought into future legislation, we shall not be wanting in proposing that legislation, and in trying to get Parliament to accept it.

LORD THRING: If this is one of the clauses which deal with the question of sweating, I should like to say a few words upon it. It seems to me the case is this: the difficulty is for the inspector to find out where the sweating dens are. That is the real truth of the matter. If the factory inspector, or the sanitary inspector, or anybody having jurisdiction, can find them out, he can then proceed, and he is enabled to enforce the law. It was found, in the course of the investigation before the Sweating Committee, that one of the colonies of Australia—Victoria, I believe—had put into one of its Acts of Parliament a clause exactly like the clause that was recommended in the Committee without the word “directly” in it, and it was found the clause practically worked. I do not mean to say, or pretend to say, for a moment that it would abolish either the middleman or sweating; but it will do this, it will give a clue to the inspector, in many cases, by which he may find out where the worst sweating dens are situated. Therefore the clause can harm nobody; it may do a great deal of good, and it will tend very largely indeed, as it has tended to do in Australia, to stop sweating. That it would stop sweating altogether, none of us imagined. But when evidence was before us that it was found very effective in Australia, we recommended this provision. But I think your Lordships had very much better strike out the word “directly.”

LORD HERSCHELL: I do not understand the use of putting in this word “directly.” It is not the persons employed by others whom the man employs, but the persons who are employed by himself. Now, what limitation is intended by the word “directly,” I am puzzled rather to discover. It seems to mean something less than the persons employed by him in the factory. Why he should not be compelled to give the names of all those persons, by putting in the word “directly,” I do not know. It points to the suggestion that there may be persons employed by him whose names it is not necessary for him to give. I do not know whether it is intended by those words not to include persons to whom he gives out some of his work. Would that person be a person employed by him directly in the business of the factory? It strikes me as impossible to compel a person who has a factory or workshop to give the names of all persons whom his sub-contractors may employ, because he would not have the means of getting at them; but I do not see why he should not be required to give the names of all sub-contractors who may be employed by him, which, of course, would put the sanitary inspector on the track. But I do not feel so sure that the persons employed to do work so given out are “directly” employed by him. I am not at all sure that that is the meaning of it, or that that would be the construction put upon it.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: The word “directly” is put in for the purpose which the noble Lord has pointed out, of getting at the sub-contractor. If the sub-contractor gives out the work himself, then he is within the clause; and the obvious meaning of the word “directly” is to get rid, by the use of those express terms, of the necessity of dealing with the sub-contractor.

LORD HERSCHELL: Still I would point out that these people are not employed by the principal contractor at all, in ordinary language. The expression is “Employed by him in the business of the factory for that purpose.” I really do not think the word “directly” is necessary.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: Exactly; it is “in the business of the factory.” That is the point.

*THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: I do not think the difficulty will be so great as the noble and learned Lord, and the noble Lord anticipates. I, of course, admit that there is considerable difficulty in tracing the goods manufactured beyond the first sub-contractor who takes the work out. But your Lordships will remember that on the Sweating Committee, manufacturers and others who gave their work out, admitted over and over again that they know exactly by whom the work was done, that it always went to the same place, and so on; and if that is so there can be no difficulty in getting the desired information. If they were unable to trace it, then the information could not be given. That is all; but if it is possible to do it, it should be given. At any rate, as the clause stands now, it would have very little effect. It appears to have some effect, but it would really have very, very little, and I think if the clause is amended, as the noble Lord opposite (Lord Sandhurst) proposes, the effect would be very good and far-reaching, and I hope Her Majesty's Government will agree to the Amendment.

LORD HERSCHELL: I will not move the words now, but I should like to propose to add an Amendment something to this effect:—"That any person with whom the occupier of a factory or workshops has contracted to do any work connected with the business of the factory or workshop shall be deemed to be a person employed by him within the meaning of the section." My doubt is whether it might not be held that the sub-contractor was not a person employed.

*THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: Your Lordships will remember that in most cases, from the evidence before the Committee, where the work is put out to anybody worthy of the name of a sub-contractor, that sub-contractor would be himself the owner of a workshop, and would be subject to the rules and regulations which are applicable to him accordingly.

LORD SANDHURST: I beg to withdraw the Amendment, but I wish to say that I shall bring up another upon Report.

LORD DE RAMSEY: I would point out to the noble Lord (Lord Herschell) that the man he wishes to include is already included.

LORD HERSCHELL: My doubt is whether that would be so held—whether the construction would be that it is carried into effect by this clause.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause 28 agreed to.

Clause 29.

*THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: This Amendment, my Lords, deals with the minimum penalties specified for breaches. It, in fact, specifies the penalties applying all through the Bill. Before the Sweating Committee we had evidence of much importance given by the Chief Inspector of Factories, and other Inspectors, to the effect that it was useless in many cases to obtain conviction for offences against the Acts, because merely nominal fines were imposed. Mr. Redgrave, the Chief Inspector, says, "One great defect in the Factory Act has been in regard to the infliction of minimum penalties." Mr. Oram, a superintending Inspector, says, speaking of over work—

"In some cases they may work to half-past ten, eleven, or twelve o'clock at night, and only a fine of sixpence will be inflicted."

Mr. Lakeman spoke to the same effect. Now, if in many cases merely nominal fines are inflicted, it is clear it is useless for the inspectors to take proceedings, and they are naturally very much discouraged in the performance of their duty. I do not mean to insist on the specific sums I have laid down, but I should greatly like to see some real minimum penalty fixed which would be inflicted in all cases.

Moved, to leave out Clause 29, and insert:—

"Clause A.—(1.) It shall be the duty of every occupier of a factory or workshop (including any workshop conducted on the system of not employing any child, young person, or woman therein) for whom work is done for the purposes of his factory or workshop elsewhere than in the factory or workshop to keep a register, which shall be in the prescribed form, and shall be kept so as to be a substantially correct record of the description and quantity of the work done outside the factory or workshop, and of the name and address of the persons by whom the work is done, and in default thereof the occupier of the factory or workshop shall be liable to a fine not exceeding ten pounds nor less than forty shillings.

"(2.) The register shall be kept for the information of the inspectors, who may at all reasonable hours examine the same, but no person other than an inspector shall be entitled to inspect such register.

"(3.) Any inspector divulging the contents of a register kept in pursuance of this section, except for official purposes, and any inspector or official of any public department making use of his knowledge of the contents thereof, except for the purpose of enforcing the law, shall be guilty of a misdemeanour.

Penalties.

"Clause B.—(1.) In sections twenty-two and thirty-one of the principal Act the words 'not exceeding five pounds' in the said sections respectively are hereby repealed, and there shall be substituted therefor the words 'not exceeding ten pounds nor less than twenty shillings' in the said sections respectively.

"(2.) In section thirty-five of the principal Act the words 'twenty shillings and for every subsequent offence five pounds' are hereby repealed, and there shall be substituted therefor the words 'not exceeding five pounds nor less than twenty shillings, and for every subsequent offence to a fine not exceeding twenty pounds nor less than five pounds.'

"(3.) In section sixty-eight of the principal Act, after the words 'five pounds' shall be added the words 'nor less than twenty shillings,' and after the word 'five' shall be added the words 'pounds nor less than twenty shillings,' and after the words 'twenty pounds' shall be added the words 'not less than five pounds.'

"(4.) In section seventy-seven of the principal Act, after the words 'not exceeding forty shillings' shall be added the words 'nor less than five shillings.'

"(5.) In section seventy-eight of the principal Act the words 'not exceeding forty shillings' are hereby repealed, and there shall be substituted therefor the words 'not exceeding five pounds nor less than forty shillings.'

"(6.) In section eighty-one of the principal Act, after the words 'not exceeding ten pounds' shall be added the words 'nor less than ten shillings,' and in the same section the words 'not exceeding one pound' are hereby repealed, and there shall be substituted therefor the words 'not exceeding five pounds nor less than ten shillings.'

"(7.) In section eighty-two of the principal Act, after the words 'one hundred pounds' shall be added the words 'nor less than ten pounds.'

"(8.) In section eighty-three of the principal Act, after the words 'not exceeding three' shall be added the words 'pounds nor less than ten shillings,' and in the same section after the word 'night,' where that word first occurs, shall be added the words 'not exceeding,' and after the words 'five pounds' shall be added the words 'nor less than forty shillings,' and such part of the section as relates to section sixteen of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, is hereby repealed.

"(9.) In subsection one of section eighty-four of the principal Act, after the words 'twenty shillings' shall be added the words 'nor less than two shillings,' and in subsection two of the same section, after the words 'not exceeding twenty shillings' shall be added the words 'nor less than two shillings.'

"(10.) In section eighty-five of the principal Act, after the words 'not exceeding twenty pounds,' where they respectively occur, shall be added the words 'nor less than five pounds.'"—(The Lord Kenry, E. Dunraven and Mount-Earl.)

LORD DE RAMSEY: This clause with regard to minimum penalties was suggested after a good deal of consideration in another place, and it was thought, considering that the Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1879 put an end once for all to minimum penalties for first offences, that this was a good solution of the difficulty if there was one possible. The noble Lord goes into a great many penalties, and makes it a very long business, but this appears to us be sufficient, and I hope your Lordships will accept it.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause 29 agreed to.

Clause 30.

*THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: After Clause 30 I propose to insert a new clause, in fact applying the provision of the Bill to laundries. The Bill already applies to laundries as far as sanitation is concerned, and I cannot for the life of me understand why the provisions as regards hours of work, meal times, and so on, as applied to workshops and factories, should not be applicable to laundries also. It is a very large industry; there are something like 100,000 laundresses in London alone; it is an industry which is carried on by women, young persons, and female children, and it seems to me entirely illogical and utterly indefensible, without some extraordinarily and overpoweringly strong reason, to deprive all these women and young persons of the safeguards which may be thought necessary in the case of women and young persons who are employed in all other industries. It is not as if the laundry business was in itself an especially healthy one. I do not think that can be claimed to be the case at all. To a very large extent, especially in small laundries, they are in a very insanitary and very bad condition, but that no doubt the Bill would do much to remedy. But the hours that the women work are excessively long. I am told by the secretary of the Kensal Green Laundry Association, and by the secretary of the Laundry Women's Union, that the ordinary hours of work during the week vary from seven in the morning till twelve at night, or one o'clock on the next morning, the shortest day's work being on Monday, from one in the afternoon to ten at night, and the longest on Friday, from seven in the morning to midnight, or one o'clock on Saturday morning. From other sources I hear that the work is generally done in 4 days, and that the women work 15, 16, 17, or 18 hours a day. Now, why on earth those long hours should be permitted in this industry, and not in others, I cannot for the life of me understand. Neither can I understand why no precaution should be insisted upon for fencing of machinery in these laundries, when protection is afforded in other places; the machining is done by girls from 10 to 14 years of age, and no precaution is taken whatever to prevent accidents. I need scarcely say that in the trade, among the laundresses themselves, they are almost universally in favour of being brought within the Act. A canvass was taken of them not long ago in London. I will not trouble your Lordships by reading all the statistics; it would take too long; I will only mention the principal figures. In the eastern district of London 13,305 were canvassed, and of those only 67 were opposed to being brought under the Act, while 301 were neutral; in the north-western and northern districts 14,670 were canvassed, and 14,211 were in favour of being brought within the Act, 140 were opposed to it, and 319 were neutral; in the western district there were 10,737 canvassed, and 10,521 were in favour, 37 were opposed, and 179 were neutral; in the south-west, 11,151 were canvassed, 11,103 were in favour, 28 were opposed, and 20 were neutral; in the southern, 8,147 were canvassed, 7,856 were in favour, 115 opposed, and 176 neutral; and in the south-east district, 9,496 were canvassed, of whom 9,311 were in favour, 52 were opposed, and 133 were neutral. Altogether 67,506 laundresses were canvassed on this occasion; and of that number, 65,939 were in favour of the laundries and their businesses being brought within the provisions of the Factory and Workshop Acts, 439 were opposed, and 1128 did not care one way or the other—they were neutral. Now, this shows almost practical unanimity on the part of the persons employed in this business. It would also be a great mistake to suppose that the employers were universally opposed to it; on the contrary, though I have had a great many letters from employers, who were opposed to laundresses and laundries being brought under the operation of the Bill; on the other hand, many of the employers were exceedingly desirous that they should be brought under the Bill. I have received a letter from Mr. John Mason, President of the South-West District Laundry Association, an association containing 50 large and small proprietors and managers of laundries, employing up to 200 persons, stating that they had passed a resolution in favour of it. I have received many other letters of the same kind; but I do not wish to weary the House, and I will not read them. I may, however, say that resolutions in favour of extending the provisions of the Act to laundries have been passed by the Trade Councils in the Metropolis and in most of the northern towns—in London, Liverpool, Glasgow, Edinburgh, Aberdeen, Govan, Halifax, Huddersfield, Ipswich, Leeds, Sunderland, Oxford, Middlesbrough, and Leicester—and by the National Laundry Association, who also desire it. I really think it is scarcely necessary to adduce reasons why the provisions of the Factory and Workshop Act should be applied in this case, limiting the hours which women and young persons may work, and insisting upon their having reasonable times for meals and rest. I think it is unnecessary to give reasons why those provisions should be applied to an enormous industry like this, which is almost exclusively carried on by women and young persons. It appears to me rather that reasons should be given why they should not be included, and that no reason can be a good one unless it is overwhelmingly strong. I know it has been said, and it may be repeated in your Lordships' House, that this business is in the nature of a season trade; that there comes a sudden rush of work, and that it cannot be performed and the business carried on unless those employed in it work excessively long hours. Believe me, that is all nonsense. It may be the cause at the present time; but if the hours are limited as they ought to be, the trade would very soon adopt itself to the new conditions. It has been said, also, that it would be very hard on the middle class people that they have not, perhaps, a great many shirts, and that they have them washed in a hurry. If that be so, I think myself it would be preferable that the middle-class in London should be compelled to buy a shirt or two more, and that the 100,000 laundresses should not be allowed to work excessively long hours, and should not be allowed to carry on their industry under circumstances which would not be permitted, and which would be illegal if these persons were engaged in any other industry in the country. I understand the difficulty that is urged in carrying on their trade, but if proper hours and time for meals and rest were provided for them, it would be found that the opportunity would soon adapt itself to the changed circumstances.

Amendment moved, to insert the following new Clause:—

"(1.) In section ninety-three of the principal Act and in Sub-section (3) of that part thereof which defines the expression 'non-textile factory' there shall be added after 'in or incidental to the adapting for sale of any article' the words 'or (d) in or incidental to the washing or cleansing of household linen or articles of wearing apparel or other laundry work,' and after 'manufacturing' the words 'or other.'

(2.) In the same section of the principal Act, and in Sub-section (2) of that part thereof which defines the expression 'workshop, there shall be added after 'in or incidental to the adapting for sale of any article' the words 'or (d) in or incidental to the washing or cleansing of household linen or articles of wearing apparel or other laundry work.'"—(The Lord Kenry [Earl of Dunraven and Mount Earl].)

LORD SANDHURST: I desire to say only a word or two on this subject. There is no doubt that the places in which these people work are of a very unsanitary description, and that they affect the health of the workers. Indeed, they suffer very much from consumption, weak eyes, and bad legs. I have taken the trouble to obtain from the Brompton Hospital some information with regard to their suffering from consumption, and I was very much startled at the result. I have had the advantage of a conversation with a clergyman, the vicar of one of those parishes at Notting Hill, where over 20,000 of these people live, and he tells me that, having had experience in Bethnal Green, the people who live in Notting Hill seem to have less self-reliance, and to lead far more miserable lives than anything he saw during the whole time he was in Bethnal Green. They live in great fear of taking any action themselves. The canvass to which my noble Friend alluded was carried on under circumstances of the greatest difficulty, because the canvassers were never allowed into the places where the work was going on, and they had to get such information as they could from the workers as they came out of the laundries. I would beg leave to point out that by trying to put this new clause into the Bill we are not trying to put into our factory legislation any new principle, because by the Factory Act of 1864 it is distinctly laid down that the designation "factory" shall be ascribed to factories where steam and steam-power are used, and that all workshops, however small, occupied by persons working for hire, shall come under the factory regulations. Then, again, dyeing is under the Factory Acts. That is only a process employed in regard to clothing; while washing is simply a process for cleansing it, and it appears to me, with all respect, that is a technical distinction with no practical difference. Of course, this population is an extremely poor one. The circumstances under which they live breaks up what is generally meant by home life entirely. They have to take their children to a crèche or to leave them with a caretaker. They leave their homes early in the morning, and get back to them late at night, and, therefore, the children who go to school have to be locked out that they may not incur danger from fire. Then, with regard to the wages they receive. My attention has been called to a statement in a book written by Mr. Charles Booth, who is known as a great authority on the subject, "Labour in London," and he distinctly states that washerwomen receive as a rule 4s. or 5s. a day. I have endeavoured to check that statement, and I have seen a washerwoman, as to whose history I have made very careful inquiry, and she informed me that is totally in excess of the wages really earned, and that she herself has worked frequently 18 hours at a stretch for 3s. 6d. I submit to your Lordships that endeavouring to bring these washerwomen within the Factory Acts is really only endeavouring to develop our Factory legislation, and that this clause is a very legitimate application of the principle which underlies it.

EARL WEMYSS: Before the noble Earl answers, I should like to say that I have been asked to say a word on behalf of the smaller laundries. As your Lordships may be aware, there are large and small laundries. A laundry may employ any number of persons, from three up to 20, 50, or more. It may easily be supposed that the large laundries are very favourable to this kind of legislation, because it will crush out the smaller laundries. But in the small laundries they say this legislation is perfectly inconsistent with their carrying on their trade, which comes at uncertain times and hours, and necessitates working overtime. I have here a mass of papers on the subject, which at this hour I will not trouble your Lordships with, but I may say that they comprise resolutions of mass meetings, attended by great numbers, at Croydon, Rotherhithe, and other places, all deprecating this kind of legislation. There is a strong movement set on foot by these people wishing not to be interfered with by Parliament. I believe that Mrs. Fawcett is in favour of that movement. These full-grown women say that Parliament has no more right to interfere with them than with men. This clause will go the length of establishing Parliamentary interference, not only with laundries, but with the work of all full-grown women everywhere. Then I have other statements here, repeating what I have already referred to, that is the statements made by them that this is cruel and unnecessary—that “it is not the business of Parliament to interfere with us.” Then there is the statement of the Laundry Co-operative Association. I have a statement from the solicitor who acts for these small laundries, and I have also a petition which has been presented to Parliament. Instead of making a long speech and troubling your Lordships with these documents, I will just read one paragraph of this petition. They say—“Your petitioners further submit that the provisions restricting the hours during which women may be employed are destructive of the laundry industry, which now employs thousands of industrious persons who now earn a variable income in it.” Then they say that there are periods of idleness, and often requiring large amounts of work to be completed by a given time; that if the women are obliged to stop work at a certain time it will be impossible for the petitioners to conduct their business, and consequently they will be thrown out of work; and not only that, but the owners of premises will lose the rent which they now receive, and for which purpose they have expended money in fitting up those premises. Then it is added that “some of your petitioners are not engaged in the laundry business at all, but in other businesses in the district, which would suffer severely from the stoppage of the work and the loss of custom to their shops.” Having been asked to do this, I thought it right that I should go and visit these places, and see their condition for myself, and last Thursday I did so. I went quite unexpectedly—nobody knew I was coming—to some of these small laundries, which will be crushed out if your Lordships accept the legislation proposed by noble Lords on both sides of the House. The laundries I went to employed some 30 or 40 people, and nothing could be more healthy and contented than the appearance of the women who were employed there. I happened to go about luncheon time, and I found that they had a quarter of an hour allowed for lunch, an hour for dinner, and half an hour for tea. Their lunch they bring with them, and eat whatever they bring at the shops. They go home for dinner and they also go home to tea. I questioned these women, and asked them if they wanted the inspectors to take care of their health, bodies, and souls, and they laughed at the idea of being watched over. They laughed at the arguments which have been put forward by some too interested friends as to the miserable conditions under which they work. Then as to the dirt of the thing, I can only say that I went there with a clean pair of boots, and I came away with them just as clean as when I went. It strikes me this would be a very hard thing on these people, and they pray to be saved from the well-intentioned but uncalled-for, as they think, and cruel humanitarian legislation of my noble Friend. I hope the Government will stand by their Bill, and will not allow my noble Friend—for that is what it comes to—to reverse the deliberate decision of the House of Commons; for the whole thing has been discussed there, and the Government carried their Bill with the clause as it stands. I hope they will stand by the legislation which has been passed in another place.

LORD THRING: The noble Lord tells us that the small laundries will be crushed out, but I think if he had taken the trouble to read the Amendment he would have seen that that is not the case. The small laundries will not be crushed out.

EARL WEMYSS: The question is, what you call a small laundry.

EARL WEMYSS: I am talking of laundries where some 30 or 40 persons work.

LORD THRING: The noble Earl talks incredulously of "doleful tales" we are told; but does my noble Friend know what took place before the Sweating Committee? We were told over and over again that we were cruel in excluding the children, and that we were going to ruin the owners of these places. But they had not been ruined. What has been the effect of the Factory Acts? Why, they are the most beneficent legislation we have ever had. What is the distinction between these laundresses and the women who are employed in other workplaces and factories? It is perfectly true that in the earlier stages of factory legislation, Parliament confined itself to the steam-factories; but Parliament put fustian-cutters under that legislation because they found that the health of the people suffered. Some of these laundries are in a parish with which I am well acquainted, and I know what happens. My noble Friend says they are very willing indeed to show people over their laundries; but what said the clergyman to whom he has alluded, and who was well acquainted with the misery endured by these members of his flock? He said, "They will not let you into the bad laundries, and, therefore, you could not see their condition." What was that clergyman's account of them? He depicted these laundresses as being in the most miserable state, the laundries wet and wretched, with the women working up to their ankles in water, dirty, squalid, and miserable. Then, are we to be told that we are introducing a new principle when we are not introducing any new principle at all, and that we are disturbing business—the old, familiar tale—when they never have been disturbed? I trust your Lordships will pass this clause in justice to these poor washerwomen, whose numbers amount to 100,000, and who are now in a condition of squalid misery.

*THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: I merely rise to point out that my noble Friend (Lord Sandhurst) has a similar Amendment down later, but he has two exceptions in it. I wish to say that if your Lordships will accept my Amendment, I should be quite ready to include that provision in it. I sincerely hope your Lordships will accept this Amendment. Of course, my noble Friend on the cross-benches (Lord Wemyss) may be perfectly right in saying that it is a mistake altogether to interfere with the liberty of adult women; but, if so, let us at least be consistent and do away with all our factory legislation affecting adult women. But if our factory legislation interfering with adult women is beneficial, as I believe it to be, then why, in the name of goodness, should it not be extended to these women who are engaged in this laborious work? I do not think your Lordships will be much affected by the letters which have been read by the noble Lord, saying that if the present conditions of this industry are interfered with, some of the public may have to pass their lives in one gradually-darkening shirt. I think your Lordships need not have the slightest fear on that score, and I feel convinced that if this clause is passed, this industry will continue to be carried on under its improved conditions, just as other industries have been carried on before.

EARL FORTESCUE: I have only one word to say. I presented a petition some years ago from a number of shopwomen in reference to the conditions of their work, and the same thing applies to these laundry-women. There was one thing which they dreaded much more than long hours, and that was being compulsorily excluded from employment. That was a thing which they dreaded very much, and they deprecated Parliament compelling them to forego the means of earning an independent and respectable livelihood, and they added the further ground that it would lead too many of their sisters into terrible temptation.

LORD DE RAMSEY: My Lords, I think you are hardly likely to allow an excess of sentimental philanthropy to draw you away from a course of sound common sense in this matter. What has happened since the Factory Acts of previous years to induce you to alter your decision as to laundries? There has been a vast amount of agitation on this question, a great deal of petition presenting, deputations, and other matters which we are well acquainted with in London ; and we know that whenever a popular question arises, it is easy to get up petitions and deputations. Overwhelming proof has been given us that any interference with laundresses is most unnecessary and most undesirable. We do not want to extend the scope of this Bill. It is a Factories and Workshops Bill, and we ask your Lordships very earnestly not on this occasion to extend it. I said very early in the evening that laundresses were brought within Section 2 of this Bill, and I did not explain the matter then, because I did not want to raise a question of this importance at that period ; but they are brought in there merely to make laundries subject to the same sanitary regulations as workshops. We have done that much, and to make a long story as short as I possibly can—and I shall detain your Lordships for a very few seconds more—this question really resolves itself into a question of hours. I have already spoken of the sanitation. A great deal of misapprehension exists on this point. The question of hours is the one we have to consider. For the purpose of special sanitation, laundries are under the Public Health Act, and would remain so, were they made workshops. That is an important thing to remember, that they would remain under the General Public Health Act, even if they were made workshops. With regard to the hours, which I have stated to the House, I think is a matter that is worthy of your consideration ; it remains for your Lordships to decide whether you think it is possible or probable that the public will alter their mode of life in regard to changing their linen. If you could get the British citizen to put on his Sunday shirt on Saturday afternoon, and otherwise alter what have been his customs time out of mind, we might be able to go some way towards meeting the wishes of noble Lords ; but as long as the family washing goes away on one day and has to come back on another, so long must you have four days in the week in these laundries in which the work is comparatively heavy, and two days on which it is comparatively light. Added to that, there are exceptional matters which you can hardly legislate for. Let me mention one. A traveller goes to a big hotel, gives out his linen early in the day, and says he wants it back as quickly as possible, and they let him have it back in the evening of the same day. How, if you are going to put laundries under the same rules with regard to hours as factories and workshops, can you possibly meet the public convenience in that way ? Then, as to the effect which these long hours have on the women employed in the laundries. I venture to state decidedly that the exaggerations on this point are enormous, and there is no reason whatever why we should not allow a poor washerwoman to work what hours she likes, and when it is most convenient to her. It is a matter quite outside this subject of factory and workshop legislation, which deals with places where articles are manufactured for gain, while in this matter the work is only for domestic purposes.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY : Are not the washerwomen paid ?

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY : It is in the nature of domestic service.

LORD DE RAMSEY : My point is that they are not working upon articles which are got up for sale. That is the difference, that factories and workshops are dealt with because the goods manufactured are produced for sale. It would be presumption for me to think I could explain the matter further to your Lordships, a matter which has been before the public so long, and which has been so fully discussed ; but I do earnestly hope that your Lordships will not agree to this Amendment, and that you will enable us to make this Bill a practical and useful measure.

*THE MARQUESS OF RIPON : My Lords, the speech we have just listened to is one of those speeches that everyone who is as old as I am has had to listen to from time to time in matters arising upon our factory legislation. The noble Lord on the Cross Benches (Earl Wemyss) says that legislation on this subject is wrong.

EARL WEMYSS : No ; I said the resolutions on the part of the women themselves were to that effect. They are rebelling against your further legislation.

*THE MARQUESS OF RIPON : Then, if the noble Lord does not say it is wrong I am glad to hear it, and I will leave that point alone. The noble Lord who has just sat down concluded by telling us that he could not include laundries in this Bill, because the linen washed was not got up for gain. Places where boots are made and where women are employed are now included under the Factory and Workshop Acts, and if you send your boots to be mended they are not got up for gain; but the places where they are sent to be mended are nevertheless put under the provisions of the Workshop Acts. So that I do not think the noble Lord's analogy is quite correct. Then the noble Lord tells us that the laundries are included under Section 2.

*THE MARQUESS OF RIPON: The noble Lord said it was Section 2, and therefore I mistook it. The noble Lord who has just spoken (Lord de Ramsey) dealt a great deal in assertion. I quite admit my noble Friend on the Cross Benches (Lord Wemyss) produced some evidence on the other side; but the noble Lord who has just sat down treated us to a series of assertions. He told us the Home Department think so too, but he gave us no evidence whatever in support of the opinion he expressed, whereas my noble Friend, Lord Sandhurst, produced before your Lordships the evidence of the Vicar of the parish at Notting Hill, who compared the condition of the washerwomen in his parish with the condition of others whom he had known in Bethnal Green. He also gave you the evidence of the physicians at the Brompton Consumption Hospital with regard to the effect of this work on those washerwomen, and with all respect to the noble Lord (Lord de Ramsey), I must say I prefer the opinion of a clergyman and of physicians with regard to the condition of their flocks and patients to any unsupported assertion which may be made from the Home Office. There is one part of this matter on which very little has been so far said, but it is a most important point, and that is with reference to the fencing of machinery. I have inspected one of those steam laundries—a very well-conducted establishment, as it seemed to me—but I observed there was not an attempt to fence the machinery. The fencing which everybody in the northern districts in England are accustomed to see did not exist, and the gentleman who was good enough to show me over the place I inspected—he was the manager of the institution himself—admitted there were machines which had drawn in the fingers of the women and had crippled them. That shows the necessity for fencing, and the machinery could be fenced with the utmost facility, only, as the law does not require it, they never do it. I think that is a very strong point in favour of including these laundries under the Factory Acts. Then, as to the hours. Just recollect the nature of this work. Do your Lordships think that washing—and especially ironing when it is not done by a machine—is easy work? Hand-ironing is, I am told, very hard work indeed, and do you think there is no need to deal with it if you are to regulate the labour of women at all? It is too late to enter upon a discussion of that question now; it is an established principle of our legislation. Surely in regard to work that is so hard and so laborious, these poor women have just as good a claim to have their hours regulated as have the milliners and women employed in bootmakers' establishments, who are brought under the regulations of the Factories and Workshops Act. I earnestly trust your Lordships will not be tempted by arguments which you have heard over and over again on this subject from doing what is right in this matter. Some of those noble Lords who have addressed the House have spoken as if our factory legislation was a thing to be deprecated and not extended. I believe it to be, as my noble Friend behind me (Lord Sandhurst) said, one of the most successful portions of the legislation of this country. The Berlin Conference has shown you that it is the envy and admiration of foreign countries. It is going to be the model upon which they are about to attempt to legislate themselves, and I think your Lordships cannot be wrong in following the principle upon which you have hitherto acted in the case of these over-worked women.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I have heard one speaker after another urge upon your Lordships to make this change, on the ground that factory legislation has succeeded. Why has it succeeded? Factory legislation has succeeded because it went on a definite principle, because it was moderate, because it was sensible, and because it avoided exaggerations and superfluous philanthropy. That is no ground for thinking that a false development of that legislation will succeed, which sins against all those principles, and which deals in a very reckless, hasty, ill-considered manner with the industry and livelihood of a great number of the poorest and most helpless of our population. If you are right, you may save these women from long hours; if you are wrong, you are condemning them to starvation—or worse. I maintain that before you take such a step as that, and interfere with this industry, you ought to do something more than move an Amendment in a Bill directed to another purpose. You ought to make it the subject of special, long, careful, and considerate inquiry; and you ought to introduce a special measure in which special provisions can be devised suitable to the particular industry with which you are dealing. There are two peculiarities about this industry which should make you pause; one is that you are entering upon what is, to a very large extent—I do not say that is so in the case of these very large steam establishments which have been referred to—interference with a species of domestic service. You are going outside manufacture and sale, and entering into those vast multifarious services which are included in the term domestic service. You must ask yourselves how far you are going to apply the principle of compulsory hours to all kinds of domestic service. The other ground upon which some caution may be asked of your Lordships in dealing with this matter is, that this industry does not, like other industries, allow itself to be timed according to days. It is an industry unlike most of the industries we have dealt with, in which Mondays are like Tuesdays, Tuesdays like Wednesdays, and Wednesdays like other days, and where there is no difficulty in applying the rule; but the essence of this is, that the want which creates this industry makes the labour heavier at one part of the week than at another. There is no reason why the industry, as a whole, should be more laborious than another; but if you attempt to make one day like another you are practically, if not ruining the industry, loading it with such heavy restrictions that you make the practice of it difficult and costly. And, remember, that every additional difficulty, every additional tax you impose on the industry redounds to the advantage of the rich and to the disadvantage and injury of the poor. It then becomes only those who can afford to pay for the impediments which your philanthropy has imposed, who can practice the industry, and benefit by it, and all the competition which they have to meet with from poorer persons, by which those poorer persons could live, is, by your philanthropy, crushed out.

*THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: I would remind your Lordships that I have offered to amend my Amendment by adding at the end of it the proviso at the end of Lord Sandhurst's later Amendment on Clause 32:—

“Provided that this Act shall not, nor shall the principal Act apply to any domestic laundry.

“A domestic laundry means a laundry in which the work is done for the use of a single family, or single institution, by persons being servants of such family or institution on premises belonging to such family or institution, and in respect of which work no profit is derived by the persons by whom or by the persons for whom the work is done. Domestic laundry shall also include a laundry in which the persons employed are all members of the same family residing in the house in which they are employed, but they may be assisted by not more than two persons, although such persons are not members of the same family and are not resident in the same house.”

I beg to move that addition to my Amendment.

On Question that the proposed new clause as amended be inserted? Their Lordships divided:—Contents 19; Not-Contents 49.

Amendment disagreed to accordingly, and Clause 30 agreed to.

Clause 31 agreed to.

Clause 32.

*THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: My Lords, the object of this Amendment is to repeal words in the principal Act referring to certain classes of goods. I frankly admit that I do not know whether that would have a bad effect, but certainly their existence will have this effect, that in Sheffield, for instance, the workpeople are not employed in the ordinary sense by the employer, but each man hires a portion of the premises and he works practically for himself; so that in some places, according to the definitions in the Act, neither the factory nor the domestic workshop provisions would apply, and they would not be inspected by anybody. To ensure that inspection is my object in introducing this Amendment.

"In the same section 93 of the principal Act, and in that part thereof which defines the expression 'workshop,' there shall be repealed the words following: 'and to which or over which premises, room, or place the employer of the persons working therein has the right of access or control.'"—(The Lord Kenry [Earl Dunraven and Mount-Earl].)

LORD DE RAMSEY: The words are unnecessary, if the noble Lord will take it from me, for this reason, that we want to exclude workplaces which are not put under the Factory Inspectors both as being innumerable and also as being in the nature of homes. That is all the reason I think I need give the noble Earl, and unless he wishes I need not go into the details.

*THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: I would suggest that the noble Lord should consider the cases I have mentioned, and see whether any means could be devised for bringing them into the Act. I mean cases where the people working are really not employed, but who hire portions of the premises themselves.

LORD DE RAMSEY: I will consider that matter before the next stage.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Remaining Clauses and Schedules agreed to; Bill re-committed to the Standing Committee; and to be printed, as amended. (No. 232.)

House adjourned during pleasure; and resumed by the Earl of MORLEY.

DRAINAGE AND IMPROVEMENT OF LANDS (IRELAND) BILL.— No. 96.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put in Committee, read.

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, I stated on a former occasion that I had been in communication with the Attorney General of Ireland on the subject of this Bill, and I quite agreed with him that owing to a recent decision in the Court of Appeal in Ireland some modification of it was necessary. I have since had a communication from the Attorney General of Ireland, who states that he has conferred with the Chief Secretary on the subject, and that they have come to the conclusion that it will be necessary at an early period during the next Session to introduce a Bill dealing with the subject of Drainage Boards. Under those circumstances, I do not propose to proceed further with this Bill at all this Session.

EARL CADOGAN: My Lords, I only rise to make one slight explanation. I think the noble Lord said it had been arranged that a Drainage Bill should be introduced at an early period next Session. I am afraid it is impossible for us to pledge ourselves as to the time of its introduction, but I can say the matter is engaging the attention of the Chief Secretary, and that it is our intention to prepare and produce as soon as possible a Bill on the subject of Drainage in Ireland.

LORD HERSCHELL: I did not intend to lay stress on the introduction at an early period of next Session, but to say that a Bill would be introduced.

Order for Committee discharged.

COUNTY COUNCILS (ELECTIONS) BILL. (No. 222.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*LORD HENNIKER: I will not trouble your Lordships with any lengthy remarks at this hour of the evening, but it is necessary for me to make a few observations on this Bill in introducing it. I must remind your Lordships that under the Municipal Corporations Act as applied to the Local Government Act of 1888, County Councillors are required to be elected once in three years, on the 1st November. A provision was made by the Act of 1888 that the first election should be in January, 1889. These elections were held in January, 1889. The elections of 1889 took place on a register which came into operation on the 1st January, 1889, and when the question of preparing the new register for 1889 was considered, very strong representations were made to the Local Government Board that in many cases it was quite impracticable to secure a revision and completion of the register by the date prescribed. As your Lordships know, the last day is the 20th October, and the printing of copies of the register between the 20th October and the 1st November would be impracticable in some cases, and very difficult in others, and that in cases where it might be possible to complete the register by the 1st November the printing would be done under great pressure, and that the cost of the printing would be very seriously increased. There was an Act passed in 1889 which provided that the registers of 1889 and 1890 should be completed by November 30th. There was no objection taken to this change of date, because, of course, these registers only affected the elections which were required to fill up casual vacancies. With regard to the next County Councils elections, the question is quite a different one. It is an election of all the County Councils in England, and the strongest possible representations have been made to the President of the Local Government Board as to the extreme risk of the failure of the arrangements for the election by reason of the difficulty in securing the printing within the period allowed. So general was the complaint made to the President of the Local Government Board that it was thought necessary to propose some amendment of the law to meet the difficulty. There was a general indisposition on the part of everybody interested in the question to change the dates of the election as laid down by the Act of 1888; so it was thought that it would be wise that additional time should be given by providing that some of the proceedings in connection with the registration should take place at earlier dates than those at present fixed by Statute. A Bill, as your Lordships probably know, was introduced by the President of the Local Government Board; but the proceedings in the House of Commons connected with that measure showed it was desirable that it should be withdrawn, and a measure to alter the date of the elections introduced—the one to which I have brought to your Lordships' attention this evening. It is to that effect. It was essential that if the first Bill, which was introduced by the President of the Local Government Board were passed, it should be passed early in the Session, particularly as the dates of the registration proceedings were to be altered for the present year. At first it was contemplated by this Bill to fix the next election, as the first election for the County Councils was fixed, in January; but there were many representations made to the President of the Local Government Board upon the subject. In fact, the great proportion of the County Councils in England were in favour of the month of March being fixed; and they said, not for one reason only, but for many reasons, that it was much more convenient the elections should take place in the month of March. Therefore, the Bill provides that the elections shall be held between the 1st and 8th of March, that the registration shall be completed by the 20th December, and that the register shall come into operation by the 1st January. If the Bill is passed, as I hope it will be, by your Lordships, the whole of the difficulties as to printing, and so on—and there are many of them—will be obviated. I should mention that the Bill does not affect the date of the burgess list in boroughs at all. I may also mention that in connection with the first elections of County Councillors some question arose as to who were the Returning Officers in certain cases. The question arises as to who should be the Returning Officers in a borough divided into wards, where the wards were not conterminous with Electoral Divisions, and as to the duties of Returning Officers in counties and boroughs respectively. Those difficulties were met by the Local Government Board for the first election temporarily by orders under powers given them by the Local Government Act; but they could only meet that difficulty temporarily. This Bill has afforded an opportunity of remedying this difficulty, so the Local Government Board has provided that the Mayor, or in his place an Alderman, will in every case act as a Returning Officer in a borough of that kind. All the duties which ordinarily devolve upon a Mayor in a municipal election will be performed by him, except that he will have, after the return of the Members of the County Council, to make a return of those elected to the County Returning Officer. There is only one other provision in the Bill which I need refer to, and that is a provision dealing with the date at which County Councillors, Aldermen, Chairmen of County Councils, and any others the Act affects, should make their declaration. It is now fixed at ten days, and the time is extended to meet cases where Aldermen and Councillors happen to be abroad, or not able to take the declaration at the time. It is now proposed that within three months of the notice given the declaration will be quite in order. I know a case in my own county where this happened, and where great inconvenience and expense were caused in having a fresh election. I think, my Lords, I have explained as shortly, and I hope clearly, as I can the provisions of this short Bill; and I beg now to move that it be read a second time.

Lord Henniker

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Lord Henniker.)

*LORD LINGEN: My Lords, I am very sorry to trespass upon your time at this late period of the evening, but this Bill, although apparently one of routine and procedure on the face of it, affects the London County Council very closely. By the classification of constituencies in the Local Government Act of 1888 the County of London is classed among the counties of the Kingdom. This Bill is confined to counties, and, as one of them, it affects the County of London; but the great Municipal Corporations of the Kingdom are outside this Bill, and they will retain their elections in the month of November. I do not know why the objection that is taken to the old register and the new one applies to the counties and does not apply to the Municipalities; but in London it will have very serious effects indeed. The practice hitherto has been for the estimates of the coming year, both for expenditure from the rates and for borrowing on capital account, to begin to be made up in November. The process is very much the same as it is in the Government Departments. Various Committees, which, for brevity, I may call Spending Committees, are constituted for the various work of the Council, and the Chairmen of those Committees, in conjunction with the other members of them, prepare their several estimates in communication with the Chairman of the Finance Committee, and with the principal permanent financial officer of the Council—the Controller. I can answer now, from the experience of three years, that the preparation of these estimates among the various officers and authorities who have to be consulted, occupies not less than three months. The Local Government Act prescribes that the estimates for each year shall be ready for settlement by the Council in April. The financial year of the London County Council and of other Municipal Councils begins in April; the financial statement goes before the Council, which is the ultimate authority on this subject, is made as soon after April as possible, waiting for the end of the old financial year, and the commencement of the new one. Now, if the new Council is appointed in March, inevitably the new Council must present the estimates of the old one, and I venture to say that is not the intention of the Act of Parliament. Adopting the month of November from the Municipal Corporations Act, it provides, in effect, that the Finance Committee shall prepare its financial statement in conjunction with other Committees, and submit it to the Council; but that cannot be done if the election is postponed in the manner proposed. The question naturally arises now, because this is the first election of County Councils and of Borough Councils since their institution, and if the Act of Parliament as it stands be followed, the Committees of the new Council will have time to prepare their estimates, and, with full knowledge of the case, to bring those estimates before the Council. But besides finance, with which I am personally acquainted in the administration of the Council, there is a vast mass of Parliamentary business which the Council has to transact, in opposing Bills and introducing Bills of its own in the course of each Session. The proposed date of election will cut the Session right in two; the outgoing Council will be in office up to Easter, and the new Council will be in office afterwards. Those who are familiar with our Parliamentary business inform me that the consequences of that interruption of the business by the election of the new Council will be most serious. These points I wish very earnestly to bring before your Lordships. I did not see this Bill until Saturday, and I had no time to give notice, or to confer with my colleagues upon it; but after conference with them now I should like to give notice, if I am sufficiently in order in doing so, that on Motion to go into Committee I shall move that this Bill be referred to a Select Committee. I should be content, if nothing more is referred to a Select Committee, than that London either be exempted from the Bill, or that large modifications as to the date of election should be made in favour of London. A Select Committee has this advantage, which your Lordships' Standing Committee on Law does not equally possess, that we should be able to produce our permanent officers, both our Parliamentary Agent, our Comptroller, and our Deputy Chairman, before this Committee, and they would be able to state matters with authenticity and in detail much better than I could state them before the Standing Committee on Law, after having been instructed by those gentlemen. I am very sorry to have detained your Lordships so long, but it was indispensable that I should state to you how this Bill affects the County Council of London.

On Question, agreed to.

Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

QUESTIONS.

THE INDIAN TROOPSHIP SQUADRON.

MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he is aware that the vessels comprising the Indian Troopship Squadron occupy (on an average) 30 days for each passage on the outward and homeward voyage to Bombay, or about 10 days more than that of merchant passenger steamers, besides consuming more fuel per day than modern merchantmen of similar tonnage and type, and whether it is intended that these vessels shall be fitted with more powerful and economical machinery; if so, when, and at whose expense, that of the Home or Indian Government?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The average time taken by the Indian Troopships in the passage to and from Bombay is 27 days, but the coal consumption is less than that of a merchantman of similar tonnage running at high speed. When it is necessary to replace the machinery of these ships the question of fitting engines of an improved type will be considered. Such an expense would be a charge on Indian funds.

SURVEYS OF THE SHORES OF THE UNITED KINGDOM.

MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether measures will be taken to secure the more "frequent and closer surveys of the shores of the United Kingdom," declared, in the Report of the Admiralty Hydrographer just presented to Parliament, to be necessary "from the changes and new dangers revealed during this year (1890) alone."

*LORD G. HAMILTON: The hon. Member is under a misapprehension as to the meaning of the sentence quoted from the Hydrographer's Report. It does not imply that more frequent surveys are necessary, but that the frequent surveys, &c., now undertaken are amply justified. There are now three surveying ships at work in home waters, of which one was added in 1889, and these are considered sufficient for present requirements.

WRECKS OF MERCHANT SHIPS.

MR. WEBB: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, with reference to the Leerdam and the Gaw Quan Sia, merchant vessels, which were sunk in the North Sea after collision, on 16th December, 1889, and whose iron masts are declared by the Hydrographer of the Admiralty to be an appalling danger to shipping, whether, since the Penguin and Triton failed to discover the wrecks, further operations will be undertaken to fix the site of these wrecks and warn off shipping?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: These wrecks are in the centre of the North Sea, in no territorial waters, and nearer the Dutch coasts than our own. In the interests of Her Majesty's ships and of our great mercantile trade, the Admiralty have, however, already made great and unprecedented efforts to ascertain the position of the sunken steamers, and have offered a reward to any fisherman who would buoy the spot and report the same to the Admiralty. Although frequent complaints have been made of nets being caught in the wreckage, no fisherman has yet taken the trouble to do this. Three of Her Majesty's ships have made careful search for the wrecks, but, without further information limiting the area, any further search would be entirely useless, the objects being so very small.

RAILWAY TIME-TABLES.

MR. BOULNOIS (Marylebone, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade, whether representations can be made to the various railway companies, drawing their attention to the serious inconvenience caused to the public by the delay in bringing out the time-tables, and urging upon them the desirability of publication at least a week before the expiry of each month?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth) (for Sir M. HICKS BEACH): The Board of Trade have no power to compel Railway Companies to publish the alterations in their time-tables by any particular time, but the Department have already been in communication with the Railway Association on the subject, and, no doubt, the question of my hon. Friend will be of use in directing attention to the matter.

THE NAVAL RESERVE AND THE NAVAL MANŒUVRES.

MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty how many of the first class and how many of the second class Naval Reserve men have volunteered for service during the forthcoming Naval Manœuvres; and whether he is aware that, in order to induce men on the North-East Coast to leave their current employment, the seamen and stokers will expect similar remuneration to that which they are now receiving in the mercantile marine, and that the second class will expect an equivalent to that which they are now earning on board trawlers and other fishing craft?

LORD G. HAMILTON: As I stated in reply to a previous question by my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Eastbourne, a limited number of men of the first and second classes of the Royal Naval Reserve who volunteered have been allowed to embark in certain of Her Majesty's ships for the Naval Manœuvres this year, in addition to the ordinary complements of the ships. It was originally proposed to limit the total number to 300, but no definite proportion was allotted to the first or second class. The number reported to have actually joined is 217 first class and 252 second class—total, 469. The result shows that the inducements offered to the men to volunteer were adequate.

LIVERPOOL POST OFFICE.

MR. CROSS (Liverpool, West Derby): I beg to postpone until Thursday my Question to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he can state the result of the negotiations for the acquisition of a site for a new post office in Liverpool?

NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERIES.

MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the French Chamber of Deputies have yet agreed to the arbitration between this country and France on the Newfoundland Fisheries question?

BARON H. DE WORMS (for Sir J. FERGUSON): The situation has not changed since the answer which was given to the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy on the 22nd of June.

MR. MORTON: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the action of Sir Baldwin Walker in closing 60 lobster factories on the west coast of Newfoundland, thereby causing great suffering among the people and the loss of a large amount of capital, will come under the supervision of the local courts to be established in accordance with the Agreement recently made between Her Majesty's Government and the delegation from the Newfoundland Parliament?

BARON H. DE WORMS: The newspaper telegram of July 7, on which the hon. Member bases his question, has not been confirmed by official intelligence. The latest news of Sir B. Walker's movements is that he was to meet the French Commodore at St. Pierre on the 6th of July, to discuss with that officer the effect which it would be necessary to give this year to the modus vivendi.

POST OFFICE LEAD PENCILS.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he is aware that the lead pencils supplied to the Post Office Telegraphs Department are of German manufacture, and bear the name of "Gutt-knecht, Bavaria"; and why are German manufactured goods selected in preference to British?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): If the hon. Member will refer to an answer which I gave to a similar question on the 27th of June, 1890, he will find full information on this subject. The reason why the pencils are used is because the Department prefer them.

DR. TANNER: Will the right hon. Gentleman answer the last paragraph of the question why it is that German manufactured goods are selected in preference to British, and why competent men in this country are neglected?

MR. JACKSON: They are not selected because they are German manufactured goods, but because they answer the purpose better.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether Messrs. Holland and Hannen, contractors for repairs, &c., of public buildings, agreed under their contract to pay their painters employed under the contract at the minimum rate of 8½d. an hour, the ratio generally accepted as current in the trade for competent workmen; and whether he is aware that, in violation of their agreement, they have within the last few weeks reduced the wages of some or all of the painters engaged on the work to 7½d.; and, if so, what action he proposes to take in order that the Resolution of the House of the 13th February, in regard to the payment of fair wages under Government contracts, shall be properly enforced?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, Dublin University): The question of the hon. Member seems to be based on a misconception. Messrs. Holland and Hannen are not departing from the terms of their contract. The facts are that in the schedule of rates accompanying their tender the minimum rate for painters was higher. But this was owing to an error, and when they discovered the error Messrs. Holland and Hannen wrote to the Office of Works for permission to correct it, and to reduce the minimum rate for painters to 7½d. per hour. Having satisfied myself that for much painters' work 7½d. would represent the rate of wage "generally accepted as current for competent workmen," I agreed to the alteration, and the contract has been drawn on the basis of a range of wages for painters of from 7½d. to 9½d. per hour.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: What steps has the right hon. Gentleman taken to inform himself whether this was the maximum rate?

MR. PLUNKET: I ascertained that, if paid directly, the men would be paid a larger rate for work on behalf of the Crown than they would obtain otherwise.

In reply to Mr. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.),

MR. PLUNKET said: I am aware of the Resolution of the House, which was, in fact, passed upon my own Motion. The course taken has been entirely in conformity with the Resolution.

INFLUENZA.

MR. C. E. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I had intended to ask the President of the Local Government Board if he proposes to institute any further inquiries into the origin, prevention, and treatment of the disease known as influenza, which has been again so fatally epidemic this year, having regard to the memorandum of the Medical Officer of the Local Government Board, covering the elaborate Report of Dr. Parsons upon the outbreak of 1890, which Dr. Buchanan describes as showing that

and declares

"that it would be no small gain to get more authentic methods of identifying influenza, so as to get earlier opportunity for applying preventive measures."

At the request of the right hon. Gentleman I will postpone the question until tomorrow.

SCHOOL DISTRICT OF WHATLEY, SOMERSET.

MR. A. DYKE ACLAND (York, W.R., Rotherham): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he is aware that the school district of Whatley, in the County of Somerset, consists of the civil parish of Whatley, with a population of about 400 and an area of 1,259 acres, and that in the district there are two schools within two miles of each other; and whether one or both of these schools received in 1889 the small population grant under Article 104 of the Code; and, if so, by what legal authority the small population grant was paid to these schools, or either of them, in a school district, as defined by the Act of 1870, Schedule 1, and Section 3, and the Act of 1870, Section 19 (2), which has more than 300 inhabitants?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): The grant under Article 104 of the Code appears to have been paid to both these schools in 1889 under the impression that the two ecclesiastical districts for which separate returns were made by the managers were distinct school districts, whereas they really formed one school district, as defined by the Act of 1870, and the Inspector was misled in recommending the grant.

SOUTH KENSINGTON MUSEUM.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether the plans and elevations of the competitive drawings to complete the South Kensington Museum have been sent in; and, if so, whether he will have them exhibited in the Tea Room before the end of the Session?

MR. PLUNKET: I expect that Mr. Waterhouse will have finished his examination of, and Report upon, the competitive designs by the end of this week, and in the course of next week the Committee will, I hope, make their selection. As soon as they have done so, the drawings can be shown in the Tea Room. They cannot, of course, be exhibited, or even allowed to be seen, until the Committee have made their choice. It is proposed that in due course the designs should be exhibited to the public, probably at South Kensington.

FREE EDUCATION.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether seeing that the Bill granting free education in England has now passed through this House, Her Majesty's Government will forthwith present to the House the estimate for the granting to Scotland of a sum of money as an equivalent to the educational fee grant for England; and, whether Her Majesty's Government will present the Estimate in a form enabling the opinion of the House to be taken upon the purposes to which the Scottish grant is to be applied, or, if the estimate cannot be so framed, will in some other way arrange to give the House an opportunity of pronouncing its opinion upon the mode of application of the grant, or upon the conditions which ought to be attached thereto?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): In answer to the first part of the hon. Member's question, the estimate is practically ready and will be presented to the House in the course of a few days. The House will have full opportunity for discussing the matter upon the Estimate, but I cannot give any undertaking that the Government will bring the question forward in any other form.

MR. BRYCE: What I desire to know is what opportunity will be given to the Scotch Members to express an opinion as to the destination of the Vote. It will be felt as a hardship if they are not allowed to discuss the matter.

MR. GOSCHEN: So far as mere opinions are concerned, when the Estimate is submitted they will have a full opportunity of expressing them by moving a nominal reduction.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): Can the right hon. Mr. Plunket

Gentleman hold out a hope that the Estimate will not be brought forward as a Supplementary Estimate at the end of the whole business of Supply?

MR. GOSCHEN: I will confer with my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury on the subject. I quite understand the desire of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, considering that in the Division on Thursday night a large majority of Scotch Members voted in favour of abolishing school fees for children in Scotland between the ages of three and fifteen, the Government will consent to give the same advantages to Scotch parents as are given by the Education Bill to English parents, with respect to the limits of age within which their children will receive free education?

MR. GOSCHEN: The Minute of June 11 has now become law, and while experience must decide how far it is acceptable and convenient in operation, we believe that it will be found well adapted to the circumstances, and that under its provisions school authorities will be able and willing to offer advantages in respect of free education which will be accepted as fully satisfactory by Scottish parents. We shall, however, use every opportunity of testing its operation by experience, although we do not think that at present it would be expedient to propose any alteration.

ADVANCES UNDER THE ASHBOURNE ACTS.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland, if he can state what were the total number of applications for advances under the Ashbourne Acts, and the total amounts applied for on the estates of Sir Victor Brooke and Sir Thomas Lennard in County Fermanagh, and also the total numbers and amounts sanctioned on each estate, and the average rates of purchase on the rent on each estate; did Mr. Wrench, who was agent on these estates, take any part in the negotiations with the Purchase Commissioner as to the sums to be advanced in any of these cases, and had he access to any of the Private Reports of the Purchase Valuers, and did Mr. Wrench.

as tenant, apply for an advance to purchase any holdings on the estate of Lord Lanesborough in County Cavan, or on any other estate; and, if so, what was the area and rent of each holding and the advance applied for; was the application granted, or how was it dealt with; and which of the Purchase Commissioners had charge of the sales of each of these estates?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): The Land Commissioners report that 27,095 applications for advances under the Ashbourne Acts have been received up to June 30, 1891. On the Brooke estate 580 applications were received for £192,636. Of these 553 were sanctioned for advances amounting to £185,217. On the Lennard estate 376 applications were received for £139,068. Of these 365 were sanctioned for £136,067. The average rates of purchase were respectively 19·3 and 18·6 on the rents of each estate. Mr. Wrench previous to his appointment as Commissioner under the Act of 1881, had, as agent, practically arranged the sales of the whole of both of these estates. Subsequent to his appointment he did not enter into any negotiations with the tenants, but he did inform Mr. Commissioner MacCarthy, under whose charge the sales were, when questioned by him, of the nature of the holdings purchased, and was shown by Mr. MacCarthy in some cases the valuers' reports. Previous to his appointment as Commissioner Mr. Wrench had arranged with Lord Lanesborough as to the purchase of a leasehold in the County Cavan, containing 104a. 3r. 24p., held at a rent of £116 18s. 5d., and an application for an advance of £2,278 was provisionally sanctioned. Mr. Wrench subsequently instructed his solicitor to withdraw the application. The farm has since been purchased by the present occupier, Mr. Mahaffy, on the same terms.

GUN FIRING IN A PUBLIC ROAD.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, whether his attention has been called to the fact that Constable Thomas M'Garry discharged a double-battered gun in the public road in the village of Kilmeedy, County Limerick, on the 17th day of April last; and whether the occurrence was reported to the District Inspector and to the Excise Authorities, and why no notice has been taken?

MR. MADDEN: The fact stated in the Question is correct, and there has been an investigation into the case, with the result that the constable was admonished and fined.

MR. SEXTON: Had the constable a license?

MR. MADDEN: That is another question, and I am unable to answer it.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to give notice that I shall feel compelled to raise this question upon the Estimates.

ILLITERATE VOTERS AT THE CARLOW ELECTION.

MR. J. POWELL WILLIAMS (Birmingham, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he can state to the House the number of illiterate voters who polled at the recent election at Carlow, and what members of the Roman Catholic clergy acted as personation agents at that election?

MR. MADDEN: I must ask the hon. Gentleman to defer the question. Inquiry is being made.

MR. J. POWELL WILLIAMS: I will repeat it on Thursday.

MR. SEXTON: I wish to ask Mr. Speaker if it is in order to place upon the Paper an invidious question of this kind in reference to what the hon. Member called "Members of the Catholic clergy?"

*MR. SPEAKER: I do not see anything irregular in the question.

In reply to a further question by Mr. J. POWELL WILLIAMS,

MR. MADDEN said: Inquiry will have to be made of the Sheriff's representatives who acted at the various polling booths. If the hon. Member will put down the question for Friday, I will make inquiry and endeavour to obtain the information.

WEST CORK MAILS.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether any, and if so what, steps are proposed to be taken to promote the acceleration of the mails to Skibbereen and Bantry, in West Cork; and, if so, when the improvement will be carried out?

*MR. JACKSON (for Mr. RAIKES): It has not been found practicable to make any arrangement for accelerating the service. It is impossible to re-adjust the train service without a large addition to the present cost.

DR. TANNER: What would the additional expenditure be?

*MR. JACKSON: I am afraid that I cannot answer that question.

HAULBOWLINE DOCKYARD.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty what is the present condition of the channel which connects the floating basin in Haulbowline Dockyard with the main channel of the river; and whether he is aware that at several points this recently excavated channel has been choked by accumulations of mud?

LORD G. HAMILTON: The amount of silt that has accumulated since the channel was originally dredged is about one foot, reducing the depth of water from 31 feet to 30 feet. No other obstruction exists in any part of the entrance channel.

DR. TANNER: Is the noble Lord aware that the south end of the dredged channel is filled up to the extent of several feet, and that no ship of war can by any possibility enter the dockyard, although so much money has been spent upon it?

LORD G. HAMILTON: The channel ought to be clear, and I will inquire whether what the hon. Member asserts is true.

DUTY PAID TO THE IRISH BENCHERS.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when and where the inquiry concerning the proportion of Stamp Duty now paid to the Irish Benchers will be held, by whom it will be conducted, and what facility will be afforded to the Incorporated Law Society to state and substantiate their claim?

MR. GOSCHEN: The hon. Member seems to have got into his head the idea of a much more formal and elaborate inquiry than was suggested at the Grand Committee, but I may say that every facility will be given to the Incorporated Law Society to state and substantiate their claim. I am addressing letters to the Incorporated Law Society and to the Irish Benchers suggesting that each of them should select a gentleman to take part in an inquiry, and that I would name a third unconnected either with the Benchers or the Incorporated Law Society. What I should prefer would be an arbitration rather than an inquiry if both sides were prepared to agree to an arbitration, and I would then undertake to bring in a Bill to give effect to such arbitration. But if either side objects to the arbitration, then the matter must be dealt with in the form of an inquiry, and I must be guided by the result of that inquiry as to the course ultimately to be pursued.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

That they have agreed to—Local Authorities (Scotland) Loans Bill; Allotments Rating Exemption Bill.

Amendment to Amendments to—Roads and Streets in Police Burghs (Scotland) Bill, without Amendment.

That they have passed a Bill, intituled, "An Act to consolidate enactments relating to Trustees." [Trustee Bill [Lords.]]

MOTIONS.

FOREIGN MARRIAGES BILL.

On Motion of Sir James Fergusson, Bill to amend and explain the Foreign Marriage Acts, ordered to be brought in by Sir James Fergusson and Mr. Jackson.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 408.]

MR. DE COBAIN.

(3.45.) THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): In the unavoidable absence of my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury, I rise to move the Motion which stands in his name with reference to the charges relating to Mr. de Cobain. The House is now in full possession of the evidence, which goes to prove that Mr. de Cobain is aware of the charges brought against him, and of the fact that a warrant has been issued. Some time has elapsed since the warrant was issued, and under these circumstances, according to precedent, I beg to move the Resolution which has been placed on the Paper by my right hon. Friend.

Motion made, and Question, "That Mr. Edward Samuel Wesley de Cobain do attend this House in his place upon Thursday 23rd July,—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer,)"—put, and agreed to.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES, 1891-2.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS II.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

(3.50.) MR. PICTON (Leicester): I desire to move the reduction of this Vote by the sum of £100. When the discussion was adjourned on Friday night, the Committee were considering the conduct of Her Majesty's Government in relation to the treatment of the Zulus, especially in reference to the continuance in exile of the two Zulu Chiefs—Dinizulu and Ndabuko. I have great sympathy with these people, because I think that they have not been fairly dealt with. The right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for the Colonies, in reply to my hon. Friend the Member for West Waterford (Mr. Webb), on Friday, made what appeared to me to be a most uncalled for charge against Miss Colenso. The right hon. Gentleman said that her conduct had not been conducive to the welfare of the natives of Zululand or to the peace of the country—a charge which, in my opinion, was quite unfounded. I venture to assert that the right hon. Gentleman can bring no charge justly against Miss Colenso, except that she has had too much confidence in the justice of the British Authorities. She persisted in assuring the Chiefs and the natives that they might rely on British justice to remedy their wrongs, and it was only in consequence of her loyal and earnest persuasions that the Chiefs waited as long as they did before they sought to obtain redress for themselves. The work of Miss Colenso must be viewed as one with that of her father, and I am not aware that any more heroic record of Christian work exists in the world than that of Bishop Colenso and those who assisted him, especially his daughter, in South Africa. I maintain that if Christian missionaries go from this country and submit to great sacrifices, they are deserving of more sympathy and respect than have been shown in this case, and I believe that their word is entitled to the consideration which is usually given to persons who talk about what they understand. We have read Miss Colenso's despatches, and they show that the concession which was made to the Boers in 1886 was an unjust and impolitic concession. It was an act of gross impolicy and of cruel injustice on the part of the British Authorities to send Usibepu back to the country after he had been driven out for cruelty and misgovernment. It must have been known that such a course would lead to disorder, and bring to an end the comparative era of peace which the country had enjoyed. Umsutshwana, one of the Chiefs who had taken a foremost part in driving out Usibepu in 1884, had retired to a small kraal of five or six huts, on being evicted, with a large part of his tribe from their own lands, and this was part of the evidence given in Court by an old woman, sitting on the floor with a baby grandchild before her:—

"I know Umsutshwana," she began. "At the time of his death I was at Ntshuku's kraal. I was there because we had run thither for protection, when we were running away from Usibepu. Umsutshwana belonged to the Government—that was the reason why we went to him. I slept outside the kraal fence. It is quite a small kraal. On the night before Umsutshwana's death my elder daughter and her three daughters were with me there. My younger daughter was there also with her three children, of whom this is one. Her elder child was not five years old. Early next morning an impi (war party) came and surrounded the kraal. It killed my eldest daughter and the child of five. It was stabbed in the thigh, and then it crawled, when its mother fell from off her back to the embers by which we had been. It came and sat beside us, and a young man came up and stabbed it to death. I heard the impi cry watshetsha (Usibepu's distinguishing cry). Beside my daughter another woman fell. As to Umsutshwana he was shot; the men who shot him were Usibepu's. When he was shot I heard him cry out, 'Oh! alas! I am dying, and I don't know for what sin.' I heard the men who were killing him cry 'Ji' (a sign of triumph at the death of anything hunted). Then Usibepu rode up fast on horseback at the time 'Ji' was cried, and jumped over Umsutshwana and back again, being then on foot. Then the impi went off, driving the cattle with them. They took away also women and children. They said that I could remain. What was the good of taking one so old as I was?"

This took place after the Zulu Chiefs had waited for many months expecting a favourable answer from the Government at Cape Town to their appeal for protection. At last their patience was quite worn out, and possessing the idea that they were left to themselves, but that they had the sympathy of the Government of England, they determined to take up arms to protect themselves and their people from the cruelties to which they had been subjected by Usibepu. This was then condemned by the Government as levying war on the Queen; the Chiefs were charged with high treason against the British Government, although the British Government was by no means completely established at that time, so that any act of violence could be called by so high-sounding a name as high treason. What followed? Troops were sent and a terrible vengeance was taken. The Chiefs were tried and punished with exile. In no sense was justice done. Three hundred of the Zulu women were taken away, and Miss Colenso tells us that she succeeded in ransoming one of them. A vast amount of suffering was occasioned. We could hardly have expected the same ideas of order to prevail in Zululand as in this or any other civilised country, and to regard a few scimmages among discontented Chiefs as making war on the Queen is absurd, especially as those very Chiefs were not opposed to British authority. For whatever wrongs these Chiefs committed, their exile was more than an amply sufficient punishment. I hope that the Government will, as far as they can, cultivate a better feeling amongst the Zulus, and show that Miss Colenso did not exaggerate when, speaking of the British Government, she said these poor people might rely upon justice at our hands. I beg to move to reduce the Vote by £100.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item A, Salaries, be reduced by £100, part of the Salary of the Secretary of State."—(Mr. Picton.)

*(4.5.) CAPTAIN BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness): I have no intention of pursuing the same line of argument in regard to South African affairs as hon. Members opposite, but I willingly join with them in urging the Government to exercise considerable clemency in relation to these military prisoners. Among the arguments used by the hon. Member for Caithness (Dr. Clark) on Friday were these, that exception must be taken to the constitution of the Special Commission which tried the prisoners. But the question was brought before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and the Court was declared to be legal and even proper; and exception must also be taken to the character and weight of the evidence, and also to the severe sentences imposed. From these views I wish to dissociate myself. I am quite sure that it is impossible for anybody who did not hear the evidence to form a judgment as to its weight and character; I am perfectly content to accept the decision of the Special Commission; and so far as the sentences are concerned, bearing in mind the indictment of high treason upon which the prisoners were arraigned, the Judges could not well have passed much lighter sentences. If it were proved that the prisoners had committed high treason it was impossible to pass very light sentences. But I will pass from the procedure of the Court and proceed to criticise the action of the Administration in reference to these Zulu prisoners. I certainly do not approve of the action of the Administration in the matter. In my opinion, the indictment for high treason ought never to have been made against the prisoners. The offences they were alleged to have committed did not amount to high treason. The hon. Member for Caithness gave on Friday the early history of the trials, but I do not think it is necessary to go into it again. Against the two most important prisoners, Dinizulu and Ndabuko, three charges were made which separately and together were alleged to constitute the crime of high treason. It appears that a certain fine had been levied upon them which the Administration sent the police to collect, calling upon the Chiefs to obey the law. They refused to pay the fine, but on the first demand the police were not treated with violence. When, however, they were sent a second time to enforce the law they were driven back, and unfortunately there was loss of life. But that did not amount to high treason. They committed a breach of the peace, it is true, but they were not guilty of rebellion against the Queen's Government. There was really in substance no distinction between the action of Dinizulu and Ndabuko and the action of Irish tenants, who on certain occasions with which we are all familiar, have resisted the officers of the law. It was a resistance of the law, but it was not high treason. It is absurd to call the offence high treason. But there was another act alleged against these same men. Dinizulu saw Usibepu, his ancient enemy, within his grasp. He did what any one would have done under like circumstances; he attacked and routed him. But even that was not high treason. A frightened Government arraigned the men for high treason, convicted them, and they were sentenced to long terms of imprisonment. All that these men did was to commit a breach of the peace. They declined to give up certain men and to pay a fine to the officers of the law, and later on Dinizulu collected his forces together for the purpose of crushing his ancient and hereditary enemy. But he never proposed to drive out the Governor of Zululand. What he did was to offer resistance to the police twice, once without violence. I am obliged to point out here an observation by Chief Justice Wragg, of Natal, which induces me to think that there was more than the nature of the crime behind the sentences imposed upon the Chiefs. At the termination of the proceedings Chief Justice Wragg addressed a Report to Lord Knutsford, which will be found at page 17 of Blue Book C, in which he said—

"I am strongly of opinion, which my colleagues share, that for the peace and welfare of British Zululand it is necessary that the prisoners should be deported to some foreign country far removed from Zululand."

That is to say, that there were political motives behind what was required by the justice of the case. But whether the Chiefs were likely to be troublesome in Zululand or not was a political consideration, with which the Chief Justice had nothing whatever to do. His business was simply to adjudicate upon the offence as it was alleged against the prisoners; yet in his Report to Lord Knutsford he added this sentence, which clearly shows that there was something behind which acted as an additional reason. Therefore, I think I have some justification for saying that the sentences were rendered somewhat more severe by motives which were not entirely judicial, and that they would not have been as severe as they were if the Chief Justice had possessed a mind more completely unaffected by the condition of the country. The sentence upon the two Chiefs was that they should be exiled to some foreign place for 10 years. Another Chief, who was half-brother to Cetewayo, was also tried for high treason, for offences of more or less the same character, and also sentenced to imprisonment. I think that the Administration in reviewing the sentences ought to have taken into consideration—impartial consideration—the character of the country and the difficulties under which these people had laboured for some years. Who were they? Dinizulu was a youth, the son of an absolute King whose power was destroyed, whose country was thrown into a maelstrom of disturbance, and who, in a moment, was deprived of his inheritance. Within eight months of being deprived of his rule over the country he was tried for these offences. Is there nothing to be said for a man who was deprived suddenly of the whole of his power? Would it not have been wiser to have exercised a little patience? Ten years of exile must seem an eternity to the uncivilised or semi-civilised man. Is there not something in the plea that the uncivilised man should be treated with consideration? I would recommend my right hon. Friend to take great care that the punishment imposed upon these men when they return to their country, which they must do sooner or later, instead of securing obedience and a recognition of the supreme authority over Zululand, does not engender a bitter hatred and an unextinguishable feeling of injustice. A moderate punishment was undoubtedly deserved; but let me invite my right hon. Friend to consult Lord Knutsford, in order to see whether they cannot extinguish a considerable part of the sentence. Let some hope be given to these men that they will return to their country; do not remove from them the possibility of return before the expiration of 10 years. I should like, before I conclude, to say a word about the Commissioner in Zululand, Mr. Osborne. I have nothing to say against Mr. Osborne. I believe that in difficult circumstances Mr. Osborne has done the best he could. But I would suggest only this: that the Commissioner, who has been an energetic and able officer, having been in Zululand all this time, and throughout all this trouble, has undoubtedly taken—perhaps was obliged to take—one side against the other. The side he took was that opposed to Dinizulu, and in favour of Usibepu, and I find from his Despatches that his deliberate opinion is that peace can never exist in Zululand as long as Dinizulu and Ndabuko were allowed to remain there. I make no charge against Mr. Osborne, but can he remain there as Commissioner when these two men go back? Is it not possible to replace Mr. Osborne by some other officer, who shall bring an unbiased mind to bear on the settlement of the affairs of Zululand? I certainly unite my voice with those of hon. Members opposite who urge that it is a matter which ought to be looked into carefully. I have read most of the evidence, and I have heard a good deal of what has been said on the other side, and, after most carefully weighing everything, I think it is undoubtedly a case in which the clemency of the Crown may be very justly exercised. I do not join in the plea of injustice, but I only ask my right hon. Friend and Lord Knutsford to inquire into the matter, with a view of deciding whether the punishment imposed upon these men is not too heavy.

*(4.27.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): I cordially join in the appeal. I look upon the whole of our policy in that country from the beginning to the end as a policy of which England ought not to be proud. Indeed, I regard the whole of our dealings with Zululand, with a very few exceptions, as a series of blunders. I will not, however, enter into matters of ancient history, but will confine myself to recent events. My hon. Friend who first moved the reduction said the punishment of these chiefs was a vindictive punishment. If that were so, I do not think that any words would be too strong to apply to it. It is a great crime for a great nation like this to inflict anything in the shape of a vindictive sentence upon savages. But I do not go so far as my hon. Friend and say that it was a vindictive sentence. Still, I think that it was more or less influenced by political considerations. I think that we are bound to look at this question as a matter of justice. I altogether demur to any Judge looking at anything except the real merits of the case. As to the sentences, they were undoubtedly severe. I think that when the right hon. Gentleman said that the men were never more happy in their lives he went a little too far. A sentence of exile is a much more severe thing to half civilised people than it would be to us, and the right hon. Gentleman not only underestimated the severity of the sentences, but he also considerably overstated the offence which had been committed. I cannot help thinking that the accounts which have been given are considerably exaggerated. It is said that Dinizulu was guilty of murder, but the word seems a strong one to use in application to the acts which he committed. We all know that in a country like South Africa human life is far less sacred than in a country like England. The phrase "high treason," too, as applied to his acts is too strong. The right hon. Gentleman must bear in mind the position of Dinizulu. He was the son of the old King Cetewayo, who for years and years was supposed to rule by Divine right. To describe his acts of resistance as acts of high treason is absurd. The term might as well be applied to the foray of a Highland clan in the last century, or to a Scotch border raid in the days of Henry VII. Of course, if these men had committed high treason, then the punishment must necessarily have been severe. It may be that Miss Oolenso probably has indulged in some of that feminine exaggeration which probably we may look for when we get female suffrage, which the right hon. Gentleman supports. But Miss Colenso is thoroughly honest and generous in spirit, and she carries on with enthusiasm the work bequeathed to her by her father. But I go so far as to say that, in dealing with these things, it is good that you should have some honest advocacy on the side of the natives. We know the sort of record we are likely to get from official sources which will hardly ever be fair to the natives. With regard to the question of the amnesty, I venture to press upon the right hon. Gentleman very seriously whether the time has not come when he can grant something like an amnesty. The danger which was at one time apprehended of a great movement among the Zulus is practically over. The spirit of the Zulus is broken; they are docile, and easily managed by kindness. As to the general question of Zululand, my hon. Friend has suggested that it should be placed under the responsible Government of Natal; but before assenting to that, I should like to see a little more of the working of that Government. However, I agree that it is desirable to have a change of administration in that country, and there must be men in the Colonies with the qualifications necessary for successful government. An appeal has been made from both sides of the House, and I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he does not think the time has come when justice should be tempered with mercy.

*(4.35.) THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. DE WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): I regret that the hon. Member was not in his place on Friday evening when I dealt fully with this subject, as in answering him now I shall be compelled to take up the time of the Committee by repeating many of the statements I then made. With regard to the action of Miss Colenso, I can only say that whilst accepting the statement of the hon. Member that she had been actuated by the best of motives, I must again recall the fact that as far back as 1882 Sir Henry Bulwer, in a Despatch to Lord Kimberley (Colonial Secretary in the Administration of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian) deprecating her interference in Zulu affairs as conducive to disturbances in that country. I am inclined to agree with the views he then expressed, and apply them to the line of conduct she has since pursued, and is still pursuing, relative to the imprisoned chiefs and their followers. I regret that such a long time should have been allowed to elapse—now more than three years—before this question has been brought to the full consideration of Parliament. Events which happened so long since are apt to be forgotten by hon. Members, and they are the less able to appreciate the real state of things, and are consequently driven to false conclusions.

CAPTAIN BETHELL: May I remind the right hon. Gentleman that Mr. Bradlaugh called attention to the subject last year?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: The hon. Member for Leicester and my hon. Friend (Captain Bethell) have repeatedly urged in the course of their remarks that the acts of Dinizulu were not acts of high treason, because they were not in any way directed against the Government of this country, but against Zibepu. I can show that such is not the case. Now, the first rebellious act of the Usutus was in April, 1888. At that time Ndabuko led a body of men against the police, who, under Mr. Mansell, the Commandant, were sent for the purpose of executing a warrant issued against four natives guilty of contempt of Court. That was the first act of rebellion. Warrants were issued for the arrest of Dinizulu and Ndabuko for their action at the Usutu Kraal on the 26th of April, and on June 1st Mr. Mansell started for Ceza to execute them, with a force of 70 native police, about 100 Dragoons, two companies of Mounted Infantry, and about 600 of Muzamana's men. None of Zibepu's men were present. On the 2nd June, 1888, our force arrived at Ceza. They found opposed to them under Dinizulu and Ndabuko about 2,000 armed Usutus, who, under cover of the fortified position, made such a fierce resistance that our force was obliged to retire with loss, and if it had not been covered by the Dragoons, would have been cut to pieces. Encouraged by this, Dinizulu and the Usutus raided in the district and committed several murders: e.g., Dirk Louw, Klaas Louw, and several natives—men, women, and children. That was the second act of rebellion. The third act of rebellion was on the 2nd July, 1888. A force of about 2,000 men, including Dragoons and Mounted Infantry, were sent to Ulopekulu to capture Ishingana and disperse his followers. The position was taken after six hours severe fighting; the Usutus were dispersed with considerable loss. The fourth act of rebellion was in July, 1888, on the Umfolosi, when the Magistracy there was attacked by Somkeli with more than 2,000 Usutus, and they besieged it until the arrival of relieving forces on the 10th July. On this occasion several murders of peculiar atrocity were committed. I should like to know from hon. Gentlemen opposite what are acts of rebellion if these are not? These were not acts against Usibebu; they were acts against the forces of the Crown, and the object was to re-assert the supreme authority of the Zulu Chiefs as against the authority of the British Crown. I must confess I have not heard from hon. and right hon. Members opposite any defence of these acts. It is not sufficient to get up in the Committee and say that these acts were not rebellious acts in the true sense of the word, because they were directed against the personal enemies of Dinizulu. As a matter of fact they were nothing of the sort; they were against the authority of the Crown, and as such they were acts of rebellion. The hon. Member for Leicester said that Usibebu ought to have been punished because he was guilty of murder. What are the facts? On the 4th, 5th, and 10th of June, Umsutshwana, one of the Usuto Chiefs, met the ally of Dinizulu and routed Zibepu's people and murdered several of them. On the 11th, Zibepu, who was on patrol duty, attacked Umsutshwana, who was defeated and killed with 10 of his men. On the 23rd June, Zibepu, who was at the Iruna Magistracy, was attacked by an Usuto force from Ceza, numbering 4,000 or 5,000 men, and was defeated with the loss of 300 killed. In consequence of this it was not thought safe to continue the occupation of the Magistracy, and it was abandoned and the force withdrawn to Etshowe. The prisoners were tried, and their friends appealed to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, who confirmed the sentence upon them.

CAPTAIN BETHELL: They merely approved the composition of the Court.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: The question of the legal competence of the Court was brought before the Committee of the Privy Council, and they decided that the Court was properly constituted. The hon. Member for the Holderness Division says that Dinizulu and the other chiefs ought not to have been indicted for high treason. He seems to forget that the Court before which they were tried had the power to quash the indictment had they held it to be improper. They did not do so; they tried and sentenced the prisoners for high treason. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council decided that the Court was a properly constituted and competent tribunal. I do not see upon what ground the hon. Member now seeks to impugn its acts and decision. The hon. Member took exception to the action of Mr. Justice Wragg in suggesting, in the Report on the trial which he made to the Secretary of State, that it would, in his opinion, conduce to the tranquillity of Zululand if the three chiefs were deported; and he went on to say that he must have been influenced by political considerations. I protest against such an unfair insinuation. Mr. Justice Wragg is a most upright and able Judge; he was called upon to make a Report on the trial, and was fully justified by his intimate knowledge of all the facts in expressing his views as to what he considered the best course to be adopted. With regard to Dinizulu, it must be remembered that he was first charged with murder as well as high treason.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): Then why did you not send him back to Natal, if you had him here on false pretences?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: The hon. Member does not appreciate the position. The prisoner was removed from Natal under the Colonial Prisoners Removal Act. Would the hon. Gentleman argue that a person, charged with murder, should not be extradited simply because the evidence proved afterwards insufficient to support the indictment? The indictment was not preferred in this instance for murder, although there was some strong evidence against the prisoner of having murdered a trader and his family.

*MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: I was speaking of Dinizulu.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: That is the very murder with which Dinizulu is charged.

*MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: It was not proved.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: It was proved that one of his followers was guilty of the murder, and the man was sentenced to death. His punishment was subsequently commuted to hard labour for life. Dinizulu was guilty to the extent of having brought about the circumstances which directly led to the murder of this man and his family. There was another murder under peculiarly atrocious circumstances, and in fact, owing to the conduct of Dinizulu and others Zululand was in a state of continuous internecine strife. Cattle were raided, wives were stolen, homes were burnt, and the people were miserable. But no sooner were these men in prison than everything became as peaceful as possible. These facts are beyond denial. With regard to the amnesty, it must be left to the discretion of the Government whether the present is the best time for these men to return to Zululand. They were sentenced to 10 years imprisonment, and only three years of that term have been served. I cannot give any promise at present that these chiefs will be sent back to Zululand.

CAPTAIN BETHELL: While I give every credit to Mr. Justice Wragg, my argument is that he took into consideration when making his Report the political condition of the country, whereas, I think, he ought to confine himself to matters judicial and not trouble himself about the political aspect of affairs.

(4.57.) MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I confess I am sorry that the Under Secretary for the Colonies has adopted such an uncompromising attitude, and that he remains unmoved by the arguments addressed to him from both sides of the House. The Under Secretary repeated his censure of Miss Colenso, as one of those persons who are perpetually agitating. I think it would be a very great misfortune if, in our Colonies and in all places where we come in contact with the native races, there were not these persons whom the right hon. Gentleman calls agitators. We are bound to exercise the utmost subtlety and intelligence in dealing with the native races to prevent hardship and injustice often; and I confess that we owe no small debt of gratitude to Miss Colenso for the manner in which she has maintained the cause of the natives of Zululand. With regard to the four acts of rebellion of which the right hon. Gentleman spoke, he admitted that two of them were mere acts of resistance to the police. Why, we have had resistance to the police in Ireland, and we have not called it high treason.

MR. BRYCE: Yes; in Ireland we have had the police supported by troops, and when the people resisted them we did not call it high treason. So far as the case of Dinizulu is concerned, it entirely rests on the resistance to the police. The right hon. Gentleman then proceeded to deal with the case of the Court and of the Privy Council, and I think that his language is liable to misinterpretation. He spoke as if the Privy Council had approved the sentence. Nothing could be further from the fact than that. The Privy Council had nothing whatever to do with the sentence. What the Privy Council dealt with was simply the question whether the Court was duly constituted, and it found that, under the law of Natal, the Governor had power to constitute the Court. Therefore, as far as the sentence is concerned, the authority of the Privy Council cannot be put forward in favour of it in any manner whatever. I think it shows the animus with which the case has been conducted that a charge of high treason should have been brought in. The right hon. Gentleman has mentioned instances in which murders were committed; but it is not proved that Dinizulu was connected with them, and, therefore, nothing properly in the nature of a charge of murder can be brought against him. Indeed, we have had a virtual admission from the right hon. Gentleman that, although Dinizulu committed acts of violence and attacked his old enemy, nothing in the nature of murder is charged against him, and certainly nothing of the kind was proved. The short and the long of the matter is this: There was a great deal of trouble in Zululand, the legacy of that melancholy and dreary tragedy which began with Sir Bartle Frere's war. The authorities took it into their head to bring back Usibepu, and it would have been beyond human nature for Dinizulu and his friends to resist the temptation to attack their old enemy when they saw him again. Disorders and acts of violence followed, and a wise Government would have welcomed the first opportunity of restoring peace and tranquillity to the country, and if they inflicted any penalty at all, would have inflicted a comparatively light penalty. As soon as possible, they would have allowed the heir of the ancient King to resume his place at the head of his people, and they would have restrained him rather by the exercise of a wise guardianship than by the infliction of severe punishment. The sentence of exile for 10 years is very severe for a semi-civilised man, and it is quite disproportionate to Dinizulu's offences. I think a Division ought to be taken, so that we may have an opportunity of recording our protest against the policy which has been pursued. If the protest be unsuccessful at the present time, I hope that those who have brought the question forward will lose no chance of doing so on subsequent occasions.

(5.5.) DR. CLARK: I do not entirely take Miss Colenso's view of this question, nor can I justify the action taken by Dinizulu and his two uncles, but I think that much more has been made of their conduct than the facts justify. I did not attack the Commissioners. My point was that the counsel for the Chiefs wanted to bring before the Court certain reasons to justify their action, but the Court refused to permit them to adduce that class of evidence, although it was the kind of evidence that would have weighed with a jury if the trial had taken place in Natal. As I pointed out, these men, finding themselves accused of crimes, went into a civilised country and asked to be tried, but the Natal Authorities refused to try them, because they knew that if an investigation took place in Natal, the man who would have had to be put on his trial would not have been Dinizulu, but Mr. M. Osborne, the Commissioner. To save Mr. Osborne, they got this poor man and his companions taken away on false pretences, by bringing against them a charge of murder. They were then compelled to create this new Court. When it met the question that ought to have been brought before it could not be, and the witnesses were intimidated, because it was as much as their lives were worth to give evidence in favour of the prisoners. Usibepu would have killed them, and he would have been assisted by the police. Usibepu had been sent back to Zululand for the purpose of wiping out these men, and if you will read the papers you will see that this was so. As a matter of fact, they would have been wiped out had it not been that they were able to cross over into the Transvaal. The question which Lord Knutsford ought to consider is not whether the proceedings of the Chiefs were high treason or not, but whether Mr. Osborne was justified in his action, and whether a great deal is not to be said for Dinizulu and his people. I think they were driven into rebellion by Mr. Osborne and Mr. Dick Harrison, the Magistrate. I stated at the time that if the Government sent back Usibepu there would be civil war, and other Members also opposed the sending back of that firebrand to Zululand. What the Government ought to have done when terms were arranged with the new Republic was to have got Dinizulu's sanction and consent. Instead of that the country was annexed right away, and the Chiefs never knew exactly where they were until they found themselves under British rule.

(5.15.) MR. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I have not been in Zululand myself, but I have had 14 years' experience of the Indian frontiers of America, where a precisely similar state of things was to be found, and I wish to join my appeal to that of the hon. Member for the Holderness Division (Captain Bethell) in favour of these Chiefs. In talking about uncivilised tribes, I demur entirely to the use of the words "murder" and "high treason." I do not argue that if deaths occur in these tribes they should not be punished just as if they were civilised people; but I say that it is difficult to judge of the motives of these natives, and impossible to attribute to them the same praise or blame as you would to civilised men under the same circumstances. The right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary spoke of Miss Colenso as an agitator. Well, I am an agitator myself, and I have always held that much good work has come from agitators, but I think there are special reasons why the right hon. Gentleman should not have referred to Miss Colenso's action as having anything of the nature of agitation about it. I know the right hon. Gentleman will not be offended if I refer to one illustration, as I know he is one of those Hebrews who are proud of their ancient race. I would ask him, with reference to the persecution of the branch of his race which is located in the South of Russia, whether he would not welcome such action as that which Miss Colenso has been taking in South Africa? It has been said that when these men were removed to St. Helena all the cattle-stealing, and wife-stealing, and so on stopped as if by magic. Well, we have heard that Mr. Escombe, who will probably be Prime Minister of Natal, has spent much time and £1,200 in money in championing the cause of these men. Miss Colenso, in taking the course she has followed, has acted not merely from impulse, but in pursuance of the life-long policy of her great father, who was much beloved by the natives and sacrificed much for them, even, I believe, to his own life in the end, because I think it was the worry occasioned by the constant attacks made upon him by those who ought to have known better, that eventually brought about his death. I beg that mercy may be shown to these men. I have observed in my experience on the Indian frontiers of America that whenever a popular Chief is removed, although disturbances might for a moment cease, the tribe ultimately always 'fell' into confusion; and more cattle-raiding, wife-stealing, and so on occurred on the frontier, until eventually the natives became subject to those blessings which civilisation affords to both natives and Europeans, namely, drunkenness and immorality.

*(5.22.) MR. A. M'ARTHUR (Leicester): I regard the history of our relations with Zululand as one of the most disgraceful that is to be found in our colonial history. I think we have acted most discredibly towards the Zulus. I do not desire to make any imputations in reference to Miss Colenso. Her action may not have been judicious or beneficial to the natives, but I believe she was actuated by the highest and purest motives. I believe she was carrying out the policy of her father, the late Bishop Colenso, who, whatever else he may have been, was regarded by the Zulus as the truest friend they ever had. I join in the appeal to the Government to act with leniency in this matter. These men may have acted improperly and may have been guilty, to some extent, of violation of the law; but I think the punishment has been much too severe, and I hope the Government will exercise the prerogative of mercy. I am certain that Lord Knutsford has the most kindly feelings towards the native races, and I am confident that he will look at the matter carefully, and will, as far as he possibly can, see that the prisoners are treated mercifully.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: I can assure the Committee that the Government are not actuated by any vindictive spirit in this matter. The question is entirely one for the decision of the Secretary of State, who must be guided not merely by considerations of leniency but by the condition of Zululand. There is no immediate intention of remitting the sentences, and though I cannot say what may be done hereafter, I can give no pledge at the present time.

(5.37.) SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I desire to move a reduction of the Vote, with the object of calling attention to the question of granting responsible Government to Natal. The question is so important that I think it should be subject to Parliamentary discussion and decision. We have been promised Papers, but months have passed, and we are still without them. I notice in the Times of to-day there is a telegram from Natal which states that certain conditions are imposed, which will have to be assented to by the Natal Legislature before responsible Government will be sanctioned. I confess I hope that the arrangements may fall through. It is a very grave question. It affects not only Natal and Zululand, but the question of British dominion in South Africa. On two sides we are shut out from access from the sea to Central South Africa—on the one side by the Cape, on the other by Damaraland; and if we grant self-government to Natal, the Imperial Government will be shut out altogether from Central South Africa. I have not such “Jingo” sentiments as have been expressed by the hon. Member for St. Austell, but I am not disposed to quarrel with him in the view he has expressed that it is especially desirable that the British Government should maintain an influence in South Africa. It is important in itself, and it is important inasmuch as it is on our road to India. If we exercise due and legitimate influence in South Africa we may save vast expenditure in the Mediterranean, and those complications in the Mediterranean of which we heard so much in a recent Debate. My “Jingoism” does go to the extent of exercising a proper influence in South Africa. In regard to giving responsible Government to Natal, my first objection is to handing over control to a body of white men who only represent 1-15th of the whole population. I quite agree in the encouragement of friendly relations between the Transvaal and Natal, but I do very much doubt the wisdom of extending responsibility to Natal. My own idea in regard to South Africa is that, while to the white communities, whether British or Dutch, a certain amount of self-government should be extended within their own territories, where the white population is in such a small minority, and where, beyond the white settlements there are such masses of native population, the Imperial Government should retain control somewhat after the manner of the Indian Government. Natal is not in the position of a white community having settled upon a territory and cultivating it; the white population are in the position of masters employing native labour. Hitherto, when we have given responsible Government, it has been to a colony in the proper sense of our countrymen qualified for and accustomed to self-government. But in Natal you have a different state of things. The first departure from this pure system of responsible Government was when the Cape was somewhat hurriedly forced into that position, but there you had half a million of men, who are the best material for colonists in the world. What was done in regard to the Cape does not necessarily lead up to responsible Government for Natal, with its 30,000 white population, 35,000 Indian subjects imported to supply labour, and half a million Kaffirs, Zulus, and other native races. The whites are in the proportion of 1-15th of the whole population of the colony, and responsible Government means the handing over to this small minority the control of this vast mass of the coloured races. Opinions may differ whether it is desirable to do this or not, but I am sure there will be a general opinion that the step should not be taken without the assent of Parliament. I will not argue the point whether the Government have power to do this without consulting Parliament; but I do say that, though they have the technical power and right, they have not the moral right to do it. While Parliament has any authority at all it should exercise it in this difficult question, and in the interest of such an immense number of native population. The Natal people, I believe, are far from wanting it; they have repeatedly refused it, and even now the proposal has only a small majority of the Legislative Council in its favour. At all events, there is a very strong minority, if not a majority, of the people opposed to giving Natal responsible Government at the present time. I have a statement from a gentleman of position in the colony—I am not at liberty to state his name—to the effect that there is no general desire for the change, and that if adopted it would probably be followed by some form of compulsory native labour. It is not unlikely that a similar state of things would happen to that which has occurred in the Mauritius and in Queensland and other colonies, that dominion over the natives would mean some form of compulsory native labour. I am quite aware that it is said Her Majesty's Government will insert certain conditions for the protection of the natives, but, on the other hand, I am certain that once you give responsible Government, when you cast off a colony and allow it to govern itself, any stipulation or provision you make for the protection of the native population will be wholly and absolutely illusory. We had a difficulty in enforcing such a provision in New Zealand, and there has been much ill-treatment of the native population in Queensland. There is less likelihood of oppression of natives in Natal, perhaps, because they are in such an overwhelming majority, and a rebellion might follow with enormous difficulties to contend against; but in such a case, when colonists are involved in difficulties and defeat, a cry arises in this country; we have to go to the rescue, and ultimately the British taxpayer suffers. This brings me to the military aspect of the question as it affects the British taxpayer. The question of responsible Government for Natal has for many years been before Her Majesty's Government, and the Government have often shown themselves anxious to get rid of the trouble and responsibility of governing Natal, but the colonists have always refused the responsibility of their own defence. We are told in the Times' correspondence that the very important question of defence will probably be made matter of arrangement outside a Bill, and that British troops will remain for the present in the colony under the control of the Imperial Government. That means that the British taxpayer must pay for these troops. With such great masses of native population it is necessary to have a strong force to protect the European colonies. And what contribution do the colonists make? The Cape does not pay a farthing, and Natal has hitherto only paid a nominal sum of £4,000 out of a revenue of £750,000, and now approaching £1,000,000. I admit that, inasmuch as South Africa is on the way to India, Imperial garrisons should be maintained at certain points; but it is also fair that rich colonies should pay a share of the expenditure for their own defence; such expenditure should not fall wholly on the taxpayers of this country. Cape Town and Simon's Bay are important military ports, and we must have fortifications and heavy guns there; but is the British taxpayer to pay for all? Then it is said Zululand will remain a Crown Colony, while Natal has responsible Government; but there are about 500,000 Zulus in Natal, and I am sure nothing but trouble and difficulty will arise from two systems of Government applied to the Zulu people. It would mean the defence of Natal in another form if we had a brigade of troops as a buffer to protect Natal in Zululand. I confess I have not a great deal of sympathy with hon. Members who raise the question of the contributions for the defence of military ports in Ceylon, Singapore, Hong Kong, and elsewhere; but there is a disposition to raise these contributions by taxes on the food of the people, and I must say it is a cowardly proceeding to impose a heavy burden on some of the poorer, weaker colonies, from which colonies like the Cape and Natal are exempt. But I would press upon Her Majesty's Government that they should not rashly, and behind the back of Parliament, carry out this proposal to give responsible Government to Natal, on the ground that it is imperative that British dominion should be preserved in South Africa; that we must not shut ourselves out from access to Central South Africa from the sea; that it is dangerous to hand over the control of such an immense native population to a handful of whites who number but 1-15th of the whole, and that justice to the British taxpayer requires definite arrangements as to military defence. I hope Her Majesty's Government will not allow Parliament to be prorogued without telling us what is their intention, and that we shall be told that no final step will be taken until the House has had an opportunity of expressing an opinion on the terms on which it may be proposed to concede responsible Government to Natal. To raise the question I move to reduce the Vote by £1,500.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item A, Salaries, be reduced by £1,500, part of the Salary of the Secretary of State."—(Sir G. Campbell.)

*(6.0.) BARON H. DE WORMS: The answer I have to give to the hon. Member does not vary much from that I had to give him some time ago. The hon. Member has raised the question whether responsible Government can be given to Natal without the prior consent of Parliament. My reply is that it can.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I have not argued that; but I say it ought not to be so.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: Previous legislation by Parliament is not required before responsible Government is granted to a colony, except in cases where existing Imperial legislation has to be modified. In the case of Natal, the original instrument—the charter of 1856—gave to the Local Legislature the power of amending its constitution subject to the right which the Crown possesses of disallowing Bills. At the present moment the Governor has before him the Secretary of State's objections to the Bill as passed by the Colonial Legislature. These objections, which are principally concerned in safeguarding native interests, must be considered by the Local Legislature, and I cannot say what view they will take of them, or how long it will be before we are in possession of their opinions. I can assure the hon. Member, however, that the reason why the Bill has been referred back is because the Secretary of State is not satisfied with the provisions for the protection of the native races, and until Her Majesty's Government obtain adequate assurances that the natives will be protected, so long will the Imperial consent be withheld from the Bill. As regards military arrangements under responsible Government, not much can be said, as the whole question is now under discussion with the War Office. But I may say the introduction of responsible Government would not justify the summary removal of all troops from Natal. A period must elapse before the colony could substitute a sufficient police force for the maintenance of internal order. Moreover, Zululand must be defended by us, being under the direct control of the Crown, and the troops required for this purpose are, for sanitary and economical reasons, principally stationed in Natal.

*(6.6.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: No doubt the Colony of Natal has power, subject to the approval of the Crown, to constitute a proper Government. At the same time, I think it would have been satisfactory if the House of Commons had had an opportunity before the matter was finally settled of considering and discussing the question. Of course, I understand that the Government are not bound to submit the matter to Parliament, and, as it is, we must accept the statement of the right hon. Gentleman that the interests of the natives will be properly safeguarded. I have myself always been in favour of granting responsible Government to every colony as soon as it is fit for it; but the case of Natal, with a proportion of natives to Europeans of something like eighteen or nineteen to one, is exceedingly peculiar. It is possible the colonists may take strong measures against the natives, and there may be rebellion. In that case there is a great deal of force in what the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy has said. It will be the duty of the Home Government to support the action of the Government of Natal, and the British taxpayer will be called upon to pay for the expense of putting down the rebellion. I should like some more definite information as to the action likely to be taken by the War Office in the matter.

DR. CLARK: I should like to ask what safeguards the Imperial Government has asked for that the Natal Government has refused?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: I can only reply that the Secretary of State has objected to certain provisions in the Bill, and those provisions are now being considered by the Government of Natal.

MR. BRYCE: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman three questions—first, whether Papers are going to be produced; secondly, whether there is to be a General Election in Natal in order to test the opinion of the country on the question; and, thirdly, whether there is any reason why Her Majesty's Government should not defer their consent until some time in next Session, when the question can be properly gone into and debated, and, if necessary, a Committee can be appointed to consider the Bill? At the last election the majority was an exceedingly small one, and the knowledge that the natives will be dealt with differently from what was supposed may produce a change of opinion in the popular mind. It is too late now to discuss the question this Session, but it is one of considerable importance. There is in Natal an enormous black population, and the white population is only about 40,000. The colony will be an important element in future combinations in South Africa. It is quite as important in its way as Western Australia. I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that no Statute is necessary; but it does not follow that because a Statute is not necessary a Parliamentary investigation here is not desirable. The right hon. Gentleman must not suppose that he is not at liberty to do that which he is not obliged to do. I hope the Government will take no final and binding step in this matter until some time in the early part of next Session, and will give us the opportunity of raising the question, and, if necessary, appoint a Committee to examine into it.

*(6.12.) BARON H. DE WORMS: As to the right hon. Gentleman's first question, I have promised Papers, and I believe they are already in the printers' hands. With regard to a General Election in Natal, the Secretary of State has no power to control the action of the Government of Natal in that direction. And the answer to the third question is practically in the same sense. Under the Charter of 1856 the Government of Natal has the absolute power to change and modify the conditions of Government.

MR. BRYCE: Without the consent of the Crown?

BARON H. DE WORMS: Subject to the veto of the Crown. That, however, is quite another question, and would be no reason for curtailing or modifying the power which was given to Natal under the Charter of 1856. In the case of Western Australia, which has been cited, we were bound to have an Act of Parliament, as certain existing Acts had to be modified; but in this case there is no obligation whatever, Natal having the right, under the Charter, to demand from the Home Government that they should either accept or veto the Bill altering its constitution. If the conditions we have imposed are complied with, we have no right to withhold our consent. I cannot give an assurance that we shall depart from the rule we have laid down, and first place the matter before Parliament. Of course, if the conduct of the Secretary of State is impugned, Parliament can take action with regard to it.

(6.15.) MR. BRYCE: The right hon. Gentleman does not seem, in the least, to understand my point. He seems to think that the Colonial Office is bound to assent to a Bill if it fulfils certain conditions they have specified. What is to prevent the Colonial Office sending a Despatch to Natal saying, "We will not consent to this Bill until, by a General Election, the provisions of the Bill have been confirmed?" I cannot understand the lofty view of the Secretary of State's prerogative which the right hon. Gentleman seems to take.

BARON H. DE WORMS: The opinion in Natal was expressed at a General Election.

MR. BRYCE: That is disputed. I stated that there was a General Election, and that at that election the project was confirmed by an exceedingly small majority, and that it has since been suggested that there is an alteration of opinion in Natal owing to the fact that the provisions of the Bill will be changed.

BARON H. DE WORMS: The majority was not very small. There were 2,121 electors in favour of the proposed constitutional change, and 1,937 against it, the numbers of the members elected being 14 for the change and 10 against it.

MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: Will the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War state what arrangements have been made for the defence of Natal?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): I would rather reserve my reply to that question, so as not to give an incomplete answer.

MR. ROBY (Lancashire, S.E., Eccles): I wish to ask whether in the Papers that will be submitted we shall find the provisions of the proposed constitution and the communications that have taken place with regard to it?

BARON H. DE WORMS: I do not think that information can be afforded. The communications are all of the nature of confidential communications.

MR. ROBY: Are we, then, to understand that the proposed important change in the constitution of the colony is to be made not only without Parliament having an opportunity of expressing an opinion on the subject, but without Parliament having the information necessary to enable them to form one? There is no reason for such great haste, and, in my opinion, the proposals for the change in the constitution of the colony should be laid upon the Table of the House for a sufficient time to enable the matter to be fully discussed.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: I have pointed out that the Government are strictly following the precedent set by the Government of the day in 1872, when responsible Government was granted to the Cape. There will be an ample opportunity afforded of challenging the decision of the Secretary of State after the constitution of the colony is altered.

MR. ROBY: That will be too late. Do I understand that in 1872, when the constitution was granted to the Cape, a request was made to Parliament that information should be given, and an opportunity for discussion afforded, and that that request was refused?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: I cannot say that. I can only say that Parliament was not consulted.

(6.21.) MR. W. MCARTHUR (Cornwall, Mid, St. Austell): While my hon. Friends are no doubt justified in pressing for full information, yet I hope no one will gather from the fact of our pressing for information that any of us are opposed to the granting of responsible Government in these particular cases. Judging from the only occasion on which I have had any experience of the granting of a constitution to a colony, I do not think discussion of this kind is very satisfactory. I think that all we need concern ourselves with in connection with this question is whether proper precautions are being taken for the protection of the natives, because there can be no doubt that natives have been improperly treated under constitutions which have been given to other colonies. However, if the Government determine to divide, I shall support them, although I think they are accepting a very serious and great responsibility, and when they have the opportunity of allowing the whole House to share in that responsibility it seems to me a very foolish thing not to avail themselves of it.

MR. BARRAN (York, W.R., Otley): Natal is quite an exceptional colony, by reason of the small numbers of the white population and the large native population. It seems to me most undesirable to press the question forward too quickly. Some of us have cause to regret the haste with which the annexation of the Transvaal was decided upon and carried out, and it would be a great misfortune if similar haste were made in the present instance. If any dispute arose in connection with Zululand or the Transvaal the Natal Government would be unable to defend their territory, and the British taxpayer might be compelled to contribute enormously for the maintenance of the independence of the country. I hope, therefore, that Her Majesty's Government will be very careful as to committing us, although in doing so they may only be carrying out the conditions under which the Natal Government have power to organise their internal administration.

(6.27.) DR. CLARK: The people of Natal have been considering this question for many years, and the General Elections in the colony during the last 10 or 15 years have shown a gradual growth of public opinion in favour of what is called responsible Government. The reason why the majority in favour of it is not larger is that there is in the colony a very large Party called "the Mealy and Forage Party," which is composed of people who grow rich by selling mealies and forage to the troops. I have no objection at all to another General Election in Natal on this question, because I think the advocates of responsible Government would go back to the Legislature still stronger. I should like to see something done to safeguard the interests of the natives. Certainly things cannot be worse than they are now, because polygamy is legalised, and runaway women are compelled to what is practically slavery.

*SIR G. CAMPBELL: Nothing ought to be done rashly until Parliament has had some opportunity of considering the subject. The right hon. Gentleman has stated nothing whatever as regards the constitutional question; he takes his stand on a technical point—that the Crown may dispose of this territory. But what he has read from is not an Act of Parliament, but a clause in a Charter which constitutes the present Government of Natal. We may alter that, but we are not bound to give responsible Government. As regards the protection of natives, my own view is that we cannot give responsible Government, and at the same time the Imperial Government take measures for the protection of the natives. I do not want to see troops removed from South Africa. On the contrary, I think it a most important possession, and that we might move troops from the Mediterranean to South Africa. On no account should we remove our troops from South Africa. But I think that those for whose protection the troops are maintained ought to pay for that protection. The hon. Member (Dr. Clark) complains that polygamy is allowed in parts of Natal. Is he aware that it exists in our great dominion of India?

DR. CLARK: No, it is the permission to a father to sell his daughter, and to compel the girl to go to the husband; that is what I object to.

*SIR G. CAMPBELL: I should be surprised if the hon. Member can find any law to that effect which has been sanctioned by Her Majesty's Government any more than permission is given to sell daughters in this country. I am not one of those who would overstrain the Colonial Government, and I hope the Government will not take a step which would be irrevocable and involve enormous responsibility, for which they would have to account on a future day. Under the circumstances, I will not trouble the House to go to a Division.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. DE LISLE (Leicestershire, Mid): I propose to move the reduction of the salary of the Colonial Secretary in reference to Singapore, and, as I understand the hon. Member (Sir T. Sutherland) has some remarks to make, I shall reserve my observations until later.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item A, Salaries, be reduced by £300, part of the Salary of the Secretary of State."—(Mr. De Lisle.)

*(6.38.) SIR T. SUTHERLAND (Greenock): In rising to support the Motion of my hon. Friend, I may state that the question to which I am about to call attention was under discussion on the occasion of the Debate on the Budget. The late hon. Member for the City of London then brought the matter before the House, but since then there have been voluminous Papers circulated among the Members of the House, and various Petitions have been brought under our notice. I believe that, had they been perused, they would have shown impartial minds that Her Majesty's Government, in dealing with the question of the military contribution in reference to these colonies, have been, I may say, guilty of high-handed and arbitrary conduct, and have strained to the very utmost the constitutional powers which they have in those colonies. My remarks have reference not only to Singapore, but to Hong Kong and Ceylon. I think the experience of hon. Members will bear me out in stating that in every instance in which a Crown Colony has been taken possession of by this country it was for strategical and Imperial purposes, and for the defence of the sea-borne commerce of this country, which is of vital consequence. Take the Colony of Hong Kong. It is a barren rock taken possession of under the Treaty of Nankin for certain specific purposes with regard to Her Majesty's ships. Or, take a more recent example—Cyprus. In the words of Lord Beaconsfield, it is a place of arms for the Imperial requirements of this country. It is notorious that when a colony was no longer required for Imperial purposes it has been abandoned, Heligoland furnishing a recent illustration. For a long succession of years this country has paid large sums for the purpose of maintaining many of these colonies in existence under the British Flag. Even at the present moment, in the Estimates before the House, we are called upon to vote large sums for the purpose of maintaining our authority in these colonies, such as Ceylon, the Straits Settlements, and Hong Kong. I venture to say that those colonies have long since emancipated themselves from the need of any financial dependence upon this country. They have become great provinces of which every one who has knowledge of them is proud. We know well that the centre of gravity of the trade of this country is gradually being shifted eastwards owing to the protectionist tariffs in western countries and the opening of the Suez Canal; and if Singapore were held by another Power we would soon realise the vast Imperial consequence of the possession of that place. If Singapore or Ceylon were to become the possession of any other Power than

Great Britain the loss to the commerce of this country on a trade amounting to many millions would not only be very great, but the fact of those colonies passing from us would be a menace to our Australian and Indian Empire. But seeing that those colonies of which I am speaking have become and still remain Imperial possessions of the greatest possible value to us, that they are necessary to the protection of the seaborne commerce of that part of the world, and to ensure our communications with India and Australia; seeing also that they have been enabled to achieve financial independence as far as this country is concerned, and have required no assistance from this country for many years; seeing that by their enterprise they have contributed wealth directly and indirectly to this country, surely under these circumstances they are entitled to more than ordinary consideration on all questions affecting their Government and prosperity from the people of this country. But, Sir, these colonies are unfortunately, in some respects, not in a position to demand that consideration to which I hold they are entitled. They are Crown Colonies without representative Institutions of any kind whatever, and, though financially independent of this country, they are completely at the mercy of the Downing Street officials and the Government, who impose whatever laws and taxes they choose. It is true that there are Legislative Councils, but the members of those bodies are overruled by the official members, who are compelled to obey whatever mandates are sent from home. On a former occasion, when this subject was before the House, I stated a case within my own experience, in which I had been enabled to prevail upon an official member of the Council to actually vote against the Government. But, Sir, that act was followed by a Despatch from the Home Government informing the recalcitrant member that it would be as much as his place was worth if ever he attempted to take an independent attitude of that kind again. This happened, I regret to say, not under a Conservative, but under a Liberal Government. I hold that it is somewhat difficult to imagine a Government of this country in the present day bringing in a Bill to impose a tax,

however slight, on an independent colony. As far as I am aware, there is nothing to hinder the Government from bringing in a Bill to tax Ceylon, Singapore, or Hong Kong, but this policy does not appertain to the present day. It belonged to a system which was in vogue 100 years ago, and which even then met with comparatively little success. It is almost impossible to suppose, for example, that if the maintenance of the status quo in Newfoundland were to be productive of enormous cost in this country that this or any other Government would bring in a Bill to tax Newfoundland for the purpose of meeting that expenditure. I may remind the House that some of those who four or five years ago voted against Irish Home Rule were mainly induced to do so by the fact that the system was one of taxation without representation. I may be told that morally there is a difference between the taxation of a colony which possesses what is called self-government and the taxation of a Crown Colony which possesses no self-government. I reply, however, that there is, morally, no difference at all. I say that the Government have no more right to force taxation on a Crown Colony than it has to force taxation on a self-governing colony, so far as the moral principle of government is concerned. But in this matter the Government have done worse—they have introduced a measure such as I have described as impossible. They have, by a stroke of the pen, imposed enormous financial burdens on those colonies against the protest of the Governor and of every member of the Legislative Council, whether official or non-official. In taking this action the Government have surely been guilty of an act of injustice and of imposing a species of coercion not necessary in the interests of law or of good government, but solely caused by a desire to enable the Chancellor of the Exchequer to obtain as satisfactory a Budget as possible. I, of course, sympathise with the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his desire to obtain as satisfactory a Budget as possible. He is a man who has many claims upon him, and between free education on the one hand and the claims of Local Government on the other, one would hardly be surprised to hear that he is sometimes driven to his wits' end to know how to obtain the requisite balance. Accordingly, we find that the right hon. Gentleman and his myrmidons are always on the qui vive to pounce whenever they can do so upon any new source of revenue. It sometimes happens that those sources of revenue which ought to be available are not available. We have, for example, a proposal which I considered a fair proposal, that a Van and Wheel Tax should be imposed; but it was impossible to carry that proposition, because it met with opposition everywhere. After that the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Government looked round to see where they could safely obtain money without that amount of opposition. They looked round to see whether there were any of the Crown Colonies on which they might judiciously impose further taxation, and they found that the finances of Ceylon, Singapore, and Hong Kong were such as to enable them to impose this additional taxation. By acting as they have done in regard to this matter they acted in exactly the same way as the most absolute Monarchy that ever existed might have done, for they sent out positive orders to force the Bills for the subventions through the Legislative Council, no matter what opposition was offered; and I challenge the Government to defend such conduct as worthy treatment on the part of a great country like this towards its dependencies. Now, Sir, I wish to say a few words particularly in reference to Singapore or the Straits Settlements, because that is a case which comes before us very fully in the Blue Book which lies on the Table of the House. The history of the matter is briefly this: Singapore at one time formed a portion of the dominions of the East India Company, but at the time of the Mutiny the Government of the colony was handed over by consent to the Colonial Office. At the time this change was made a bargain was in force to the effect that Singapore should bear to the full extent the cost of its military expenditure, which amounted to something like £50,000. Singapore undertook to bear that military expenditure, but it should be noted that the agreement entered into at that time had reference entirely to the existing conditions of military expenditure, and had no reference whatever to any future conditions. I think it is impossible to imagine that if for some reason, which might appear to themselves to be a good one, the Imperial Government found it necessary to make an expenditure of £1,000,000 or £2,000,000 a year in connection with the Straits Settlements, such a tax ought to be borne by that colony in virtue of such an agreement. I say that such an idea is absolutely preposterous. What the Colony of Singapore agreed to was that it should bear its own military expenditure, which, as I have said, was £50,000 a year, and it agreed to nothing else. Besides, it is shown by the Despatch addressed by Lord Knutsford to the Governor of Singapore that an entirely different colouring is attempted to be given to this transaction. It is there attempted to be shown that whatever the conditions of the military expenditure might be at any time the bargain made 35 years ago was binding; and that if the Home Government for reasons satisfactory to themselves chose to expend £500,000 or £1,000,000 a year for the defence of the Straits Settlements, Singapore was bound to contribute that amount. Reasoning of this kind hardly requires to be contradicted. It may be highly ingenious, but it is by no means ingenuous. Her Majesty's Government have repeatedly revised the arrangements for the apportionment of Imperial obligations with regard to military expenditure, and they did so notably in 1879, when there were apprehensions of a war with Russia, for then, at their own cost, they embarked on considerable expenditure in providing fortifications for this settlement. Singapore has continued willingly to pay £50,000 annually up to the present; there have, it is true, been some minor squabbles with the home authorities, and there has been the miserable dispute as to the question of exchange on the silver remittances sent to this country from Singapore. So long as silver was above par the Government graciously accepted payment in silver, and never thought of crediting the colony with the difference in exchange, but so soon as silver became depreciated then they set up a counter claim, without taking cognisance of the profits they had previously made. But that has nothing to do with the main question as to whether the arrangements under which the Straits Settlements paid £50,000 a year to the Home Government were satisfactory. A great change occurred in this matter some years since in consequence of the appointment of a Royal Commission by Lord Carnarvon, and the Report of that Commission to the War Office. It was at that time found that the position which Singapore occupied with reference to India, China, and Australia was of such vast importance and significance that except with perhaps one solitary exception—the Cape of Good Hope—no other coaling station within the whole range of British possessions required to be so carefully looked after, and it was consequently pressed upon the Government by the Royal Commission and by the voice of the country that great and important works ought to be undertaken there. As these involved very heavy outlay, the Government of the day naturally enough invited the colony to consider what proportion of the expenditure it would bear. In this matter, I think it will be admitted by all who have perused the Blue Book, Singapore behaved with singular liberality, for it at once offered itself to construct the whole fortifications at a cost of £81,000. The Government had certainly no intention of claiming from Singapore more than it was willing to pay. Remember, the question of the fortification of our colonies is Imperial and not local. Singapore does not require the fortifications for her own use, and this House has never yet sanctioned the idea that a colony shall be called upon, whether it likes it or not, to make good Imperial expenditure undertaken at the instance of a Royal Commission. If it were necessary to drive this point home more conclusively it could be done by citing the cases of Hong Kong and Ceylon, for our vast possessions there are not in the slightest iota defended by the fortifications at the Singapore coaling station. Nevertheless, Singapore willingly undertook the burden of erecting the fortifications recommended by Lord Carnarvon's Commission, although the cost was £81,000. But the authorities at Downing Street are always on the qui vive, and finding that Singapore was financially solvent, raised the annual contribution from £50,000 to £100,000, and, in addition, required the colony to build barracks at a further expense of £60,000. Surely that is a high-handed proceeding, and treating with contempt a colony entitled to be treated with consideration. The colony, be it remembered, did not object to constructing the fortifications at a cost of £81,000; it did not object to building barracks at an expenditure of £60,000; but it did demur to pay more than two-thirds of the annual cost of the garrison, estimated at nearly £140,000, because it felt that that was an unfair proportion. I think every hon. Member acquainted with the facts will feel that they were justified in protesting against this charge. They also asked for an assurance of finality; they wished to be told that the question of the amount of military contribution would be definitely closed. The colony, I repeat, acted fairly and liberally, while the Government, in declining their proposal, accentuated the bitterness of the situation by insisting on the payment of £100,000 a year, and by refusing to finally settle the matter, and leaving it open to themselves to revise the arrangement in the course of the next two or three years. In other words, they said to Singapore:—"As you are only a Crown Colony, and have no representatives, we will, if we find you in a state of sufficient solvency, put our hands into your pockets to any extent we choose." I do not know what may be the feelings of those who adopt such an attitude to the people who maintain the glory and bear the burdens of this Empire in these inhospitable climes; but I, for one, taking as I do a pride and interest in the great achievements of these colonists, do not envy those feelings. There are grave consequences following upon this action of the Home Government. During the last two or three years it has been found absolutely impossible for this colony to frame an adequate Budget for its public works, because it was aware that it might be pounced upon at any time by the Home Government for a larger annual contribution. There must, consequently, be something approaching a paralysis in the public works of the colony. Such a condition of affairs is utterly unjust and inequitable, and inconsistent with the relations which ought to exist between a great country and its dependencies. I hope that I have not spoken on this question more strongly than I ought to. I have no personal interest whatever in any of these colonies; my only interest is that of personal association and a feeling of pride in the great work which has been undertaken and accomplished there. Now, I wish to make an appeal to the Government to deal with this matter, if possible, in some other way. I fear that in the present state of affairs it is impossible for the Government to retreat from the position it has taken up by calling on the colony to erect the barracks and by doubling its annual contribution. The claim made by the Government is extravagant and unjust no doubt, but I am more anxious as to the future than as to the present position, for unless a satisfactory solution is arrived at, the good feeling which has hitherto existed will disappear, and the difficulty will crop up again and again, and ultimately the Government may be defeated upon it. Three courses are open to the Government. They might decide that the present military contribution shall not be exceeded; or they might adopt the principle of fixing the contribution in proportion to the revenue of the colonies, allowing it to rise or fall proportionately with the revenue. I think either of those proposals would be deemed by the colony as not unreasonable, although I have no authority to speak in the name of the colonists. My third suggestion is one which I am sure the colony would heartily support, and that is that the whole question of military contributions should next Session be referred to a Select Committee to determine how, in what ratio, and in what manner they should be paid. We have heard a good deal during the last year or two as to a Committee to discuss the financial relations of England, Scotland, and Ireland; and I hope it will not be deemed unreasonable to suggest the adoption of a similar course with regard to a question which has raised angry and embittered feelings in the colonies, and has excited the opposition alike of official and unofficial members of the Council.

*(7.25.) SIR J. COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.): The question raised by my hon. Friend is one of very great importance, and one which I fear cannot be adequately discussed in Committee on a Vote of this character. However, recognising the gravity of the subject, I wish to say a few words upon it. I cordially support the last suggestion of the hon. Gentleman, that the Government should consent to refer to a Select Committee this question of the apportionment between the Home Country and the Colonies of the cost of Imperial defence, for nothing could be more unsatisfactory than to continue to act on the principles now in force. I shall confine my remarks to the cases of Singapore and Hong Kong in dealing with this question, for I think my hon. Friend somewhat marred the force of his case when he talked about the injustice of Penang and Malacca being called upon to bear taxation for fortifications and garrisons in Singapore, from which they derive no protection. On the same principle he might have taken a case nearer home, and cried out against the injustice of calling upon his own constituents in Scotland to contribute towards the cost of the fortifications at Portsmouth. Therefore, my hon. Friend has introduced an argument which will not hold water. When the words "Imperial Government" are used—and my hon. Friend frequently used them—the Committee are apt to forget that the Imperial Government has not the resources of the Empire at its back. Therefore, when we are talking of the Imperial Government in relation to matters like this we are referring to the taxpayers of the United Kingdom. If the Imperial Government were able to deal with resources furnished by the whole Empire for discharging a common obligation, it would be very different; but under the present arrangement you have practically to come down only on the taxpayers of the United Kingdom (Singapore, Hong Kong, Mauritius, and Ceylon) in order to meet the cost of defending the Empire in those seas. This discussion has been raised on a Motion to reduce the salary of the Secretary of State for the Colonies. But is the right hon. Gentleman at all responsible for the unfortunate series of events which have culminated in these protests? I say that this present state of affairs is the full fruit of seed sown in the blindness of the Governments which immediately preceded the present Government. Singapore, as we all know, is a point of strategical importance; but arguments may be pushed a great deal too far in regard to what that means, for, after all, it is only valuable to the British Empire so long as the Empire retains supremacy at sea. It would be absolutely useless to us if we lost that supremacy. When the hon. Gentleman asks what would happen if Germany, France, or any other foreign Power got possession of Singapore, my reply is that it would be a very temporary inconvenience if we had the command of the sea, but that the loss of the place would not matter so much if we had not that command. We must not, therefore, push arguments too far. What is most valuable and essential is the water area around Singapore. In that area the whole Empire is concerned. What the hon. Member proposes to do is to take off from Singapore a certain burden and put it on the taxpayers of this country; but the other portions of the Empire have really greater interest in the water area around Singapore than the Mother Country, and therefore, even on his own showing, an equitable arrangement, and the only equitable arrangement that will stand the test of examination on any fixed principle is some system by which the whole Empire shall share proportionably in the cost of the defence of that area. Following the history of the question there came the Report of the Royal Commission on the importance of improving the defences of Singapore; and I know from personal communication with that colony that for years previously there was great desire among the colonists for defensive works, and that the Government were being constantly pressed to create them. At last there was an arrangement by which the colony was to bear the cost of the works, and the Imperial Government to provide the armaments, and the estimate on which that arrangement was based was that the works would cost £75,000 and the armaments only £49,000. But it will be found from the Despatch that while afterwards the colony had to pay £5,000, or 8 per cent. more than the amount estimated, for works, the Mother Country had to pay £73,000 more, and did pay it. This extra expenditure, amounting to 146 per cent., was incurred at the request of the colony. [An hon.

Sir J. Colomb

MEMBER: No, no.] If the hon. Member will turn to page 1 of the Correspondence he will see that Lord Knutsford, in a letter dated 13th December, says—

“The armament originally proposed was to have cost £49,000, but this sum is far below the actual cost of the heavier armament, which at the request of the colony will have to be supplied.”

Therefore, at the request of the colony, we so far exceeded our obligation as to spend £73,000 more than was estimated. I should like the Under Secretary for the Colonies, or the Secretary for War, to explain explicitly what the expression “at the request of the colony” means. Was it an official request? Was it made in response to expressions of opinion at public meetings, or how does it come about that the taxpayers of the United Kingdom have to pay, at the request of a colony, £73,000 more for armaments than was originally estimated? Well, the arrangement with regard to the works and armaments was carried out, but the late Government never seemed for a moment to have thought that, having the works and armaments, a garrison was required. It was simply a repetition of their policy with regard to the Navy. They provided extra ships, but forgot to supply them with guns and ammunition. We all know it is a most dangerous thing to make strong places with strong armament and weak garrisons. £200,000 having been spent on works and armaments for the defence of Singapore, then the question arose, “What is to be done about the garrison?” The present Government stepped in and called on the colony to provide a further sum of £100,000, and I really do not see what else they could do. Nevertheless, I think the colonists have a real grievance in the matter, though they must put the saddle on the right horse. The fault does not lie with Her Majesty's Government; it arises from the fact that we have no regular system under which to provide for the general defence of the Empire out of resources drawn proportionably from all its parts, and so long as the existing state of things in this respect remains injustice must be done and dissatisfaction created. To show the inequality and injustice that now exists I will give a few figures.

Singapore is the centre of a circle which, with a radius equal to its distance from Aden, embraces a large number of British possessions, including India, whose aggregate sea trade amounts to £300,000,000 a year, and whose aggregate revenue is £85,000,000 a year, or nearly equal to that of the United Kingdom. If we exclude India the aggregate sea trade of the other British possessions within the circle is £181,000,000 a year, and the revenue £29,000,000. Four places in this circle—the Mauritius, Hong Kong, the Straits, and Ceylon—with a sea trade of £54,500,000 a year only, and a revenue of £5,000,000 only, give us over £250,000 a year in the shape of military contribution; while all the other places, with an aggregate revenue of £24,500,000, do not contribute a farthing; or, in other words, while we extract military contribution amounting to nearly £250,000 from four places having an aggregate sea trade of only £54,500,000 a year, we do not receive a farthing by way of military contribution from the other countries within the area having a sea trade of over £126,500,000. It is not fair to lay the blame for this inequality on the Government, because it is the effect of a false and vicious system that has grown up, and that in my judgment is imperilling the Empire. The time has come to deal with the matter, and, in my opinion, the only way of dealing with it is to have a Council of Imperial Defence. On that Council both the Mother Country and her dependencies should be represented, and it should be appointed to make arrangements for a fixed time. If such a suggestion is acted upon, and taken with the recommendations of Mr. Ismay's suggestion attached to the Report of the Hartington Commission, I believe we will be able to arrive at a system by which a more equitable arrangement can be made throughout the Empire for what is a common purpose and a common interest. I trust, therefore, that one result of this Debate will be to turn the attention of the Government seriously and earnestly to the question.

(7.48.) MR. BRYCE: I cannot help thinking that the question now under consideration is one of too large and important a character to be adequately dealt with on the present occasion and in so thin a House; for it is one the settlement of which will tax all the resources of statesmanship. With regard to the particular point relating to Singapore, I presume that all are agreed that the colony ought to make some contribution to the State; and the next point for consideration is the action of the Government in largely increasing the contribution. Singapore has no doubt paid a great deal, and has paid for other colonies. What is said, and what I believe to be correct, is that the present demand is not only a large increase on what was hitherto demanded, but that it is a much larger demand than the colony had any reason to expect, considering the assurances given to them on previous occasions. They were led to understand that the demand would be of moderate dimensions, and as a result of what has taken place they feel there is no finality. Secondly, they allege that their local financial arrangements will be seriously disturbed, and that they will be unable to deal with public works and sanitary improvements and other things which the colony require if they have to meet this increased demand. Then the colonists allege that the trade of Singapore is to a large extent a mere call trade which contributes nothing to the wealth of the colony; that though the number of vessels which touch is very large, it does not tend to the profit of Singapore. In that case the tonnage touching at Singapore is not a measure of the support which Singapore should give to a matter of this kind. Of course, it will be said that they have naval protection, but I think that the colony feel acutely having no voice in the amount of contribution. Of course, I am not here to contend that it is possible to leave it to such a colony to determine a matter of this kind. The Government at home must be the determining authority, but at the same time it is desirable to use the controlling power in the most conciliatory manner. There seems to be some uneasiness at the large increase in the demand, and I gather that there is some little sense of irritation which it will be desirable to remove. Singapore has not been backward hitherto in trying to do its duty. There are other colonies which do not pay anything at all; therefore, without making the matter an attack on the Government, I think that we may hope that they will be as indulgent as they can, and not increase the burden upon that colony indefinitely.

(7.54.) MR. E. STANHOPE: The hon. Member who has just sat down has avoided the vague generalities and the violent language of the hon. Member for Greenock, and has stated in temperate language the case of Singapore. He seems to desire to make Singapore a typical case, and I am perfectly ready to meet him on that ground, only I think if the hon. Member wanted to carry conviction to the minds of the Committee he ought to have descended to particulars. He ought to have proved to us by arguments and figures that the contributions now asked are in excess of the capacities of the colonies. With the permission of the Committee, I wish to speak not as the representative of the War Office, but the representative of the Government as a whole. It is perfectly well understood how the Government dealt with this matter. There were strong Committees inquiring into this question, and they made their Reports. Not satisfied with this, the Government for themselves examined into every one of these Reports. I am not going into a great deal of the speech of the Member for Greenock. No one is likely to accuse me of any want of sympathy with the colonies. I have the deepest possible feeling for the colonies, and I should not like to press anything which I do not believe to be just to the colonies. But in recent years circumstances have changed. The cost of defence has greatly increased all over the world. It costs more now than formerly to defend a harbour. The armament is very much more expensive than formerly, and it is natural that the Government should think that the time has come for examining the amount of the contributions of the colonies with the view of increasing them where it is just and decreasing them where they appear to press heavily on any colony. The hon. Member for Greenock based his whole case on what he called justice to the colonies, but there is also justice to the taxpayer of the United Kingdom, and it is not right that, without careful examination, the taxpayer should bear the whole cost, or even a large portion of it, without asking the colonies to bear a reasonable share of it. I do not think the Member of Greenock would go down to his constituency and tell his constituents that he was going to ask them to pay additional taxation in order to relieve the colonies of, what I shall be able to show are the reasonable demands made upon them. Now, we have not been able to lay down any general rule which can be applied to all the colonies in the matter of the garrisons. We feel that each case must be judged upon its merits, and we are bound to judge the capacity of a particular colony. We have also to consider the amount of Imperial interest involved. I come, first, to the case of Singapore, and if I dwell longer upon that it is because the Member for Greenock has selected it as a typical case. It has been already stated that the colony of the Straits Settlements urged the transfer of the colony from India to the Imperial Government on the ground of the charges imposed upon them for the cost of their defence. An agitation took place and lasted for years, this country absolutely refusing to allow the transfer, except upon the guarantee that no further charge should fall upon the Imperial Government. That was laid down as an absolute condition of transfer, and it was accepted by the Colony in 1866, when the conditions of transfer were laid down, and providing that no charge should result to the Imperial Exchequer in consequence of the transfer of the Straits Settlements to the Imperial Government. This understanding was again affirmed in 1873, the Straits Settlements accepting the agreement with full knowledge of their position. And in the result the colony has had the full advantage of it. Upon the old footing the charges they would have had to pay to the Indian Government would be about £236,000, instead of the £100,000 now asked. The case, then, stands thus, speaking generally. They made a bargain with the Imperial Government, and the bargain has turned out very much better than they had any reason to expect, and now they turn round and wish to avoid payment of a fair and reasonable amount of expenditure. Is it now to be contended that they are not to bear their fair share of the expenses of their defence, notwithstanding that they deliberately entered into an agreement to do so? Of course, I admit that if the present charges imposed upon them a heavier proportionate burden than was the case in 1866, they would have reasonable grounds for making a complaint. But is that the case? Let us examine the figures. In 1858, when the transfer of the Straits Settlements to the Imperial Government was first mooted, the revenue of the Colony was £132,000 per annum, while the military and marine charges which they had to pay amounted to £87,000 per annum, being at the rate of 66 per cent. of their total revenue. In 1866, their revenue had risen to £260,000 per annum, while the charges had fallen to £70,000, or 27 per cent. of revenue. As years went on the proportion continued to fall, and in 1890 the revenue had increased to £650,000, and the charge we impose now is £100,000, or 15½ per cent. of the revenue. So it will be seen, that so far from the proportion of charges to revenue being increased, it is very much smaller and less than a quarter of what it was when the question of transfer was first mooted, and not much more than half what it was when the transfer was made. I have also to point out that the Straits Settlements, while paying only this proportion towards the defence of the colony, pays nothing towards the cost of the Navy, and when the contribution was increased two years ago, a part of the settlement was that the charges against the Straits Settlements, which had accumulated in the course of years, and which the Imperial Government might have called upon them to pay, were remitted to the extent of £82,000. Their present contribution, instead of being comparatively greater than it was, has proportionately largely decreased. The charges amount to only 3s. 6d. per head of the population of the colony, while in the United Kingdom the corresponding charges amount to 16s. per head. [An hon. MEMBER: More.] In these circumstances, it cannot be said that they are being asked to pay more than is fair and reasonable. Two or three minor questions have been raised in connection with this subject. In the first place it is said that the charges having been fixed at the time of the transfer, therefore should not be increased. Nothing can be clearer, however, than the two conditions that were laid down at the time of the transfer, one being that no additional burden should be thrown upon the Imperial Exchequer by reason of the transfer, and the second being that the Government of the day made it a condition that the charges should be increased or decreased from time to time as circumstances might require. The colony, therefore, had ample notice that the contribution which they agreed to pay might be increased from time to time. A question has also been raised as to the charges for the fortifications. I do not think it is difficult to show that the arrangement entered into in 1884 in regard to fortifications was altogether favourable to the colony according to the understanding of 1866. What the colony was to do was to pay the whole of the cost, but instead of requiring them to do that, what the Imperial Government did was to say "find the necessary work and we will provide the armaments." The Imperial Government undertook not only a very large proportion of the whole cost of the fortifications at the time, but as it subsequently turned out, found a much larger proportion than was originally intended, more effective and heavier guns being provided than were suggested in the first instance. I do not carry in my head the terms of the Despatch, but I know that the guns provided were more effective to meet the requirements of the colony than was at first contemplated. Malacca and Penang share in the advantages of the defensive works; it is ridiculous to say this is not the case, because these places are not actually fortified. In every country you cannot fortify every possible place, but they all share in the general defence, and should pay a portion of the contribution towards the expenditure.

*SIR T. SUTHERLAND: What I said was that Malacca and Penang were in no way advantaged by the fortifications at Singapore.

MR. E. STANHOPE: The hon. Member, I think, went beyond that; but, however, I need not make it a point of controversy.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Can the right hon. Gentleman say what is the strength of the garrison at Singapore, and the cost, both effective and non-effective charges?

MR. E. STANHOPE: That, I think, is a question to raise on the Military Vote. The garrisons in the Straits Settlements amount to 1,360 men.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: And the approximate cost?

MR. E. STANHOPE: At the moment I cannot give that.

MR. DE LISLE: I think £66 per head.

MR. E. STANHOPE: Then passing to Hong Kong, the question is a very simple one. Hong Kong, according to the agreement of 1863, was to pay a contribution of £20,000 per annum, but in that case, again, the condition was made that the sum so fixed was to be subject to any revision that the altered circumstances of the colony might require. Nothing can be clearer than the condition laid down in the Duke of Newcastle's Despatch, that, in fixing £20,000, the desire was not to press too heavily at first on the Colonial Revenue, and thus probably to retard works of great public utility, and it was further laid down that the amount of the contribution might be raised to a higher rate at a future period. Therefore in that case, again, the colony had full notice when the agreement was entered into that the amount of the contribution might be increased. There can be no doubt that Hong Kong is well able to bear the burden, because the amount of the contribution has been reduced from 16½ per cent. of the revenue—the proportion it bore when the arrangement was made—to 12 per cent. in 1890. The cost of the garrison to the Imperial Exchequer at the present moment is £170,000 per annum, and of this sum the colony is only asked to pay £40,000. This cannot be called an unreasonable proportion, taking into account what has been said by the hon. Member for Greenock (Sir T. Sutherland) as to garrison being maintained for Imperial purposes. As to what has been said about the strength of the garrison, I may explain that, to relieve the strain on the European Army, it is proposed that the 2nd Battalion maintained at Hong Kong shall consist of Asiatic troops. We are raising a battalion in India, and as soon as it is raised it will be sent for the garrison of Hong Kong. The arrangement is an economical one, of considerable advantage to this country, and one which I should like to see carried a good deal further than the case of Hong Kong. I made a comparison of cost per head in the case of Singapore, and I may make a comparison of the contribution from Hong Kong with the proportion in other countries, not great military Powers, paid by the population towards the cost of defence. Hong Kong contributes from 9 to 12 per cent. of its income to defence, the Netherlands 25 per cent., Belgium about 14½ per cent., Portugal 19 per cent., Sweden 32 per cent., Greece 24 per cent., and Switzerland 34 per cent. Put in another form, it may be said that each inhabitant of Hong Kong contributes towards defence 1s. 10d., each inhabitant of the Netherlands 13s. 7d., Belgium 6s. 7d., Portugal 7s. 2d., Sweden 6s. 6d., and Switzerland 5s. 1½d. Considering, therefore, the large amount which the Imperial Government has to pay towards providing an adequate garrison in Hong Kong, I do not think that the contribution of the colony can be regarded as unreasonably large. I might go further in comparison, but I rest the case here. I hope that I have made out to the satisfaction of the Committee that the contribution we are now asking the colony to pay is one, judged by every fair and reasonable test, which we may fairly call upon the colony to contribute. My hon. Friend the Member for Bow and Bromley has undoubtedly raised a large and important question in urging that these great questions connected with Imperial defence should be looked at as a whole between this country and the colonies. With his view I have considerable sympathy, and I should be exceedingly glad to do anything that lies in my power to contribute towards that result. I may remind the Committee that a great deal has been achieved in that direction, and especially by the valuable Report made by Lord Carnarvon's Commission. The recommendations suggested by that Commission have now been practically carried out, while other places have also been defended in addition to those specified in that Report. The great omission then made of not considering either the question of garrisons or that of barracks has since been dealt with by myself, and when those two subjects have been completely carried out, the Government will then have dealt with all that side of Imperial defence touched upon by Lord Carnarvon's Commission. At the Imperial Conference the list of ports was extended so as to include Table Bay and certain Australian ports, while the Government have been able to induce the Australian Governments to join with the Home Government in the cost of naval defence. The question, however, is one of enormous difficulty. The case of the Cape has been referred to. I think that the Cape ought to contribute more largely than it does, but the House of Commons cannot compel the Cape to make a larger contribution. I believe the time will not be far distant when the Cape may be induced to look upon this question in a different light, and that it will be able to see, not only in justice to the taxpayers of the country, but in its own interest, that a larger contribution ought to be made towards the defence of that important station. There are also other cases to be dealt with, and if I can do anything in this direction, I assure the Committee that it will be done.

*(8.23) MR. DE LISLE: I have listened with great attention to the defence which the right hon. Gentleman with his usual great ability has made, but I am not convinced that the facts are such as to justify the Government in the conclusions at which they have arrived. The essential grievance complained of is that the Government have not merely put pressure on the officials at Singapore, but have compelled them to vote against their convictions and belief, and have deliberately violated an honourable understanding made between the colony and the Colonial Office. A Despatch from the Governor, March 21, 1890, points out that the course followed had brought about strained relations between the Government and the Legislative Council. Now, this is a very serious matter. The Governor goes on to say, however, that his instructions were clear, and he had to require each member of the Legislative Council to support the proposals of Her Majesty's Government. Now, in the first place, I protest against this arbitrary exercise of authority which has led to these strained relations. I am not proposing any change in the form of government, or to make it possible for the Council to resist the wishes of the Imperial Government, but I protest against the exercise of authority being carried to such an extent. I had the honour of serving the late Governor in the Settlement, and came into intimate acquaintance with the whole affair. The understanding in the colony was clear and distinct, that if the colony bore the expense of fortifications and barracks the existing conditions with regard to the maintenance of the garrison should not be altered. There is a Treasury Minute I may recall to the memory of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, for I think he is the real offender in this matter, looking naturally to the interest of the British taxpayer. We are grateful to him on behalf of our constituents, though, I am sure, speaking for my own constituents, they do not want their pockets to be saved at the sacrifice of justice to a colony. This Treasury Minute of June 2, 1866, was written to Mr. Cardwell at the time when the original arrangement with the colony was made. It states with respect to barrack accommodation that no charge ought to fall on the Straits Settlements, the troops being maintained for Imperial purposes; but in defiance of that utterance, the Government have imposed on the colony an extra charge of £60,000 for barracks, and have doubled the charge for military contribution. I may also call attention to a letter of Lord Kimberley's to the War Office in 1871, in which an objection was raised to making the colony liable for an uncertain charge over which they would have no power. I am not prepared to go so far as to say the colony should not be liable to pay a sum over which they have no power; but when you have the whole Colonial Ministry protesting against the charge as unjust, under such circumstances I think the Imperial authority ought not to be exercised. What it comes to is this, that what the Colonial Office thought unfair in 1871 is now pressed upon the colony as a liberal arrangement. I am not so much blaming the Colonial Office, for anyone who reads the Despatches will see that the sympathy of the Colonial Office is with the colony, but the War Office and the Treasury are on the other side, and they have compelled the Colonial Office to break faith with the Settlements. The arrangement I refer to actuated Major McCullum, the Colonial Engineer, when he made his Report to the Governor in 1872, when it was well recognised that for expenditure for Imperial purposes the Home Government should be responsible and not the colony. Now, with regard to the defence the right hon. Gentleman made of the conditions under which the transfer of Singapore from the Indian Government to the Colonial Office was effected, I would point out the complete reply of Major McCullum in his memorandum—

“Much stress in justification of the large demand now made is evidently laid by Her Majesty's Government on the fact that the transfer of the Straits Settlements from the Government of India to the Imperial Government was only sanctioned on the distinct understanding that the revenues of the colony should bear all the cost of its military as well as its civil requirements. This was only natural, for at the time, namely, in 1866, the trade of the Straits Settlements was with India; its profits and losses mainly affected India, and the mother country through India; and it was India which, though its monopoly of the trade with China had been terminated by Act of Parliament in 1834, still specially enjoyed the advantages of that trade. In 1866 it may not have been unreasonable to call on the colony to provide the cost of its own protection if it wished to sever its connection with India, and it did so by paying, not—it is important to notice—the cost of a garrison for Singapore, which is now alone under consideration, but the cost of troops quartered in each of the Settlements—in Singapore, in Penang, and in Malacca. Some troops were, for Imperial purposes, to be stationed in Singapore, and the cost of their maintenance and of their barracks was admittedly an Imperial charge, to be borne by the Imperial Exchequer. Her Majesty's Government recognised at the time of the transfer that there were Imperial obligations in regard to such military expenditure, and the colony was, to that extent, not called upon to share in them.”

What, therefore, may have been a fair arrangement in 1866, has since been altered by the creation of the Suez Canal, and there is no real ground for raising the contributions of the colony to the armaments in the fact that the trade of the colony has increased. The Imperial trade which passes through the Straits Settlements has increased to £41,000,000, while that of Singapore has only increased to £14,000,000. On this point Major McCullum says—

“The opening of that canal”—referring to the Suez Canal—“has created such a vast Imperial trade that it is of vital importance to the United Kingdom that it should be adequately protected. It is in the interests of British trade, therefore, that the harbour of Singapore has been defended.”

Moreover, I am certain that there must be in existence confidential Despatches between the Home and Colonial Authorities, which have laid down in terms very clear that all local military requirements should be paid for by the colony, and that the colony should pay a fair share towards Imperial defence, but that all demands that arose on Imperial grounds should be paid out of Imperial funds. The fact that the possession of Singapore is of prominent importance to us has not been disputed to-night. We find in the Memorandum of the Inspector General of Fortifications in 1884 these words—

“The possession of Singapore keeps open to our fleets and commerce the Straits of Malacca and the highway from India to the farther East and Australia.”

Therefore, from that point of view, I will only say that if we come to allot the relative amounts that ought to fall on the different parts of the Empire we shall find that Australia ought to pay a considerable share of the cost of the maintenance of the defences of Singapore. I would now refer to the contention of the Secretary of State for War that it was the colony who asked for the larger armaments. This is not the case. The Governor and the officials, in the interests of the Empire at large, represented that the armaments provided were not in any way adequate, but the colony itself had nothing to say in the matter. When the Government undertook to pay for the armament they implied that the armament was to be adequate and efficient for the purposes in view. The Colonial Engineer, Major McCullum, has answered this point completely, and has made a proposal which would, if carried out, satisfy the demands of the colonists and be just to the interests of the British taxpayer. I have now gone over most of the ground, and, in conclusion, I would only refer to a proposal of Major McCullum, the Colonial Engineer, in his very able Report and reply contained in the Despatch to the Colonial Secretary—and I would here remark that, if any one desires to get to the bottom of this matter, it is only necessary to read these Despatches. The suggestion comes at the end, and I think it is well worthy of the consideration of Her Majesty's Government. If in the course of the next year or two the Government can see their way to adopt these proposals, they will go a long way to satisfy the demands of the entire Singapore community and, at the same time, do justice to the British taxpayers—against whom I, as one of them, can have no manner of ill-feeling. He says—

“I premised this Memorandum by saying that a decision having been come to by Her Majesty’s Government, there is nothing to be done but to vote the money demanded. If it be possible, however, to re-open the question, I would respectfully urge that, with the present approved garrison, the military contribution should at the outside stand at no higher figure than £70,000 per annum, not terminable in 1893, but to continue as long as the garrison is not further increased, the actual annual figure being contingent on actual annual expenditure. Considering that we have also to pay for the cost of new barracks, this, I submit, is a liberal proposal, as the Colonial contribution would then amount to about £20,000 per annum more than we have been paying during the last 17 years, whilst the Imperial Government would really be contributing but a comparatively small sum towards their enhanced Imperial obligations. By paying such a large sum as £70,000, it cannot be said that we benefit by our connection with the Empire without sharing its responsibilities.”

There is another consideration which must not be forgotten, and that is, that when the existing arrangement was first entered into the three Straits Settlements were all defended. The defences were not confined to Singapore, but Penang was the stronger place of the two, and Malacca was also fortified. The defences of Penang are now almost abandoned, although the place is still used for the purpose of giving soldiers occasionally a change of air. The fortifications at Malacca, however, have been entirely abandoned. But Singapore itself is not defended. It is the harbour some two miles off which has been secured from external attack. Singapore now takes the position of a central coaling station. It is of the utmost importance for the purposes of Imperial defence, and cannot be regarded as it used to be. Another point to be considered is that, besides being the capital of the Straits Settlements, practically Singapore is the seat of the Government of the entire Malay Peninsula. The native protected States, though their revenues are larger than those of the whole of the Straits Settlements, do not contribute one penny to the defences, and I think that some scheme should be devised by which contributions from those States should be received. If that were done, and the £100,000 were equitably levied, the charge would not be so unfair as it now seems to be to the people of Singapore, Malacca, and Penang. I earnestly hope Her Majesty’s Government will take this matter into consideration, and see if it is not possible to adjust a grievance which I, for one, am convinced is a real one, the reality of which I do not think any statement made to-night by Her Majesty’s Minister has in any way tended to remove. (8.50.)

(9.20.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: I have always thought that the British taxpayer, who is compelled to pay for naval and other defences all over the world, receives a miserably inadequate return. But it does seem to me that the Secretary of State for War has made out a very fair case for the contribution of £100,000 for the Straits Colony. For my part, I should be glad to regard that colony as a typical one, and my opinion is not that the Straits Colony pays too much, but that the other colonies pay too little. While it is shown that the Straits Colony makes a tolerable approach towards paying for its own garrison in the same way as India does, we must nevertheless feel that the people of that colony have some excuse for feeling sore upon the subject, on the ground that while they are compelled to make a just contribution for defensive purposes, the other colonies do nothing of the sort. I wish the Secretary for War could only show them the prospect of something being done in other directions. I think we are in a somewhat unsatisfactory position with regard to most of our colonies. We “gas” a good deal about our possessions in every part of the world, but at the same time we have little or no control over those possessions. At any rate, we have no such control as will relieve the pockets of the British taxpayer from the enormous burden he is compelled to undergo for the defence of those colonies. I regret that the Secretary for War has not formulated some plan for obtaining a more adequate contribution from our colonies. It has been stated with regard to the Straits Settlements—Hong Kong and Ceylon—that the British Government contribute very little towards the revenues of those colonies. But in the case of Singapore and Hong Kong, the revenues are derived almost entirely from the duties upon opium and spirits sold to the natives. Ceylon is a large and rich island, which pays very little in the shape of taxation, but which follows what is the normal rule among the Crown Colonies by levying heavy duties on the commonest food imported for the consumption of the commonest people, and yet, at the same time, it grudges a contribution to the British Revenue for Imperial Defence. Ceylon, Singapore, and the other colonies in that part of the world are under the ægis of India, and are all equally benefited by the expenditure incurred for the defence of India. Therefore, it is not too much to suggest that in the interests of the British taxpayer all these colonies should be called upon to make, at least, similar contributions to those of the Straits Settlements; and if this were so, Singapore would have no ground of complaint.

MR. R. G. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.): There is no doubt that the Colony of Hong Kong derives a large portion of its revenue from opium; and if hon. Members opposite had their own way, that revenue would be taken away. With regard to Singapore, that colony undoubtedly contributes largely towards its own defence, and does this ungrudgingly. I believe it has not yet obtained all the guns that are considered necessary for defensive purposes, but we are told that they will shortly be supplied. We must remember that what is being done is not merely for the defence of the colonies per se, but for the defence and protection of the British trade up and down the entire coast in that quarter of the globe. It would be manifestly unjust to demand additional taxation from the Colony of Hong Kong on account of its opium revenue without, at the same time, giving it additional troops, because that source of revenue may soon be swept away. If additional troops had been sent to Hong Kong, the complaints made by that colony would not be so justifiable as they appear to be at the present moment. No doubt we have a very important trade at Hong Kong, and passing through Hong Kong, but, as I have just said, if it is necessary to call upon them for increased contributions, we ought to give increased means of defence. For my part, I shall support the Amendment of my hon. Friend.

*(9.30.) SIR E. J. REED (Cardiff): The difficulty of this question will be obvious to every fair-minded man. It is quite easy on the one side to declaim against the magnitude of the charge imposed upon Singapore, and it is equally easy on the other side to say that a large charge should be imposed in such cases, in order to relieve the British taxpayer. I naturally listened very carefully to the speech of the Minister who undertook to defend the situation; and when the Secretary for War concluded, I could not help contrasting the tone of his remarks in dealing with this protest with what it would have been had the protest come from a colony blessed with representative Government. I could not detect one word or one expression in his speech designed to alleviate or pacify the very strong feeling which undoubtedly exists in the colony, both with regard to the amount of the contribution imposed and the manner of its imposition. It would surely have been well if the Secretary for State had taken notice of one of the three propositions made by my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock. This is a question of some importance, for we know that the feeling of every one who speaks on this subject in the colony—whether official or unofficial—is adverse to the action of the Government, and therefore it would be well if some concession could be made to their views. I can hardly see the general bearing of the Secretary of State's argument. No doubt the figures he quoted were interesting and instructive. The difficulty in Singapore has arisen from two circumstances: In the first place, an extremely high charge has been imposed in a somewhat violent manner; and, in the second place, that charge is felt to be very large in comparison with like charges imposed upon other Crown Colonies. I agree with the Secretary of State that it is impossible for the British Government to do all they desire with regard to the levying of these charges; but I view with grave apprehension the tendency which now exists in this House and out of it to impose from home charges equal with our own upon our colonial people. If that were attempted in the case of the self-governing colonies, we should, I am certain, soon lose their Imperial attachment. The Secretary of State in the figures he quoted compared the charge per head and the personal income in the colony with the military charges per head in this and other European countries, but he failed to give any figures showing the extent of the burden in our great representative colonies, which would have been a comparison far more applicable to the case. While I feel very strongly it is a bad thing to have dissatisfaction arise in the colonies, I do not desire to do anything which would have the effect of diminishing the charge upon the colonies at the expense of the taxpayers of this country. On the other hand, the most common good feeling towards our colonists would suggest that we should take all possible pains for the purpose of equalising the charges which they bear among themselves. The great grievance in this case is that the charge imposed upon Singapore is without parallel among the Crown Colonies, and that point in itself affords a ground for careful inquiry. I believe that much might be done if the question were brought under the purview of a Committee of this House. Right hon. Gentlemen opposite may not agree with that view, but I would ask them to remember that the inhabitants of this colony have for the most part lived in England, and have been accustomed to that consideration which our system of government necessarily involves. The speech of the Secretary of State to-night was not, perhaps, inappropriate to the time in which we happen to be, for it was a speech which might have been made by the greatest Emperor upon the face of the earth, and it conveyed no kind of intimation that the people of Singapore were entitled to any consideration whatever beyond the baldest discussion of the figures. I shall be glad if, before the Debate closes, something is said to show the people of Singapore that they will be treated with something like consideration by Her Majesty's Government.

*(9.40.) MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): I hope that before this Debate closes we shall have a few words from my right hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies. The Blue Book is full of interest. It shows that there was a wide divergence of opinion, not only between the colony and the Home Government, but in the Cabinet itself. There was a difference of opinion also equally marked between the Colonial Secretary and the Treasury and the War Office, and they were obliged to call in the Chancellor of the Exchequer to put matters right. The result was that the unfortunate Colonial Secretary was placed in a minority by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Secretary for War, and has been forced to accept their decision. The colony unanimously complained of what was proposed, and appealed to the Colonial Office, which supported the colony. The Colonial Office was outvoted by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Secretary for War. Now, we in this Committee ought to support the colony and the Colonial Office. The Colonial Office ought not to be made a mere Department either of the Treasury or of the War Office. Lord Knutsford informs us that the incidence of the contribution was fully considered by the various Departments concerned, and continues—

“As in the end a difference of opinion was found to exist between the Colonial Office, the Treasury, and the War Office, the matter was dealt with in confidence by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Secretary for War, and myself.”

Thus the unfortunate Secretary for the Colonies was sandwiched between the Secretary for War and the Chancellor of the Exchequer. We have reason to complain that the Colonial Office should have been forced to put pressure on the members of the Legislative Council of Singapore. This raises a very difficult and important question in regard to our attitude towards our Crown Colonies. Are the Legislative Assemblies to be absolutely controlled by the Home Government? It appears to me the true policy for us to pursue in our relations with the Crown Colonies is to deal with them as far as possible as if they possessed representative Government—as a Cabinet would deal with a representative Assembly, and I hold that it is most dangerous for us to override the local opinion of a colony. What has been done in this case reminds one of a Stuart King directing his Parliament what to do. Word was sent out from the Colonial Office to the Governor of this colony to carry this Vote at all hazards and against all opposition; the official members were compelled to support it, while the unofficial members were against it. It was carried by the casting vote of the Governor, and, therefore, became a case of absolute dictation, entirely out of harmony with English principles. I am sure that the protest which has been made in this Committee is a wise one, and I hope it will have the effect of moderating the dictatorial tendencies and sentiments of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Secretary of State for War.

(9.45.) MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, E.): I support the appeal of my hon. Friend. It is a remarkable fact that in this Debate the Committee have not yet heard anything positive from the Colonial Office on the question, and that the defence of the Government has been left to the Secretary for War, with the Chancellor of the Exchequer in close attendance. It is also a notable fact that this matter was first broached to the House by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his Budget speech in April last, when the right hon. Gentleman said the Government would appeal to the patriotism of the colonies on the subject, and that they were not disposed to deal with them in any niggardly spirit. It can hardly be said now that Singapore has been at all generously dealt with, and the colonists have, I think, strong ground for complaint. I regard the statements and arguments of the Secretary for War as very unsatisfactory, for they in no way adequately meet the case, or answer the complaint made by the colonists. Nothing has been urged in defence of the exaction—which is characterised by excessive meanness on the part of the Home Government—of a sum to make up the deficit arising from the exchange on silver in past years. I believe this is an addition to the increased contribution now demanded.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): No.

MR. BUCHANAN: I understood that the contribution of £100,000 was to be exacted from the colony, and that also there was £23,000 due to the Home Government on account of the loss on exchange.

Mr. Stanley Leighton

MR. GOSCHEN: The hon. Member is absolutely incorrect.

MR. BUCHANAN: I am sorry to have made the mistake, but I gathered from the Despatch of Sir Cecil Smith that the Government claims that the annual contribution hitherto fixed at £50,000 shall be paid in sterling or at the Treasury rate of exchange; and the Despatch goes on to say—

“Your Lordships and your Lordships’ predecessors have unceasingly represented how inequitable any such claim is on the colony, so I must despair of being listened to.”

*MR. GOSCHEN: He had been listened to already.

MR. BUCHANAN: That does not appear on the face of the Despatches. My hon. Friend alluded to the fact that this claim on the part of the Treasury for loss on exchange forms part of the arrangement which has been made.

*SIR T. SUTHERLAND: I certainly thought the demand for a lump sum on account of the loss on exchange was entirely apart from the increase of the annual contribution.

*MR. GOSCHEN: It is a just claim, a large part of which was waived out of deference to the views of the colonists, and in order to treat them as generously as possible.

MR. BUCHANAN: I am very glad to have elicited that explanation. As to the suggestion that the Home Government is entitled to demand this increased annual contribution by virtue of the terms of the arrangement of 1856, that is, I think, endeavouring to enforce the provisions of the agreement too stringently upon the weaker party to the contract.

MR. E. STANHOPE: We were accused of breach of faith, and it was only fair, therefore, to quote the essential points of that agreement.

MR. BUCHANAN: The agreement might have been perfectly fair then. Is it so now? It is well-known that this extra contribution has been exacted from Singapore because of the new ideas—the new condition of things that has sprung up in connection with the necessity of protecting, or defending, our Imperial coaling stations abroad, and there is this element of shabbiness about it—that the Government will not persist in the demand on colonies which can resist it, and has only done so in the case of Singapore, because that Crown Colony is powerless. Then there is the further argument as to the proportion which the sum of £100,000 bears to the present Revenue of the Straits Settlements. Sir Cecil Smith also deals with that. He points out clearly that the contribution now demanded is asked for because of the importance of Singapore; under the new scheme of Imperial defence; yet a burden is imposed on the whole Revenue of the Straits Settlements, which have really no interests in the fortifications at Singapore. Therefore, the only fair comparison would be the ratio of the £100,000 to the Revenue of Singapore alone. I would suggest to the Government that such an important subject as this should be dealt with as a question of general Imperial policy, and not as one affecting a particular station such as Singapore. With the general consent of the House of Commons, the Government have made various proposals for Imperial defence, and particularly for the defence of the coaling stations in the other hemisphere; and surely it is a matter to be settled on general principles how much of the necessary expenditure shall be borne by the Mother Country, and how much by the individual settlements where the fortifications are raised. I quite gathered from the Blue Book and other sources that, if the Government had brought forward this matter in a reasonable and temperate spirit, it would have been met in a similar way by Singapore; for, in proof of this, it may be stated that, after all the cause of irritation given, and notwithstanding the harsh and coercive manner in which this contribution has been forced upon them, the colonists passed resolutions, expressing their willingness to contribute one-half of the estimated expenditure—or £70,000 a year. I earnestly join in the hope expressed by the hon. Member for Greenock and other hon. Members, that some action in the matter will follow this Debate—that the Government will seriously take it in hand with a view to arriving at some settlement, either by a Committee of the House, or by investigation on the part of some other responsible body, so that, in the interests of the Empire, future differences with our colonies may be avoided.

(9.59.) MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): I do not propose to occupy the time of the House at any length, but I should like to point out that this matter raises a very important point, not only with regard to Singapore, but with regard to all the Crown Colonies, because it involves the question whether in future they are to be entirely at the mercy of the home authorities. It should be remembered that these colonies have no representative members, and it is very important that in all financial relations with them the Home Government should not err on the side of harshness, meanness, or injustice. They should not only avoid shabbiness of conduct, but should be careful not to create any impression that they are guilty of it. They draw a distinction between the defence of Singapore and the defence generally of the commercial interests of the British Empire in the East. They feel it is unjust that they should be called upon, not merely to defend themselves, but to pay the very large proportion which is thrown on them of the cost of the general protection of British commerce in the East. Upon the question at issue between the Home Government and the colony, there can be little doubt that the Home Government have erred; but it is not too late, even at the eleventh hour, for the Government to do that which the sense of justice of the Colony of Singapore demands. It is hardly a light matter that leading merchants of Singapore should be led to entertain doubts of the justice, not to speak of the generosity, of the Imperial Government. I feel quite sure there is no part of Her Majesty's dominions in which stronger Imperial instincts prevail than amongst society at Singapore, but the whole colony is up in arms against the Imperial Government, and I think the amount of money which the Chancellor of the Exchequer is going to get does not make it worth while to create such a sense of injustice which has been created in this case.

*(10.4.) MR. GOSCHEN: The colonists are happy in one respect—that when there is a dispute in a matter where Imperial and colonial interests are at issue they have sympathetic Members in this House to plead their case; but, on the other hand, when the Imperial view has to be put before the Colonial Council, there are no Members who are able to press the Imperial case in the same way. The hon. Member has spoken with regard to the merchants of Singapore. They pay no Income Tax, no Customs Duties; they are taxed more lightly than merchants in almost any other part of the world. In fact, they pay scarcely any taxes at all. It is a most natural thing on their part that they should vote or agitate against the demand made by the Imperial Government. It is said that if we impose a larger contribution upon the colony they will have to find new taxes, and that they hope, at all events, the demand made upon them will be final. Contrast with that the position of the English taxpayer. Government cannot give them any guarantee that the payments they make will be final, and when it is necessary that increased expenditure should be incurred, Government is obliged sometimes to have recourse to new taxes. It appears to be entirely forgotten that defence costs infinitely more than it did. Every single item of military expenditure costs more than it used to do. The hon. Member for West Edinburgh thinks the offer of the Singapore people a generous one. They paid £50,000 in the year 1860, when their revenues were £200,000; now their revenues are £600,000. The hon. Member thinks it generous, when the revenues are three times as great and everything connected with military expenditure costs twice as much, that the colonists should offer to pay the same as they paid 30 years ago. I do not think that is an offer which is adequate to the occasion. I deny that the speech of my right hon. Friend was wanting in sympathy with the colonies, but surely it is right to put before the House of Commons fairly what the case is as between one set of taxpayers and the other. Having looked carefully into the matter, the Government found that whether we take population, or revenue, or any other test, the colonists of Singapore paid infinitely less than almost any other community. I can assure hon. Members, while I wish to be just to the taxpayers of this country, I have at the same time borne in mind that the colonists are not represented in this House, and that, therefore, there ought to be extreme care taken in fixing the sums that should be charged. I regret the feeling of dissatisfaction in the colony, and, as far as the Government are concerned, I do not wish to add a single word which may embitter the controversy; on the contrary, the Government wish to express their appreciation of the efforts which the colonists have so far made, but I do not think we have gone one jot beyond the fair justice of the case in the demands which we have made upon the colony. This is not the view of one Department or another, but of the Government as a whole, acting upon their responsibility, and after careful consideration of the circumstances of each particular colony. I do not think we are called upon to retreat from the decision we have taken, but in order to meet the view of the hon. Member for Greenock, if the revenues of the colony should decrease, if they are less able to bear this contribution than they now are, the Government will be inclined to review the situation. At present the demand of the Imperial Government is made in the full conviction that they are attempting to draw the proper line between the claims of the British taxpayer and those of the colonists.

Ayes 44; Noes 112.—(Div. List, No. 344.)

Original Question again proposed.

*(10.21.) MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to move the reduction of the salary of the Secretary of State for the Colonies by the sum of £200, with a view to calling the attention of the Committee to the administration of the island of Ceylon, and especially to the system of taxation which prevails in the island. Ceylon is about five-sixths the size of Ireland, and, in proportion to its size, it is almost as thickly populated. There are at present nearly 3,000,000 people on the island. Notwithstanding its fertility, it is not able to grow sufficient food for its own consumption. In the year 1888 the visible food supply for the year consisted of 8,600,000 bushels of paddy (i.e., rice in the husk), locally grown, which is equal to half that amount, or 4,300,000 bushels of clean rice. In addition the food supply included imported rice to the amount of 6,600,000 bushels; fine grain (kurak kan) 900,000 bushels; and peas, 35,000 bushels; making a total of 11,835,000 bushels. There is, consequently, scarcely an allowance of four bushels apiece for the bulk of the population. This is only half rations; eight bushels is the proper allowance for health. The dietary for prisoners in the gaols exceeds seven bushels of rice besides other things, the penal diet being eight bushels without other things. This being the actual state of things as regards the food supply, what does the British Government do? It raises one-fifth of the gross revenue, or three-eighths of the net revenue of the island, in the form of taxes upon necessary food. In 1887, the tax on imported rice was 1,800,000 rupees, and the tax on home-grown paddy 975,000 rupees. This is an iniquitous and intolerable state of things that ought no longer to be endured. Fifty years ago the corn laws were in force in this country. They were an intolerable wrong, but the state of things still prevailing in Ceylon is infinitely worse than was the state of things prevailing in this country during the existence of the Corn Laws. We were satisfied to place an Import Duty on foreign corn. In Ceylon we not only place an Import Duty on rice imported into the country, but we tax the home-grown rice as well. It is mainly with the Paddy Tax that I am now and here more particularly concerned. This tax is of British origin. Before the British occupation taxation had been levied on all sorts and descriptions of property in the island, but by proclamation, dated 18th November, 1818, a tax on paddy only was established at 1-10th its yearly yield. In 1840 the British Government introduced the farming system, the Paddy Tax of the different districts being put up to auction to the highest bidder. This gave rise to the grossest extortion and abuse, and was succeeded by the commutation system some 20 years ago. The tax which had formerly been paid in kind was now paid in money, and the goiya, or peasant cultivator of Ceylon, was now obliged to pay whether the crop was good or bad, and whether the land was under cultivation or not. The amount of the tax was also raised. In the Uva district, for every 100 rupees of the tax in kind in 1818, the peasantry had now to pay 350 rupees in money. Within about 30 years the Paddy Tax has been increased in the Colombo district by 145 per cent., in the Kandy district by 149 per cent., in the Matalé by 73 per cent., in Matara by 105 per cent., in Trincomalee by 108 per cent., and yet the cultivated area has not increased in these localities. The tax has every vice which it is possible for a tax to have. In the first place it is a tax on food, and taxes upon the necessities of life; as Adam Smith has well said, have nearly the same effect upon the circumstances of the people as a poor soil and a bad climate. Hon. Members will remember that the author of Wealth of Nations lays down four canons with which every good tax ought to comply, and it is easy to show that this tax violates them one and all. The first of Adam Smith's maxims is this—

“The subjects of every State ought to contribute towards the support of the Government as nearly as possible in proportion to their respective abilities; that is, in proportion to the revenue which they respectively enjoy under the protection of the State.”

The Paddy Tax is levied in flagrant violation of this first and most essential principle of all just taxation. The inhabitants of Ceylon are, as I have already stated, nearly 3,000,000 in number; the paddy growers, on the other hand, are only 430,187, or about one-seventh of the whole. Paddy is the only agricultural produce in the island upon which tithe is levied. The rich planters and tea growers escape scot free, the whole weight of the tax falling on the poorest portion of the population, and this in face of the fact that the remaining burdens upon the paddy growers are so great that even when the Grain Taxes are repealed they will still be the most heavily taxed of any of the people in proportion to their means. The second principle of sound taxation is that—

“The tax which each individual is bound to pay ought to be certain, and not arbitrary.”

Now the Paddy Tax, as we have seen, has been raised in the most capricious and arbitrary fashion. One of the assistant Government Agents, Mr. Le Mesurier, says the cause of the great default in payment of commutation has been twofold; the over assessment of the production of the fields, and the high rates enforced per bushel. The third principle of taxation is that—

"Every tax ought to be levied at the time, or in the manner in which it is most likely to be convenient for the contributor to pay it."

Here, again, the Paddy Tax is at fault. It is an annual tax levied whatever the state of the crop, and whether the land has been cultivated or not. The work of the Grain Commissioner in the Uva district revealed the fact that there were instances in which men had paid tax for 10 years without once realising a crop. These payments were made from coffee, not from paddy. When there was a failure of the coffee crop widespread destitution ensued. In 1883 the coffee exported amounted to 307,530 cwts.; in 1888 it had fallen to 137,793 cwts. Lastly—

"Every tax ought to be so contrived as both to take out and to keep out of the pockets of the people as little as possible over and above what it brings into the Public Treasury of the State."

From this point of view the Paddy Tax is a bad tax, because the cost of collecting it amounts to at least 20 per cent. of the tax itself. The tax, then, being of such an odious and abominable character, it is not surprising to learn that the worst possible consequences have followed from its exaction. In the year 1864 the Agent for the North-West Province sent in a Report showing that during the year 1860-61 8,000 people died of starvation, and the diseases engendered thereby, in his district in six months. Again, during the last few years the Ceylon Government sold up and evicted from their lands 85,380 people, and dispossessed them of 29,182 ancestral acres for 71,551 rupees due for arrears of Grain Tax—that is to say, for the paltry sum of about 5s. each person. The people have died by hundreds and by thousands in consequence of the brutality and inhumanity of the British Government.

*SIR J. COLOMB: What is the date to which the hon. Member refers?

*MR. SUMMERS: From 1882 to 1885. Another statement given us on the authority of a Government official is that in 1882-5, in the Newara Eliya district alone, 1,048 owners of paddy lands died of starvation. We are responsible. I hold that the British Government and this House are responsible for the deaths of these men, women, and children.

Mr. Summers

"You take my house, when you do take the prop

That doth sustain my house; you take my life,
When you do take the means whereby I live."

The Government have taken from these poor people their means of livelihood. I do not speak of this, or indeed of any, particular Government; all Governments have sinned in this matter. Ceylon is governed despotically. It has, no doubt, a Legislative Council, but this Council is only a consultative body, it has no power of initiative. The Legislative Council is composed of the Governor and 10 of his officials, and of seven gentlemen, not officials, who are nominated by the Governor. None of these non-official members may raise any question in Council which entails a money vote or might lead to one; and no official member may speak or vote except as the Governor permits. Everything depends upon the Governor and the Secretary of State for the Colonies. They have only to speak the word and an end will be put to a gross wrong, and right will be done at last to some of the poorest, humblest, and most deserving of Her Majesty's subjects. I beg to move the reduction of the Vote by £200.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That Item A, Salaries, be reduced by £200, part of the Salary of the Secretary of State."—(Mr. Summers.)

*(10.40.) MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): I must say I had hoped, after what passed in this House some few months ago, that by this time, at any rate, a considerable step would have been taken in the direction indicated by my hon. Friend. It seems to me that this question of the Paddy Tax in Ceylon has somewhat akin in its nature to the course of an intermittent fever; it has its hot and cold phases, and, at the present time, we have entered upon a cold phase of the question, I fear. I judge this, because when I asked a short time ago whether any advance had been made towards a settlement, I was told that, though it had been under the consideration of the Government, nothing had been decided upon in this "very complicated question." As a partisan of the Government of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, I should be satisfied if the honour and credit of settling this matter did not fall to the present Government; but having visited Ceylon, and knowing the condition of the Cingalese labourer, I feel it is a matter too urgent for even that short delay, and I would prefer that it should be settled now immediately by the right hon. Gentleman now sitting opposite and his Party, so as not to prolong the hardships under which the Paddy-grinder suffers. For my own part, I cannot see any cause for such long delay. There must be tons of correspondence on the subject in the Colonial Office, and I am quite at a loss to understand what it is which prevents the settlement of so simple a question, involving only £75,000 a year of revenue. To the great ability of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, who not long ago bore, Atlas like, the immense burden of the Sugar Bounties question, I am sure the solution of so simple a matter as the Paddy Tax can present no great difficulty. In Ceylon there are only a few fanatics and fossils remaining who defend the tax. Even the planters, whose interests are not all on the side of a change of taxation, have very greatly changed their position, having been touched by the miseries depicted in the Reports of the Government Agents—Mr. Le Mesurier and Mr. Fisher. I need not enter at length into the Reports of these gentlemen, because the House has on various occasions been put in possession of the facts. I will only mention from Mr. Fisher's Report the fact that 3,244 fields have been sold within five years, or 22½ per cent. of the paddy fields in his—the Uva—district, 2,950 head of families, and estimating each family to consist of five, 15,750 villagers have been thus deprived of the means of livelihood, or 49 per cent. of the whole population of the district. Mr. Moir did not exaggerate when he said that in his district 1,689 fields out of 2,780 had been alienated and sold by the Government for arrears of taxes? But very recent information the Government has at hand to show the impoverishment among the paddy growers. The Census Returns for 1891 show to what an enormous extent villagers have been driven away by eviction and want to the tea plantations. It is difficult, without local knowledge, to picture all the evils that result from this driving of the heads of the families from their native villages. Wives and children are deserted, destitution and gross immorality prevail. It appears from the Census returns that in the Central province the population has diminished 10 per cent. in the villages, and on the estates it has increased 20 per cent. In the Kandy district the decrease in the village population has been 11 per cent., and the increase on the estates 32 per cent. The transference of population is obviously the result of bad times and the continued exactions of the tax collector. The fact is that rice cultivators in the island can only obtain a miserable livelihood, and yet upon this class falls almost the whole burden of taxation on produce. It is said sometimes that money has been made out of rice cultivation, and that it is an industry that pays well; but from actual experiments made, Mr. White, the well-known planter, declares that the cultivation cannot pay. The only way in which a profit can be made is by the usual method adopted by the Moormen and others, who buy the land, settle families of Cingalese upon it, and reserve to themselves the right of supplying food, implements, and seed, all at a profit of 50 per cent. Only by half-starving himself can the "goiya," or labourer, eke out an existence. By working 100 days, he gets eight or ten bushels of paddy, equal to 15s. or 16s. A miserable result for 100 days' labour. Mr. Wall, the well-known editor of the Ceylon Independent, has made a calculation of the incidence of taxation in terms of days on heads of families, and he has taken four different classes in Ceylon and estimated the percentage of day's income per year a man of each class gives to pay his share of the taxation. The "goiya," paid in kind equal to 10 cents a day, has to work 52 days to pay his share of taxation, the goiya earning wages works 46 days, persons in receipt of incomes of 500 rupees a year 11 days, and those in receipt of 1,000 rupees pay 5·90 days income. When reduced to averages it works out that the goiya works 14·4 per cent. of the total days of the year, the goiya earning wages 13 per cent., the person with an income of 500 rupees annually 3 per cent., and the recipient of an income of 1,000 rupees a year 1·6 per cent. of the 365 days of the year. So it appears the class most heavily taxed is that to which the poorest agricultural labourers belong. I am glad to think that since I was in Ceylon, four or five months ago, there has been a decided advance shown in the expression of public opinion. The present Governor—Sir Arthur Havelock—may be claimed as on the side of those who propose the abolition of the Paddy Tax. Speaking at a public breakfast at Dimbula, at which he was entertained by planters, he used these words, in which he referred, though indirectly, to the Paddy Tax—

“I am not aware of any particular obstacle in the way of the progress of the planting interests that Government could at present help to remove, nor can I think of any special advantages which the Government, with due regard to other interests could just now fairly give to the planting enterprise. If the planting industry were an industry that hardly paid its own way; if it were an industry that hardly left any margin of profit and which only succeeded in keeping body and soul together; if that industry were subject to a heavy impost to which no other industry or undertaking in the country that I know of is subject; if the result of the collection of that impost has been the leaving of their homes by hundreds, I might say thousands of families who have had to quit their holdings on account of forced sales of their land, and have had to seek their living as best as they can, some in unaccustomed and menial labour, and others in the paths of crime and vice or of dishonour, then I should say that it was the duty of the Government to do all it can to remove that impost, even though it might cost some little sacrifice of revenue—even though while removing it, it might be necessary to throw overboard some of the axioms and theories of financiers—even though it might be proved that that impost had existed and had been endured since the time of Noah, of Wivjavo, or of Buddha.”

Obviously Sir Arthur Havelock was referring to the paddy growers, and the reference was so understood by the Observer, for that paper animadverted severely upon the phases I have just read. But I am glad to think that the Observer, which may be said to hold in Ceylon the position the Times does here, recognises the justice of our claims, for I find the Observer making use of these remarks—

“The Government have mitigated the paddy evy again and again; they have in a very slight degree, and as regards the abolition of this ‘rent,’ or tax, the rich are, we believe, ready for the change to-morrow, and to go in for a general land levy which can alone supersede both our local food or grain taxes.”

Again, I find the Observer saying—

“We have told Mr. Schwann and other visitors a thousand times that the Ceylon planters are, if need be, ready for a general land tax, or any re-arrangement of taxation at any time; but what native, or native organ, in Ceylon has ever, or will ever, support a general land tax?”

Of course, those who are only subject to a light Road Tax of 1 rupee 80 cents do not look forward to a new tax with any pleasure, and as Burke said, “It is as difficult to tax and to please, as to love and be wise.” What substitutes may be found for the Paddy Tax? A general light Land Tax, exempting small holdings. Out of 25,000 square miles in the Island there are 574,000 acres under paddy, and 643,641 acres under cocoanut trees, the latter constitutes the most profitable form of cultivation, though no tax whatever is imposed upon it. Then, again, an Income Tax, which has been applied by able financiers throughout India, could surely be applied without much difficulty to a small Island like Ceylon. The duty on spirits might be raised. It is only 4 rupees 50 cents in Ceylon, while in many colonies it is 10s. or more per gallon. It would not be difficult to impose a light Export Duty on tea, the export of which has increased in four years from 14,000,000 to 44,000,000 lbs. A very small duty on this would produce a large revenue. But I do not wish to detain the House with suggestions. I hope that before the House meets again next Session the Government will have done themselves the honour of removing the weight of taxation which now presses so heavily upon this suffering and industrious population.

*MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: I have always considered this the very worst tax that could be imposed, for it is raised on a necessary of life and falls on the poorest part of the population, while it is exceedingly expensive to raise. It is a tax wrung from the poorest part of the population, and, as I gather from the pamphlet on the subject published by Mr. Salmon, the tax amounts to 13 or 14 per cent. on an average income of £6 a year. It is no wonder that the land is going out of cultivation. Mr. Salmon states that in one district out of 18,848 fields, 2,889, or 15 per cent., were sold in four years, owing to the inability of the cultivators to pay the tax, and besides that, a large number of other farms had to be abandoned. Statistics show that in the districts where the Paddy Tax presses most hardly upon the cultivators there have been appalling starvation and misery. I do not wish to attach the blame to any particular Government, for Liberal Governments have been as much to blame as Conservative Governments in continuing this tax, but a change has taken place in the views of the authorities themselves, and I think the time has come when a determined effort should be made to substitute for it some more fair and equal tax, which will not press so heavily on the poorest part of the population. A light Income Tax might well be substituted for it. That is paid throughout India; why, therefore, should it not be paid in Ceylon? The means of finding a substitute must be left to the Government of the day, but I do press most earnestly on the right hon. Gentleman that the time has come when something should be done to relieve these wretched people who, as it is, have hard work to keep body and soul together, from one of the most unjust taxes that can be conceived.

*(11.4.) BARON H. DE WORMS: I can assure the right hon. Gentleman and hon. Gentlemen who have spoken that Her Majesty's Government, to a great extent, share the views they have expressed. The hon. Member for Huddersfield was incorrect in stating that the tax was introduced by the British Government, for I have here a Report which states that when England took possession of the island the land was liable to contribute to the general revenue of the State, and that this tax was instituted in the year 500 of the Christian era. It has been continuously reduced during the occupation of the island by the English. While sympathising with hon. Gentlemen opposite, and agreeing that this tax is hard on the poorer population, the Government have to consider a very important question, namely, the means of raising an amount of revenue equal to this tax should it be abolished. That question has presented itself to many Governments. Up to the present time no Government has succeeded in solving the problem of how to raise an equal amount by other means. It is easy to suggest Income Tax and taxes upon cocoanuts and tea, but it is certainly doubtful whether the people of Ceylon would receive any of those suggestions with any considerable amount of enthusiasm. It has been said that a vast number of persons have been compelled to leave their lands in consequence of the impossibility of paying the Paddy Tax, and have perished from starvation. The Secretary of State has inquired carefully into the subject, and is convinced that the circumstances have been greatly exaggerated. The population statistics are the strongest evidence of this. In two districts where the mortality is said to have been specially high the statistics show that whereas a few years before the population was 10,564 and 15,700 respectively, in 1888 it rose to 10,938 and 16,341. That leads to the conclusion that there can not have been much diminution in the population from deaths in those districts. To make good the deficit that would be caused by the abolition of the Paddy Tax a very considerable amount of revenue must be raised. It would be necessary to reconstitute the whole system of taxation in the island. From 1881 to 1885 this question was under the consideration of the Colonial Office under the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, and I observe that the same difficulties that presented themselves to the present Government presented themselves to that Government; and when the hon. Member for Manchester says he thinks that we ought to have solved the question during the past three months, I would remind him that this is not a question that the present Government alone has had to deal with, but which generations of Governments, so to speak, have had to face. One-third of the taxation of the island is derived from these taxes on grain.

MR. SCHWANN: My argument was that, for the sake of humanity, the Government be prepared even to depart from the recognised principles of political economy.

BARON H. DE WORMS: I do not say it is impossible to supply the place of this tax, but I say it is a matter which requires very grave consideration. The Governor of Ceylon has been instructed to inquire into the whole subject. Her Majesty's Government are waiting for this Report, and as soon as it is received we shall do our utmost to do away with a tax which we regard as a hard one, and one to some extent unjust.

(11.10.) SIR E. WATKIN (Hythe): Having been in Ceylon two or three years ago, and having made inquiries in regard to this matter, I must say that I regard the Paddy Tax as one of the most scandalous taxes in existence. The Government have never fairly looked into the question at all. I have heard answers given from the Front Bench opposite which have convinced me that that is the case. The tax bears most heavily on the poorer part of the population, every spoonful of paddy eaten by a child in the island having to pay its proportion of the tax. The question is one of humanity, and not of political economy at all. As a mere question of humanity it ought to be abolished, for it conduces to the starvation of the people. I must say I am astonished to see the state of the Treasury Bench to-night. We are not dealing with the luxuries of the rich, but with the misery and starvation of the poor under our protection in Ceylon, and there are the Members of the Government, or rather, there they are not. I thank the hon. Member for Huddersfield for having brought this question forward. I hope Her Majesty's Government will have the courage to appoint a Commission to thoroughly investigate the whole matter, and I feel sure that if they do, such Commission will condemn this iniquity which has been permitted for so long.

*SIR G. CAMPBELL: I desire to dissociate myself from the suggestion of the hon. Member for Manchester that the Import Duty on rice should be retained. I am surprised that the suggestion should come from Manchester of all places in the world. I earnestly hope the Paddy Tax will be abolished. It now replaces the old Land Tax, which fell upon the rich, and which has been abolished owing to the pressure of that influential oligarchy which is to be found in all our Crown Colonies. They have shifted the taxes from themselves and imposed them on the food of the lowest and poorest of the people. The Paddy Tax ought to be abolished and an equitable Land Tax re-established. That would bear on all alike—whether the rich cultivators of tea and cocoa or the poor growers of rice.

(11.16.) MR. S. HOARE (Norwich): We are all agreed that if possible the Paddy Tax should be altered, but I do hope that the suggestions of the hon. Member for Manchester will not be allowed to pass without notice in this House. I am astonished at the hon. Member suggesting the imposition of an Income Tax and an Export Duty on tea. I wonder what the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. Picton) would have said to that if he had been present. Ceylon is only just emerging from financial difficulties due to the failure of the coffee crop, and I should be very sorry to see an Export Duty on tea, which would diminish the export of tea, thereby injuring the colony, and at the same time increasing the price of an article in this country of universal consumption among the poorer classes.

Sir E. Watkin

Original Question again proposed.

*(11.28.) MR. S. SMITH (Flintshire): Before we pass from this subject I wish to deal with a matter several times referred to to-night, namely, the main source of revenue in Singapore, the Straits Settlements, Hong Kong, and other Crown Colonies along the Asiatic coast. That source of revenue is the sale of opium. That trade is very demoralising. There is a strong feeling growing up among the natives in those colonies against our policy of multiplying opium dens among them for the sake of revenue. We have crowded Singapore and Hong Kong with opium dens, and all the British settlements along the Asiatic coast have become contaminated, and I wish to protest against such policy. I would call attention to a Petition from Singapore, signed by 11,000 residents and sent to this House last year. That Petition refers to the terrible effects of opium smoking among the thousands of Chinese in the colonies, and prays the British Administration to lessen the facilities for carrying on a traffic in this pernicious drug. On behalf of the people of Singapore I wish to call the attention of the House to this Petition, and to point out the havoc we are causing by the enormous multiplication of the number of opium dens in that unhappy place. We are told that of late years the revenue of Singapore has been trebled; that it has risen from £200,000 to £600,000. Yes; but how has that great increase taken place? By multiplying the number of opium dens and stimulating the consumption of the drug, thereby demoralising tens of thousands of the population. And the same thing has happened in Hong Kong. There, again, we draw our chief revenue by ministering to the vices of the people. A Petition was sent from Hong Kong last year, and it was supported by nearly all the native churches. It points out the evils arising from the trade in opium, and it prays the Government to restrict the importation. I think the House will be very hard-hearted if it pays no attention to these appeals. Had this been a matter touching the pockets of European merchants there would have been a tremendous noise about it; but as it only injuriously affects the welfare of millions of poor natives little notice is taken of these appeals. The Government will not trouble itself about the moral and physical welfare of these people; it studies only the pecuniary advantage of the European colony. I do appeal to them, however, to do something to limit a traffic which inflicts ruin and misery on thousands and tens of thousands of our fellow-subjects.

(11.34.) MR. M. STEWART (Kirkcudbright): I wish to emphasise what has fallen from the hon. Member for Flintshire. I think that the Petitions referred to by the hon. Member show that there is a strong feeling in these colonies against the existing state of things with regard to the opium traffic. I trust that this question will be narrowly watched, not only by the Government, but by Parliament, and that a real effort will be made to reduce the evils of the opium traffic as far as possible in Singapore and other colonies. At Singapore it is not only the Chinese who are victims to this terrible vice; even Europeans are falling into the pernicious habit.

*MR. GOSCHEN: No notice has been given to my right hon. Friend that this important question was going to be brought up, but it will be brought under the notice of Lord Knutsford. Of course the question is extremely important, both socially and financially, and I am sure that the Committee will not wish any rash action to be taken on the matter. I will now earnestly ask the Committee to allow this Vote to be taken, as a considerable time has been occupied in the discussion of the very important questions raised. I do not say that the Debate has been unduly prolonged, but I am sure hon. Members on both sides are anxious to make progress with the business of the Committee.

*MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): I have no wish to prolong the discussion. I wish, however, to ask two questions, not out of curiosity, but for reasons which will make themselves manifest on a future occasion. I desire information as to the office hours of the First and Second Division clerks in the Colonial Office and also of the messengers and workmen. I want to know at what hour they commence, how long is allowed for refreshment, and at what hour they finish? I ask for this question during Supply, because if I had moved for a Parliamentary Return it would probably have been refused me. I also wish to give notice that I propose on all the subsequent Votes affecting other Government Departments to ask for similar information.

*(11.40.) BARON H. DE WORMS: I shall be happy to give the information either in reply to a question or on the Report.

*MR. CREMER: I should prefer to have the information on the Report. I think I should be more likely to get definite information than if I put a question.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I do not think my hon. Friend ought to be satisfied with that undertaking. I take it that promises are often given to supply information on Report with the hope that as Report is taken after midnight the hon. Member desiring it may chance to be absent from the House. I think it is our duty to insist on having the information as to the hours the clerks in Public Offices work. We know that in some Departments they have a very easy time, and we ought to see that the country gets money's worth for the salary paid to them. I shall take a Division on this matter, even if I am the only Member to challenge it. I therefore hope the right hon. Gentleman will, even now, give us a specific statement.

(11.45.) MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I wish to ask a few questions. We certainly have had a long Debate on this Vote, but we have not yet commenced to analyse the figures. Under Sub-head A I find the case of a first-class clerk who is a major in the Yeomanry. When he goes on his annual training he receives 19s. a day, and an allowance for forage. Is any deduction made from his salary of £800 while he is away from the office on this training? Then I see that one of the chief clerks gets £100 a year for emigration business. Is that in addition to his salary of £1,000 a year, and, if so, does he do the emigration work out of office hours? Under Sub-head B there is an item, Emigrants' Information Office £500 "expenses of management, &c.," and £150 rent. Why are not the details set out in the same way as the Votes for other Offices? Can the Under Secretary for the Colonies explain the items? What is the meaning of "etcetera?" Is it, as a celebrated individual once found out, "sherry and biscuits?" I hope my hon. Friend will persist in securing the information he desires as to the hours of labour of the employés in Government Offices. I think sometimes they are too short, for I remember that when I went to one office on public business before 11 o'clock the clerks were very angry indeed with me.

*(11.50.) BARON H. DE WORMS: As to the Emigrants' Information Office, the £500 is for salaries of clerks and caretakers.

MR. MORTON: How about the Yeomanry officer?

BARON H. DE WORMS: He is absent only six days at the training, and I am not aware that any deduction is made from his salary on that account. As to the other gentleman, the emigration is something outside his ordinary duties, and of course he receives extra remuneration for it.

MR. MORTON: Why is not the staff of the Emigrants' Information Office set out as that of other offices?

*(11.51.) BARON H. DE WORMS: I cannot say; I have nothing to do with that.

SIR J. COLOMB: If the hon. Member will look to the Report of the Colonisation Committee he will get full details.

MR. MORTON: I say the details ought to appear in this Vote.

(11.52.) Question put, and agreed to.

Resolution to be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £11,009, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1892, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Department of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council and for Quarantine Expenses."

DR. CLARK: On this question I wish to ask whether it was not the intention of the Government when the Board of Agriculture was formed to take the £2,000 put down for the salary of the President of the Council and devote it to the Minister of Agriculture by way of salary? I certainly gathered there was an understanding to that effect. We shall have to take a Division on it; but it will be more convenient to do so when we come to the Vote for the Minister of Agriculture.

MR. CREMER: I wish to put a question as to the hours of the clerks and workmen in this Department. I wish also to get an explanation of the item of £50—"allowance to the purveyor of luncheons." A similar item occurs in other Votes, and I wish to know if it is an allowance to make up a loss on the sale of refreshments?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I will endeavour to get the information asked for by the hon. Member on the Report stage. If he will put a question as to the allowance of the purveyor of luncheons I will also explain that.

MR. CREMER: I will do so.

(11.58.) MR. MORTON: I also wish to draw attention to this allowance to the luncheon purveyor. There is an item for a similar purpose (but only for £25) in the Home Office Vote. Why is a large sum given to the comparatively small Office of the Privy Council? I should like an answer as to that.

It being Midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

Resolution to be reported to-morrow; Committee also report Progress; to sit again to-morrow.

EVIDENCE BILL [LORDS].—(No. 335.)
COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

SIR H. DAVEY (Stockton): I beg to move that this Bill be sent to a Select Committee. It cannot be adequately discussed in Committee of the whole House, and therefore I beg to move that the Order now read be discharged, and the Bill referred to a Select Committee.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I object.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): How long does the hon. Gentleman the Member for Stockton think the Bill would take in Committee? Could it pass this Session?

SIR H. DAVEY: It is not my Bill, it is a Government Bill; but I hope my hon. Friend the Member for Longford will not press his objection.

MR. T. M. HEALY: As long as I am a Member of this House I shall object to this Bill.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I think the hon. Member for Longford is under a misapprehension.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I object.

SIR R. WEBSTER: May I explain—

MR. T. M. HEALY: I object.

SIR R. WEBSTER: If I may—

MR. T. M. HEALY: I object. I rise to a point of Order. I wish to know if the Debate can be proceeded with in the face of the objection taken?

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General is entitled to explain or to make an appeal. Of course, Opposed Business cannot be proceeded with.

SIR R. WEBSTER: I only wish to say that the objection which the hon. Member takes to the Bill is founded on a suggestion made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton that a certain clause should be inserted. But the Leader of the House told the right hon. Gentleman that if that proposal were pressed the Bill could not be passed. The Bill, as now presented, does not make the alteration of the law to which the hon. Member for Longford objects. I agree with the suggestion to send the Bill to a Select Committee.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I presume I may be allowed to reply to the speech of the Attorney General. I have for the last eight years successfully prevented any Bill of this kind passing into law, and so long as any objection of mine will prevail it will be made. I remember the triumphant statement of the Chief Secretary that he intended to cram this Bill down our throats; but capacious as those throats are he has not succeeded in cramming it down as yet.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): The Attorney General told us on the occasion of the Second Reading that this was a Consolidation Bill making no change in the law. But the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton is seeking to introduce what we think an obnoxious provision, and the Government also are proposing to resist a Motion that the Bill do not extend to Ireland. So long as that is their attitude we shall object to the Bill.

Committee deferred till Thursday next.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES, 1891-2.

Resolution [10th July] reported.

CLASS II.

"That a sum, not exceeding £46,015, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1892, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Department of Her Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs."

Resolution agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Committee deferred till Wednesday.

TRAINING COLLEGES (IRELAND)

[LOANS].

Resolution reported.

"That it is expedient to authorise the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of any annuity that may be created for the repayment of any Loan made by the Irish Land Commission under any Act of the present Session, to provide for the Re-imbursement to Training Colleges in Ireland of certain past expenditure on their Sites, Buildings, Appurtenances, Premises, and Fixtures."

Resolution agreed to.

FISHERIES BILL [LORDS].—(No. 406.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I object.

MR. ROWNTREE (Scarborough): I appeal earnestly to the hon. Member not to object. The Bill is an important one in the interests of the east coast fishermen, and I hope it may be allowed to pass with as little delay as possible.

DR. TANNER: I have objected because no explanation has been given of the provisions of the Bill.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I did make an explanation on the Second Reading, but I think the hon. Member was not in his place. This is merely a Bill to carry into effect provisions which will prove advantageous to English fishermen. It does not affect the Irish fisheries.

DR. TANNER: Under the circumstances, I will not press my objection. I have only just returned from Carlow, where I have been opposing the Tory friends of the right hon. Gentleman, and as I could not be in two places at once I missed the explanation. I hope that the Chief Secretary for Ireland will take cognisance of this, for I have on the Paper a Bill for the benefit of Irish fishermen, and hope it will be allowed to pass.

Bill considered in Committee, and reported; as amended, to be considered to-morrow.

HIGHWAYS AND BRIDGES BILL.

(No. 384.)

Read the third time, and passed.

STATUTORY RULES PROCEDURE (RE-COMMITTED) BILL.—(No. 397.)

Considered in Committee, and reported; as amended, to be considered upon Friday.

BETTING AND LOANS (INFANTS) BILL [LORDS.]—(No. 367.)

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): I am sorry to oppose this Bill, but I feel bound to do so as it creates new offences, and, in fact, repeats some of the worst features of the Conspiracy Law, to which we on this side of the House so strongly object. I do not think it would be easy to amend it, so I hope it will not be persisted in. I beg to move to report Progress.

SIR H. DAVEY (Stockton): I hope the objection will be withdrawn. The Bill was carefully considered in another place; it has the support of Lord Herschell, and any Amendments the hon. Member may put down shall be carefully considered. Although the Bill has been before the House several weeks not a single Amendment has been put down.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I hope that the Bill will be allowed to proceed. It makes the very minimum of alteration in the law, and it is absolutely necessary that there should be some stringent remedy for the evils which the Bill deals with. It is admitted on all hands that great mischief is done by offering inducements to young people and persons in employment to bet and gamble, and surely the hon. Member sympathises with any effort to get rid of that evil.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: The Attorney General says the Bill does not go very far, but it goes this distance: it makes it a crime to send to an undergraduate at Oxford or Cambridge information as to a coming race on which betting or wagering is customary, while that undergraduate is quite at liberty to bet on the race if he chooses. The Bill also establishes violent presumptions against the persons at whom its provisions are aimed. It is a departure from sound principles of legislation, it will have to be carefully considered, more so here than in the other House, and as we cannot go into it thoroughly at this time of the night I must press my Motion to report Progress.

Question put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.

EAST INDIA (COLLEGES OF RURKI, SEEBPUR, POONA, AND MADRAS.)

Address for—

"Return showing the Capital Cost of each of the four Colleges of Rurki, Seebpur, Poona, and Madras; the Annual Expenditure and Amount of the Return in the shape of Fees in each case; and, the number of Annual Government Appointments from each of these Colleges."—(Mr. King.)

ALIEN IMMIGRATION.

PURCHASE OF LAND AND CONGESTED DISTRICTS (IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 229.)

THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading, read.

Moved, “That the Bill be now read 3^a.”

LORD DENMAN: My Lords, having given notice of opposition to this Bill, I have to apologise for leading what appears to be a forlorn hope, but from 1870 to the present time I have constantly protested against the principle of Land Purchase as introduced by Mr. Bright, who, at the same time, was such a depreciator of the value of land that he made it almost impossible for tenants to hold their own. Having an interest in Ireland, and having constantly been there, I do assure your Lordships I do not think that this Bill will produce anything more than continued litigation between tenants and their landlords. I believe that the landlords may be reconciled to their tenants, and that the union between them is one of the greatest possible advantage to both. In the year 1870, I think there was a large majority in this House for the retention of the old glebes. The great Duke of Abercorn told me there was a private meeting at the house of the Marquess of Bath, and that it was agreed to abandon the opposition to the Bill on the ground of wishing to retain those glebes. That resulted in the noble Marquess, who is now at the head of the Government, assuming the place of defender of the Irish Church, but the late Earl of Derby was taken entirely by surprise. He was Leader of the Opposition, and I owed allegiance to him, and to see him walk out of the House, and say there is no occasion for him to remain any longer, was the most painful sight I ever witnessed, and my life has been a very long one. The Press has entirely suppressed my opposition to this Bill by entirely excluding my speeches, although I know they can hear me exceedingly well. But I do not speak for the purpose of publication in the newspapers, and when I assure your Lordships that I have attended in this House more often than any other Peer, and have spoken more seldom than any other Member of your Lordships' House, I speak the truth. I do not speak to try to cause agitation in a part of the Kingdom; but I have a character to maintain. I can only say that I have always thought this House had considerable influence over Money Bills. It is stated so in the Standing Orders of the House. In the time of Charles II. there was a Wine and Licensing Bill, and great displeasure was expressed by the Lord Chamberlain in this House that it was passed only on account of the lateness of the Session. I believe the Session was then only until May 15, but things were different in those days. I wish your Lordships to know that I have lived in a county in which casting votes have very often decided great questions. At Ashbourne, after the return of Munday, who turned the election by a single vote, with his own, I stated most emphatically that if measures coming from this House were cut short by clôture in the other House, I should view them with very great jealousy. It cannot be true that a measure which is cut short by clôture is enacted by the advice of both Houses, because the advice of a great portion of Parliament is cut off. If you say it is the same thing, I can only say that it is very far from the exact truth. I wish to show your Lordships that I do not divide the House on capricious motives. If I say that the Noes have it when this question is put, it will not be the truth, I fear; but I can say that I honestly think it ought to be the truth, because the conflict between both Houses will be so very great, and the delay and subsequent litigation will also do no good to anybody. The Duke of Devonshire lately sold a property to a tenant in Ireland, but that man happened to be exceedingly wealthy. But how men who have to borrow money to buy their land can stock their farms when they have got them I cannot possibly imagine. I fear they will stop short in their career of payment. The noble Lord Harlech, in an Amendment, wished to give the right of pre-emption to the landlords, and I suppose that many landlords wish to get back their land if it is sold at 10 years' purchase, as I understand the Marquess of Bath to have said. If the Marquess of Bath's son were to live 34 years, I fear he would be rather sorry to be without his paternal estates. I do not wish to be personal in any way, but I must say this, that if anybody had foretold that Her Majesty's Government would adopt the advice of Mr. Bright at any future time, I should have said it was a false prophecy. I am not easily induced to use language which can give offence, but I do most earnestly believe that if you have a sudden vindictive election to punish the majority of the House of Commons for being a majority against the expensive devices of the County Councils, I believe you will not have the approbation of any honest man. I beg to move that this Bill be read a third time this day 10 months.

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now") and add at the end of the Lord Denman

Motion ("this day ten months.")—(The Lord Denman.)

EARL SPENCER: My Lords, I hardly think your Lordships will be willing to adopt the Amendment which has been moved by the noble Lord who has just spoken. Perhaps I ought to apologise to your Lordships for rising to make any remarks upon this important Bill at this stage of the proceedings, but I was prevented from being here at the Second Reading, and as I have been so mixed up at different times with questions connected with land legislation in Ireland, I do not like to let the opportunity pass without saying a very few words upon the subject. I shall not detain your Lordships long, for the subject was then ably discussed, and the views which I hold were very ably and powerfully put forward by my noble Friends Lord Kimberley and Lord Herschell, sitting behind me. I have always advocated for many respects the settlement of the land question in Ireland, and I have always advocated a large measure of land purchase. I still hold those views, and on the whole I am glad that Her Majesty's Government have succeeded in passing what I may say I consider to be a large and comprehensive measure for this purpose. At the same time I do differ very strongly from some of the methods which have been introduced into this measure, and I have serious objections to several of them. I shall not expand those views into anything like a long speech, but I should like shortly to recapitulate the principal objections that I entertain to the measure. First of all I object to the extreme complication. I believe that in order to make a measure of this sort successful in Ireland, and acceptable to the Irish tenants, it is desirable that the clauses should be as simple as possible. I believe there is very little simplicity in this Bill, and that the complication of the various clauses in it will prevent its working and being availed of to the extent which I should like to see. I object to using the Probate and other Duties which were intended to be given to the Irish in aid of local rates, without the Irish ratepayers being consulted in the matter. I object also to the power given to apply the rates of any county in Ireland to make up the default of those who have purchased under the Act, without the ratepayers in the county in any way having a voice as to the responsibility which is thereby thrown upon them. I object to the direct contact into which the State will be brought with the occupiers in regard to this measure. That I have always used as a strong argument against any measure of this sort. It is what the noble Marquess at the head of the Government called the "buffer" argument, but I believe that argument is a very valid one, and I confess that I look with some apprehension to the possible results of the State being brought into direct contact with the Irish occupiers by means of this Bill. I do not for a moment say there is a chance of repudiation, but we all know what has occurred before in Ireland, and we know that in bad seasons there will be great pressure upon the tenants, and that they may be unable to pay these annuities. We know also from the past that at different times political agitation has created difficulty in respect of this very point, and, though I hope it may not so turn out, I fear in the future there may be some difficulties of the kind again. Further than this, I have always said I wish that a large settlement of the Land Question should be accompanied with a large measure of Local Government reform in that country. I have only stated these objections, and I shall not delay your Lordships by elaborating any arguments upon them, for, as I said before, my noble Friends Lord Kimberley and Lord Herschell spoke very ably and powerfully on this point during the Debate of the Second Reading. I wish now to refer to one or two other matters very shortly. In Committee the other night I asked some questions of the noble Lord the Lord Privy Seal with regard to the congested districts, and I wish to repeat what I said on that occasion. I attach very great importance to the relief of these congested districts, because I believe that in all difficulties in Ireland the first beginning of disturbance comes from those places in which an exceedingly impoverished tenantry reside, and if there is anything like famine or any difficulty, they are brought into great straits, and they immediately become a very serious burden on the community and a source of real danger to the State. I fear very much that the proposals of Her Majesty's Government will not really touch the fringe of that question. They may do some good, and I do not for a moment say they will not, by their system of improved communication in those districts, by the erection of piers and the encouragement of fisheries, but I doubt extremely whether they will be able really to master the serious difficulty of the enormous number of poor tenants being huddled together on one spot where they are unable to get a bare subsistence at any time of the year. In those districts it is very often most important that the landlord should sell his property; he is often in a very impoverished state, and with such exceedingly poor tenants, it would be desirable if he could sell his estate, though he may not be able to sell it to those small tenants paying only £1 or 30s. an acre for their holdings. I believe it is next to impossible. The security they can give will be insufficient, and the Land Commission will not sanction sales to them. I really think the only mode of dealing with this difficulty is to enable some body which has popular support to buy the estates in such congested districts, and then try to improve the miserable condition of these tenants. I wish the Bill contained a proposal of that sort, but I am afraid it does not. I did intend to make some proposal of that sort, but when I came to look into the matter, I found it was too large a proposal to be made at this stage of the Bill. There is another consideration with regard to this Bill, to which I do not think sufficient attention has been given. In Ireland, unfortunately, there are an enormous number of estates of proprietors who are in extreme difficulty. I understand at this moment there are estates under Receivers in Chancery of the value of something like £990,000 a year. Very nearly £1,000,000 of rent is under those circumstances at the present moment. That alone I regard as a very serious matter. Besides that, there are estates which are very heavily mortgaged, but which are still under the management of the proprietors. We all know with any country when any proprietors are in this very dangerous position without any money it is a very serious drawback to the development of their estates. The Encumbered Estates Act has come almost to a complete deadlock. There have been very few sales, except the sales which have taken place under the Ashbourne Acts. I cannot help thinking that this Act, if it is at all successful, may bring about a gigantic revolution on this very point. Up to the present time, and for many years past, there have been practically hardly any sales in Ireland; the tenants, and landlords, and mortgagees have all been expecting some further legislation. Now, I do not say there is anything like finality about any legislation. We all know there is not. But it seems to me this Bill will be probably one of the last great measures for the purchase of land in Ireland. We all know what has been said by large numbers of people in the country of both Parties with regard to State credit being pledged for this purpose. I myself do not join with those who have said that State credit should not have been given for the purchase of land in Ireland, for I have found the necessity of dealing with this matter. So great is the responsibility of Parliament with regard to the condition of land in Ireland—so heavy is that responsibility—that I have thought if there were no other means of foregoing the difficulty, it would be right to use the State credit. But a large party in this country are opposed to it. In fact, I may say, both Parties in this country have at different times used the strongest arguments against employing the State credit for the purchase of land in Ireland. The present Bill is, no doubt, the extreme measure which could have been carried through Parliament at the present time. No doubt alterations and Amendments may have to be made in it, but I think I am right in saying that this will be probably the last great measure which will be passed for land purchase by the Imperial Parliament. Now what will be the result of it? The result of it will be, I think, that if this view is taken by the majority of people in Ireland the deadlock to which I have referred will come to an end. Mortgagees will foreclose. There may be some sales, perhaps, at low prices in the Land Court; applications to sell will come before that Court, and there will once more be sales under it. That alone will bring about an enormous revolution in agriculture in the country. I do not know whether people in general have contemplated the bearing of that result upon this subject, but I think they ought to have it before them. We hardly know what the effect will be yet; but it will no doubt be enormous, and will bring about a tremendous change in Ireland. I do not believe the Bill will very materially increase the normal amount of sales in Ireland. Up to the present time I believe only about £1,000,000 a year has been got through in carrying out the Ashbourne Acts. I am afraid there are some clauses in the Act, particularly the tenants' insurance clause, which will retard its progress. I must say I regret that clause very much. It is one of the most complicated in the Bill, and it will not only deter tenants, and small tenants particularly, from applying for purchases, but I am afraid it will prevent the Land Commissioners sanctioning the sales until there is sufficient security offered by the purchasers. I regret, therefore, that that clause should have been inserted. My Lords, I have thought it right to make these few remarks, and I shall not detain you any longer, but I thought, as I have so often spoken on this subject, and taken so much part in it, that I ought to state the views I hold with regard to this measure. I sincerely trust my objections may not be actually fulfilled. No one wishes more than I do to see this Bill working well in Ireland, for I know full well the land question in Ireland has been one of the most serious difficulties connected with this country. If we can get rid substantially of the Irish land difficulty, we shall have made great progress in Ireland, and we shall have cut away one of the great incentives to disturbance in that country. If a settlement is made by this Bill we shall be doing a great deal for Ireland: we shall be opening the way for other reforms in the government of that country which many believe are so essential, and without which I do not think there will be a complete and satisfactory solution of the Irish difficulty.

*EARL FORTESCUE: My Lords, I would not delay the progress of this important measure by speaking on its earlier stages; but now that it is the point of quitting this House, I would ask your Lordships' indulgence for a minute while I make a few remarks. My apprehensions are not in the same direction for the most part as those, as far as I can gather them, of the noble Lord who has just spoken. I must congratulate Her Majesty's Government, and especially Mr. Balfour, on the success which has attended their wise, and firm, and at the same time sympathetic administration in frustrating the efforts of the Irish Home Rulers, aided, I am sorry to say, by too many of their new allies the British Home Rulers, in trying to make the government of Ireland impossible by exciting the ignorant and intimidated population to lawlessness and boycotting, and dishonesty and outrage. But I must congratulate them still more on their legislation; and especially on their introduction and carrying so far through Parliament of this important, this comprehensive, and most skilfully prepared measure; and I will say that our gratitude is due also to the noble Lord the Lord Privy Seal for his conduct of the Bill through this House. It seems likely to neutralise to a considerable degree the enormous evils resulting from the faulty administration, and worse legislation, of their predecessors; and especially the unsound and unjust confiscatory Act of 1881, carried, I will not say under false pretences, but by statements which experience has shown to be, as we announced it would, entirely illusory. Some of us Liberals have the melancholy satisfaction of reflecting that we were not for a moment imposed upon by the very irrational assurance that that Bill would be for the benefit of the landlords as well as the tenants; and we did not omit to warn your Lordships of the confiscatory character of that Bill—that character which was aggravated by the discreditable appointment of men notoriously both incompetent and undeniably partisan to what was a very important, and ought to have been considered the almost judicial, office of Sub-Commissioners. The noble Lord the Viceroy of India showed the utter absurdity of the allegation of some Members of the then Government and their followers, who cited the great and sound land reform of that illustrious statesman, Stein, as a precedent for the Act of 1881; ignorant that the land reform of Stein substituted for the previous dual ownership single ownership, whereas Mr. Gladstone's Bill for the first time established double ownership over the greater part of Ireland. Nothing could be more diametrically opposite than the tendency and effect of the two reforms. The one has worked with great advantage in Germany up to the present time, but it gives the landowner full possession—absolute possession—of a part, and of part only, of their previously larger estates which were extensively held by tenants occupying large farms, and rendering for them feudal dues and services. On the other hand, it reduced the size of those farms, and handed over what was left of them to the tenants as their absolute freehold, exempt from all dues and services. What it did was to replace dual ownership by single ownership, and, as I have said, that reform has worked admirably up to the present time, while within the last two years the dual ownership established by Mr. Gladstone in the Land Act has been generally condemned. Its operation has been as undesirable as possible, though that, one must say, has been aggravated by the agitation of the Home Rulers in Ireland, practically aided and encouraged by their allies the Home Rulers in Great Britain. My Lords, we not only exposed the ignorance with which various assertions with regard to that Bill were made, but we warned your Lordships of its consequences. I remember myself saying that that Bill as I read it would deal hardly with the landlords in proportion to the good they and their predecessors had done and to the forbearance they had shown to their tenants. I appeal to your Lordships whether that has not proved literally true, whether the most liberal and beneficent landlords have not been those who have suffered the most from the operation of the Bill. I remember complaining of the vagueness of the language and pointing out that the Land Commissioners would not have for their guidance either distinct and definite enactment, or, since the measure itself was unprecedented, the guidance of precedents. Well, my Lords, we have seen the consequences of that, and that Act has been, as I said before, I believe, universally condemned. But this Bill seems to me objectionable, and only, though amply, justifiable, by the state of general hostility to landowners as such, to which the previous administration and previous legislation have reduced Ireland. I agree with the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) in hoping that the gradual multiplication of smaller proprietors, exempted from the trammels and restrictions which the Legislature has imposed upon the present landlords of Ireland, may tend gradually to bring about a more healthy and natural state of things, and to recall the doctrines of political economy from Jupiter and Saturn, whither they had been relegated, or left apparently only for the study of diplomatists, but not meant for practical application, by the eminent members of the miscalled Cobden Club. Was there ever a more cruel irony than identifying that true patriot and eminent political economist—a man of the strongest conscientious convictions, and incapable, as his conduct showed, of sacrificing them either to popularity or to place—with a club whose most eminent members opposed political economy. But, my Lords, I wish to say that in my view the establishment of a body of proprietors exempted from the mischievous trammels and restrictions imposed upon the present landlords would be a very inadequate reason for passing an Act so objectionable in principle as we must recognise this to be. It is a remedy only less bad, though decidedly less bad, than the terrible evils—likely to last in spite of this Act through generations—which it has been brought in to counteract. I am utterly incredulous of the success of small farmers occupying and cultivating arable farms, except in a few places where a sparse population cultivating the rich soil in thinly inhabited districts may live in rude abundance. I do not believe there is in the world any instance of a number of small landowners living in anything like reasonable comfort, or, I would almost say, civilisation. The evidence which the late lamented Lady Verney collected with regard to the condition of a number of the small landowners in France and Italy seems conclusive as to the hardship of their lot, and as to the narrowing effect of their position upon their minds. Then we must remember that, as a rule, very small owners have very little capital. Two or three bad years are almost certain to drive them to the money-lenders. We know how deeply most of the peasantry of France and other European countries and also the ryots of India are indebted to these money-lenders. From the times of the early Romans down to the present the pressure of bad times upon the small owners and of their debts to the usurers have been a constant source of difficulty. I have said I do not believe in the competition of small arable cultivators with larger farmers. As one of the best northern farmers told a distinguished friend of mine, "The small freeholds mean small fields, and in the case of small fields the frequent turning of the plough alone would render the competition of the small cultivator hopeless as compared with the larger one." The plough is only one of the implements that have frequently to be turned; the harrow, the horse-hoe, the drill—if, indeed, small occupiers could afford to obtain or to keep such implements—whenever used, would necessarily be subject to the same disadvantage. Again, the skilful division of labour by the large farmer, that division of labour the advantage of which Adam Smith so lucidly and powerfully explained, would of itself alone place the small cultivator at a great disadvantage. The only two classes of cases, I believe, in which experience shows that land can be advantageously occupied in small portions are, first, those in which, being within reasonable access to markets, some produce of high value, requiring very detailed and skilful cultivation, is grown, such as the vine, whether for wine or for eating, or else various other fruits and the choicer vegetables; and the other case is that of dairying, where the loving and patient tending of each cow by the family, and the detailed care and attention bestowed in the manufacture of cheese and butter, compensate the great disadvantage of working on a small scale, and the absence of appliances economical and advantageous in their use, but of course beyond the means of very small owners. In all other cases it seems clear, in spite of the essays and pamphlets we have seen, and the speeches we have read from men who seem to have more acquaintance with agriculture and horticulture in books than in practice; in spite of them we have seen everywhere that the amount of produce raised with immense labour and great self-denial by the small occupier is wonderfully less, disproportionately less, than that raised by large farmers. The soil and the climate of France are infinitely more favourable, as a rule, to the production of wheat than that of England, and yet the disproportion between the average produce per acre is immense. The produce of France, owing to the manner in which the soil is cultivated, is, if I remember rightly, not very much more than half per acre of the average wheat produce in England. I have spoken of the indebtedness of small landowners from the earliest times of all races and in all parts of the globe: but what is the race that is to furnish this body of new landowners? Why it is the Irish, a large proportion of the tenants being, as their "illiterate" votes would seem to indicate, uneducated. They are many of them—the majority of them—miserably bad farmers, both ignorant of, and averse to, improvements in agriculture; they are improvident, and, lastly, they are about the most prolific race on the face of the earth. And yet, if the industrious French peasant—and those Irish are less industrious than they were, because they have been demoralised by ceaseless agitation weaning them from their work, and exacting their attendance at meetings of all sorts—when we find that the industrious and painfully thrifty French peasants are, as a rule, largely indebted, even with so small an average of children in their families that in the rural districts the next generation will barely keep up the existing population; what are we to expect from the poorest of the Irish peasantry? I confess that I take a very gloomy view of the future: and I will end by repeating that I think this measure would be very objectionable if it had not been rendered desirable—nay, almost necessary—by previous maladministration and unwise legislation; and such being the case, I do feel that the country owes a great debt of gratitude to the Government for devising and proposing, and having carried this measure almost completely through both Houses of Parliament.

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, before the noble Lord rises I wish to ask for an explanation with regard to the 44th clause as it has now been amended. That is the clause which defines the annual value of a holding. As far as I know, the annual value of a holding is only defined to the purposes of the 9th clause, which relates to what has been called the tenants' insurance, and, therefore, the definition will have no effect but in relation to that guarantee. Of course, there it has an important effect, because the amount of the guarantee depends upon whether the purchase money exceeds 20 times the annual value of the holding as defined. Now, the first part of the clause defines the annual value of the holding as meaning the rent of the holding after deducting therefrom—putting it roughly—five years' average of poor rate, Grand Jury cess, and tithe rent-charge. Of course, that matter is perfectly clear, and it makes the sum an absolutely rigid one—a mere matter of calculation—the provision which allowed certain deductions having been struck out. But it is now followed by this proviso—

"Provided that after the advance applied for has been sanctioned, the purchaser may apply to the Land Commission to determine the annual value, and thereupon such annual value shall be ascertained by the Land Commission in the manner prescribed by the rules made by them, as provided in such case."

That is, where the application has been made to the Land Commission to determine the annual value, the tenant's annual value shall be so determined. What I wish to know is whether, under the last part of the section, the Land Commission are left at large to take any method of procedure they like in accordance with their rules in determining the annual value, and to take any matter they please into account, or whether it is intended to be limited by the earlier part of the clause, and that the rules must only provide for their taking into consideration the rent with the deductions for poor rate, Grand Jury cess, and tithe rent-charge. Of course, it will be seen at once that it makes a great difference according to which of those is meant. If the latter is meant, the clause is a very rigid and inelastic one;

but if the former is meant, of course the clause may be a very elastic one indeed, because it would well be open to the purchasing tenant to apply to the Land Commission to fix the annual value; and, if they are at large in the matter, of course they can take into account all the circumstances which would lead them to fix the annual value at something below that which would be represented by the rent minus the poor rate, Grand Jury cess, and tithe rent-charge. I should be inclined to think that the latter was the meaning of it, but I have discussed the matter with more than one, and I find that there is not altogether agreement as to what is the meaning. Of course, the matter should be made clear one way or the other. I need hardly point out that this is not a matter which concerns the landlord at all; it is a matter which concerns the State and the tenant, and it is a matter which will affect considerably a number of the tenants who will purchase, because the larger the annual value that can be fixed the more tenants there will be purchasing. It is an extremely important point, and I shall be very glad if the noble Earl can tell me what is intended by the clause.

THE LORD PRIVY SEAL (EARL CADOGAN): I am afraid I must regard the question which has been asked by the noble and learned Lord somewhat in the light of a conundrum. It is rather difficult to answer at the moment, because I am not quite sure that I understand his question. Perhaps I may state what I understand to be the meaning of the clause. For the purpose of ascertaining the annual value of a holding we take the rent with the deduction set forth in the clause, and the principle is to allow deductions in respect of taxes and impositions for which, of course, the tenant becomes liable the first time on purchasing the fee. The elasticity to which the noble and learned Lord refers is not only, I think, not to be desired, but is not to be found certainly under the first portion of the clause. But when we come to the second portion of it, I understand the contention of the noble and learned Lord to be this. It says that "after the advance applied for has been sanctioned, the purchaser may apply to the Land Commissioners to determine the annual value of the holding, and thereupon"—that is a very important word, as the noble and learned Lord will see—"thereupon such annual value shall be ascertained by the Land Commissioners in the manner prescribed by the rules to be made by them." I understand those words to mean that the annual value is to be ascertained by the Land Commissioners under rules to be made by them, but not in any manner contrary to the earlier portion of the clause; otherwise the two halves of the clause will read in exactly opposite directions. This is the only answer I can give the noble and learned Lord, though I admit I am not sure that I understand his question correctly.

LORD HERSCHELL: I have no right to speak again, but the matter is really of importance. The noble and learned Lord is quite right in thinking that what I alluded to was that proviso, as he says; and I think this is very important upon the question of its construction, because what strikes me is that its construction is not really what the noble Earl says is the intention. It is important to observe that it commences with the word "provided." It is made a proviso following upon the earlier part of the section, and is not a separate and independent section. That, of course, seems to imply that it is intended in some way to qualify what has been provided in the earlier part.

EARL CADOGAN: I only make the suggestion to the noble and learned Lord, but is it necessary because at the end of a clause there is a proviso that therefore the clause itself is modified?

LORD HERSCHELL: Generally when you have a provision and it is followed by the words "provided that," it is meant to qualify the provision. It certainly would be the construction of it. Then what is the meaning of this provision—that after the advance is completed they are to determine the annual value? There is no inconsistency between this and the earlier provision; but then comes the proviso that the purchaser may apply to have it fixed, and thereupon it is to be fixed in the manner, not "hereinafter provided," but it is to be fixed in the manner prescribed by the rules to be made by the Land Commissioners, which would seem to show that in that case the Land Commissioners would prescribe rules which would leave the matter very much at large. That, it seems to me, is the true construction as at present advised, but upon the noble Earl's explanation I am very glad to hear it is not so.

EARL CADOGAN: Again I must apologise for my ignorance of drafting. I am really only asking for information. I do not understand that the words "in the manner prescribed by the rules" bear the interpretation that the noble and learned Lord puts upon them. Surely the annual value will have to be ascertained, in accordance with the earlier part of the clause. The words "in the manner prescribed by the rules to be made by them" do not refer to the scale upon which the value is to be fixed, but to the manner in which it is to be done.

*LORD MORRIS: My Lords, I think the views taken by the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Herschell) and the noble Lord below me (Earl Cadogan) are to a certain extent consistent. As I understand it, for the annual value, in the first place you must take the rent, and that rent is to be minus deductions. Then the proviso comes in, which, as the noble and learned Lord says, is always supposed to be an exception to the clause. The same deductions are to be made, and the same principle is to be adopted by the Commissioners in estimating the annual value that the earlier portion of the clause states; but that the Commissioners will have the power of fixing a lesser value, though on the principle of deducting the Grand Jury cess, the poor rate, the tithe-rent charge, and the taxes and impositions to which the tenant becomes liable on purchasing. That, I believe, is the meaning of the clause, and that is what I think was intended. At least, I have so understood. I have taken a strong view upon this clause, supporting it as it was brought up from the other House. I think there is nothing in the views either of the noble and learned Lord opposite, or of the Lord Privy Seal, antagonistic to the Commissioners proceeding on that principle in making the deductions.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: An additional reason for that interpretation is that, as the clause originally stood, the Commissioners could not determine the rent if it was a judicial rent. The judicial rents were beyond their purview. Now, the very fact that you excepted the judicial, but put the other non-judicial rents within their purview, shows that it is impossible that you could have been dealing with the rent itself. That, I think, is the obvious meaning of it.

*THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: My Lords, I may say I am responsible for this Amendment, as it is only an improvement upon the Amendment which I moved in Committee, and when my noble Friend (Lord Erne) moved it I supported it, exactly on the grounds which my noble and learned Friend beside me (Lord Morris) has described to the House. I believed that by the Amendment many objections which were raised by noble Lords opposite, and other Members of the House, to my Amendment, would be met, and therefore I supported the Amendment on those grounds.

EARL CADOGAN: I have no right to speak again; but, at all events, we are agreed upon what should be the meaning of the clause. I do not know whether the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Herschell) could suggest any other form of words which would, as he thinks, more clearly carry out its apparent meaning; but, as I understand there is this unanimity with regard to it, I would suggest that it would be better to leave the clause as it stands.

LORD HERSCHELL: I have no other words to suggest.

On Question whether ("now") shall stand part of the Motion, resolved in the affirmative.

Bill read 3^a accordingly, with the Amendments.

EARL CADOGAN: My Lords, I have one Amendment on page 24, Clause 31, line 16. It is to omit the words "and all duties and functions consequent thereon." Those words were put in in Committee on the Motion of a noble Lord (Lord Castletown) who is not here, and I unfortunately allowed their insertion, as I did not quite realise the effect they would have. But the clause was arranged in another place, as it stood without those words, and I am afraid we cannot agree to its being disturbed. It was never contemplated that the duties should be really discharged by the Commissioners of 1881, and it might happen that before the period mentioned in the clause the Commissioners would have practically done their work, and would have nothing to do. I think it will be obvious to anyone that it is hardly necessary to put in those words prohibiting them from taking part in the performance of duties which might be consequent upon their position. I therefore beg to move that those words be omitted.

Amendment moved, in page 24, Clause 31, line 16, leave out ("and all duties and functions consequent thereon.")—(The Earl Cadogan.)

Agreed to.

Other Amendments made.

Bill passed and returned to the Commons.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, this is a Bill which, from the experience of what has taken place, has been rendered necessary for the purpose of introducing some small Amendments. I do not think that, beyond the account of the Bill that is given in the preliminary notice, it is necessary to detain your Lordships at any length in describing its object. There are one or two points chiefly affecting Local Government which have been urged upon me, but at this period of the Session, if opposition were offered to any of them it would be impossible to pass the Bill. Your Lordships may, however, think that it is desirable that some of the Amendments suggested should be adopted, and I see that my noble and learned Friend, Lord Thring, has called attention to one defect in the Bill with reference to questions which may arise where a person has been kept in confinement in one place and has to be removed to another. Questions arise upon the removal of persons from one workhouse to another. A further matter which my noble and learned Friend, Lord Herschell, has called attention to, is the restricted power of appointing magistrates specially fitted and selected for the purpose of granting certificates under the Act. That matter has also not been left without proper attention being paid to it. There are other Amendments of the same kind, but, as I have said, if there is any real opposition, it would be impossible to carry the Bill through now, and I hope that all the Amendments will command themselves to your Lordships, especially as they relate chiefly to matters of local government, and to getting rid of certain difficulties which have been found to exist in the method of administering the law. Some small items here and there have not been found to be completely successful. That is the whole object of the Bill, and probably your Lordships will think it right to give it a second reading. If there are any Amendments which noble Lords desire to suggest, they could perhaps be dealt with better in the Grand Committee.

Bill read 2^a (according to order), and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Earl BROWLOW): This, my Lords, is a Bill which is founded upon the report of a Committee of the House of Commons assembled to inquire into the difficulties experienced by Volunteer Corps in obtaining land for ranges and such like purposes; and to endeavour to find some way of obviating those difficulties. Clauses 1 and 2 give power to Volunteer Corps to purchase land, and also give power to any group of Volunteer Corps to apply to any County or Borough Council to purchase land for those purposes. Clause 3 deals with the machinery for the purchase of land, which practically will be this: if a Volunteer Corps desires to purchase land for ranges or such purposes they will petition the Secretary of State for War. The Secretary of State for War will make inquiries in the manner he likes, and if he satisfies himself that it is undesirable that the prayer of the petition should be complied with, he will quash it at once. If, on the other hand, he considers it desirable that the purchase should be carried out, he will then bring up an ordinary Provisional Order Bill in Parliament, which will be dealt with in the usual manner, and if the owners of land object to any portion of their land being taken, they will have the power of taking the Bill to a Select Committee. This machinery may appear at first a little complicated, but when your Lordships remember the rather large powers which are about to be given for the purchase of land, you will, no doubt, think it necessary to hedge in the Bill with every safeguard possible. Clauses 6 and 7 give powers to Volunteer Corps to borrow for this purpose the security, being first the land itself, secondly, the Capitation Grant, and further on in the Bill provision is made, that in case of its abandonment by the Corps the land shall revert to the Secretary of State, subject to the money borrowed being repaid. There are powers also given under the Bill to the Public Works Loan Commissioners to lend money for this purpose. I do not know that I need detain your Lordships by going any further into details. This is a Bill which has passed through the other House with no opposition and scarcely any comment, and I trust your Lordships will give it a Second Reading.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Earl Brownlow.)

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I need hardly assure the noble Earl that I have no objection at all to the principle of this Bill, which, of course, in itself, is very desirable; but I wish to call attention to Sub-section 3 of the 9th clause. That provides that if the Volunteer Corps is disbanded, the Council may appropriate the land in any manner approved by the Local Government Board, or may sell it for the best price to be obtained, and so forth. It seems to me that in accordance with our usual practice where land has been taken compulsorily, there ought to be a right of pre-emption in the owner of the land taken because otherwise land might be taken for a range and afterwards used for other purposes which might occasion great inconvenience or create a nuisance to the landlord. Again, the landowner might have consented to the land being appropriated for a range without any opposition, but would object to its being used in other ways, and I think if it is no longer required for a range, the landlord should have the privilege of pre-emption. Perhaps the noble Lord will consider whether he would have any objection at another stage of the Bill to bring in an Amendment to that effect.

EARL BROWNLOW: I quite see the object of the noble Earl, and I think such an Amendment as he suggests would be a decided improvement in the Bill.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Perhaps the noble Lord will consider in what form to put it. I will not read the Amendment now.

On Question agreed to.

HANOVER CHAPEL BILL [LORDS].— (by Order.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

*(3.10.) VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Lancashire, N.E., Darwen): In moving the Second Reading of this Bill, I desire to give some reasons why the measure should be approved and referred to a Committee upstairs. Perhaps I ought to apologise for interposing in regard to a London Bill, but my excuse is that I have lived in London all my life. The present position of Hanover Chapel is somewhat unfortunate. The district is a very extensive one, consisting of a wealthy portion, and another portion which is very poor; and on the extreme edge of the richer portion this Chapel is situate. The congregation is consequently very scanty. The wealthy tradesmen of Regent Street do not stay in that part of London on Sunday, and as the congregation has to come from other parts it is naturally very small. The church itself is badly in need of repair, and quite £500 or £600 is required for this purpose, but there is no source from which such a sum can be obtained. The Duke of Westminster has come forward and offered another site, worth £20,000, for the erection of a new church in the centre of the parish, and in the midst of the poorer population. If that offer is accepted and the present church is sold, it is estimated that the sale will realise sufficient not only for the building of a new church, but to endow it adequately. One difficulty is that the present church has no residence attached to it. The clergyman resides out of the parish, but it is hoped that if the new arrangement is carried out, there will be sufficient funds to build a vicarage. There is certainly no reason why the Bill should not go before a Select Committee. The only argument against it is an architectural one. My hon. Friend the Member for the Knutsford Division of Cheshire (Mr. Tatton Egerton) has placed on the Paper an Instruction to the Committee to authorise the Charity Commissioners to amend the Trinity Chapel scheme, and give to the new church the same income as to the other churches under the scheme, and transfer the balance of the double portion given (under the plea of absence of endowment) to the Hanover Chapel to the Mother Church of St. George's, Hanover Square. No doubt the point raised by my hon. Friend is one that deserves consideration, and perhaps if the Bill goes before a Committee a case may be made out for a redistribution of the Trinity Trust. The promoters of the Bill are quite willing that the proposal should be discussed upstairs.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Viscount Cranborne.)

*(3.15.) MR. NORRIS (Tower Hamlets, Limehouse): I rise to oppose the Second Reading of the Bill. I object to it because it involves the destruction of a consecrated edifice. Not any Petitions have been presented in favour of the Bill, but, on the other hand, four important Petitions have been presented against it. One is from the Vestry of the Parish of St. George's, Hanover Square, who object to the removal of the human remains now reposing in the vaults of the church. Many hon. Members will, I am sure, sympathise with that feeling. The petitioners go on to say that the building is not inconveniently situated, and that the proposed church will be situated in a bye street and not in the centre of the poorer population. The second Petition is from the Trinity Trust, who pay £200 a year to free sittings in the church, and contribute £50 a year towards the maintenance of the fabric, besides subscribing a moiety of the stipend of the incumbent. The third Petition is from the Society of British Architects, and the fourth comes from the Council of the Royal Academy. In my opinion, no case has been made out for the Bill. The portico is said to be a nuisance, but it is of great convenience to poor persons, who are able to rest there and to find shelter when it is raining heavily. In the next place, if it is intended to accommodate the poor the new site proposed will not be found more convenient than the present edifice. At the present moment there is a large population in the immediate neighbourhood of the existing church who will be much inconvenienced by its removal. The Bishop of London, who is said to be in favour of the Bill, is an advocate for additional churches in populous places. Why, then, destroy this, which occupies a conspicuous position in a crowded district? I regard the proposal as a desecration even if there were a necessity; but in this case there is no necessity, and I entertain a decided objection to the pulling down of these old edifices. The House will remember that similar attempts at destruction have been made from time to time even against the beautiful church of St. Margaret's yonder, and Canon Farrar wrote of those who proposed the Vandalism, as talking ignorant nonsense. It was likewise sought to destroy the handsome portico of St. Martin's, Trafalgar Square, for facilities of traffic, but the House of Commons rejected the proposal, as I hope hon. Members will do with this Bill.

MR. CHARRINGTON (Tower Hamlets, Mile End) seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question, to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Mr. Norris.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

*(3.25.) COLONEL MAKINS (Essex, S.E.): If a church only 65 years old is to be regarded as an ancient monument, I am afraid there are a good many ancient monuments about the Benches of this House. The real question to be considered is the interest of the parish.

As to the question of contributions towards the erection of the building borrowed on the church rate, it seems to be forgotten that church rates have been abolished, and I fail to see how any claim can be made on that account. Another sentimental argument is, that the church porch affords a comfortable shelter during rain, but if that argument is to have any force, there ought to be rain shelter provided in every street in London. The best argument for the removal of the building is, that it is a long way from the parishioners who wish to go to it, and I have always understood that now-a-days it is necessary to bring the church to the doors of the people, instead of requiring them to go a considerable distance in order to attend their church. One strong argument in favour of the Bill is that the generous offer of the Duke of Westminster may never be made again. On these grounds I hope that the common sense of the House will carry the Second Reading of the measure, and the recommendations which have been made by the hon. Member for Limehouse (Mr. Norris) can be dealt with by the Committee upstairs.

*(3.28.) MR. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.): I think it would be a good arrangement to remove this church to a more convenient part of the parish, and from that point of view the Bill commends itself to our support. One of the objections which have been urged is that the removal of the church will involve the destruction of an architectural building of reputation. Now, the building is only 65 years old, so that it is not a very venerable structure, and as to its architectural merits there are differences of opinion. I am able to say, from personal knowledge, that the congregation is very small. I visited the church one Sunday morning, and was very much surprised at the smallness of the congregation. If the congregation I saw was a fair average, I do not think it is likely to be very much smaller wherever the church may be placed. Upon every ground I should regard the removal of the church as a desirable proposal. There is, however, another feature which deserves consideration. The intention is that the Government shall practically purchase the site. The Woods and Forests are to purchase it for a sum of £60,000, so I am told—a price which will enable the new church to be liberally endowed. This is a consideration which certainly ought to be borne in mind, and I should be glad to learn whether the sum mentioned is a reasonable price. I should also like to know whether the parish as a whole has any claim upon the money, and whether there are any other claims. The church was, I believe, originally built by borrowed money on the security of the rates of the whole parish of St. George's, and I am under the impression that the debt was paid off out of money raised by the general body of parishioners. In dealing with the purchase price, I think the parishioners should have some voice in the distribution of the money.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE: The parishioners have been consulted, and have passed a strong resolution in favour of the Bill.

MR. T. H. BOLTON: I have no doubt that the parishioners were consulted as to the proposition for the removal of the church from one part of the district parish to another, but were they consulted as to the propriety of endowing the new church out of public money? The present church is the property of the parish, and not of the people who worship in it. If the congregation is transferred to the new church, and the old site is sold for £60,000, the Duke of Westminster giving a new site worth £20,000, representing the old site, there will still be a large sum of public money to be dealt with. If it should turn out that the site offered by the Duke of Westminster is not worth £20,000, there will be a larger sum of public money appropriated? I think there are considerations involved in the matter which will require careful attention, and I trust that if the Bill is to go upstairs, the Select Committee will, in the interests of the public, enter into a full investigation in order to ascertain first, whether the price to be paid is a fair one; secondly, whether the parishioners have any claim to the money; and lastly, whether there are any other claims. I trust also that the Commissioners of Woods and Forests will be called upon to give evidence that the price to be paid is a reasonable and proper price.

(3.35.) MR. WOOTTON ISAACSON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): As one of the oldest inhabitants of the parish, I desire to say a few words on this subject. The Royal Academicians object to the removal because the church was designed by Cotterill, but I should like to know why they never objected before when the Junior Army and Navy Club and other places designed by Cotterill were pulled down? Why, again, was the piastre in Regent Street removed? It was an architectural feature, but it was removed because it interfered with the shops and obscured the light. For the same reason this chapel is to be removed because very few of the public have attended it for many years past. The Crown claim the site, but they propose to pay £45,000 for it. Reference has been made to the removal of the bodies from the vaults, but there is an Act of Parliament which requires all disinterments of this nature to be conducted with decency. The Duke of Westminster, with his usual munificence, is giving a new site in Davies Street. That site is large enough both for a church and a vicarage house annexed to it. The passing of the Bill will be a great boon to the people in the West End. I shall support the Second Reading, and I may say, in conclusion, that the Bishop of London has given his consent to the scheme all through.

(3.40.) MR. H. BYRON REED (Bradford, E.): I beg to support the Second Reading of the Bill. I sympathise very much with the spirit which has animated my hon. Friend the Member for Limehouse in objecting to the measure. I am ready to admit that no interference with a place of worship should be sanctioned except after the gravest consideration and with full reference to the needs of the locality. As the result of the proposal there will be a large addition to the bulk of the church revenue. The exceptional value of the site will cause something like £45,000 to be paid into the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commission, and the munificence of the Duke of Westminster will further augment the value of the new edifice. Therefore, looking at the matter from a business view, and from the point of expediency, and without giving undue weight to sentimental considerations, which I thoroughly respect, I am inclined to think that the Church will make a good bargain by this measure. The only opposition comes from the Institute of British Architects, and I am at a loss to understand why gentlemen of that profession should object to a proposition which must necessarily bring grist to the architectural mill. I hope the Bill will be read a second time and referred to a Select Committee, before whom all questions of detail can be threshed out.

(3.50.) MR. PICTON (Leicester): The hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Byron Reed) has used a mercenary argument. He has expressed his surprise that the Society of British Architects should oppose a measure which will bring grist to their mill. Now, I sympathise to a large extent with the arguments which have been brought forward by the hon. Member for Limehouse. I am opposed to all change whatever, unless it is proved to be necessary. When once a change is proved to be necessary I am ready to support it, but I am bound to oppose it until its necessity is proved. In this case I do not think the change is at all necessary. It is said that the inhabitants who require the church are at the other extremity of the parish, but I do not see why we should draw a line of half a mile in a small ecclesiastical district, and I presume that there is no parishioner who cannot find his way to one of the churches in the locality; therefore there is no weight to be attached to the argument; but there are other questions involved which ought to be seriously considered. The Preamble of the Bill says—

“And whereas the site on which the said church now stands was granted by the then Commissioners of His Majesty's Woods, Forests, and Land revenues without consideration by a deed dated the 12th day of June, 1824, to Her Majesty's Commissioners as then constituted for building new churches.”

It was granted without consideration. Not a single halfpenny was paid for it, and since 1824 the land has grown enormously in value. We have heard a good deal about the unearned increment, but here we have had a present made out of the possessions of the Crown, and not more than 60 years afterwards we are asked to remove the building to another site, and to call upon the Crown to pay the full value. I think that that is a proposition which ought to be resisted, especially as the Disestablishment and Disendowment of the Church are not far off. We are now called upon in reality to make at the public expense an immense addition to a Church endowment, and the result will be that when disendowment comes, we shall be told it cannot be touched because it is the private property of a Corporation. I know of a similar case in Liverpool, where £10,000 was asked for a piece of land which was given to the Church in a previous generation. It was only after a considerable amount of persuasion that £3,000 was accepted. Similar jobs—for I can call it nothing else—have been perpetrated by Ecclesiastical Corporations in other parts of the country, and now that the House has an opportunity of condemning such proceedings I hope it will do so. If it is necessary to remove the church, let the Church Corporation give back the land to the Commissioners of Woods and Forests; the Duke of Westminster will not withdraw his liberal offer of a site, and the parishioners can then go to work and build another church on the new site. In the interests of the taxpayers of the country I shall certainly oppose this bargain. The Woods and Forests only represent the interests of the struggling taxpayers, and why should they be called upon to give £45,000 for property which they once gave away?

MR. WOOTTON ISAACSON: The site does not belong to the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, but to the Crown.

MR. PICTON: That may be a distinction in name, but it is not a distinction in substance. The Commissioners of Woods and Forests represent the Crown, and the Crown represent the public; and when we speak of the interests of the Crown we speak of the interests of the public at large.

(3.57.) MR. BEADEL (Essex, Chelmsford), who was imperfectly heard in the Gallery, was understood to say: The matter is one which appears to me to require simply the exercise of a little common sense. Here is a church built many years ago which does not now answer the purpose for which it was intended, and I fail to see why the House should refuse to allow the parishioners to avail themselves of the opportunity to make other terms and to take advantage of the generous offer of the Duke of Westminster, by which not only the incumbent and his congregation, but the parish generally, will be benefited. I shall certainly support the Second Reading.

*SIR J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): Here we have public property given for a church 67 years ago, and it is now proposed to remove the building without giving back the site, but demanding £45,000 for it. In reality, it is proposed to give it to one of the richest men in the world for a purpose which other people carry out at their own expense. I think it is an extraordinary thing for the Duke of Westminster to come here and ask for £45,000 to build a church and a vicarage in the richest parish of London. Any other man, owning the whole of the property around, would only be too proud to provide a church and minister's house for the people who contribute so enormously to his wealth. It must also be borne in mind that the entire parish will not participate in the benefit, but that it is to be an endowment for Church of England worshippers alone, nonconformists receiving no benefit whatever from this large grant of public money.

(4.0.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I was outside the House just before this discussion began, speaking to a friend of mine, who remarked, "This is just the time that we ought to be here, because it is at the end of the Session, when there are only a few Members in attendance, that the Tories are fond of running their little jobs." I did not think, at the moment, that the truth of the observation would have been proved so conclusively as it has been by this Bill. I do not think hon. Members opposite can have read the Bill. They seem to be under the impression that the money—£45,000—is to be expended in building a church and a vicarage. But when this has been done there will be a surplus, and that surplus is actually to be invested in securities, and the interest to be handed over half-yearly to the vicar as part of his emolument. So that not only is it proposed to build this church and vicarage at the public expense, but at a time when the majority of the country are in favour of disestablishment and disendowment, we are actually asked to endow a fresh church. I think there is a great deal of truth in what an hon Member said just now, that a great deal of the advantage of this bargain will go into the pocket of the Duke of Westminster. We all know that when an agnostic or any other wicked man in the neighbourhood of London wishes to convert land into a building estate he builds a church, or gives the site for a church, in order that his property may thereby become more valuable, and it is very obvious that the Duke of Westminster gives this land, not from any religious motive, but simply to increase the value of his property. ["Oh, oh!"] I know that hon. Members opposite are of opinion that gentlemen who do this sort of thing ought not to be accused of it, but I do accuse the Duke of Westminster of it. The present case is a most monstrous one. This land, which formerly belonged to the nation, was given for the one purpose of building a church—an estimable object, no doubt—but these speculative Churchmen want to sell it, and certainly, if the church is removed, it is only fair that the land or its value should be given back to the nation. I hope the House will decisively reject the Second Reading of the Bill.

(4.5.) MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin): I cannot help thinking that we have had what somewhat resembles a storm in a teapot. I think the question of the disestablishment and disendowment of the Church has very little to do with the matter, but I may point out that even if the Church were disestablished and disendowed it would be perfectly possible to bring in a Bill of this kind. The main question for the House is whether it is for the convenience of the neighbourhood that the church should be removed, and upon that point there does not appear to be much doubt, as the people of the parish are in favour of the Bill. As to the question of architectural beauty, I think that very few persons whose opinions are of any value would say that this particular church is a beautiful edifice, although the porch may afford a convenient shelter. As to the use made of the interior, I have only visited the church once, and that was on a Saturday afternoon. If the attendance which I then witnessed was an average one, the services of the church cannot be very much wanted in the neighbourhood, as I found that I was myself one-fifth of the congregation. The church has no real beauty of any kind that is sufficient to require us to retain the structure as a monument of artistic merit. In my opinion, a clear case has been made out for sending the Bill to a Select Committee.

The House divided:—Ayes 107; Noes 91.—(Div. List, No. 346.)

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed.

MR. PICTON: I beg to give notice that upon the further consideration of the Bill I will move that it be referred to a Hybrid Committee.

Q U E S T I O N S.

HINDUSTANI REGIMENTS.

MR. KING (Hull, Central): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that the regiments, raised in the places of the four Hindustani regiments recently disbanded, though retaining the numerical titles of the disbanded or "converted" corps, are, in fact, new, being not only composed of other races but placed with some few exceptions as to juniors under a new cadre of officers; whether the band and mess funds of a regiment are, and have always been, considered by military authorities in England and India as its private property, and have, on disbandment, been distributed among its officers; and, if so, will he explain on what grounds the Government of India announced, in April, 1891, in General Orders, that the band and mess funds of the old regiments should be handed over to the new, although the officers of the new regiments were ready and willing to pay for what was handed over; and whether similar steps have been taken with regard to certain disbanded Madras regiments?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): There has been some irregularity in this matter. The Secretary of State will call for a Report from the Government of India upon the subject.

VOL. CCCLV. [THIRD SERIES].

INDIAN RAILWAYS.

SIR E. WATKIN (Hythe): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Secretary of State for India is prepared to sanction the connection, on the same gauge, of the 2,008 miles of metre-gauge railway now working in Rajputana, the North West Provinces, and Central India with the Kattiawar system, 334 miles in length, on the one hand, and the Oudh and Bengal systems, about 1,420 miles in length, on the other, thereby enabling direct and uninterrupted through communication over 3,765 miles of metre-gauge railway, constructed at a cost of £20,000,000 sterling (of which four-fifths were provided by the British Indian Government), but now separated into four distinct sections which can be linked up in one continuous whole by the construction of, in all, about 120 miles of new line in two short lengths, at an estimated cost of £200,000, excluding a permanent bridge over the Gogra River, or of £400,000 including such a bridge; whether the Secretary of State for India has received communications from the Bombay, Baroda, and Central India Railway Company, who work 1,672 miles of the metre-gauge State lines in Rajputana, Central India, and the North West, and from the Bengal and North Western and Rohilkund and Kumaon unguaranteed Railway Companies, who work over 1,000 miles of the metre-gauge lines in Bengal and Oudh, and also Memorials from the Chamber of Commerce of Upper India, Cawnpore, urging the completion of the connection in question; and whether he is in a position to state that such connection shall be carried out without further loss of time, as the railways affected are in a satisfactory financial condition, and are anxious to get the work done at once?

SIR J. GORST: My noble Friend the Secretary of State is fully alive to the advantages which may accrue from the connection referred to in the hon. Member's question, and is in communication with the Government of India on the subject.

MRS. MELVILLE.

MR. MACLEAN (Oldham): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Government of India have resolved to give Mrs. Melville, widow of the Superintendent of Telegraphs, who was cruelly tortured and murdered by the rebels in Manipur, no other provision than a pension of £100 a year for herself and of £18 a year for each of her two boys; whether he is aware that Mr. Melville had, at the time of his death, served the Government of India for 21 years, was in receipt of a salary of Rs. 800 a month, or about £700 a year, and could have returned home in 1892 on a pension of £400 a year; and whether, in view of the fact that Mr. Melville was a Civil servant employed in the execution of his duty, and was permitted by the Government he served to pass into Manipur without warning or indication of danger, insomuch that he carried no protective arms and had only two small-shot cartridges for his fowling-piece, the Secretary of State will recommend the Government of India to make some more adequate provision for the family of a man whose life was thus sacrificed through no fault of his own?

SIR J. GORST: The Government of India have proposed to the Secretary of State in Council that such provision shall be made for Mrs. Melville as would have been made for the widow of a military officer of corresponding rank, namely, a captain, if killed in action. The proposal is now under the consideration of the Secretary of State in Council.

MR. MACLEAN: I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman if any comparison can be made between a Superintendent of Telegraphs and a military officer, who is bound to risk his life in action? Was not Mr. Melville employed in public work as a Civil servant, and permitted by the Government to pass into Manipur without the slightest warning that there had been a disturbance, or that any danger existed? I should also like to ask the right hon. Gentleman if the same principle which is applied to a military officer is applicable to an officer in the Civil Service; and, if so, why a different scale of pension has been granted to Mrs. Grimwood?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman is now putting an argumentative question.

Mr. Maclean

SIR J. GORST: I cannot give the opinion of my noble Friend the Secretary of State upon such a matter without notice.

SIR W. PLOWDEN (Wolverhampton, W.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he does not consider that in reference to Mr. Melville he occupied a much better position than a military officer of the same rank?

SIR J. GORST: I cannot say what the opinion of the Secretary of State may be without notice.

MR. MACLEAN: Are we to understand that the question is still under the consideration of the Secretary of State, and that he is open to receive communications on the subject?

SIR J. GORST: Yes, Sir.

CASE OF AUSTIN BIRON BIDWELL.

MR. ALLISON (Cumberland, Eskdale): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he can now see his way to re-consider the case of Austin Biron Bidwell, who, in 1873, at the age of 25, was convicted of forgery, and sentenced to penal servitude for life, he having now suffered an imprisonment of 18 years, and having during that period conducted himself to the satisfaction of the authorities?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I have repeatedly given the most careful consideration to the case of the convict Bidwell, and I regret that, having regard to the gravity of the offence, and to the prisoner's career of crime, I cannot, consistently with my public duty, advise Her Majesty to extend her clemency to this convict.

METROPOLITAN OVERSEERS LISTS.

MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he will grant the Return to be moved for to-day in reference to the Metropolitan Overseers Lists for the coming revision?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): This is a matter which does not rest with my Department, but with the Home Office.

ADULTERATION OF ARTIFICIAL MANURES AND FEEDING STUFFS.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture when he proposes to introduce and print the Bill promised some months ago dealing with the adulteration of artificial manures and feeding stuffs?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): I hope to do so very shortly, probably this week—not with any substantial hope of its passing this Session, for, as my hon. Friend knows, it is a highly technical subject on which there is a good deal of difference of opinion; but because the criticism it may call forth will tend, I hope, to facilitate the passing of a measure on this subject next year.

THE 42ND HIGHLANDERS.

MR. J. WILSON (Lanark, Govan): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether anything can be done for the survivors of the 87 braves of the 42nd Highlanders who, under Major Lawson (who was killed), held Sisseyghat against an army of rebels, numbering 2,000, on the 15th January, 1859, and repulsed them with great loss; and whether, at this late date, the survivors, who are now aged and unpensioned, will have speedy recognition?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): I have already undertaken to do the best I can with limited funds for some of the unpensioned survivors of the Crimean and Indian Mutiny campaigns, and the cases of the men referred to in the question will be considered with others.

THE FORTHCOMING NAVAL MANŒUVRES.

MR. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he will be good enough to state the reason why daily newspapers were informed that Press representatives could not be accommodated in vessels of the Red and Blue Squadrons in the forthcoming Naval Manœuvres, while at the same time it was known that vessels in both squadrons were issuing invitations to private guests? The hon. Member also asked the noble Lord if he would inform the House why, when there were so many large and commodious vessels mobilised, all the large ones were placed in the Northern and Western Fleets, while none but small and incommodious ones were allotted to the Red and Blue Squadrons, which were supposed to be the more important squadrons; and whether he could inform the House if there were then any guests at all in the vessels of the Red and Blue Squadrons; and, if so, would he explain on what ground their presence had been allowed, having regard to the statement of the Secretary to the Admiralty, that the vessels of the Red and Blue Squadrons "have no accommodation for any one except their own crews."

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): In the Official Memorandum describing the Naval Manœuvres of 1891 it is pointed out that the operations are of a twofold character. The ironclads, in which accommodation can be provided for the Press, will go through a series of technical evolutions, which, though important as a means of training, are not interesting to the general public. The torpedo boats and gunboats, on the other hand, which have not accommodation for the Press, will be engaged in a series of operations which will be both useful and interesting. The Admiralty have therefore informed the Press of these circumstances, and have made arrangements accordingly. I have not interfered with the officers' discretion in asking occasional guests, who come at their own risk, and must put up with any accommodation they can get; but the Admiralty cannot in any way, so far as the torpedo squadron is concerned, undertake officially to provide accommodation for the Press of the country.

*MR. T. H. BOLTON: Am I to understand that accommodation is provided for the Press in the portion of the Fleet which is not interesting to the public, and that no accommodation whatever is provided in that portion which is interesting?

LORD G. HAMILTON: If the hon. Member ever went in a torpedo boat he would appreciate the difficulty of providing accommodation.

*MR. T. H. BOLTON: The noble Lord has not answered my question—why accommodation cannot be found for the Press, although invitations are issued to private guests.

LORD G. HAMILTON: Because the nature of the operations will not permit it.

SCOTCH SCHOOL BOARDS.

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox) postponed a question he had upon the Paper—To ask the Solicitor General for Scotland upon whose authority, and upon what evidence, he made the statement, on behalf of the Government, that School Boards in Scotland have made their financial arrangements for the current year upon the basis of the Minute of the Scotch Education Department of 11th June last; whether he is aware that the latest statutory date for School Boards certifying to the Assessing Authority is 12th June in each year; and whether, considering that the Minute of the Department only became law on 12th instant, the Scotch Education Department had any evidence that one single School Board in Scotland had made their financial arrangements for the current year upon the basis of the Minute?

POST OFFICE TELEGRAPH SERVICE.

MR. KING: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether a Petition from the Inspectors of the Engineering Branch of the Post Office Telegraph Service, asking for consideration of the unequal terms on which they were placed by the raising of the scales of salary of Superintendents and Assistant Superintendents of provincial telegraph offices, was sent in in August last year; and whether a scheme for remedying the grievances of the men has long since been submitted by the Post Office to the Treasury; and, if so, will he explain why the decision on their grievance is delayed?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I understand that the proposal is now under consideration.

INFLUENZA.

MR. C. E. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if he proposes to institute any further inquiries into the origin, prevention, and treatment of the disease known as influenza, which has been again so fatally epidemic this year, having regard to the Memorandum of the Medical Officer of the Local Government Board covering the elaborate Report of Dr. Parsons upon the outbreak of 1890, which Dr. Buchanan describes as showing that

“that it would be no small gain to get more authentic methods of identifying influenza, so as to get earlier opportunity for applying preventive measures”?

*MR. RITCHIE: Some further inquiries are being carried on by the medical staff of the Local Government Board, but I am advised that we must mainly rely upon clinical and pathological observation for the increase of our knowledge concerning the disease.

MR. DE COBAIN.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he has seen the passage in the sworn declaration of District Inspector Seddall, recently presented to this House, to the effect that a person in Belfast sent a telegram to Mr. De Cobain in Yorkshire, apprising him of the issue of a warrant for his arrest; whether, considering that this telegram enabled Mr. De Cobain to escape from justice, the Government will cause inquiry to be made as to how confidential official information leaked out in Belfast; and whether the sender of the telegram has rendered himself liable to prosecution?

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): No confidential official information leaked out in the case referred to. The telegram in question is believed to have been sent by a person who was watching the action of the informants in the interests of Mr. De Cobain. I have already directed the police to make further inquiries into the matter, in order to ascertain whether the evidence is sufficient to sustain a prosecution.

ACCELERATED MAIL SERVICE IN IRELAND.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether immediate steps will be taken to provide the inhabitants of the important towns of Wexford, Enniscorthy, and New Ross with an accelerated mail service; and if he is aware that business men in these towns have at present no opportunity of answering letters received by the mid-day train from Dublin until late the same evening?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): There are considerable difficulties in the way of arranging for such a service as is indicated by the hon. Member, and I have agreed to see a deputation from Wexford on the subject towards the end of the present month. I am aware that at Wexford and New Ross there is no opportunity for reply by the day mail except for persons who live near the Post Office, but at Enniscorthy there is a short interval for reply.

LABOURERS' COTTAGES.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention, as President of the Irish Local Government Board, has been directed to the opposition offered to the building of labourers' cottages in the Doneraile Union; and whether steps will be taken to secure the acquisition of land for the erection of a cottage, under the Labourers (Ireland) Acts, for a caretaker at the entrance to Oldcourt Cemetery?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The Local Government Board have no information as to any opposition being offered to the building of labourers' cottages in the Doneraile Union. I believe the Guardians have taken power to rent a number of cottages. I am not aware that there has been any proposition to erect a cottage at Oldcourt Cemetery.

HAULBOWLINE.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether a communication was recently received by the Admiralty from the Cork Harbour Board asking that the Government should establish a naval station and shipbuilding establishment at Haulbowline; and can he state what was the nature of the reply given by the Admiralty?

LORD G. HAMILTON: I recently received a communication from the Cork Chamber of Commerce and Shipping on the subject of a shipbuilding establishment at Haulbowline, and, in reply, I stated that I could not undertake to add to the number of our present shipbuilding establishments, of which we had a sufficient number, and also that Haulbowline was not naturally adapted for the purpose, there being no local supply of skilled labour nor of the material necessary for iron shipbuilding.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): Is the noble Lord aware that the guardship at Queenstown had to be sent recently to Plymouth or Portsmouth for repairs?

LORD G. HAMILTON: I believe that two ships have been sent to Devonport, but it was not because they wanted repairs.

DR. TANNER: Is it the fact that the Triumph had to be anchored within 500 yards of the dock gates, being unable to get into the dockyard?

LORD G. HAMILTON: I have inquired into the matter, and am informed that the harbour had been recently dredged, and there was a settlement, which, however, will be removed at once.

THE CORK UNION.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if it is a fact that a sum of £16,000 is due to the Cork Union under the Medical and Education Acts; and whether this sum will be paid at once?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It does not appear to be the fact that £16,000 is due to the Cork Union, but there is a much smaller sum—about £2,000, I believe—which will be paid to the Union.

BRIGADING OF VOLUNTEER INFANTRY.

SIR H. HAVELOCK-ALLAN (Durham, S.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether, in view of the marked improvement in the movements and efficiency of the Volunteer Force since the Infantry were brigaded under officers of experience, and especially on last Saturday, he will consider the advisability of extending that system of command and supervision if it can be done without much increased expense to the country; and whether, if so, the matter may receive attention during the coming Recess?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: The subject of the local command of the Auxiliary Forces is now engaging careful consideration.

STATISTICAL ABSTRACTORS.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, as the summer season is now far advanced, he can state when the decision of the Treasury will be announced as to the leave which is to be granted to the Statistical Abstractors in Her Majesty's Customs, who were appointed in February last?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The Treasury has decided upon the leave which is to be granted to the Statistical Abstractors in Her Majesty's Customs, and the decision will be communicated to the Board of Customs at once.

THE EDUCATION ESTIMATES.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education when he intends to make his annual statement; and whether the Report of the Committee of Council on Education, and the Reports of Her Majesty's Inspectors, will be distributed to Members before the statement is made?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): The opportunity for my annual statement on the Education Estimates must depend on the progress made with the preceding Votes. The General Report of the Committee of Council has been laid on the Table to-day, and will be circulated as soon as possible. The Reports of Her Majesty's Inspectors were presented on the 6th inst., and will be distributed in a day or two.

POSTAGE OF FRIENDLY SOCIETY CIRCULARS.

MR. ATKINSON (Boston): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he will arrange to encourage thrift by letting postages on "arrears summonses" for subscriptions overdue to Friendly Societies be charged a halfpenny each, as allowed to tradesmen in issuing statements of account?

*MR. RAIKES: The question of surcharges on these circulars has for a long time occupied my attention, and if the hon. Member is alluding to the desire of the Friendly Societies often expressed for such an alteration of the rules as will permit of a statement of account being combined with a circular, I hope, in the event of the Post Office Acts Amendment Bill becoming law this Session, to be in a position to meet their wishes.

SALVATIONISTS AT EASTBOURNE.

MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the practical refusal of the Magistrates of Eastbourne to inflict punishment on those riotous individuals who attack the Salvation Army, whilst meting out imprisonment to the members of that body brought before the Bench; whether he is aware that there are only 38 policemen in Eastbourne, and that only 18 were on duty on Sunday last, the 12th instant, when it is said that a mob of some thousands attacked the Salvationists; and whether he can take any steps to cause the police of Eastbourne to be reinforced sufficiently to maintain order? Before the question is answered, may I read the following telegram from a witness:—

"I witnessed two attacks, one in the afternoon and another in the evening. The former was the most serious, as the small contingent of police were utterly unable to contend with the opposing force. In the evening the number of police was larger, and was under the personal direction of Superintendent Fraser, who frankly admitted their inability to effectually control such a mob. Instead of enforcing the law, the Magistrate seems to leave the vindication in the hands of the roughs of the town, and when the police arrested some of these self-appointed administrators for breach of the peace, the Mayor considered it in accordance with the maintenance of law and order to send to the Superintendent of Police a special letter to see what can be done in their behalf."

MR. ATKINSON: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will answer my question. If he will interfere to prevent the Magistrates at Eastbourne applying a clause of a local Act to the Salvation Army, which clause has been abandoned at Torquay, and is not now acted upon anywhere else than at Eastbourne; if he will reduce the sentences of the members of the Salvation Army now imprisoned under this clause, so as to let them go free, and cancel convictions and penalties of £5 each, imposed upon domestic servants for marching in processions for religious purposes (such penalties not having yet been enforced, although imposed); and if he will call attention to the necessity of adequate sentences being passed upon roughs who are attacking the police and the members of the Salvation Army at Eastbourne?

MR. MATTHEWS: It is inconvenient, without notice, to read to the House a telegram reflecting on the conduct of the police, to which I cannot possibly give an answer.

*MR. SCHWANN: It is in connection with the question which I asked, and does not reflect on the police but upon their numbers.

MR. MATTHEWS: With reference to the question on the Paper, I have not had time to refer these particular questions to the Local Authority. I can only say that the Reports hitherto made to me assure me that the police protection afforded is quite adequate. I will, however, make further inquiry into this matter. I have no reason to believe that the Magistrates act otherwise than impartially in awarding punishment to those proved guilty of disturbing the peace, whether they are Salvationists or not. To-day's paper reports that one prisoner was convicted of disturbance in connection with these processions and bound over to keep the peace for six months; and in the case of the three men whom I referred to in my answer of June 15, the utmost punishment that the law allowed was inflicted. With regard to the position of the Home Office in the matter, I have nothing to add to the answer which I gave in this House on June 12 in reply to the hon. Member for Shoreditch.

*MR. SCHWANN: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he has seen the report in the Manchester Guardian of to-day, in which it is said that the Chief Constable of Eastbourne appealed to the Bench to send some riotous non-Salvationist men for trial, as it was owing to the interference of the general public that the police found it difficult to stop the Army processions?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman must give notice.

*MR. SCHWANN: This is a very important question, Mr. Speaker.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

CENSUS RETURNS.

MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board when the preliminary Report of the Census Returns for England and Wales, which was presented last week, will be issued?

*MR. RITCHIE: The last pages of the Report will be sent to press to-day, and I hope that it will be circulated before the end of the week.

PIER AT RED GAP, ON THE SHANNON.

MR. JORDAN (Clare, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he has received any Resolution or Memorial from the inhabitants of Labasheeda, County Clare, in reference to the building of a pier at Red Gap, on the Shannon, from which to ship and unload the imports and exports of that locality; and whether, having regard to the fact that when the Lord Lieutenant was on his late tour in that district, Colonel Lloyd and Mr. Reeves brought him to Red Gap, pointed out the necessity for the pier, and obtained His Excellency's promise that it would be erected, and also to the fact that there is neither pier nor landing-stage nearer Labasheeda than 7 miles on the one side and 12 on the other, he will advise or authorise the erection of a small pier at this point?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not been able to get information on this subject, and perhaps the hon. Gentleman will put the question down for Thursday.

AN INDECENT PROGRAMME.

SIR J. COLOMB (Tower Hamlets Bow, &c.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware of the fact that on Friday forenoon last a so-called official programme of procession, but without any printer's name, was sold in the streets; that one of the pages was entirely filled with disgracefully indecent matter calculated to corrupt and deprave women and girls ; and whether, pending such action as may be possible to bring parties concerned to justice, he will consider the expediency of warning the public against buying in the streets or elsewhere any publication which has not printed upon it the name of the printer or publisher ?

MR. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): With reference to paragraph No. 2, might I ask whether there was anything in this official programme to corrupt men and boys as well ?

MR. MATTHEWS: I must leave the hon. Member to judge of that himself. With regard to the notice upon the Paper, I have to say that my attention has been called to this offensive circular. I am informed that the police took into custody a man for selling this leaflet. He was yesterday remanded for a week, in order to give the police an opportunity of discovering the printers. The matter is in the hands of the Treasury Solicitor, who will take such steps as the law admits of. The question of my hon. Friend will have the effect of warning the public, and I hope the pending proceedings will be effective in stopping the sale of such papers.

ORANGE LODGES IN THE ARMY.

MR. RENTOUL (Down, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether there is any foundation for the statement published in various newspapers that the Commander-in-Chief has decided to suppress Orange Lodges in the Army, and whether he knows of any reason for interfering with the lodges of the Society ?

MR. H. BYRON REED: I should like to inform the right hon. Gentleman that I will not put the following question which stands in my name, because it has been altered, and the point taken out of it since I handed it in at the Table.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman's question was out of order.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, S.): Has the right hon. Gentleman any objection to lay on the Table of the House a copy of the General Orders issued by the Duke of York, 22, and the further Orders of the Commander-in-Chief, 35, against the formation of Orange Lodges as prejudicial to the Service ?

Sir J. Colomb

*MR. E. STANHOPE: In reply to my hon. Friend, I have to say that the statement in the newspapers is substantially correct. Formerly Orange Lodges were forbidden by name, in the Regulations for the Army ; but in recent years it has been held that they were sufficiently covered by the rule which prohibited among soldiers political meetings of any sort whatever. As it came to the knowledge of the Commander-in-Chief that an Orange Lodge had been formed in a regiment in contravention of the intention of the Queen's Regulations, His Royal Highness gave orders for its being dissolved.

THE IRISH EDUCATION GRANT.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether any conclusive decision has been come to with respect to the appropriation of Ireland's share of the new grant for primary education in the present financial year ?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I had hoped to be able to deal with this question in the present Session, but perhaps it will be better to defer any final decision upon it until next Session, when the Government are pledged to bring in a Bill. If it were not passed before the end of the financial year a Supplementary Estimate could be brought in for allocating the money.

THE GERMAN CONVICT MÜNCH.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if there is any necessity for further delay in announcing his decision with regard to the German convict Münch, now lying under sentence of death, whose execution is fixed for the 21st instant ?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed by the solicitors acting for the prisoner that a Petition is being prepared in his behalf, and I have delayed announcing any decision in the case until I have received and considered this Petition.

THE KIOSK IN KEW GARDENS.

MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Hoxton): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether his attention has been called to the character of the refreshments served at the kiosk in Kew Gardens ; what are the terms upon which the contractor holds possession of the kiosk; and whether the conditions permit margarine to be sold for butter, the selling of bread and pastry which people are occasionally unable to eat, and serving tea from the bulk after promising fresh tea to each customer?

*THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, Dublin University): I have not had time to make inquiries into this matter, and must ask the hon. Member to postpone his question.

SUNDAY DRUNKENNESS.

MR. KENYON (Denbigh, &c.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to a statement in the evening papers, that the number of convictions for Sunday drunkenness had increased in the County of Glamorgan to 3,636 in 1890 as against 3,190 in 1889; whether he has any means of knowing whether the statement is correct; and whether there are any special reasons for the increase which he can communicate to the House?

MR. MATTHEWS: The Chief Constable has furnished me with a Return showing that the figures, which are correctly quoted for the years ending May 31, 1890 and 1891, refer to convictions for being drunk and disorderly on week days. The figures for Sunday are 928 and 1,082 for the two years respectively. The Chief Constable is disposed to attribute the increase to the general prosperity prevailing in that part of the country.

THE PICTURES AT SOUTH KENSINGTON MUSEUM.

MR. ELLIOTT LEES (Oldham): I beg to ask the Attorney General whether he can inform the House if the Government can lawfully transfer the collection of pictures at South Kensington from the South Kensington Museum and the control of a responsible Minister of the Crown to the proposed new gallery under the management of a Board of Trustees?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): The conditions under which the collections of pictures at the South Kensington Museum are exhibited are not identical in all cases, but, generally speaking, they cannot be transferred from the control of the responsible Minister of the Crown, and in the cases in which they could be permitted to be removed from South Kensington, the removal could only be for the purpose of temporary exhibition elsewhere.

THE TRUSTEES OF THE NATIONAL GALLERY.

MR. ELLIOTT LEES: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether Parliament has any control over the Trustees of the National Gallery; and, if not, whether the Government are prepared to suggest any plan by which pictures paid for by the nation may be brought under the control of the nation; and whether the Government will advise the Trustees of the National Gallery to ascertain from the Science and Art Department whether any great risk attaches to the interchange between various Provincial Art Galleries of collections of works of art; and, if no such risk is to be feared, whether the Government will recommend the Trustees to adopt a similar system with regard to their less important pictures now loaned to Provincial Art Galleries under the National Gallery Loan Act?

MR. GOSCHEN: I will answer this question on behalf of my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury. The management of the National Gallery and the care and ordering of the national property deposited therein are vested in Trustees and a Director, subject to such regulations and directions as may from time to time be issued by the Board of Treasury. There would be no advantage in consulting the Science and Art Department as to the amount of risk attending the circulation of works of art among provincial museums. The objects lent by that department are conveyed from museum to museum under the care of experienced persons specially employed for that purpose by the department, but the National Gallery have no staff available for such a purpose. The Trustees and Director are of opinion that it would not be expedient to give any general sanction to the periodical exchange of pictures lent by them to provincial Institutions, as they consider that each application for exchange should be considered by them on its merits.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I should like to know what are the functions of the Lord President. There was a time when he was engaged in educational matters. That has ceased, because the Vice President looks after the job. There was a time when he had something to do with agriculture. That is now done by the President of the Board of Agriculture.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The hon. Member is mistaken. The Lord President is distinctly interested in educational matters.

MR. LABOUCHERE: We are all interested, of course; but the Lord President gets a salary of £2,000, and does he for that take part in the work connected with education?

*MR. GOSCHEN: He acts as Minister.

*MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): What are the duties which the Lord President discharges? because the information we have received is of a very indefinite character. The duties should be onerous when it is considered necessary to pay him £2,000 a year for the performance of them. The Clerk of the Council, the deputy, senior and junior clerks, all receive large salaries, amounting in the aggregate to £6,620.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I can assure the hon. Gentleman that a great many duties attach to the Department. All Orders in Council pass through it, besides which the Office has a great deal to do with education. There is a great deal of work to be done both by the Minister and the Department.

(5.0.) MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I notice that one of the senior clerks is allowed to go away on military duty as Lieutenant-Colonel of Militia, and receives pay. I wish to know whether he is paid both as a Militia officer and as a clerk, or whether any deduction is made from his pay? That sort of thing would not be allowed among the junior clerks. I should also like some information about this £50 to purveyors of luncheons. I have noticed other sums of £25 for a similar purpose. It seems to me that these highly-paid officials should pay for the expenses connected with their luncheons out of their own pockets, as clerks in commercial houses are expected to do. I move that the Vote be reduced by the sum of £50.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item A, salaries and wages, be reduced by £50, allowance to purveyor of luncheons."—(Mr. Morton.)

*MR. CREMER: I think some explanation ought to be forthcoming in respect of this item, and how it is that though it is a small office, it has £50, while larger offices have only £25. It is an extraordinary thing that Members of this House who do not receive one farthing for their services have to pay a fair price for what they eat and drink in the building, while the clerks in the Government Offices, with high salaries, are supplied with refreshments at a price which entails a loss, because I assume the excuse is that the purveyor cannot get a profit on the prices he charges. These clerks are well paid, and we ought not to be asked to provide them with refreshments at a cheap rate, or to recoup the purveyor for the loss he sustains. I think the item ought to be rejected by the Committee. I wish also to ask a question as to the office hours of the higher and lower grade clerks in the Privy Council Office. I want to know what time they enter the establishment, what time they leave, and what hours they have for refreshment? I should also like similar information as to the hours of the other persons engaged in the office.

MR. LABOUCHERE: There is one point on which my hon. Friend is mistaken with regard to these luncheons. He says it is monstrous that these clerks should have luncheon for nothing, or at a cheap rate, while we have to pay for what we consume. But my hon. Friend forgets that this House votes £1,000 to the Kitchen Committee to provide coal and other things. I would point out that we must reform ourselves before we attempt to reform others.

DR. CLARK: I was not here when the £1,000 was passed, but next year I propose to move its omission from the Estimates, and I can, therefore, with a clear conscience, vote with my hon. Friend. There are only 10 clerks in the Privy Council Office, and yet we are asked to vote £50 for refreshments. In the Colonial Office, and some other offices, where there are large staffs of who is anxious to speak upon it will not be able to attend Parliament much longer this Session, and in that case I will put the Bill down after 12 o'clock in order to afford him an opportunity of speaking on it. But I would not be justified in stopping Supply until we have made further progress.

*MR. SCHWANN: Can the right hon. Gentleman say when the Irish Land Bill will be brought down from another place, and also when the Indian Budget will be taken?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I certainly am unable to make any announcement at present, but if the question is repeated on Thursday, I will probably be able to make a statement.

MR. PICTON (Leicester): Will the right hon. Gentleman be good enough to say whether the Government include the Clergy Discipline Bill among the contentious measures?

*MR. GOSCHEN: The hon. Member will bear in mind that my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury made certain reserves, and this Bill was distinctly mentioned as one in which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian felt a deep interest. I do not know whether it will be possible to persevere with the Bill, but perhaps I shall be able to let the hon. Member know a few days later.

MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W): Could it not be included among those measures which will not be pressed?

*MR. GOSCHEN: It was specially excepted by my right hon. Friend, and I am within the recollection of the House, when I say that he made a special reservation with regard to it.

THE TRANSATLANTIC CATTLE TRADE.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I wish to ask whether the Government will give facilities for the Amelioration of the Transatlantic Cattle Trade in the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Bill, this Session. The demand for the Second Reading of this Bill was supported by the delegates of 140,000 members of the Seamen and Firemen's Union.

*MR. GOSCHEN: My hon. Friend knows that a pledge was given by my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury not to proceed with any further contentious measures than those named in his statement as to the business of the House. The Government attach very great importance to this Bill, but they would not, in the face of the opposition which they know exists, be justified, consistently with their pledges, in asking the House to devote time to this measure. The President of the Board of Agriculture is engaged on the subject, and he hopes to make arrangements which will to a very great extent mitigate the evils with which the Bill is intended to deal.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

That they have agreed to,—Bills of Sale Act (1890) Amendment Bill, without Amendment; Forged Transfers (No. 2) Bill; Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill, with Amendments.

That they have passed a Bill, intituled, "An Act to facilitate the transfer of schools for science and art to local authorities." [Schools for Science and Art Bill [Lords.]]

And, also, a Bill, intituled, "An Act to amend 'The Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1888,' and the Law relating to Mortmain and Charitable Uses." [Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act Amendment Bill [Lords.]]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES, 1891-2.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS II.

(4.55.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £11,009, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1892, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Department of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council and for Quarantine Expenses."

DR. CLARK (Caithness): Is this sum put in the Estimates for the first time?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): It is mentioned for the first time.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I should like to know what are the functions of the Lord President. There was a time when he was engaged in educational matters. That has ceased, because the Vice President looks after the job. There was a time when he had something to do with agriculture. That is now done by the President of the Board of Agriculture.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The hon. Member is mistaken. The Lord President is distinctly interested in educational matters.

MR. LABOUCHERE: We are all interested, of course; but the Lord President gets a salary of £2,000, and does he for that take part in the work connected with education?

*MR. GOSCHEN: He acts as Minister.

*MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): What are the duties which the Lord President discharges? because the information we have received is of a very indefinite character. The duties should be onerous when it is considered necessary to pay him £2,000 a year for the performance of them. *MR. GOSCHEN: I can assure the hon. Gentleman that a great many duties attach to the Department. All Orders in Council pass through it, besides which the Office has a great deal to do with education. There is a great deal of work to be done both by the Minister and the Department.

(5.0.) MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I notice that one of the senior clerks is allowed to go away on military duty as Lieutenant-Colonel of Militia, and receives pay. I wish to know whether he is paid both as a Militia officer and as a clerk, or whether any deduction is made from his pay? That sort of thing would not be allowed among the junior clerks. to do. I move that the Vote be reduced by the sum of £50.

*MR. CREMER: I think some explanation ought to be forthcoming in respect of this item, and how it is that though it is a small office, it has £50, while larger offices have only £25. It is an extraordinary thing that Members of this House who do not receive one farthing for their services have to pay a fair price for what they eat and drink in the building, while the clerks in the Government Offices, with high salaries, are supplied with refreshments at a price which entails a loss, because I assume the excuse is that the purveyor cannot get a profit on the prices he charges. These clerks are well paid, and we ought not to be asked to provide them with refreshments at a cheap rate, or to recoup the purveyor for the loss he sustains. I think the item ought to be rejected by the Committee. I wish also to ask a question as to the office hours of the higher and lower grade clerks in the Privy Council Office. I want to know what time they enter the establishment, what time they leave, and what hours they have for refreshment? I should also like similar information as to the hours of the other persons engaged in the office.

MR. LABOUCHERE: There is one point on which my hon. Friend is mistaken with regard to these luncheons. He says it is monstrous that these clerks should have luncheon for nothing, or at a cheap rate, while we have to pay for what we consume. But my hon. Friend forgets that this House votes £1,000 to the Kitchen Committee to provide coal and other things. I would point out that we must reform ourselves before we attempt to reform others.

DR. CLARK: I was not here when the £1,000 was passed, but next year I propose to move its omission from the Estimates, and I can, therefore, with a clear conscience, vote with my hon. Friend. There are only 10 clerks in the Privy Council Office, and yet we are asked to vote £50 for refreshments. In the Colonial Office, and some other offices, where there are large staffs of clerks, there is no Vote at all for the luncheons. I think the Treasury ought to grant an allowance to all the offices or stop the allowance in the case of those which have it.

(5.5.) MR. JACKSON: It seems to me that there is a great deal of unnecessary time taken up in the discussion of very small matters. The hon. Gentleman who raised this question spoke as though these "highly-paid clerks," as he called them, got their luncheons for nothing.

MR. CREMER: What I said was that the inference to be drawn from the appearance of this sum in the Votes was that they received their luncheons at a reduced rate, and that the purveyor in consequence sustained a loss, which is made up to him by these amounts. I did not say that they had free, but cheap meals at the expense of the nation.

MR. JACKSON: In other words the hon. Member repeats his statement, that the State is called upon to provide a luncheon at a loss for these clerks. Now, provision is made for obtaining food and refreshments in these offices, not in the interest of the purveyor, but in the interest of the public service. Anybody who knows anything about the affairs connected with Public Departments, knows it is impossible to carry on business unless a great number of clerks are in constant attendance. It is not even for the convenience of the clerks, but for the convenience of the public service that luncheons are provided in the offices, and no more false economy could possibly be perpetrated than to limit the opportunities of getting a cup of tea or a mutton chop in the office. I would point out that the Privy Council Office includes all the Education Office, and, therefore, it is not a small office. I do not myself think that £50 is at all too much, and I do not suppose the purveyor gets one fraction of profit out of it, the demand for refreshment being extremely irregular. The alternative is for these clerks to go to the nearest establishment they can find to get their luncheons, thereby losing a great deal more time. It is impossible to fix a particular hour at which a particular clerk shall leave, because Ministers may call at any period of the day for some important information, and, therefore, it is really for the great convenience of the public service that this allowance should be continued. The hours of attendance of the official clerks at the Privy Council Office are from 11 o'clock to 5 o'clock, and the messengers from 10 to 6. But most persons with experience of the Government Departments know that during a large portion of the year there is some one in attendance as a general rule until 7, 8, or 9 o'clock in the evening. It is not necessarily the case that the clerks do not stay a great deal longer than the official hours.

(5.10.) MR. CREMER: The right hon. Gentleman has certainly not given a satisfactory answer to the question I addressed to him concerning the time allowed the clerks for lunch, and why it should be necessary to pay £50 to this purveyor. It seems to me that these officials do get their meals at a reduced price, and that we are called upon to make up out of the taxes the loss to the purveyor. I think we have a right to know who is the purveyor. It has been stated that it is one of the officials who provides these refreshments.

MR. JACKSON: I believe, Sir, the ordinary understanding is that there is half an hour for luncheon.

MR. MORTON: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered my question about the senior clerk.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member has moved a reduction on the luncheon question, and that must be dealt with first.

MR. MORTON: Well, I am not satisfied with the right hon. Gentleman's answer, and I do not admit his right to lecture us for seeking information on these Votes, whether the questions we raise are small or not. Surely he must know that if we can save the pennies the pounds will take care of themselves. It is a well-known fact that in public offices the clerks can take an hour and can go out if they choose.

DR. CLARK: I hope my hon. Friend will not persist in his Motion, because I think this Vote is being dropped by the Departments one by one. I think, however, we ought to know whether the luncheons are purveyed by one of the clerks or by someone outside.

MR. JACKSON: I believe it is usually done by the office keeper. I do not see that there is any harm in that.

(5.15.) MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I do not feel called upon to champion the Government, but I cannot honestly sit here and listen to the grotesque caricature of the practice which has fallen from my hon. Friends. It would be perfectly impossible to administer many public Departments if the staffs were in the habit of going out to luncheon in the middle of the day. It would absolutely upset all discipline and would materially interfere with work. I think, however, it would be very much better if the Estimate showed that the money asked for is simply the wage paid to the distributing servants who take the luncheons from the kitchens to the various rooms. The purveyors are obliged to bring in servants to distribute the luncheons, and that is the whole sum and substance of the matter.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I do not see why my hon. Friend the Member for Peterborough should be blamed for discussing these unconsidered trifles. My hon. Friend is in the nature of an elephant, being able to crush an oak or to pick up a pin with equal facility. I really believe that the country gains by the arrangement for providing the clerks with refreshments in their offices. The £50 merely means that the office keeper has a retaining fee to supply minor refreshments and obtain assistance in carrying them about the offices.

*MR. CREMER: The hon. Member seems to have lost sight of the fact that the staff are paid high salaries, and, therefore, are in a position to pay for refreshments at cost price.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

2. Motion made, and Question proposed,

(5.20.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid.): I beg to move the reduction of Sub-head 2 by £500, in order to obtain information on certain points. Having from time to time obtained trustworthy information from men who spend their lives on the ocean, I think the insufficiency of medical provision and supervision on the transatlantic liners and in the Mercantile Marine generally with regard to steerage passengers demands greater attention. I think also that inquiry is needed with regard to the great risks incurred in consequence of the system under which master mariners at sea doctor the members of their crew without having any acquaintance with the medical art. On several occasions I have brought these matters before the House. Many of these ships are sent to sea without sufficient accommodation for their steerage passengers, and many of the men have to crowd together in a most disgusting way. Some eight years ago the Board of Trade issued a Circular calling upon the surgeons to report any cases of overcrowding or of insanitary conditions; but no complaints have been made. This is because it is as much as the medical officer's post is worth to make any complaint. Two medical men have written largely on the subject, and their writings have been made public in the Lancet and the British Medical Journal. They are Dr. Irwin, who is now making a large fortune in the city of New York, and Dr. Leet, of Liverpool. Dr. Leet, who had had great experience in the Army Medical Service in Great Britain, became medical man on the steamer Celtic, of the White Star Line. He says he very soon found insanitary conditions, but he was indirectly warned all round to report nothing if his berth was to be a permanent one. After struggling with his conscience for two years he received his first snub, when he wrote a polite letter intimating that the steerage accommodation was of an improper character. His letter was treated with contemptuous silence. Three years afterwards he wrote another letter, drawing attention to the sanitary defects of the Celtic, and registered it at the Post Office to ensure delivery. This was also received with contemptuous silence, as was another letter, written a few months later, in 1886. The ship was laid up during the following winter, and when she was brought out again the managers dismissed Dr. Leet without giving him any satisfaction. He was dismissed simply because he acted according to the letter and the spirit of the Board of Trade regulations and reported the insanitary condition of the vessel. I have myself been on board many of the ships belonging to different transatlantic lines that touch at Queenstown, and I know many of the men on board them. I know, from my personal acquaintance with these gentlemen, that it is absolutely out of their power to do anything to remedy the defects. In his letter to the British Medical Journal Mr. Irving says shipowners take precaution to comply with the minimum requirements of the law, and judiciously select men who will not see what they are not wanted to see in the interest of their employers. But I hope, though he has to do with capitalists who are large shipowners, the President of the Board of Trade will guard the interests of those poor emigrants who, in search of employment, leave this country for the Western Continent. Again and again have representations been made as to the necessity of medical men on board these liners being placed in an independent position with the means of making their remonstrances effective. In the present day all space in these passenger vessels is of the greatest value, and this makes the companies extremely covetous of any space which may be allotted for sanitary purposes. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman to recollect what has been done with regard to the Australian vessels. Medical men are put on board those ships who are independent and who are responsible only to the Board of Trade. But the position of medical men on board the steamers to America is not such as to enable them to discharge the duties required of them by the Board of Trade. Vessels proceeding from Liverpool to America are inspected by Board of Trade officials at Liverpool and Queenstown. Nothing can be more ridiculous than these inspections. The medical men stand in the gangway and look at the emigrants as they enter the ship. How can any one detect in such circumstances a case of zymotic disease? It is frequently found, shortly after a ship has put to sea, that there is an outbreak of one of these diseases. As a matter of fact it is ascertained, on making inquiries on the American side, that a great mass of disease is frequently imported into America in consequence of the sanitary regulations of the Board of Trade not being complied with. Again, the regulations of the Board of Trade with respect to hospitals are often disregarded. The hospitals are made use of for all sorts of purposes. It frequently happens that a purser, a doctor, or an engineer gives up his cabin to a passenger, and then finds other quarters for himself in the hospital. I know of one case when the hospital was turned into a sort of mortuary. This is the way in which the regulations of the Board of Trade are treated. If the medical man reports on the subject he gets what is technically called the sack and loses his situation. I know that the President of the Board of Trade has said that if a flagrant case were brought under his notice he would order a prosecution, but I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that it is absolutely impossible to get the information laid, for the people who could give it know that if they did so they would lose their situations, and the emigrants who suffer have not the opportunity — when they land their thoughts and efforts are at once turned to earning a living. Another point I wish to mention is that a distinct place should be set apart on board the vessels for keeping the medicine chest, and also for the compounding of medicines, which ought not to be done in the hospital. The situation of the hospitals, too, should be altered. At present they are generally established in the most out-of-the-way and inconvenient places, whereas they ought to be on the main deck, and placed amidships. It is of great importance likewise that the Board of Trade should take steps to insure a sufficient supply of fresh water on board the steamers that carry large complements of steerage passengers. At present the state of things in this respect is deplorable. I remember that not many years since a vessel named the Servia went across the Atlantic with 700 steerage passengers, and only one water tap was furnished to supply all these people with fresh water for all purposes—cooking, drinking, and washing. It was a miserable sight to see the strings of people waiting all day long to get the chance of a little water to quench their thirst, and how could there be health or cleanliness under such circumstances? There is yet another matter, perhaps even more important than any I have yet mentioned, to which I desire to draw the attention of the President of the Board of Trade. There are many of the smaller lines which carry emigrants across the Atlantic from England to America, but return laden with cattle, because the carriage of cattle pays best. When the vessels arrive at Liverpool they are, of course, in a very filthy and unwholesome state; and yet within a week, the cattle-pens having been removed, the vessels, only partially cleansed, and still in a filthy state, start again on the voyage to America filled with emigrants. No permanent sanitary regulations are observed on board such ships. Mr. Plimsoll interested himself in this matter, but little has been done by way of improvement. Two years ago I brought under the attention of the President of the Board of Trade a case in which 700 emigrants were battened down in severe weather for three days in a vessel going across the Atlantic, and this was done without any observance of sanitary requirements. Water was passed down to the emigrants only three times a day, and the condition of things that this led to was indescribably horrible. When such things take place in spite of the rules and regulations of the Board of Trade, it is necessary that some more stringent action should be taken. At present the ship's surgeon is powerless in the matter. My opinion is supported by high medical authorities, including the public medical journals, both the British Medical Journal and the Lancet, and they have argued in favour of providing an effective remedy by making the surgeons on board the vessels thoroughly independent of the shipowners, so that they may, if necessary, communicate freely and fearlessly with the Board of Trade. Great improvements have been effected in the emigrant service to Australia, and surely the same might be done in connection with that to America, and I earnestly trust the right hon. Gentleman will give the Committee some assurance that he will move in the matter. Then I would call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the case of trading vessels which are not carrying passengers, put to sea with a large complement of men on board, and are not provided with any medical assistance at all. My own experience as a medical man, and the information I have from medical friends in Liverpool, leads me to say that an immense amount of suffering and complications of diseases ensue from men falling ill or sustaining injuries on board ship and having no means of medical relief at hand. Of course the captains have had no medical training, and I think they should be obliged to attend a certain course of lectures. I find that this year there are no fewer than 21,779 vessels registered, of which 13,835 are sailing vessels over 100 tons, and 6,502 steam vessels. If one considers the enormous number of sailors on board those vessels, and the large number of families dependent upon them, the stronger will appear the necessity for steps being taken to secure that some medical skill is on board in case of need. You had Returns dealing with this matter in 1875 and 1882, but very little has been done with regard to it. Dr. J. F. Maguire, of Cork, who first called attention to the question, got on board one of these steamers without anybody knowing who he was, and was taken to America, so that he was able to throw considerable light on the horrors of the passage. Of course many of the faults of those days have been remedied, but many still remain, and as a medical man and an Irish Member, whose country has been decimated by emigration, the result, as I believe, of misgovernment, I think I should not be doing my duty if I did not call attention to these grievances. I believe that the more they are made public the more satisfactorily they will be dealt with for the benefit of the poor people themselves and of humanity.

*(6.5.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. Hicks Beach, Bristol, W.): The hon. Member has gone at very considerable length into this matter. I do not at all question the importance of the subject, but on that account I should have been glad if the hon. Member had given me some little notice of his intention to bring it forward.

DR. TANNER: I should certainly have given notice, but I did not think there was any necessity for doing so. I said last year I would bring it on.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I can hardly accept that as proper notice, but I do not at all complain of the course the hon. Member has taken except on the ground that it renders me incapable of following him into the details. In 1888 the hon. Member made almost the same speech as he has made to-night. [Dr. TANNER dissented.] Well, that is my recollection. I think he will admit that I answered him to this effect: that I was anxious to put down any evils of the kind to which he alluded, and if he would furnish any detailed cases where those evils had occurred, I would have them thoroughly investigated, and the persons who might be found guilty punished. The hon. Member supplied me with no details, but, in spite of that, I soon afterwards directed an inquiry to be made at Liverpool by one of the highest officers of the Board of Trade. That investigation was made towards the close of 1888, and I was utterly unable to discover any ground for the accusation the hon. Member had made against the lines trading between Liverpool and America. When the hon. Member made a similar speech last Session, I made him the same offer as on the previous occasion, but no facts have been brought to my knowledge, and I am in the same position as before. With regard to the suggestion that it would be better if medical officers on these ships could keep their medicine chests in some place other than their berths, and that in some ships the situation of the hospital should be altered, I shall be glad to look into the point, and if I can make any regulations which will insure better sanitary arrangements, I will certainly do so. There must be some amount of hurry in the inspection of emigrant ships on leaving port, but I believe, after doing the very best in my power to make myself acquainted with the facts, that the medical officers intrusted with this duty perform it in an able, zealous, and competent manner. There may have been individual cases—I remember one—where an emigrant has been permitted to take passage who ought not to have been allowed to go on the vessel, but such cases are very rare indeed. I believe, also, that as regards the accommodation of passengers the requirements of the law are carried out. It is, of course, impossible to send an officer to go through the voyage on every emigrant ship to see that no regulation is broken during the voyage; but I think better of the medical profession than to believe that the medical officers will not be as ready to report any breach of the regulations as their brethren on land are to report on insanitary matters. The hon. Member's proposal that the position of medical officers should be independent of the shipowners, and the suggestion with reference to vessels on which there is no medical officer could not be carried out without legislation. I have no power to make any regulations dealing with those matters at all. I am afraid that I can only again repeat that if the hon. Member can produce any evidence of individual cases in which regulations of the Board of Trade have been broken during the voyage, I will not only have an inquiry conducted on the spot, but will also endeavour so to watch such ships in future that any further infringement shall be rendered impossible.

(6.15.) DR. TANNER: I am afraid I have not gained much, but I shall try and do my best in this matter as long as I am a Member of this House. I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it could not be provided that medical officers should report to the Board of Trade instead of to their owners. A point is made in the British Medical Journal about medical officers being called upon to report more fully than they are in the habit of doing.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: My impression has been that there was some duty incumbent on the medical officers to report to the Board of Trade, but I will look into that question.

(6.16.) MR. ROWNTREE (Scarborough): I wish to ask some questions respecting the Sea Fisheries Department of the Board of Trade. That Department is practically a new one. The Chief Inspector of Fisheries referred in his Report to a Conference, which it was proposed to hold in June, of the representatives of various Sea Fisheries Committees round our coast with the heads of the Department. I wish to ask whether the Conference was held, how many of the Sea Fishery Committees were represented, and whether a report of the proceedings will appear in the Journal of the Board of Trade. I think the Department is to be congratulated on the way in which its suggestions have been adopted around the coast. The need for the Act is strikingly shown by the statistics as to the decrease in the catches of the deep sea fishermen in the North Sea. This is a matter of great national concern. If there has been any delay in putting the Act into operation, I think it is on the part of the Local Authorities and not on the part of the Board of Trade. I wish to direct the right hon. Gentleman's attention to one difficulty that has shown itself with regard to the effective carrying out of the provisions of this Act. Something like a third of the members of the Sea Fisheries Committees are nominated by the Board of Trade from those who are actually engaged in the sea fishing industry. Many of them are practical fishermen, and I believe the effect of appointing them has been most useful, as it has enlisted in the operation of the Act the sympathies of the men engaged in the fishing industry. In some parts of the country two or three, or even three or four, counties have united together and formed a Sea Fisheries Committee. The result is that the expense to fishermen attending the meetings is sometimes very serious, as attendance means a journey of 50, 60, 70, or even 80 miles. A fisherman going to a meeting so far away has to give up a day's work, and, in addition, incur expense amounting sometimes to as much as 11s. The result has been in some instances practically to prohibit the attendance of fishermen at the meetings. I understand that at present there are no means by which either the Board of Trade or the National Treasury can defray the expenses of the fishermen when called away from their homes on the work of these Committees. I am afraid the absence of any such provision must destroy much of the value of the Sea Fisheries Committees, and I would appeal to the President of the Board of Trade to consider whether something cannot be done to meet the difficulty I have pointed out. There is at present a Bill before the House which embodies several useful Amendments to the Sea Fisheries Act, and I confess I have been somewhat tempted to put down Amendments to that measure to carry out the object I have in view. I have refrained from that course, however, because the Bill is a very useful one, and I have been afraid of jeopardising its passing into law this Session. I congratulate the Board of Trade on the success which has attended their effort to give the workers in this industry some controlling voice over it. They have done more in this respect than any other Government Department, but, at the same time, it is to be regretted that the usefulness of their Act should be marred by the inability of any public body to pay the third-class railway fare of the fishermen who are members of the Committees.

(6.22.) MR. T. ELLIS (Merionethshire): The Report as to the working of the Sea Fisheries Act shows how generally the Act has been adopted, and I think the constitution of the Sea Fisheries Committees all round the coast has given satisfaction to everybody. I would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that he should increase the usefulness and interest of the Report by adding a map showing the boundaries of the various sea fishery districts. I would also join in the appeal of the hon. Member for Scarborough, that some steps should be taken towards defraying the expenses of the fishermen attending the meetings. One of the most valuable provisions in the Sea Fisheries Act is, that a fair proportion of the members of the Committees should be practical fishermen. I believe the presence of fishermen on the Committees, and the other clause in the Act which enables the President of the Board of Trade to summon Conventions of the various Committees, will do more than anything else to make the Act of real value to the fishermen all round the coast. But the fishermen cannot attend the meetings in large and appreciable numbers unless some contribution is made to their expenses. Often the Committees meet at considerable distances from the residences of the men, who very frequently cannot afford the expense of attending. I trust the right hon. Gentleman will hold out some promise that he will devise some means by which some moderate allowance will be made towards the travelling expenses of the practical fishermen.

(6.26.) MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I also should like to congratulate the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade on the success of the Fishery Act—and I think that I have probably had as much experience of it working in Essex as any hon. Member has had in any other part of the country. But my object in troubling the Committee is not to deal with that Act. I believe that Friendly Societies and Trades Unions that are on the Register may make terms with the Board of Trade, and, that being so, I should like to call attention to certain matters connected with the National Agricultural Labourers' Union. This Union was formed in 1873—

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I rise to order. This question has nothing to do with the Vote now before the Committee.

THE CHAIRMAN: I am not aware of the connection.

MAJOR RASCH: Shall I be able to call attention to this question on the Vote for the Friendly Societies' Register?

THE CHAIRMAN: I cannot commit myself to the future.

MR. BOLITHO (Cornwall, St. Ives): I think the right hon. Baronet opposite must be pretty well satiated with the praise he has received for his Fisheries Act from all sides of the House. Still, I beg to join in the general chorus. I have some knowledge of the question, and I am sure there are many good men indeed who are most able fishermen, well skilled, and competent to speak with authority on these matters, who are deterred from going to the meetings—especially from attending the conferences in London—in consequence of their inability to bear the expense. I trust the President of the Board of Trade will give some consideration to this subject.

(6.29.) MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon, &c.): I can confirm what has been said by my hon. Friend on this side of the House as to the value of the Fishery Act, and also as to the difficulty practical fishermen experience in attending the meetings of the Committees. I trust the President of the Board of Trade will provide some facilities for enabling County Councils or Committees to pay the expenses of these fishermen. The matter is one of great practical importance, as I have found on the Committee for the joint counties of Merioneth and Carnarvon, of which I am a Member, that, owing to the absence of practical fishermen, questions have very often to be decided by persons who are not practical, and who have to be guided by what they are able to learn from fishermen not in attendance. It would be a very good thing if practical fishermen could be induced to attend, but the only way to induce them is to pay their expenses. Another difficulty experienced in our county is this: We have no fishing harbour in Cardigan Bay at all. The fishing villages are so small that they cannot provide a harbour. There is no harbour, and there is no fund out of which we could provide one. I find that £24,000 is voted to the Fishery Boards of Scotland for the express purpose of erecting piers and harbours, and that is a subject to which I shall call attention on the proper occasion.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I am very much obliged to hon. Members who have referred in such flattering terms to the way in which this Act has been carried out by the officials of the Board of Trade. I can bear testimony to the manner in which they have dealt with the matter, and I really think they have succeeded in giving satisfaction to everybody. With reference to the suggestion as to the publication of a map made by the hon. Member for Merioneth, I think I can arrange for that being done. The other point raised was the payment of the expenses of the fishermen's representatives on the Fishery Boards. I am not disposed to be very straight-laced in this matter, and I hope it may be possible to do something without raising the general question of the payment of the expenses of members of County Councils or of this House. I would rather approach the subject with the principle in view which obtains in the payment of the expenses of members of Royal Commissions. It seems to me that the subject should be brought on next year before the Conference of the representatives of the different Fishery Committees. We would then get an expression of opinion which could be considered by the Board of Trade. I hope I have shown that any recommendation they may make will meet with reasonable sympathy from me, should I have the honour to continue in the office which I now hold.

MR. ROWNTREE: The right hon. Gentleman has overlooked my question, whether any Report is likely to appear in the Return?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I think so, though I cannot speak with certainty.

(6.25.) MR. A. O'CONNOR: The Report of Mr. Courtney Boyle on railway accidents ends with the statement that there is considerable danger to human life from overworking railway officials. I wish to know what regulations the Board of Trade have made since this Report was made, and whether it has been their experience that the Railway Companies put difficulties in their way? Sometimes signalmen are so exhausted as to make it clearly dangerous for them to be entrusted with the manipulation of machinery or the custody of trains where there are many crossings or where there are a large number of passengers.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I have given very great attention for the past four months to this subject, having had the honour to preside over a Select Committee which has considered it. The Board of Trade has absolutely no power to direct Railway Companies as to the hours during which they may employ their servants. Whether we should have such a power, and in what way we should have it, are the points which have been under the consideration of this Committee. The matter is one of very great importance, and I can assure hon. Members that it is by no means escaping attention.

MR. JEFFREYS (Hants, Basingstoke): Will the right hon. Gentleman explain why the salaries of the Grain Inspectors, which were to be transferred to the Vote for the Board of Agriculture, are still under the Vote for the Board of Trade?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The transfer has been arranged, and these amounts merely refer to the current year.

*MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I should like to know when we may expect any practical results from the recommendations of the Maritime Conference as to the rules of the road at sea, on which a Departmental Committee is sitting, and how soon the necessary steps will be taken in connection with the United States and other countries to bring about a revision of the rules?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The Departmental Committee reported some time ago, and we thought the first step to take was to communicate with other foreign countries with regard to several points in the Report. We have not yet received answers to all our questions. When we do the Committee will again meet to consider them, and then I hope the matter will finally be settled.

*MR. CREMER: At the risk of being considered a bore, I wish to ask a question as to the hours of the clerks in the Board of Trade, and if I do not receive a general answer concerning the office hours in all Government Departments I shall repeat my question on subsequent Votes. The answer I received with regard to the Privy Council was that the hours were from 11 o'clock to 5 o'clock. I wish to know whether the hours are the same at the Board of Trade? Then, Sir, I find on page 126 an item of £25 for the purveyor of refreshments, and the mystery to me is why a small office in another Department to which I have already called attention should receive £50, and this, a smaller one, only £25. I protest against these items, which really enable well-paid officials to obtain cheap meals at the expense of the taxpayers. I do not feel justified in asking the House to divide, but I certainly protest against these items appearing on the Estimates, and if they appear again next year I shall divide the House against them. There is another item in the legal branch—the salary of the solicitor—£1,800 a year. What I wish to know is whether he has any private practice, or whether he and his clerks are employed directly by the State for the whole of their time?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The solicitor has no private practice whatever; he is solely in the employment of the Board of Trade. As to the arrangement for luncheons, it is the same in the Board of Trade as in other Offices. The reason why the item is only £25 I imagine to be that the offices of the Board of Trade are so scattered that the £25 is only for a small part of the entire offices of the Board of Trade. The hours are as follow:—In the main part of the Board of Trade, 11 to 5 for some clerks, and 10 to 5 o'clock for clerks of the Second Division; Bankruptcy Department, 10 to 5 all round; Seamen's Registry, 10 to 5 all round, and in the Patent Office 10 to 5 all round. I think that answers the question of the hon. Member.

*MR. LENG (Dundee): I now rise to move the reduction of the Vote for the Patent Office by the sum of £100, in order that I may have the opportunity of advocating the redress of a grievance which is felt to be serious by the large and important class of inventors in this country. Under Section 24 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade Marks Act, 1883, it is provided that the fees shall be such as may be from time to time, with the sanction of the Treasury, prescribed by the Board of Trade. The Board of Trade may, from time to time, if they think fit, with the consent of the Treasury, reduce any of these fees. It is evident, therefore, that the initiative in reducing the fees rests with the Board of Trade, so that, if there is, as I contend there is, a strong case for the reduction of these fees, and they are not reduced when they ought to be, the responsibility primarily rests with the President of the Board. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in replying to a question I addressed to him early in the Session, admitted that the receipts of the Patent Office for the year 1889 were £93,534 in excess of the expenditure. The Report for the year 1890 since issued shows a large increase on that large sum, namely, £109,366. The Patent Office for the year, in round numbers, yielded no less than £165,000; designs, £4,500; trade marks fees, £16,400; and sale of publications, £6,000; making a total of £192,000; while the total expenditure of the Patent Office was only £83,240. The right hon. Gentleman did not attempt to defend the exaction of fees in excess of the requirements of the Office, but he said that manufacturers did not object to fees which had the effect of extinguishing useless patents, and that it is in contemplation to spend a considerable sum on new buildings to which the excess of revenue will be applied, although I observe that only £12,000 appears in the Estimates for this purpose. Now, I submit that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has been misinformed regarding the views of manufacturers. Within the last two years Mr. A. V. Newton, of Chancery Lane, presented to the Board of Trade Memorials from manufacturers and inventors in Liverpool, Manchester, Leeds, and London, praying for a reduction of these fees, and at the same time Mr. Barker, a patent agent in Birmingham, presented a monster Petition to the same effect from that city. The Memorials presented by Mr. Newton sought a reduction of £50, leaving the renewal fees to stand at £100. The Birmingham Memorialists went considerably further, and proposed that the fees should be reduced to £30. Mr. Newton has on several occasions brought the subject under the notice of the Board of Trade, in the year 1888, and still more recently. Mr. Whitelow, an active and intelligent patent agent in Manchester, has written extensively on the subject in the leading journal of that city, the Manchester Guardian, and also in the Textile Mercury. Mr. Eaton, of the International Patent Agency, Martin's Lane, London, an able and earnest advocate of reforms in our Patent Laws and their administration, has also prepared a very comprehensive Memorial on the subject which I hold in my hand. Numerous pamphlets have been printed, one of the most interesting and valuable of which is by Mr. Keith, an inventive and enterprising Scotchman now carrying on a large business in London. It was a statement in his pamphlet which suggested my first question to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Since then I have been almost overwhelmed with correspondence from all parts of the Kingdom urging me to persevere with my advocacy of a reduction of these fees, and it is because I find such a strong body of opinion on the subject that I venture to bring it before the Committee. I may explain that the cost of a patent in this country is largely in excess of that in any other country in the world. The British Government exacts £154 for a patent for 14 years, against £7 10s. which has to be paid for a patent in the United States for 17 years. I am aware that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, in answer to the statement—

“That a patentee in this country had to pay a sum of £154 for 14 years' protection, whereas in the United States of America the cost was only £7 for 17 years' protection,”

“The position is not fairly represented, because protection is given for periods less than 14 years for sums less than the amount set out.

Protection for four years, for instance, is given in an ordinary case for £4, whereas the payments required to be made within the same period in the United States amount to £6 or £7."

In reply to this it must be observed that while protection for four years costs only £4, the payment of £10 for the fifth year brings that up to £14, being for five years about double the charge in the United States for 17 years. Our Government makes the heavy charge of £154 simply for registering and giving a certificate that a patent has been granted, the sole benefit of which is that it places the patentee in a position to begin legal proceedings against anyone who may infringe his patent. The Patent Office does nothing to ascertain or to guarantee the validity of the patent. This is all our Patent Office does for the £154 which it receives. On the other hand, the United States Patent Office, for the £7 10s. it receives, ensures the patentee a real title by a painstaking examination by the best experts. Computing the fees for the number of years for which the patents existed in the different countries, the average charge in each country is as follows:—

United States ..	0	8	5	per ann. for 17 yrs.
France and Italy..	4	0	0	" " 15 "
Belgium and Spain	4	4	0	" " 20 "
Russia ..	5	10	0	" " 10 "
Great Britain ..	11	0	0	" " 14 "

It will thus be seen that this country is far behind even Russia, our fees being 100 per cent. more than those in that benighted land, while they are 2,500 per cent. more than those in the United States. As illustrating how these fees affect the number of patents issued, it may be mentioned that in 1887 the figures stood as follows:—

	Great Britain.	United States.
Number of Applications	18,051	35,613
Patents Granted ...	9,410	20,429
Income from Fees	£124,279	£228,902
Expenditure ...	£81,577	£198,892
Surplus...	£42,702	£30,010
Patent Fund ...	None.	£651,498

This statement shows that while the small fees encourage the taking out of double the number of patents in the United States, the total amount of the fees is double that in this country, and a very large patent fund has been accumulated. This country, in effect, levies a heavy tax upon its inventors, on the men to whose ingenuity it is so largely indebted for its manufacturing and mercantile prosperity. The United States, on the other hand, makes the most reasonable charge on the inventor, with the result that almost every American citizen is a patentee. America encourages her poor newsboys, like Edison, to become distinguished inventors and millionaires, while the Patent Office in this country exacts fees which to many a poor man are prohibitory, and although in many cases he may scrape together the £4 charged during the first four years, he is quite unable to pay the £10, £15, and £20 per annum exacted during the remaining 10 years. I acknowledge that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, when President of the Board of Trade in 1883, introduced a great improvement on the system which had previously existed. Under the Patent Act of 1852 the patent fee of £150 was required to be paid in two instalments of £50 and £100 respectively, which covered the patent for 14 years. Under the Act of 1883 the total sum of £154 was spread over 14 years in the following manner:—£1 was charged on filing the provisional patent, and £3 on its completion, so that for the first four years the total charge is only £4. Then from the end of the fourth year to the end of the seventh year £10 per annum has to be paid, for the next two years £15 per annum, and the next four years £20 per annum. These changes led to a large increase in the number of patents. Under the Act of 1852 the largest number of applications was in 1882, the total being 6,241, but immediately after the passing of the Act of 1883, which spread the fees over a number of years, the applications rose to 17,110, and they have gone on steadily increasing until in 1889 the number was 21,008. The easier method of charging the fees, although the total fees remained the same, has led to an increase in the number of applications for patents of between 300 and 400 per cent. The reason why the renewal fees were left unaltered in their aggregate amount was that it was feared that without these the administration of the Patent Office might be carried on at a loss, owing to the reduction brought about by the diminished fees. The question of renewal fees was therefore left in statu quo, but now that it is plainly evident that there is no risk of such loss as was then feared (owing to the number of patents having increased four-fold through the easier method of paying the fees), the time has come to consider the question of renewal of fees de novo. The merits and demerits of renewal fees were never really considered. The small sum charged during the first four years has multiplied the applications, which last year were 21,300 in number, and the trade of Birmingham especially—where great ingenuity is shown in the making of small nick-nacks and appliances—has largely benefited, since the low initial fees enable small inventions having only a temporary sale to be protected for a number of years at a small cost. With inventors elsewhere, and particularly in Manchester and the North, the matter stands differently. Take a typical instance. A working man invents a new machine and patents it. In working it practically he discovers defects, which he removes within the first year or two by successive improvements, for which he takes out additional patents, as he can do for a small sum of money. It takes him some time after he brings out his machine to overcome the vis inertiae of prejudice against novelties. When he begins to make headway, and expects some return for his labours, he discovers that the renewal fees on his original patent and its improvements are too much for his resources, and his patents are too frequently allowed to lapse, not because the invention as such is unsuccessful, but simply from lack of means to meet the taxes on his brains which the Patent Laws of the country impose, since these taxes during the next 10 years amount to £150, the result being that only 10 per cent. of all the patents granted survive for the full period of 14 years. They are literally strangled by these exorbitant renewal fees. I hold in my hand a large number of letters from inventors testifying to the crushing effect of these fees. One of my correspondents—Mr. Weir, Charing Cross, says—

"The answer Mr. Goschen gave shows clearly that he has no conception of the enormous injury that these heavy fees inflict on the country. I speak advisedly, because my son, an engineer, has taken out between 50 and 60 patents, and for every one of these patents, if carried out to the full term of 14 years, the Government takes £154. The same patent taken out in the United States costs £7 for 17 years. I know the United States very well, and every man who goes there and studies that country can see for himself that the encouragement given to patentees there is the principal cause that has led to the prosperity of that country. Capitalists there assist inventors. There is not £150 to deter them; so easy is it to get on with an invention there that this country is inundated with American inventions. Edison would never have made the name he has if he had lived in this country. Mr. Goschen should know that the inventors as a class are poor men kept down by these heavy taxes. Manufacturers will not help a poor man in this country. They know it is only a question of time when the invention will fall into their hands, and Mr. Goschen's answer to you, if he did but know it, was a manufacturer's answer, namely, that in a short time they would get the poor man's invention and his brains for nothing. All these thousands of pounds are taken out of the pocket of the poor man, and at the same time injure the progress of the country."

Mr. James Keith, of London, Edinburgh, and Arbroath, writes —

"Many working men in this country, seeing no hope before them of being able to meet these, to them, enormous charges, prefer not to patent their ideas at all, but do actually sell them to Americans, who take them up readily and produce the novelties in the States on a large scale, sending them over here again as bonâ fide Yankee notions, when they are really British inventions after all."

And again—

"During the present year I am paying at the rate of £150 per annum in renewal fees under the new Act, while, as time rolls on, these fees keep increasing in amount during the life of the patents till £200 per annum is reached on each. These figures, I think, speak for themselves, being taken from the practical experience of myself. Ordinarily, the crippling effect is tremendous, for how can any workman stand such payments?"

As corroborating what these correspondents says, I may mention that the number of applications to our Patent Office for patents from the United States last year was not less than 2,597, as against 14,000 from England and 1,000 only from Scotland. I could quote many similar passages from the sheaf of letters which I have beside me, but I think what I have read will suffice to establish that these fees are both excessive and injurious, and that they ought to be reduced. My belief is that even if the fees were reduced, and reduced very considerably, there would not be a proportionate reduction of the total receipts of the Patent Office, but we should see that as the spreading of the fees over a number of years led to a large increase of applications, so would the lessening of the annual payments. Many more patents would be applied for, and many more payments made which would compensate to a large extent for the reduction of the fees. No one would object to a reasonable and prudent expenditure in enlarging the Patent Office. The accommodation at present for the extensive records that require to be kept is miserable. The Library is a limbo where inventors soon lose themselves, and give up searches in despair. Much might be done to improve the arrangements. A larger staff of examiners and compilers of abridgments should be employed, so that they might be brought closely up to date. Now they are 25 years behind time. The American system of examination should be adopted to prevent duplicating and triplicating patents for the same invention. In some points the Patent Acts should be amended, especially in conformity with the recommendations of the very valuable Report made some time ago by the Chairman of the Chemical and Allied Trades Committee. With a surplus of £110,000 a year to work upon, the Patent Office might do much to encourage poor inventors by purchasing from them inventions of real utility, and making them free to the public. The German Government frequently offers prizes as an encouragement to inventors, and one was recently offered for the best invention in railway train brakes. The method of dealing with modifications and additions to patents also admits of considerable improvement. It will be observed that I have not contended for the total abolition of renewal fees, but I say that to tax inventors £150 on each invention in a country which has so much to gain from the encouragement of inventions is most injurious, not only to the inventor, but to the country. I think, too, the period of protection might be extended from four to seven years. A comparatively small annual payment during the currency of the patent should suffice, and either £3 or £5 per annum would be quite sufficient. In conclusion, permit me to say that I think the present system of transferring the annual surplus from the Patent Office to the Treasury is very objectionable. When so transferred, the money is lost sight of, and inventors are apt to forget how heavily they are being taxed. During the last five years these surpluses have amounted to fully £360,000. I think the Patent Office revenue ought to be distinctly ear-marked and appropriated for the advantage of inventors, and not thrown hotch-potch into the general revenue of the country. It is extremely inconsistent on the part of the Government to grant large sums on the one hand for technical education, and then on the other to tax those who are technically educated and are turning their technical education to good account. We should not only endeavour to fetch up our leeway so far as technical education is concerned, but we should adopt all the enlightened methods we can devise to stimulate and encourage inventors in all the arts and crafts which are the foundation of our manufacturing and mercantile pre-eminence. Did the President of the Board of Trade recently notice that on the 8th of April, at Washington,

“A Congress of the inventors and manufacturers of patented inventions, to celebrate the beginning of the second century of the American patent system, was opened? President Harrison and the Members of the Cabinet were among those present.”

The holding of such a Congress shows how much the American people appreciate their patent system and how they value its liberal provisions. If such a Congress were summoned in this country it would be for a very different purpose: it would be to denounce the illiberal, the exacting, the mischievous provisions of our Patent Laws. Instead of our Patent Office being a helpful promoter of inventions, it is a hard, niggardly, unsympathising tax collector, bent on screwing all it can out of the poor inventor, while aiding him as little as possible, and boasting what should be its shame, the confiscation of his invention for the benefit of the wealthy manufacturer or capitalist, simply because he cannot afford to pay the heavy fees it demands from the fifth to the fourteenth year of the patent. In conclusion, I would respectfully urge the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, and his Colleague the Chancellor of the Exchequer, no longer to look at this question merely from the manufacturer or capitalist's point of view; no longer to look at it from the Treasury point of view as to how much the inventors of the United Kingdom can be made to contribute to the taxation of the country. Rather let them take the broader and more enlightened views which are suggested by reference to the grants in aid of technical education; and by the representations which have been made in so many Memorials, letters, and pamphlets in the interest of inventors, advocating the reduction of these renewal fees not merely for the benefit of inventors, but for the advancement of our trade and manufactures, the employment of our people, and the prosperity of the country at large. I beg to move the reduction of the Vote by £100.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item R, Salaries of the Patent Office, be reduced by £100."—(Mr. Leng.)

(7.25.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I should like to say a few words in support of the Motion of my hon. Friend, and urge upon the President of the Board of Trade to consider whether something cannot be done to reduce the Patent Fees. There is no matter which interests all classes of the community, and especially the industrial classes, more than the encouragement of invention. Inventions are a source of national wealth, and ought to be encouraged, as in the United States of America, which are vastly in advance of this country in the matter of inventions, especially inventions for the saving of labour. I would recommend the President of the Local Government Board to pay no attention whatever to his colleagues who sit upon that side of the House. I was about to congratulate him on the departure of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but his place has been taken by that watchful dragon of the Treasury, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Leeds. Formerly the Law Officers of the Crown had an interest in the patent fees, but that interest was abolished when my right hon. Friend the Member for Bury and myself held those offices. Our predecessors drew sometimes £10,000, £12,000, and even £15,000 annually from the patent fees, but the Law Officers of the Crown are now paid by salary, and the fees go straight into the Treasury. With an annual surplus of £120,000 the fees ought certainly to be reduced. The Patent Office ought not to be like the Post Office, which is a commercial undertaking, and, as I have always contended, ought to be a source of profit to the State. These fees are a tax on inventions which, after all, constitute one of the greatest sources of national wealth, and it seems to me that a more inexpedient tax than this could not be imagined. Inventors as a class are poor men, and one result of these high patent fees is that in order to be able to pay the fees they are, in too many cases, compelled to place themselves in the hands of rich men, who secure the greater portion of the profit of successful inventions. That has been the fate of the inventors of some of the greatest inventions which have distinguished the trade and commerce of this country. I know that the charges for the first year have already been largely diminished, but it is often the case that inventions do not become remunerative until they have been in use some time, and therefore I hope the President of the Board of Trade will see his way to reducing the fees still further. There is no matter more deserving of careful consideration. Under these circumstances, I hope the President of the Board of Trade will be able to give a favourable reply to the appeal made by my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee.

*(7.30.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman favours the idea of the hon. Member for Dundee that the State should buy the patents of inventors at their own price.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Excuse me. That was part of my hon. Friend's proposal I had forgotten, otherwise I should have entirely disclaimed it. I certainly do not endorse the suggestion that the Government should buy all patents. In fact, I confined my support of the proposals of the hon. Member for Dundee to the question of the reduction of fees.

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I am glad I have elicited so sound a doctrine from the right hon. Gentleman, and I will attempt to deal with that part of the speech of the hon. Member for Dundee in which he suggested that something should be done in the reduction of fees. The first question which the Government have to consider is what they can afford to do. I do not suppose that the hon. Member or the right hon. Gentleman will argue that the cost of the Patent Office ought to be charged upon the general taxation of the country. Patentees, I think, should certainly provide for the cost of the office. On the other hand, I do not think that the country ought to look upon the Patent Office as a permanent source of income. The change which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham made in 1883 did make a very great difference in the fees received. In 1883 the gross receipts from patent fees were more than £211,000, but after the Act of 1883 came into force the gross receipts from patent fees sank to £88,000. The large increase in the sum derived from patent fees beyond the expenditure on the Patent Office, which of course is really the groundwork of the Motion of the hon. Member for Dundee, is a matter of very recent growth indeed, for in 1886 there was actually a deficit of £2,800 in connection with the Patent Office. The estimated surplus for 1891 is £116,500, and the Government contemplate very considerable expenditure for the benefit of the Service. I have thought it right to examine thoroughly the buildings in which the work of the office is done, and any more inconvenient buildings both for the gentlemen employed and the public I have never seen. Complete re-construction will be necessary, and it will cost fully £130,000. The money will be very well spent, because the re-arrangement will facilitate a more efficient and economical administration of the office, and after the reconstruction the public, who frequent the office in large numbers, will have convenient access to the specifications and to all the publications in the library. The expenditure will be provided for out of the surplus of the next two or three years. It is also very necessary to make more rapid progress with the work of the abridgment of specifications. Copies of the actual specifications are sent round to a certain number of public libraries, but only in very few places can they be turned to any public use. The public generally want abridgements, and to proceed with their preparation more rapidly will involve further expenditure, which must come out of the surplus from the

Sir W. Harcourt

Patent Office fees. The fact that this expenditure must be incurred being admitted, I am ready to acknowledge that there are grounds for considering whether something may not also be done in the direction of the reduction of fees. It is not quite right to compare the fees charged here only with those charged in the United States, and I, for one, would be very sorry to see the adoption in this country of the United States system, under which, by the payment of £7, a patentee can obtain protection for 17 years. It is my opinion that the right hon. Member for West Birmingham introduced an admirable system by the Act of 1883, when he provided that protection shall be given for four years on the payment of £4, and that if the patentee requires further protection he shall be asked to make larger payments year by year until the total period of 14 years is completed. I think that in any scheme of revision the system of making a small demand for the first years and of increasing the payment for the later years should certainly be adhered to. Comparison has been made between the total payment exacted in this country for 14 years—namely, £154—with the payment of £7 exacted in the United States. Ours, however, is not the highest payment required to be made, for in Germany the total sum paid for a protection of 15 years amounts to £265. It has been said that these patent fees constitute a tax upon invention. I deny that that is the fact when the payment is light for the first few years. A payment of £4 for four years cannot be regarded as a tax upon invention. It is a lower payment than is demanded by any other country for protection for a similar period. My view is that we should consider whether a reduction may not be made in the fees charged in the interval between four years and eight years, so as to extend the cheap protection now given for four years to a longer period. I do not believe that it would be to the advantage of the public or even of inventors themselves that patentees should be enabled to retain at a cheap rate during the whole period of 14 years patent rights with regard to patents which are not worked, and which are not likely to be worked. Such retention would be as great a hindrance to invention as anything that could be imagined. If a patent is not taken up in a period of seven or eight years, is it likely to be taken up at all? If it is taken up, then the fees charged for the rest of the 14 years will be comparatively trivial as compared with the profits of the successful patentee. What has to be considered, then, is the position of the patentee who does not work his patent during the first four years, and I think that what should be done is to make the fees low for a certain number of years, during which the patentee can continue to look about for opportunities to work his patent, but we ought not, by lowering the subsequent fees, to encourage him to retain his patent rights unworked for the whole period. I trust that the hon. Member for Dundee will be satisfied with the statement which I have been able to make.

*MR. LENG: I beg to express my gratification at the assurance given by the right hon. Gentleman that he will consider the expediency of extending the period when low fees are charged. As to the proposed reconstruction of the Patent Office, I do not think that anyone will grudge the expenditure if the accommodation is greatly enlarged and improved.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I wish to know how the work of the Labour Department of the Board of Trade is going on. I have no complaint to make with regard to the work done at that office. The only thing I have to complain of is that it takes so long to do.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I assure the hon. Member that this matter has by no means escaped my attention. Mr. Burnett has recently been appointed to a very honourable and responsible position, that of Secretary to the Royal Commission on Labour, for which I think the Committee will be of opinion he was eminently qualified, and I have made arrangements by which his work at the Labour Department will be carried on, of course under his supervision. With regard to providing permanent assistance, the hon. Member will find in the Estimates of this year an item for additional clerks, several of whom will be placed in the Labour Department.

MR. P. J. POWER (Waterford, E.): I wish to draw the attention of the right hon. Gentlemen to a matter I raised last year. The main entrance to Atherstone, small town in Warwickshire, is crossed by the London and North Western Railway on the level. It is unnecessary for me to remind the Committee that all the Irish, Scotch, Manchester, and Liverpool and other trains pass Atherstone——

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I rise to order, Sir. This is a matter in which I have absolutely no power.

THE CHAIRMAN: The question is outside the functions of the Board of Trade.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(7.47.) MR. A. O'CONNOR: I should be glad if the President of the Board of Trade will inform the Committee what is the condition of the Bankruptcy Estates Account. Under the Bankruptcy Act of 1883 the fees which are levied in connection with bankruptcy business go to an account from which very large sums of money are transferred from time to time to the Exchequer, and, having been received into the Exchequer, they are invested or held on hand in case they, or some of them, should be wanted for bankruptcy administration. I do not think we have received any information since the institution of the account as to the sums which have been paid in or paid out, or as to the amount of invested capital which is now in the hands of the Exchequer, and yet the 76th Section, Sub-Section (2) of the Bankruptcy Act directs that the fees chargeable in connection with bankruptcy proceedings shall be fixed with reference to the amount of the dividends obtained from the invested sums. We know that the sums held by the Exchequer are very large indeed, because some years ago the interest obtained was not less than £22,000. It is true that since the Act of 1883 provision has been made for the appropriation of certain sums from the Bankruptcy Estates Account, to the purpose of furnishing accommodation in connection with the offices for bankruptcy business and for paying rent of bankruptcy offices; but I suppose that the sums received have been very largely in excess of anything required for such services. I venture to suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that if he will cause inquiry to be made, he will find there is abundant capital in hand to enable him to effect very substantial reductions in the fees now charged for bankruptcy, and the more so that a great number of estates now show a deficit, and are unable to meet the low charges in connection with them. It is extraordinary that in this country the only people who apparently make anything out of bankruptcy are the bankruptcy officials and the Exchequer. The Exchequer gets year after year increasing profits at the expense of the unfortunate creditors. Under such circumstances, I think the right hon. Gentleman might accede to the application made to him over and over again that the fees in connection with bankruptcy business should be substantially reduced.

MR. HOWELL: I have before called the right hon. Gentleman's attention to the fact that no final settlement has yet been arrived at with regard to the Bethnal Green Bank. I do not like to repeat rumours I hear, but it is quite evident that those interested in the bank are by no means satisfied with the hands into which the affairs of the bank have fallen for winding up purposes. The people interested in the bank are very poor. They seem to have been swindled out of their money. They would be extremely glad if the right hon. Gentleman could do anything to bring about a settlement.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: With regard to the Bank at Bethnal Green I am afraid I cannot give the hon. Member any fresh information. It is some little time since the Bank failed, indeed, it was before the Act of last year came into force. With regard to the question of the hon. Member for Donegal, I think that if the hon. Gentleman will look at page 116, he will see an estimate there of receipts and expenditure on bankruptcy services. He will see that the interest on the money invested is estimated at £18,000. Then he will see that the total expenditure is estimated at £159,000, as against £138,000 receipts. Therefore, he is mistaken in supposing that the Exchequer makes a profit. I should be glad to see the bankruptcy fees reduced, especially in the case of those small estates to which the hon. Member referred, in which the fees and costs no doubt do swallow up a large portion of the estates; but it is difficult to reduce the fees when the state of the account is as shown on page 116.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: I think that if the right hon. Gentleman takes the trouble to compare what purports to be an estimate of the receipts and expenditure with the actual experience of two years ago, he will come to the conclusion that I have come to, namely, that the estimate of receipts for the year is not only wilfully, but grossly, understated. Does the right hon. Gentleman suggest that there is less bankruptcy business in the present year than there was two years ago?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Certainly; there is a very considerable falling off in the business.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: Of course, I accept that statement. But as to the interest on money invested, I do not understand why they receive only £18,000, when two years ago they received £22,000, unless there has been some extraordinary expenditure so as to reduce the money in hand by a very substantial amount.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Money has been paid out every year.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: Does the right hon. Gentleman mean that there is less money in the hands of the Treasury than there was formerly?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: That is my belief.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: Of course, I have no official information, and I give way.

Vote agreed to.

4. Motion made, and Question proposed,

(8.0.) MR. LABOUCHERE: I have a notice to reduce the Vote by the amount of £2,000, the salary of the President of the Board of Agriculture, whom I am glad to see in his place. I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that in making the proposal to reduce the Vote I am in no sort of way suggesting that he is not a labourer worthy of his hire, or that he does not efficiently perform the duties of his office; but when the Board of Agriculture was established there was, I will not go so far as to say a pledge that the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster or the Lord President should assume the duties of the office, but there was a full and definite understanding that the establishment of the new Board should cost the country nothing. I do not say we have not got the value of it, but the additional cost is certainly £2,000 per annum. It had, until recent years, been the habit to throw the duties now fulfilled by the right hon. Gentleman in connection with the Department of Agriculture on the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, who receives as the Committee is aware a salary of £2,000, which is derived from the revenues of the Duchy, and, therefore, does not come upon the Estimates presented to the House. Of course, it comes from the taxpayers, but still it is an arrangement that does not admit of our challenging the expenditure directly. It seems to me we are paying the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster £2,000 a year for doing absolutely nothing. Against the present holder of the office I have nothing to say personally. He formerly sat in this House, and is a gentleman deservedly respected, but still I do not see why we should pay the most respected Minister £2,000 for doing nothing. I therefore propose to take a Division for the purpose of eliciting an opinion from the Committee as to the desirability of combining the offices of President of the Board of Agriculture and Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, in order that we may save the sum of £2,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item A, Salaries, be reduced by £2,000, Salary of the President."—(Mr. Labouchere.)

*(8.3.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): I quite understand that the hon. Gentleman moves this reduction not on account of any laches on my part, but because he thinks that the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster for the time being should fill the position of Minister for Agriculture. As a matter of fact, by the arrangements made with regard to the Board of Agriculture, the cost to the country has been practically decreased. When the Board of Agriculture was first created there were—or had been very shortly before—three Land Commissioners, who received a salary of £1,500 a year each. The number is now reduced to two, so that at once there is a saving of £1,500. But besides this, I think that it is not difficult to prove, according to the Estimates, that there is actually a saving at the present time as compared with what has been the case under former arrangements. Taking the year 1889-90, as far as the cost of the direction of the Board of Agriculture was concerned, it was £7,950; for the year 1891-2 the cost is £7,530, or a saving of over £400. Therefore, I think that there is not any fair ground for complaint with regard to any large increase of cost—whatever understanding there may have been—and there has been no pledge, for I have referred to all the Debates on the subject. It has been suggested that the salary of the Minister of Agriculture should be defrayed out of the Revenue of the Duchy of Lancaster, but as a matter of fact that is the private revenue of the Sovereign. Under these circumstances I do not think that the hon. Member for Northampton has any ground for complaint.

(8.10.) MR. LABOUCHERE: In the interest of progress with the Estimates the right hon. Gentleman treads upon rather dangerous ground when he tells us that the revenue of the Duchy of Lancaster is the private property of the Sovereign. I do not want to go into that, because it would take an hour or so, but I decline to recognise that it is private property. A Cabinet Minister is paid out of it, and that Cabinet Minister has practically nothing to do for the salary. It was asserted in previous Debates that it is desirable there should be this post of Chancellor of the Duchy, because it is a good thing to have this means of rewarding a veteran statesman and so on. I do not believe in this rewarding of veterans myself. It was decided that the veteran should do something for the salary, taking upon himself the duty of the Agricultural Department. The right hon. Gentleman has admitted there were three Land Commissioners eating their heads off, doing nothing at £1,500 a year each. I am glad they have been reduced to two, and

I hope the others will be improved off the face of public expenditure. The right hon. Gentleman tells us we have positively saved £400 a year by giving him £2,000. Well, I hope that will encourage him in going a step further and join with me in trying to induce Her Majesty's Government to appoint him Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, and thus another £2,000 will be saved. I shall divide the Committee as a protest against the existence of a Cabinet Minister who does absolutely nothing for his salary.

Ayes 40; Noes 71.—(Div. List, No. 347.)

Original Question again proposed.

(8.21.) MR. J. PARKER SMITH (Lanark, Partick): I have given notice of a nominal reduction of the Vote in order to call attention to the circumstances attending the Irish Channel cattle trade, the treatment and injury to cattle in transit. The right hon. Gentleman a few days ago gave a most emphatic expression of his sense of the importance of his duties and responsibilities. He said on Friday, in replying to a deputation—

“Parliament had imposed upon him by statute, as the representative of the Board of Agriculture, the responsibility of taking whatever measures might be desirable to prevent the unnecessary suffering of animals during their passage by sea, and such measures he intended to take, and, whatever might be the opposition, or however powerful the quarter from which it might come, he meant to do his utmost to carry out that duty to the best of his ability.”

He was speaking this in reference to the Transatlantic cattle trade, but what he says applies equally to another class of the trade equally requiring attention—the transit of beasts coming from Ireland. In this transit the animals endure a great amount of suffering, and the trade is subjected to great loss.

DR. TANNER: I rise to order, Sir. My name is down to a Motion for a reduction, and the notice stands before that of the hon. Member.

THE CHAIRMAN: There is no point of order involved.

DR. TANNER: I shall be enabled to proceed with my Motion afterwards?

THE CHAIRMAN: Certainly.

MR. J. PARKER SMITH: The injury to the animals, to meat, and hides is very considerable. The extent of the Irish cattle trade is very large. Until the last two years it was double that of the live cattle trade between this country and the rest of the world, but in the last two years the increase in the trade across the Atlantic has been enormous. Still, the trade with Ireland is larger than that of all the rest of the world put together. In 1888, which is the last year for which I have the official figures as they appear in the Report of the Committee of the Privy Council, the total amount of the live cattle trade from Ireland to this country is given as 739,000 beasts—fat cattle, 283,000; store cattle, 406,000; others, 3,000; calves, 48,000. It is specially in regard to the fat cattle that the suffering arises, and the ports to which the cattle mainly come are Liverpool, Glasgow, and Bristol. In 1888 the number sent to Liverpool were 254,000; to Glasgow, 151,000; Bristol, 85,000. To other ports the numbers were comparatively small. The part of the trade to which I refer more particularly is that coming to Glasgow. Of the trade to the English ports I do not know so much; but, so far as I can make out, the treatment of the cattle coming to the Southern ports is better than the treatment of those coming into the Clyde. Of this portion of the trade there have been serious complaints for a very long time, and these complaints came to a climax in the end of 1888, in the special case of the cargo brought by the steamer Seal. The question was then taken up by the Glasgow Town Council, moved thereto by the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals and the Society of Fleshers of Glasgow. A strong remonstrance was sent to the Veterinary Department of the Privy Council at Dublin, and a petition numerously signed by the fleshers of Glasgow. These held a large and representative meeting at Glasgow, and a resolution was passed to the effect that the trade had, for a considerable time past, suffered great loss and injury through the bad condition of the cattle landed at the port. They stated in detail the grave complaints they had to make, and they suggested certain regulations. The meeting was a large one, and butchers attended it from Leeds and many other English towns. Following upon this a deputation waited upon the Assistant Under Secretary of the Irish Privy Council.

Mr. Labouchere

The memorialists represented the case in words which I shall quote—

"That in many cases the animals die upon the voyage in consequence of being trampled upon or gored by their companions, and even where the animals arrive at the Port of Glasgow, they are so bruised by having to pass through too narrow hatches when being shipped or landed, and by falls, goring, or other calamities, that they are quite unfit for human food when slaughtered.

That, besides being desirous to avoid the hardships and cruelty to which such a state of matters exposes the cattle, the memorialists have a deep personal interest in approaching your honourable Council because, while the animals may have been, as before stated, greatly injured during shipment, or landing, or on the voyage, this does not always appear at the time when the animal is exposed for sale in the public market, but on its being taken to the slaughter-house and killed and dressed; the bruises are then apparent, and your memorialists, or such of them as have purchased such bruised animals, have to suffer the loss, there being no recourse at law against the vendor.

That the memorialists cannot help remarking on the fact that cattle brought from a much greater distance than Ireland arrive in the very best condition, and especially that animals brought from Canada and the United States, even after passing through the stormiest weather on the Atlantic, arrive at the Port of Glasgow without a single animal being either killed or injured, and, as this satisfactory state of matters results from the manner in which the accommodation for cattle is provided on the Atlantic steamers, they believe that were similar regulations to be enforced on the shippers from Ireland, an improvement on the present condition in which the animals arrive would be at once effected."

They sent in a set of recommendations to the Irish Privy Council. After that there was a Memorial, in which the Royal Agricultural Society, the Highland Society, and the Dublin Society were represented, to the Lord President of the Council, and they put forward similar suggestions. Lord Cranbrook, in reply, said he considered the sufferings of the animals were due to their horning one another, and the right hon. Gentleman stated the other day that another cause was the excessive whacking from the sticks of the drovers. No doubt these two causes do account for a great deal of the injury done to the cattle. It is to be hoped that the Board of Agriculture will do something to encourage the dishorning of cattle which takes place in some parts of Ireland and sometimes in England. If this were done a great deal would be achieved in the direction of making the travelling of the animals more safe and less miserable. Much remains to be done beside that. Following on these representations to the Lord President there was an inquiry by the Chief Travelling Inspector of the Privy Council, who made a Report to the Privy Council. He admits in that Report that there is great suffering among the animals when brought across. He sets down a considerable part of that suffering—as the Lord President did—to the horning of each other by the animals themselves, and to the sticks of the drovers; but he goes a great deal beyond that. Though he speaks in a different tone to that he adopts when dealing with the Transatlantic cattle trade, and though he is rather cautious in his recommendations, he points out various defects in the fittings of the steamers which bring about a good deal of injury to the animals. He speaks especially of defective gangways—the gangways being too narrow—of the decks being extremely slippery, and of the vessels being badly ventilated. In a recent Report to a Departmental Committee of the Board of Agriculture in regard to the Transatlantic trade, he makes a recommendation as to the improved treatment of the animals which, as he says, would increase the freight from 50 to 100 per cent. That would mean a most serious charge on the cattle. It would mean almost prohibition of the traffic. But in dealing with the Irish cattle trade he is excessively cautious in pointing out the difficulties which would arise if arrangements were adopted which would have the effect of increasing the freight. For example, he speaks of sand. One of his suggestions is this—

"The steamers for the conveyance of cattle should have deck flooring, bottomed in such a way that sufficient foothold be given the animals, and also that sand, or other proper substance, should be provided."

But in another column of the Report he discusses that suggestion at some length, and points out that sand would greatly improve the battening. He says—

"A plentiful supply of sand would be useful in bad weather, but to be of much use it must be provided in large quantities, and would, therefore, be expensive. In fair weather the sand is not required."

If he is so very cautious about a little matter of that kind, he is, of course, more cautious when dealing with recommendations that would involve greater expenditure. He speaks very strongly on the matter of ventilation. He says that one of the recommendations of the Committee of Fleshers is that "Improved ventilation on board ship is absolutely necessary." His comment on that is—

"Shipowners and all persons connected with the trade agree that the present arrangements for the ventilation of the holds of cattle-carrying vessels leave much to be desired. The difficulty is to find a remedy that will be effective and economical. The number of openings in the deck must be limited both in number and size, so as to avoid undue weakening of the ship's structure, and thus expose her to danger in bad weather. No mechanical means yet invented seems to meet with general approval. Neither natural nor artificial air drafts have yet been so arranged as to effectually remove the carbonic acid gas that accumulates in a hold crowded with cattle."

Later on he says—

"It is much to be hoped that human ingenuity will shortly devise some thoroughly effectual, and at the same time economical, means of providing an ample supply of fresh air to all parts of the vessels. In the meanwhile, if the suggestion of the Conference is to be carried out, the Travelling Inspectors submit that the best method of giving effect to the suggestion would be to require that a space or passage-way of, say, three feet in width, and running from the hatchway to every pen occupied by cattle in the hold should be left free from animals or goods. This would give a greatly increased breathing space for each animal, and would have the additional advantage of facilitating the proper tending of the animals during the voyage. It is, however, quite recognised that there is a serious objection attached to this proposal, inasmuch as it would inevitably increase the cost of freight by about 15 per cent."

If one thing came out clearly in the whole inquiry, it was that it is essentially necessary for the comfort and well-being of the cattle coming across the Atlantic that there should be these gangways and means of getting at the animals in all conditions of weather. It is almost equally necessary, even on the short passage from Ireland and Scotland, that there should be an improvement in the ventilation, which may easily be secured by insisting on wider gangways. According to the Report of the Inspector, the difficulty in the way of the enforcement of this precaution is the increased freight; but if it can be shown that animals suffer in value to the amount of 10s. or £1 a head by the injury they sustain in crossing from Ireland to Scotland, I think it is clear that the consignors would be repaid for the slight increase of freight by the additional precautions provided, enabling the animals to receive better treatment and to arrive at Glasgow safe and comparatively well. It is easier to insist on additional precautions in the case of Irish beasts than in the case of Canadian or American beasts, seeing that the freight in the case of the former class is less, and with the increased cost of the precautions would be a much less percentage on the total value of the animals. But if this were simply a question of pecuniary loss—simply a question of the consignor losing because he does not take proper care of his beast, I should not interfere. If it were a question of Irish eggs or butter suffering injury in transit to this country, the thing might take care of itself. But the thing that presses on my mind is the fearful amount of suffering that these hundreds and thousands of beasts have to endure year by year. Anyone who has seen animals being landed at the Broomielaw in Glasgow will feel that any efforts which he may make to lessen and prevent that amount of suffering from being inflicted will be time well spent and work well achieved. And there is this to be remembered: that the Travelling Inspector of the Privy Council in his Report says—

"There can be no doubt that almost all persons engaged about the transit of cattle become, in a short time, entirely indifferent to the sufferings they cause."

It is by looking at the thing from outside, and with a fresh eye, that you can really appreciate the immensity of the suffering that is from day to day going on, and that is being disregarded by those who become hardened and inured to it. Of course, accidents happen in this as in every other traffic. Such cases as the Seal accident occur, but we have also great accidents to passenger steamers—as, for instance, in the case of the Princess Alice. But what I want to bring before the Committee is that it is the average of the beasts which come across in quite ordinary weather, which undergo sufferings fearful to think of; and, in support of this, I have, in the first place, the evidence of the fleshers and dealers in cattle in Glasgow and other parts of the country; and, in the second place, the evidence of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. As to the former class of evidence, the fleshers are not likely to be over squeamish in regard to this subject; and as to the latter class, the Society furnish me with specific instances which must be allowed to speak for themselves. I gave these cases with all their details to the right hon. Gentleman a short time ago, and in reply to a question I put to him shortly afterwards he said he was investigating them. I would now ask him whether the facts I then put before him are true, and, if so, whether they really represent—as my informants tell me they do—what happens every day in connection with this traffic? We find, on page 18 of the Report of the Traveling Inspector, the following:—

“At Glasgow, James A. Kirkwood, the Chairman of the United Fleshers' Society, introduced me to the various dealers then present at the wholesale meat market, who showed me all the carcasses on sale which bore the marks of sticks, and I was assured about 30 per cent. are so injured, a badly marked carcass being valued by some at a sovereign less in value, while others placed the depreciation at a farthing to a halfpenny a pound. I may here remark that it is more fancy than reality as to the injury to the meat, as meat; but a marked carcass will not sell like another. It appears, if an Irish beast is hurt, it cannot be detected on its arrival until slaughtered and skinned, while in the case of American or Canadian stock, the injury being old, the scar is seen on the surface, and the butcher accordingly offers proportionately less; and, at present, they prefer to buy a Canadian against an Irish animal.”

On this Mr. Kirkwood writes—

“Mr. Coupar reminds me of 30 head of Irish cattle he bought a short time before the memorial was framed from Messrs. Ternan's, and from the weight they turned out, had the carcasses not been bruised, in the ordinary course of trade he would have netted £30 of clear profit, but from the damage they had received he sustained a loss of a little over £40, thus making a loss of £70 sterling to the country on 30 cattle. Mr. Watson says that with a large stock of Irish beef on hand, say six to seven carcasses, he finds a great difficulty in supplying his customers with sound cuts. Mr. Sloan says the last Irish cattle he bought—seven in number—he had to cut four quarters of beef before he could get one perfect cut about 30 lb. to 40 lb. to suit his customer.”

NOTE.—Mr. Sloan's cattle were free from the slightest appearance of “whacking,” as Mr. Chaplain terms it.

Mr. Wm. W. Watt says—

“It is not safe for a butcher to buy an Irish beast until he is aware that it has been ashore for a week. When Irish cattle are killed immediately after arrival four out of every six are more or less damaged, and the meat very much deteriorated in value—so much so that a well-to-do butcher in Glasgow now rarely purchases an Irish beast. So strong are my feelings in regard to the injuries received by Irish cattle, that I have not bought one for many years back. Were proper care taken at the shipment, and vessels especially adapted for this particular trade, any additional freight that might require to be levied would be more than compensated for by the enhanced value of the animal on arrival.”

I have also a statement from Archibald McConnochie, flesher, of Glasgow, who says—

“I am a member of the Committee of the Glasgow United Fleshers' Society, and have been so for several years past. I am also a Director of the Glasgow Meat Market Company, Limited, and have been in the trade all my life. I have read over Mr. Watts's statement regarding the transit of Irish cattle, and I fully endorse it in every particular. I have not bought for many years back a single Irish beast because of the treatment I know these animals receive in transit.”

Now, as to the specific instances supplied to me by the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals—and here I would observe that for obvious reasons I withhold the names and dates. I have already given them to the right hon. Gentleman. In one case this is the Report—

“Four of the cattle, on being brought ashore by means of a steam winch, were seriously injured; two of them had their backs fractured, and were suffering internal injuries. These animals lay in the sheds suffering great pain for about three hours before a float was obtained, or any person looked after them. On going to the office they informed me that it was no part of their duty to remove the animals after landing them, and they did not consider themselves in any way responsible; but as the cattle were insured, they would remove them to the slaughter-house on behalf of the Insurance Company. The consignees alleged that they were not responsible nor supposed to take delivery of disabled cattle, particularly if insured, and in some cases they are not allowed by the Shipping Companies to do so.”

Here is another Report—

“I may refer to another bad case which occurred on the 3rd February last, but which is not in my Report for 1890. On the arrival of the vessel two or three of the dealers asked the officers on board to inspect cattle in the after between deck. The officers went quietly aboard, accompanied by one of the cattle dealers, and made their way to the said deck. The steam and vapour charged with ammonia arising from them was so bad that it was very difficult to breathe. The heat was also very great, causing perspiration to run down their faces. They were unable to remain longer than a few minutes. The cattle from this part of the ship came ashore in a very wet and exhausted condition. The steamer carried 218 head of cattle and 11 horses. There were 120 head of cattle on the between decks in the condition referred to. After the cattle were all removed, two brown bullocks were found to be dead, having been suffocated. Another bullock was found unable to rise or stand, and had to be put into the sling and taken on shore on a barrow, and afterwards conveyed on a float to the slaughter-house. This state of matters was caused for want of proper ventilation. I further learned from the cattle dealers who came across with the cattle that the night was pretty calm. The steamer left Londonderry about 8 p.m. on the 2nd inst., and arrived at Greenock at 6.30 a.m. on the 3rd inst. Leaving there at 9.15 a.m., she arrived at the Broomielaw about 11 a.m. The dead bullocks were valued at £21 10s. each. From further inquiry I ascertained that this steamer was used for other cargo, and had her ventilation holes all covered, and when used temporarily or occasionally for cattle her ventilators should be uncovered, which was not done in this instance. These are only a few cases of what can be witnessed regarding the Irish traffic; but owing to the obstacles placed by the owners of steamers in the way of access to them, the matter has in no way improved, and cases of a similar description are of almost daily occurrence. The cattle dealers in Glasgow have all the same complaint to make, and their evidence is corroborated by the officers of the Society."

The Chief Inspector of the Society in another communication says—

"On calm nights, and in the most favourable weather, when there is a very considerable number of cattle penned in the 'tween decks of the ordinary cross channel steamers, the temperature in these 'tween decks rises to a great height, which causes the cattle to steam badly. This produces an atmosphere saturated with ammonia and other foul smells, which is perfectly suffocating, and from this cause alone it is quite common that the cattle are either wholly or partially blind for the first few hours after coming ashore. The state of the atmosphere on a fully loaded 'tween deck, and the condition as to blindness of the cattle may be seen almost any day at this port during the shipping season. This cruel treatment is attributable, in a great measure, to the want of proper ventilation in the 'tween decks."

He adds—

"The sufferings of Irish cattle are caused also by the manner in which they are stored in these steamers in order that they may carry a large number of cattle. These animals are jammed into pens, and as they get exhausted by the foul air and the deck gets slippery, the weaker cattle become exhausted in their continued efforts to keep their feet, and finally fall down and are trampled upon. Before being killed by this means they are generally rescued by the bullock men in charge, who are supplied by the steamers for the special purpose of beating these exhausted cattle on to their feet again. It is alleged that it is owing to the presence of these bullock men that the number of deaths on board does not form anything like an adequate guide to the amount of sufferings and abuse endured by the animals. It must be understood that this represents the normal condition of the cattle on fully-loaded steamers in moderate to good weather; you can easily imagine their condition in bad weather. Again, there is no proper foothold for the cattle, which is essential to the safe carriage of cattle in any state of the weather."

Major Tennant, the Board of Agriculture Inspector, in one of his Reports, after speaking of the stench of Atlantic ships, says—

"The stench is not nearly so great as it is in the holds of many of the Irish ships, where cattle are carried covering the whole of the deck very often. I have been completely blinded in those cases sometimes."

Things are not so bad in the Transatlantic steamers as they are in the Irish steamers; the longer voyage makes it more imperative that more care should be taken. Three years ago the Travelling Inspector made recommendations as to better gangways and precaution in the way of using sand; but it does not appear that anything has been done to carry them out. Much responsibility devolves upon the owners of cattle for not sending fit men with them to see that they are taken care of and supplied with food and water, that the holds are ventilated, that unnecessary suffering is not inflicted, and that existing regulations are enforced. Hitherto official activity has been limited to the Transatlantic trade, and no great willingness has been shown to take up the cross-Channel trade. It is obvious that when you have the beasts under your care for a fortnight or so, it is necessary to take greater precautions than when they pass through your hands in the course of a few hours. I know that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Agriculture is anxious to distinguish his tenure of office by doing all he can to increase the comfort and mitigate or do away with the misery of the animals which come under his care. I regret, however, that the right hon. Gentleman has, as yet, done nothing with regard to this question, and it is in the hope that he will make some statement on the subject that I make the Motion which stands in my name—to reduce this Vote by the sum of £100.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item A, Salaries, be reduced by £100, part of the Salary of the President."—(Mr. Parker Smith.) (9.1.)

DR. TANNER: I listened to the remarks of the hon. Member for Glasgow with attention, and was awaiting a reply from the President of the Board of Agriculture. I was surprised to hear the hon. Member attempt to depreciate Irish cattle, but, as a matter of fact, as long as I have been in the House I have never listened to the hon. Member on any subject that had anything to do with Ireland without finding him make an attempt—I will not say an insidious attempt—to do harm to that country. What was the object of his extremely long speech, and of those bundles of statistics which he gave us? They led up to two points: first of all, that money should go into the pockets of certain classes—shipowners and cattle dealers—with which the hon. Member himself may or may not be connected; and, secondly, that the fleshers of Glasgow ought not to purchase Irish cattle when they can possibly get Canadian. We had a very discursive statement about the value of well-ventilated and well-appointed ships. Well, if we could have the best class of modern vessels—such as have been provided on some of the great lines at the instance of Mr. Plimsoll—for the carrying of cattle from Ireland to the shores of England, there would be a great deal to be said in favour of the hon. Member's argument, but you can hardly expect that you can have the same class of vessel for carrying cattle a short distance as you have for carrying them across the Atlantic. I submit that it is impossible to expect the class of vessels engaged in the Transatlantic trade to be employed in the short transit between Belfast and the Clyde. We even have better vessels plying from Cork, the passage being longer. From Cork the voyage is some 17 or 12 hours; therefore, the arrangements for the comfort of the animals are better. There is more space between decks in the Cork Steamship Company's boats or the Waterford boats than you have in the northern boats. If the hon. Member wants to do any good he ought to begin at home, because most of the vessels of which he complains hail from the Clyde, and are not Irish vessels. I have risen for the purpose of defending some of our carrying companies in Ireland, and I maintain that most of the Glasgow vessels that carry cattle are not so well adapted for the trade as many Irish vessels are; therefore, the hon. Member should not endeavour to throw so much blame on our poor country, but should try and mend the habits and manners of some of the Shipping Companies that belong to the town he represents. While, however, I seek to defend the Irish carrying companies from the strictures of the hon. Member, I admit that in this matter, as in others, there is room for much improvement. There is much useless beating of beasts in taking them on and off the vessels, and the animals suffer in consequence of the narrowness of the gangways on some of the Glasgow boats which have not the amount of cubic space between the decks that is absolutely necessary. A few years since, when we did not agree with the Cork Steam Packet Company, we determined, because they were carrying boycotted cattle, to start a line of our own. We found when we went into the matter that we were able to mend many of the points which have been dealt with at such length by the hon. Member by the use of Danish vessels which we got from Copenhagen. We hired a couple of those vessels to compete with the Cork Steam Packet Company, and we found that we were able to carry cattle much better than formerly owing to the fact that the Danish gangways were much wider than those usually provided in British ships. I think that out of this matter great practical good will accrue to the Irish farmer. I am an honorary member of the South of Ireland Cattle Trade Association, and I do not believe that animals suffer such deterioration in the short transit between Ireland and this country as the hon. Member alleges, namely, from 10s. to £1 per head, because if that were so the Irish farmers would take steps to secure their own interest. The onus and responsibility for the cruelties alleged by the hon. Member rest, not with the shippers of cattle, but with the shipowners, who try at all risks and hazards to make the most of the smallest possible space. As to the slippery floors, the point was amply illustrated by certain facts brought forward by the hon. Member. The Shipping Companies will not spend a little money on sand—a very small amount of money, because I imagine that a ton or two of this substance would suffice for one of these short journeys. If they will not spend money on scantlings, they surely might spend it on a little sand.

*(9.45.) MR. CHAPLIN: My attention has been for some time directed to this subject, and I am bound to admit that the hon. Member for Partick is more than justified in bringing it before the Committee. I have been for some time engaged in considering and dealing with the question of the Atlantic cattle trade. Although the question of the Irish cattle trade has by no means been lost sight of, it is impossible to do everything at once, and the American traffic is the more important of the two. There is a wide distinction between the American cattle trade and the Irish which ought not to be lost sight of. In the latter case cattle are at sea 30 hours at most, and on the average only 12 hours, whereas in the case of the Atlantic traffic they are 10, 15, or even 20 days at sea, and, in addition to this, enormous losses of cattle occur which are altogether unknown in the Irish traffic. A company which carries cattle between Glasgow and Ireland informed me that in 1890 they carried 20,716 cattle, besides horses, sheep, and pigs, and the casualties were 28 cattle injured and only 13 killed, whereas in the Atlantic traffic sometimes 500 cattle are lost at once. I think, therefore, that I am justified in devoting my attention first to the Atlantic traffic. With regard to the Irish cattle traffic, the sufferings of the animals begin the day they are moved from the fairs; they are constantly beaten to get them into the limited space available at stations; again beaten in being put into the trucks, and again on being unloaded from the trucks and embarked on the ships. So far, however, I have no power or authority, and consequently no responsibility, because everything which takes place in Ireland is entirely beyond the jurisdiction of the Board of Agriculture. Then we come to the passage by sea, and there I frankly admit that there is room for improvement on board the vessels, especially with regard to ventilation, and the matter is now being considered by the Board of Agriculture. The injuries to cattle arise mainly from two causes. In the first place, they inflict injuries upon each other with their horns, especially in the case of young stock which cannot be tied up, because coming fresh from the pastures they injure themselves more by their struggles to get loose than they would if they were left free. Then I believe that it is the case that at many ports sufficiently good landing places are not provided. I am examining into that question now, and if inquiries have not already been sent out they will shortly be sent out, and arrangements will be come to which will bring about considerable improvement in that respect. I am afraid that it is only too true that the cattle are subjected to great and unnecessary violence from the drovers. With regard to the remedies which I have had in my mind as suitable for the state of things which has been described, on the question of dishorning I have nothing to say, because the animals are embarked in Ireland, where I have no jurisdiction, and there is nothing in the state of the law there to prevent dishorning. But the question of the violence of drovers is one which I have to consider, and I think that it may be possible to do something in that respect by establishing a system of licences for these drovers so that there shall be some control over them, for where any brutality takes place a drover's licence could be taken away. I think that legislation would be required to deal with this question. With regard to landing places the Board is, or will shortly be, in communication with Local Authorities. I have been asked with reference to certain specific cases whether they are accurate, or, if so, whether they can fairly be considered as representing what usually takes place. I will put briefly before the Committee the answers which I have received. A complaint has been made, in connection with the steamer Duke of Argyll, that on December 12, 1890, four cattle were seriously injured and left lying three hours without attention. The reply is that four cattle were seriously injured; that the consignees engaged to send floats for them, and that the animals were kept until the floats arrived. Then there is a complaint with regard to the ship General Gordon, that on November 18, 1890, four cattle were found lying down with others trampling on them, the horn of one being knocked off, and of the vessel being overcrowded. The reply is that the cattle were landed all right, and that nothing is known about the injury to them. With regard to the steamer Duke of Leinster, it is alleged than on November 22, 1890, one beast was unable to rise and was injured. The reply is that the master and officers deny that any beast had received any injury. A fourth case is with regard to the ventilation of another steamer on February 3 of this year. The reply is that it is not true that the ventilation was bad, but that an inexperienced cattleman made the mistake of turning the mouths of the ventilators the wrong way, and that it was an exceptionally close night. I think that I have now answered the specific cases which have been brought to my notice. I can say that I have done my best to carry out the duties which are imposed upon me by the Act of Parliament, and I hope that I shall always do so in the future. I shall, without hesitation, endeavour to see that those regulations which I think necessary are carried out, and if they are not I will take whatever steps are in my power to enforce them in the future. On the other hand, I am naturally jealous of doing anything which would unduly interfere with the Irish cattle trade with this country, which is a matter of extreme importance. I am quite sensible of the objections which are raised to the traffic as carried out at present, and that it may be improved in various directions, some of which I have endeavoured to indicate to the Committee.

MR. JEFFREYS: Can the right hon. Gentleman give us any information as to a serious outbreak of pleuropneumonia—

THE CHAIRMAN: There is a specific Amendment before the House.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): May I ask whether the information in answer to the complaints has come merely from the owners of the vessels without further inquiries being made?

MR. CHAPLIN: What happened was this. I made all the inquiries in my power in order to ascertain whether the charges were accurate or not, but a long time had elapsed since they occurred before they were brought to my knowledge, and under the circumstances I had to apply to the owners or those responsible for the ships. After considerable correspondence between the Board of Agriculture and the shipowners, I was obliged to rely on the explanations the latter gave me. That is the only information I have.

(10.0.) MR. J. PARKER SMITH: I have to thank the right hon. Gentleman for the explanations and assurances he has given us, and to say I am very pleased to find that the cases I cited are found, on inquiry from the owners, not to be so bad as they appeared. The cases were brought forward by the officers of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, and of course they had great difficulty in obtaining a knowledge of the facts.

MR. W. F. LAWRENCE (Liverpool, Abercromby): I am heartily glad the right hon. Gentleman is about to take action in this matter. I have been told by men in the butchering trade that the injury done to cattle during transit from Ireland is infinitely greater than that done to cattle during transit from America. The bruising the Irish cattle receive from the hands of various people is so great that when they are killed the meat is discoloured and not what it ought to be.

MR. C. W. GRAY (Essex, Maldon): What we have to consider is the injury done to fat cattle and also store stock during transit. As to the transit of fat cattle I will not delay the Committee, though I am glad to find there are Members on both sides of the House who are determined that cattle, whether fat or lean, shall not be subjected to the cruelty during transit that they have hitherto endured. I trust the right hon. Gentleman will pay very great attention to the transit of store cattle from Ireland, because it is these cattle that farmers in many parts of England buy in very large quantities. We, in England, are not altogether blameless as to the treatment the cattle receive on landing, though I believe the greater cruelty is practised at the port of embarkation and on board ship. The right hon. Gentleman has spoken of the boring that takes place on board ship. But boring is done by cattle of considerable strength. Thousands of little calves, six months old and with horns only two inches long, are brought over here, and are bought by the farmers in the Eastern and Southern Counties. These little things do not knock each other about much. The cruelty they experience is from the sticks of the drivers and from bad management. I know from practical experience that in many instances these very young calves are put in the holds of ships where the ventilation is so bad that many of them never recover from the effects. I am not prepared to say that pleuro-pneumonia is generated in the holds of ships, but disease is certainly generated, and as a consequence the purchasers of the cattle suffer loss.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

DR. CLARK : I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman how the money under Section 10 is spent. I notice there is an increase of £3,000 under the head of "Agricultural Education and Grants in Aid." Will the right hon. Gentleman explain the reason of the increase?

(10.6.) MR. MORTON : It was understood when the Agricultural Department was established that agricultural affairs would at once be put on a better footing. I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman what is being done to bring about a better condition of things. Last year at least £25,000,000 was sent to foreign countries for dairy produce, fruit, and poultry. What has been done to enable the agriculturists of this country to produce these things and thus keep this large sum of money in the country? This is not a party or political matter. Agriculture is the largest industry in this country, but in my opinion the land is not at the present moment producing all it ought, and I think the Department ought to devise some means of instructing our farmers so that a more advantageous condition of things may prevail.

(10.9.) MR. JEFFREYS : I desire to ask the right hon. Gentleman if he can give the Committee any information as to the recent serious outbreak of pleuro-pneumonia at Southampton. We are indebted to the right hon. Gentleman for the Act which has done a great deal to stamp out the disease, but I should like to know whether he has any reason to suspect that anybody has introduced diseased cattle into the country, and on finding they were diseased, has not given proper notice to the authorities. Perhaps I may also ask the right hon. Gentleman if he has any intention of introducing a Bill to deal with swine fever. I notice that £4,500 as against

Mr. C. W. Gray

£7,000 last year is taken for the collection of agricultural statistics. I should like to know whether the President of the Board of Agriculture is satisfied with the way in which agricultural statistics are collected, because I believe the statistics are often entirely fallacious.

MR. A. E. PEASE (York) : I presume that the decrease in the item for the collection of statistics is owing to an alteration in the remuneration paid to the collectors. I believe that under the old system the second-class officers of the Inland Revenue collected the statistics, and received remuneration which averaged £8 per head of the officers engaged in the collection. That remuneration has now been done away with altogether, with the result that the officers feel they have a substantial grievance.

MR. JACKSON : The collectors are paid by the Inland Revenue.

MR. A. PEASE : Is there no allowance in this Vote for the collectors of these statistics?

MR. JACKSON : No.

*(10.11.) MR. CHAPLIN : In reply to the hon. Member (Mr. A. Pease) I may say the experiment of collecting produce returns has not proved satisfactory, and the continuance of the return on the same lines was not recommended. In future the corn returns are to be placed under the charge of the Board of Agriculture, and the whole question is being investigated by a Select Committee. My hon. Friend (Mr. Jeffreys) asks me for the reason of the decrease in the item for the collection of agricultural returns. Last year we obtained statistics in regard to the number of allotments. That return has only been made hitherto once in five years, and therefore the charge for those statistics will not occur again for some time. My hon. Friend believes the statistics are entirely fallacious. [Mr. JEFFREYS : Often fallacious.] In the sense that they are not absolutely accurate, that is true; but I believe a great improvement has taken place. There was at one time a great jealousy on the part of farmers about filling up the papers sent to them by the Board, but this feeling is gradually dying out, and the character of the statistics are improving every year. I see no necessity for altering the system of collection. With reference to the introduction of a Bill dealing with swine fever, that is a formidable undertaking. My hands are now full with affairs relating to pleuropneumonia, and I should hesitate to ask Parliament for increased powers or funds until I have shown that I have made good use of the powers already conferred on me. As to the outbreak of pleuropneumonia at Southampton, there is no fear of any disease having been introduced from abroad. There is unfortunately a case at Southampton, which is now occupying the serious attention of the Board. There is a certain cattle-dealer, Mr. Tucker by name, on whose premises animals have been slaughtered, and where pneumonia is found to have existed so long that it is very difficult to believe that its existence has not been concealed. The result has been most disastrous. One animal was sent to the Dublin Show, and died soon after of the disease. I am happy to say the Board of Agriculture have been successful in tracing every animal sent back to this country from the Dublin Show, and nearly all the animals sold by this Mr. Tucker during the last few months. This case illustrates the difficulty with which the Board has to contend. There have been eight or ten outbreaks in different parts of the country, each of which has been distinctly traced to Mr. Tucker's establishment. Instructions have been given to institute a prosecution against Mr. Tucker, and I hope that the Board will be able to make such an example in this case as will have a deterrent effect. The hon. Member for Caithness has asked what the increase under sub-head F is for, and the hon. Member for Peterborough has asked what the Board of Agriculture is doing, generally speaking, to improve the agricultural industry. In the first speech I made upon my appointment as head of the Department, I warned the agricultural world and the community as a whole not to expect too much from the efforts of the Department. The £3,000 under sub-head F is the grant made at my request for the purpose of making further efforts in the direction of agricultural education. I have no doubt good use will be made of the money, and we shall be able to add something to the agricultural knowledge of the country. Within the last few days we have arranged with one of the Societies in the country that a scientific expert shall be added to the staff for the purpose of making researches into the causes which prevent the manufacture of the best quality of butter in some counties. The hon. Member for Peterborough referred to the enormous sums of money which are sent abroad for the purchase of agricultural produce, which he thinks, and to a great extent I agree with him, we might produce in this country. I have no doubt there is an enormous opening to the agricultural industry in the direction of dairy farming, of which not sufficient advantage has hitherto been taken. Everything depends upon the profit which can be made, and the profit depends upon the quality of the article produced. That is particularly the case in regard to butter, and the quality of butter depends upon the care and skill with which butter is treated. That depends, again, upon the education which may be forthcoming. The Committee is aware that in regard to agricultural education as a whole, great sums of money have been placed at the disposal of the County Councils, and it is really to the County Councils rather than to my Department, with our very small funds—£8,000—that we must look for agricultural education.

MR. DUFF (Banffshire): Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman is able to say what portion of the item under sub-head F is going to Scotland. Personally I am glad the right hon. Gentleman has got a grant of £3,000 from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but I do not think £8,000 is at all a large sum to spend on this object.

(10.30.) MR. McLAREN (Cheshire, Crewe): I take this opportunity to ask the right hon. Gentlemen whether he can see his way to give a larger grant to the Horticultural College at Swanley. It is the only horticultural college in the United Kingdom, and it is doing very good work in Kent. I think the Vice President of the Council will bear me out in that statement. It has been recognised by the County Council under their scheme for the distribution of the technical education grant. I believe the sum of money received from the right hon. Gentleman is very small, though the work the college is doing is very important, and by no means confined to the County of Kent. It is not simply a county institution, it is a college for horticultural interests throughout the kingdom, and as such is entitled to the very favourable consideration of the Government. If there were other institutions being started, as in the case of dairy schools, it would be another matter, but seeing that it is the only institution of its kind, I think the right hon. Gentleman, whose assistance to this class of education we cordially recognise, will allow the college has a fair claim to support. It will have, I think, the support of the Vice President of the Council; he spoke very favourably of the work done on the occasion when he distributed prizes a few months ago. With regard to dairy schools throughout the country generally, I am sure the support and encouragement given to them have been of great value, and in this direction I think the work of the Agricultural Department has been most successful. I presume we may expect that those institutions which have already received grants will continue to do so, and that this Estimate, far from diminishing, may increase from year to year. At the same time, I trust the Agricultural Department will keep in mind the Report of that Departmental Committee which sat two years ago and framed a scheme for the whole country, though nothing has yet been done towards carrying it out. These grants have been given, but what the Committee recommended was the establishment of provincial schools, and one large central school. I had hoped the scheme would have been carried out to some extent, and even yet I hope the right hon. Gentleman will signalise his tenure of office by taking up the matter thoroughly, using his influence with the Treasury for the carrying out of these recommendations in the Report of the Committee I refer to. From both sides of the House, I am sure, the Government will receive warm support—from every Member interested in agricultural technical education, and, therefore, I would press upon the right hon. Gentleman these two matters I have mentioned.

*(10.35.) MR. CREMER: I may save the right hon. Gentleman trouble if before he rises I put the question I have indicated my intention to address to the heads of various Departments. First, I would ask the right hon. Gentleman what are the duties of the two building clerks connected with the Department who receive £320 a year each? It seems somewhat incongruous that the Agricultural Department should require two building clerks to assist it. What are the special duties these gentlemen have to discharge? Then, perhaps, the right hon. Gentleman will inform the Committee what are the hours of service of the clerks and others in the Department, the time they arrive and depart, and the time allowed for refreshment?

DR. TANNER: I have a Motion on the Paper for the reduction of the Vote with reference to the Private Secretary of the Minister for Agriculture; but I now do no more than allude to the matter, for I have, since I put down my notice, found that one of the principal objections I had to the appointment of the gentleman has disappeared. That objection was that Mr. Bagenal, the gentleman who acts in the capacity of Private Secretary to the right hon. Gentleman, was the editor of a comic journal called England, the property, I believe, of the Civil Lord of the Admiralty (Mr. Ashmead Bartlett), and I did not recognise the propriety of introducing such a jocular spirit into such a serious Department as the Board of Agriculture. I hope, however, that the information I have is correct, and that I may not have to put the Committee to the trouble of a Division, Mr. Bagenal having ceased his connection with the comic paper I have mentioned. I know perfectly well that in other ways Mr. Bagenal's services as Private Secretary will be of great advantage. Mr. Bagenal possesses legal ability of the premier order, and perhaps the efficiency of the Department may be further developed by the military qualities attained by Mr. Bagenal's service in that distinguished corps known as the Carlow Rifles. These are qualifications to which I take no exception, though I object to the taint of connection with the comic journal England. We may, I hope, have a short explanation on this matter. Then there are one or two other matters painfully patent to anyone who casts his eye over this list of appointments. In Committee of Supply we are bound in the interests of the taxpayers to keep a steady eye to economy, though I am sorry there are many Members who do not rise to that sense of their duty. I want to point out that in this new Department most of the gentlemen appointed receive at once the maximum salary. I will not call attention to the salary of the Assistant Secretary, an office held by a gentleman who, in any position he might occupy, would do his duty. I have had an opportunity of listening to him in this House, and pay tribute to his ability. But how comes it to pass that while the maximum sum for the Director of the Veterinary Department is set down as £800, his salary this year is entered at £1,000? There are, on the other hand, some gentlemen who are paid close upon the minimum amount, while others get over the maximum. The Librarian gets £254, while the maximum is £300. The Surveyor gets £453, though the maximum is £350. There is an "Assistant Record Keeper," and I am sure from the length of time the Department has been in existence, the Record Keeper can scarcely need assistance. This official is down for a salary of £165, whereas we find the maximum on the Estimates is £150. These are matters requiring a little explanation. There is one more item. I see the Assistant Veterinary Inspector gets £430, his maximum being put down at £400. Then I would ask the right hon. Gentleman's attention to the "muzzling" order, and would suggest to him that some better subject might be found for the exercise of the Act of which he is the able exponent. At Bournemouth there has been great complaint of the stringency with which the muzzling order has been carried out, and I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is possible to allow some relaxation. He may be aware that there are many old ladies at Bournemouth, and they mostly have dogs, and whenever these ladies find the opportunity of ventilating their grievances to a Member of the House, they are solicitous for interest in favour of their pets. I put a question to the right hon. Gentleman on the subject, and he informed me that it is a dangerous neighbourhood, and that people must be protected. Of course, I do not know; it is rather a Conservative district, and perhaps the right hon. Gentleman is better acquainted with it than I am. However, I have felt it my duty to mention this, and I hope the right hon. Gentleman may see his way to allow some relaxation as regards Bournemouth; and also there is the peculiar position as regards part of the Uxbridge Road, where, I understand, dogs may walk without a muzzle on one side of the road but not on the other. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will rise to the level of the occasion, and will be able to draw a line of demarcation that will be satisfactory to all parties.

*(10.45.) MR. CHAPLIN: I am sorry to trouble the Committee again, but I will briefly answer the questions put to me. With regard to the Muzzling Order, probably the best answer I can give will be to state the results. In 1889, when the Muzzling Order was first put into force, there were 218 outbreaks throughout the country generally, 61 of them being in the Metropolis. In 1890 there were 90 outbreaks, 25 being in the Metropolis. In the first quarter of 1891 there was only one outbreak in the Metropolis, and only 13 throughout the country. I do not think that is an unsatisfactory result, and possibly the Committee will be disposed to overlook any minor laches on my part in view of the success which has attended our efforts in this matter. With regard to the Private Secretary to the President of the Board, I can assure the hon. Member that the disqualification to which he has alluded, if it ever existed no longer exists. I was not aware of it if it ever existed. I value the services rendered by this gentleman very highly, he has been of the greatest use to me, and I am heartily glad the Motion is not made. Then, as to the various items mentioned, the amounts represent the length of service, some gentlemen having reached the maximum, while others have not.

DR. TANNER: In some cases more than the maximum.

*MR. CHAPLIN: All depends on the length of service. Although the Department is a new one, the staff for the most part is old, and the Department is made up by a combination of a number of old offices, of which the greater part of the staff was transferred. Among the officials transferred to the new Department is the Director of the Veterinary Department, who receives £1,000 a year, and has been receiving that amount for years past. As to the building clerks, they were employed in the work of the Land Commission, and are now engaged in drawing plans for land improvements. The slight increase on the estimate of £40 is due to the annual increment which would have been received under any circumstances.

DR. TANNER: The Assistant Record Keeper?

*MR. CHAPLIN: There is a slight increase there, an increment of £15. It is due to an alteration made in the office from six to seven hours. Then, I have been asked a question in reference to the Horticultural College at Swanley. This institution has received grants in the last two years, and we make our grants on the result of inspection, and when the inspection is made I hope we shall continue the grant, but I cannot give a pledge until I have full information. Then the hon. Member asks as to the hours of employment in the Department, and I have to inform him that the working day consists of seven hours. In the Land Office work continues from 10 to 5, and in the Agricultural Department from 11 to 6, with Saturday half holidays. There is no distinction in this respect between the different classes of clerks. They receive full pay when absent on leave, or through illness, up to six months. There is a special rule respecting sick leave. Full pay is allowed for six months, then half-pay for another six months. After 12 months officials are, with the consent of the Treasury, paid at pension rate if still absent through illness. Overtime is paid, but is prevented as much as possible. As to the net increase in the Estimate, £3,000 of it is accounted for by the increased grant for agricultural education, and £800 by increased work in the Department, which testifies to its usefulness.

MR. DUFF: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered my question.

*MR. CHAPLIN: I think I can satisfy the hon. Gentleman. The share which Scotland obtained was £1,975 last year in respect of agricultural education, as against £2,585 for England and Wales. That is owing to the fact that the Department proceeds on the principle of helping those who help themselves most.

(10.52.) DR. CLARK: I think the right hon. Gentleman is wrong in his figures, and that the increase in salaries is £2,600.

*MR. CHAPLIN: I did not say salaries.

DR. CLARK: Before we leave the subject, I shall be glad if the right hon.

Mr. Chaplin

Gentleman will say if it is intended that when the positions now held by the recipients of higher salaries become vacant the re-appointments will be made according to the scale laid down. There are one or two items that need explanation. The Resident Legal Adviser, whose salary last year was £800, is this year set down for £900, but the annual increment attached to the office is £50, so it seems that this gentleman gets two years' increase at one jump. Then, lower down, I see two clerks of the First Division have their salaries increased from £852 to £947, though the annual increment is set down at £15, and the maximum is £400 each.

*MR. CREMER: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for his information in reply to my question. May I further ask him, inasmuch as the answer is not likely to be reported, if he will give me in writing a copy of the answer he made?

*MR. CHAPLIN: I shall be happy to give the hon. Member the information if he desires it.

MR. LLOYD - GEORGE: Will the right hon. Gentleman state the proportion of the grants in aid of dairy instruction which has gone to Wales? May I also press upon him the importance of encouraging this branch of agricultural education in Wales?

*(10.55.) MR. CHAPLIN: Of course, we pay every consideration to any application made, and I am anxious to promote this branch of agricultural education. As to the questions raised by the hon. Member for Caithness, the resident legal adviser has served for many years in the Land Commission Department, and the increase is in accordance with the terms of his engagement. The increase in the salaries of the clerks mentioned is due to natural increment.

MR. MORTON: As to the statements in reference to dairy education, I may say that, although I am in favour of reducing other Votes by, say, £10,000,000, I would be inclined to increase this Vote for the purpose of improving the quality and quantity of agriculture and dairy produce in the country.

MR. S. T. EVANS (Glamorgan Mid): Can the right hon. Gentleman say what is the amount of the grants for dairy instruction going to Wales?

*MR. CHAPLIN: I cannot answer just now, but I shall be happy to give the hon. Member the information if he will put down the question. Every application for assistance is fully considered.

Question put, and agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

*(11.0) MR. ROBY (Lancashire, S.E., Eccles): I do not intend to occupy the attention of the House for more than a short period, but I wish to make a few remarks with regard to the Endowed Schools Department. Before I do that I desire to thank the Charity Commissioners and the Treasury for commencing a most important work—a fresh survey of the charities of England and Wales. It will be remembered that since 1837 we have had nothing like a full Report of the property and present condition of these charities, but I understand that now we have got for the County of Denbigh as full an account as that which was the outcome of Lord Brougham's Commission at the date I have quoted. Probably the present account is even more complete. I only hope that the Charity Commissioners may be successful in obtaining the requisite funds for carrying on this work throughout England and Wales. With regard to the Endowed Schools Commission, I wish to ask for information as to the present position of the Endowed Schools Department with regard to the drawing up of schemes? From its first foundation in 1869 the Department has been appointed for short periods of four or five years, or even from year to year. In 1874 Lord Sandon, as Vice President of the Council, moved the Second Reading of the Endowed Schools Bill, and intimated that the work would be proceeded with at a quicker rate than theretofore, and promised to appoint additional Assistant Commissioners, in order that the work might be finished in five years. As a fact, he began by dismissing two of the Commissioners, and did not appoint any greater number of assistants. His estimate has not been justified. The work is still greatly in arrear, although 17 years have elapsed since that time. I find in the 37th Report of the Charity Commissioners that the number of endowed schools dealt with by the Endowed Schools Commissioners was 271, while the Charity Commissioners dealt with 463; the former body existed for five years, while the latter body have been doing the same work for 16 years. The comparison of work done is, therefore, not very favourable to the Charity Commissioners. We are now in this position: Between 700 and 800 endowed schools have had schemes framed for them. There were, it was reckoned, 800 endowed schools which were nominally grammar schools, and over 2,000 which were not grammar schools. A large proportion of these had very small endowments, and all schools with endowments not exceeding £100 a year have been taken from the Charity Commissioners and handed over to the Education Department. The total number of endowed schools still within the terms of the Endowed Schools Acts, as administered by the Charity Commissioners, is probably 1,100 or 1,200. Less than 800 have been dealt with. I should be glad if the Government or the Charity Commission will lay on the Table a Return showing what schools or other educational endowments have had no schemes submitted for them, the Return to apply, of course, to such endowments as are within the jurisdiction of the Charity Commissioners. The question arises, what is to be done for the future? Is it likely that when schemes have been submitted for the remaining 300 or 400 schools the work of this Department will be finished? Is it not more likely that there will be work to be done in the way of constantly amending the schemes to make them in accord with the requirements of the day? I think the Endowed Schools Commissioners should not continue on their present precarious tenure, and I ask the Government will it not consider the desirability of putting the administration on a permanent and more satisfactory basis? There are two objections to the present mode of dealing with these endowments. One is to be found in the cumbrous procedure of the Charity Commissioners for making the necessary inquiries, framing the scheme, and submitting it to the Education Department and sometimes to Parliament. I see no reason why one body should not be sufficient to do this work. The Charity Commissioners are a body standing more or less aloof; the Education Department, on the other hand, is directly responsible to Parliament. I do not think it is satisfactory that, in the case of schemes which cause great differences of opinion, a great deal of the responsibility should come upon a body which, so to speak, stands outside Parliament, and is, therefore, not able to deal with them so strongly as a Government Department could. I should be in favour of putting a large portion of the work of framing new schemes and amending existing ones under a Department of the Education Office. The Charity Commission would continue to exercise many of their old powers, but the new powers granted by the Endowed Schools Acts, which relate to matters that excite the most feeling in the country, would, I think, on the whole, be more simply and more satisfactorily dealt with by a Department of the Privy Council. A year or two ago an Act was passed for developing Welsh intermediate education, and that Act constituted in each county of Wales, and also in Monmouthshire, a Committee of three persons nominated by the County Council and two by the Lord Lieutenant, specially qualified by their knowledge of the locality, to give material assistance in executing the function of framing schemes. I think some similar kind of body is required in this country. It is very important to decentralise a good deal of the work, and I hold that there should be in each county, or combination of counties, a Committee dealing with charities and endowments, and with authority to look at the whole interests involved, from both a broad and a local point of view, and advise accordingly. Such a Committee would better understand the needs and wishes of the locality than a body sitting in London. I should be very glad if the Government will, during the Recess, consider the whole question, and see whether they cannot devise some plan for giving more representation to local feeling, recognising more fully local requirements, and, at the same time, in some degree removing unnecessary steps which exist at present in the carrying out of schemes. I do not look at these schemes as permanent documents intended to last unaltered for a long time. They are simply formal statutory rules for governing particular endowments, and they ought to be continually subject to reconsideration and amendment, so that they may be made to meet the different circumstances of each county or locality. There is a clause in the Welsh Intermediate Education Act which, I believe, has been of great service, a clause which gives the right to any Assistant Commissioner of the Charity Commission to be present at the meeting of the County Committee to advise, but not to vote. There should be attached to every county or group of counties throughout England an Assistant Commissioner or Inspector who would be the adviser of the Committees throughout his district. If that were done, and some kind of local form given to the administration of charities, I think it would be a great service to the country. I am very far from wishing to move any reduction of the Vote. I have not the least doubt that the money has been exceedingly well expended for the benefit of the whole country, and I shall be only too glad if at any time the Charity Commissioners can give further evidence of the great advantages they have brought to bear on the endowed schools of the country.

(11.20.) MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): The subject which my hon. Friend has brought to the notice of the Committee is one of very great importance, and no one in England, I suppose, is so well qualified to speak upon it as he is. I am sorry the Vice President was not here to listen to the valuable suggestions he has thrown out. I should like to remind the Committee that it was part of the original plan for the reform of the Endowed Schools Commission as launched by the late Mr. W. E. Forster in 1869, that there should be County Boards of Education for the supervision of the endowed and secondary schools in their districts, and with the view of ultimately establishing some beneficial relations between those secondary schools and the elementary schools of the country. I have risen, however, for the purpose of asking information with regard to the City of London Parochial Charities. I see that the Vote for this year is less by

£1,000 than that for last year, and I suppose we may take that to be a sign that the business of the Commission is rapidly drawing to a close, and that the expense will still further decrease. But what is the present state of business? For how long will it be necessary to extend the powers of the Commission; what schemes still remain to be disposed of; and how much of the money which, under the 44th section of the Act of 1883 is to be repaid to the Treasury, has been repaid, or within what time is it likely to be repaid?

(11.22.) MAJOR RASCH: I wish to say a few words on this Vote from the point of view of the agricultural labourers. The House is probably well aware that the agricultural labourer is totally and diametrically opposed to the objects and works of the Charity Commission. He says that when he asks that body for bread it offers him a stone. The Commission does precisely what it ought not to do. Beneficiaries under the wills of pious founders used years ago to receive something practical for these charities. They got bread and meat and other useful things. Now, the money is spent, or rather it is wasted, on repairs of buildings, salaries of teachers, the purchase of books, and other matters, with which the labourer has no sympathy, and to most of which he is entirely opposed.

MR. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith): Will the hon. Member quote cases instead of dealing in generalities?

MAJOR RASCH: Certainly. There was a case at Lichfield where a considerable sum of money was wasted, where the steward received 10 per cent. of the value of the charity, and then, in addition, brought in a bill of £30 or £40. Again, in a village with which I am acquainted—in Essex—money has been spent on buildings, in the purchase of books, and in other ways with which the labourer has no sympathy. And the dissatisfaction is increased, because the labourers cannot get clear accounts as to how the money is spent, and so they come to the conclusion that the squire and the parson have divided it between them. Another cause of discontent arises from the system of co-optation. The persons who administer the charities under the direction of the Charity Commissioners elect each other, and the ratepayers have no voice in the matter. I shall not trouble the Committee by moving a reduction of the Vote; all I desire to do is to point out the objections of the labourers to the Commissioners' operations, and to do it in language more Parliamentary than the men are in the habit of themselves employing.

(11.25.) MR. S. HOARE (Norwich): I rise to support the appeal of the hon. Member for Eccles, for I agree with him that localities should have more voice in expressing their views than they have hitherto had. I hope the Government will consider whether legislation cannot be introduced so that the public shall have the power of declaring whether or not they are satisfied. Some of us who took part in securing the rejection of the Bill for extending the powers of the Charity Commission did so because we thought it failed to carry out the recommendations of the Committee on Charitable Trusts, whose Report was furnished to this House in 1887. That Report has not yet been acted on at all. We endeavoured to amend the Bill by getting inserted a clause giving the people of a district the right to be heard in regard to the administration of local charities before a scheme was framed. But we were unsuccessful, and now the Bill has been dropped. I do not agree with my hon. Friend for Essex in his attack on the Commissioners. I think they have taken great pains and trouble in their work. In a village in which I am interested I act as Trustee of a charity now worked by means of a new scheme, under which the labourers have got allotments, can get their children apprenticed, and when sick are made an allowance of coals. I think the duties of the Charity Commissioners would be rendered much more easy if their powers were extended, and I hope the Government will consider the possibility of, in a future Session, securing that, before a scheme actually becomes law, the people of the district concerned shall have the power of expressing their views upon it. There are now six different systems under which schemes for charities have to be applied for, and they are very difficult and complicated. Many people, and some of us who are Members of this House, do not even now know how to oppose a scheme or to express an opinion on it. Some of the schemes do not come before Parliament, and therefore it is practically impossible to offer any objection. I hope we shall have legislation introduced which will simplify the procedure.

(11.30.) MR. J. STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): I wish to refer to a matter I raised two years ago on a similar Vote, and to again complain that the auditing of accounts was not satisfactory. I believe I am right in saying that between 30,000 and 40,000 Charities send in statements of accounts annually to the Commissioners, who do not hold themselves responsible for auditing them. There is no uniformity, and the audit is conducted in a most perfunctory manner. I hope that the Charity Commissioners will make some more satisfactory arrangement for the auditing of the accounts in connection with the County Councils. The organisation of the County Councils supplies means of dealing with charities locally, and their co-operation might result in saving many charities from disappearance. Another point on which I desire information relates to the City parochial charities in London. As the Committee know, these charities are now devoted partly to ecclesiastical and partly to general purposes. The scheme relating to them left unallocated something like £10,000 a year, which was to be at the disposal of the new managing body created by the Charity Commissioners. I wish to have the latest information as to the amount of these unallocated funds, for there is reason to believe that they are larger than the sum which it was at first understood they would amount to. The body intrusted with this money is thought by many persons to be not sufficiently representative, and there is not, I believe, amongst its members any one who has any special fitness to deal with the question of open spaces, which is one of the subjects to which attention is to be paid under the scheme, and upon which money is to be spent. I should like to know from some member of the Government before the Debate closes what provision has been made for the selection of persons best fitted for the due and proper administration of this portion of the fund.

(11.37.) MR. A. DYKE ACLAND (York, W.R., Rotherham): I only want to endorse the arguments which have been delivered as to the desirability of linking together those bodies which are specially concerned with charities and the County Councils. The experience of Wales shows that the Charity Commission can act harmoniously with the local representative bodies for the improvement of elementary and higher education. I wish the Government could see their way to bring in an intermediate Act for England on the lines of the Welsh Act, in order to enable the representative members of the County Councils to work in harmony with the Charity Commissioners, so that together they may utilise the endowments of a county in the best way. Small counties ought also to be able to join together in order to utilise their funds to the best advantage. The progress we have made in Wales in one year is simply marvellous, and soon we hope to have set up 70 or 80 new secondary schools of a cheap character, to which the children of agricultural labourers will have access, and there will be an abundance of scholarships; in fact, the Principality will be provided with a network of schools, being a real link between the elementary school and the University Colleges, such as I say, when complete, will not be equalled in either England, Scotland, or Ireland. I hope our little experiment in Wales will be an encouragement to the Charity Commissioners to help on a similar scheme for England. What under the Local Taxation Act is now in a purely experimental stage must pass into an organising stage. But that cannot be done without fresh legislation. I hope that some of our English friends will study the work we are doing in Wales, and I venture to say, in conclusion, that whatever complaint there may have been against the Charity Commissioners in the past, our experience in Wales shows that it is willing to work with us in a democratic spirit, setting aside all but purely educational considerations.

*(11.42.) MR. CREMER: I am glad to hear that the conduct of the Charity Commissioners in Wales has been of so highly praiseworthy a character, and I wish as much could be said as to their actions in England. Without going quite so far as the hon. Members for South East Essex and Norwich, I think I can, generally speaking, endorse the charges they have made against this body. It will be within the recollection of the hon. Member for Norwich that two years ago a Committee which sat upstairs to inquire into the doings of the Charity Commissioners, made a series of recommendations, but so far as I am aware, not one of them has been given effect to by the Charity Commissioners. One of the recommendations was that, in the appropriation of charities and endowments by the Charity Commissioners, due regard should be had to local opinion and requirements. That recommendation has not been carried out, and in a number of instances the opinion of the people in the localities has been defied. Two or three years in succession I brought under the notice of the House the notorious case of St. Katherine's Hospital in the Regent's Park, where, amongst many other gross abuses, the master has been allowed to pocket a sum of nearly £2,000 a year. What the master does in addition to preaching two or three sermons no one seems to know. Years ago a new scheme was proposed by the Charity Commissioners and endorsed by the London School Board for the better management of this institution, but for some mysterious reason the Commissioners have been prevented from carrying out their reforms, and so this scandalous waste and mismanagement is still continued.

*(11.46.) MR. J. W. LOWTHER: With regard to the last matter mentioned by the hon. Member for Shoreditch, I cannot add anything to the answer which I gave two or three years ago, when I explained the law relating to the subject. The law is to this effect — that where a charity has an income exceeding £50 a year, the Charity Commissioners cannot take any steps to force a new scheme on such a charity unless the Trustees apply in the first instance to the Commissioners for a scheme. The law still remains in this condition, and the Committee has heard from the hon. Member for Norwich how an attempt to alter it was defeated. As long as the powers of the Commission are limited in this direction I fear that the case must remain in the same position as it is now. As to the present position of the schemes under the City Parochial Charities Act, with regard to which questions were asked by the hon. Members for Aberdeen and Shoreditch (Hoxton), I have to tell the Committee that the great bulk of them have been approved by Her Majesty in Council, and are therefore law. Some of the other schemes, however, are still in an incomplete state. Schemes dealing with the ecclesiastical property of the five large parishes have been published, and will shortly be submitted to the Education Department. The scheme for the People's Palace has recently been published, but it has to await criticism, to go through the mill of the Education Office, and possibly to come before the House of Commons. I am sorry not to be in a position to report that any rapid progress has been made with regard to the polytechnics in the north of London. I believe that the Northern Polytechnic is in a fair way of making some progress, and possibly before long the scheme will be published. All the other important schemes have already become law; but the People's Palace is an extremely important one, dealing as it does with a large sum of money, and it will require a large amount of consideration before it finally becomes law. Having regard to the important schemes which yet remain to be completed, and to the difficulties and delay which may arise, the Charity Commissioners have come to the conclusion that it is desirable to continue the powers of the City Parochial Charities Department for some time longer; but the exact period has not been determined. The staff required will not be so large as it has been, and therefore the expense to the charities will be considerably diminished. The hon. and gallant Member for South East Essex has referred to a certain scheme in South Essex which has often been brought up before. As I said on a previous occasion, this scheme was drawn, not by the Charity Commissioners, but by the Court of Chancery. I may point out, too, that the income of this charity largely exceeds £50. As to the Endowed Schools Department, the schemes drawn by this Department require overhauling and modification as time goes on, and everything points to the conclusion that the work of this Department is not of a temporary character. This view is fully borne out by a clause on page 27 of the 37th Report of the Charity Commission. I cannot, offhand, assent to the proposals of the hon. Member for the Eccles

Division, because they obviously require very careful consideration; but the Commissioners would welcome any arrangement which would bring them into closer relations with the localities, as represented by the County Councils, in dealing with the wishes of localities interested, and in dealing with the question of audit of accounts. The Commissioners have no power in connection with these audits, which are often of a very unsatisfactory character. I see no reason why the County Councils should not be brought in with a view to superintending and auditing the accounts.

MR. J. STUART: What is the surplus of the City Charities?

*MR. J. W. LOWTHER: I am informed that the surplus of unallocated funds originally expected was about £5,000; but I believe that a slightly larger sum than that is at the disposal of the Central Governing Body, who, in deciding its application, will have to consider the case of North London.

*(11.59.) SIR J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): One of my complaints against the Charity Commission is that in drawing up their schemes they insert a clause enabling the Steward or Trustee to take no less than 10 per cent. from the gross income of the charity. I think that that is an excessive allowance for management, and that 5 per cent. would be ample. Then, again, with regard to the auditing of the accounts, the present system is most unsatisfactory, for although the Charity Commission does not audit them, the Trustees or Managers, whenever any complaint is made locally, reply simply that the accounts have been before the Commissioners.

(12.5.) On the Motion for adjournment,

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): The consideration of the Lords Amendments to the Irish Land Bill has been fixed for Monday, but seeing that they have only just been received from the other House, and bearing in mind the importance of the changes made, we cannot agree to their being considered at so early a date.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I have conferred with my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary on that point. We propose to put the matter down for next Monday, but not with the intention of proceeding with it. We are anxious to meet the wishes of hon. Members for Ireland, as well as to consult the convenience of the whole House. The Amendments will probably be considered on the following Thursday.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

HANOVER CHAPEL BILL [LORDS].

(12.25.) MR. PICTON (Leicester), who had the following Notice of Motion on the Paper :—

"To move that the Order [14th July] that the Hanover Chapel Bill [Lords] be committed be read, and discharged.

That the Bill be committed to a Select Committee of Seven Members, Four to be nominated by the House and Three by the Committee of Selection.

That all Petitions against the Bill presented in accordance with the Standing Orders be referred to the Committee; that the Petitioners praying to be heard by themselves, their Counsel, or Agents, be heard against the Bill, and Counsel heard in support of the Bill.

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

That Three be the quorum,"

said : I believe that the noble Lord in charge of the Bill (Viscount Cranborne) and others who take an interest in the measure are willing to agree to a Motion to refer it to a hybrid Committee, providing that the number is not so large as seven. I therefore refrain from moving my Resolution, in favour of that which stands in the name of the hon. Member for the West Derby Division of Liverpool (Mr. Cross).

Order [14th July] that the Hanover Chapel Bill [Lords] be committed read, and discharged.

Ordered, That the Bill be committed to a Select Committee of Five Members, Three to be nominated by the House, and Two by the Committee of Selection.

Ordered, That, subject to the Rules, Orders, and Proceedings of this House, all Petitions against the said Bill be referred to the Committee, and that such of the Petitioners as pray to be heard by themselves, their Counsel, Agents, or Witnesses, be heard upon their Petitions, if they think fit, and Counsel heard in support of the said Bill against such Petitions.

Ordered, That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

Ordered, That Three be the quorum of the Committee.—(Mr. Cross.)

VOL. CCCLV. [THIRD SERIES.]

MR. TATTON EGERTON (Cheshire, Knutsford): I do not propose to move the Instruction which stands in my name—

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee to alter Clause 13, and authorise the Charity Commissioners to amend the Trinity Chapel Scheme, and give to the new Church the same income as to the other Churches under the Scheme, and transfer the balance of the double portion given (under the plea of absence of endowment) to the Hanover Chapel, to the Mother Church of St. George's, Hanover Square."

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee to inquire whether the cost of building Hanover Chapel was not largely borne by the rates of the whole parish of St. George's, Hanover Square; and, if so, whether a portion of the surplus of the money to be derived from the sale of the chapel building and the site thereof, after providing for the erection of the new district church contemplated by the Bill, should not be used for the religious requirements of the whole parish; and, if so, the Committee, if they think fit, be at liberty to insert provisions in the Bill to apply a portion of such surplus accordingly."—(Mr. Thomas Henry Bolton.)

Objection being taken, the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed to-morrow.

CLASS II.

1. £25,867, to complete the sum for the Charity Commission.

*(12.30.) SIR J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): As the remarks which I was making upon this Vote were interrupted last night by the Rules of the House, I desire to continue what I was then saying. The complaint I have now to make against the Charity Commissioners is their disregard of the Resolution which was passed by this House in 1886, that the majority of the trustees and managers of a charity shall be elected by the ratepayers of the district affected. The Commissioners systematically ignore this requirement, and the consequence is, that in one charity I find the stewards' charges have been increased from £20 to £40, and that a law bill of £20, £30 or £40 is incurred, with rare exceptions, every year. I have no wish to give names, although I have them here. The accounts are not properly looked into, and the consequence is that the charities are robbed. Only this year, instead of the Charity Commissioners loyally carrying out the decision of this House that the majority of the trustees or managers should be elected by the ratepayers, in one of the schemes connected with the City of Lichfield there are only three out of 15 trustees directly elected by the ratepayers. There are eight representative trustees, which looks well upon paper, and gives a majority, but they are not elected by the ratepayers. They are nominated by the Town Council, who are identical with the Co-optative trustees and managers. I have often been asked the question, What is Co-optative Trustee? as many Members have failed to discover what their functions and duties are. It is, I believe, a position invented by the Charity Commissioners to enable a clique of persons, usually including the parson and the squire, to control and retain the control for ever of the Charity. The system is copied from the Municipal Act of 1837, when Lord John Russell, in order to carry his Bill through the House of Lords, had to submit to the pernicious system of Aldermen being elected by the Town Councillors in lieu of their being elected directly by the ratepayers. Whenever a vacancy among the Co-optative Trustees arises from death or bankruptcy, or any other cause, a new trustee or manager is elected by this body from among themselves. The pious founders of these charities nominated certain persons to see that their wishes were carried out in the future, and to see that the money was administered for the benefit of the poor in the place of their nativity. All what the founders looked to, was the proper administration of the funds, so that the poor, who they intended to benefit, should not be robbed of their rights. But the fact is, that under the present arrangements stewards are appointed who receive an excessive salary themselves, which is quite out of proportion to the work done, or required, and take care that their professional friends receive fees out of the funds. The Charity Commissioners say—"We are not accountable. Trustees and Managers have been elected, and if they will job away the money of the poor people we cannot help it." As they are practically out-voted, the poor have no voice whatever in the management of these charities. However small a Charity may be, if the managers have to go before a constituency at intervals, they will take care how they administer the trust, and, on the other hand, the constituency will see that they elect the best men as administrators. What I wish to see established is a system of election direct from the ratepayers. I know the Government say that the Resolution of the House was carried by a snatch Vote. My reply is, that if it was a snatch Vote, let Her Majesty's Government come forward and rescind it. I challenge them to do that, and to see what the opinion of the House of Commons is now. So long as the Resolution remains unrescinded, I think the Charity Commissioners ought to accept it loyally.

*(12.35.) MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): There are one or two matters in connection with this Vote which I should like to bring under the notice of the hon. Member for Penrith (Mr. J. W. Lowther.) In the first place, I believe there are a considerable number of cases in which the Trustees of Charities do not render their accounts as prescribed by the Act of Parliament. Indeed, there are thousands of cases in which the Trustees are still in arrear with their accounts. This arises, I believe, from the fact that in a great many instances the person who is supposed to keep the accounts is the incumbent, who is not, as a rule, a man of business, and in consequence, although quite unintentionally, he succeeds in getting the Charity into a great mess. In support of that view I may mention a case which occurred not long ago. I was present at a public inquiry into one of these Charities, which was conducted by the late Mr. Skirrow, one of the Inspectors. In the course of conversation with Mr. Skirrow he told me, quite unsolicited, and he had had a large experience in connection with the administration of Charities, that he only knew of one case in which a country clergyman had kept the accounts properly as a man of business would have done. Last night the question of popular representation in the appointment of trustees was brought up, and it was pointed out that the Resolution passed in 1886 has never been carried out. Personally I have had a good deal to do with the Charity Commissioners, and I have often benefited by the courtesy and consideration of the hon. Member for Penrith, and I must say that matters have been much better during the last two years than they were before. I do not see why, in regard to the smaller village charities, some uniform principle should not be adopted for the framing of a scheme in regard to the appointment of new trustees. In one of the Northamptonshire villages a scheme has been framed which ought to be converted into a model and advantageously followed in other places. The old trustees were the vicar, the two churchwardens, and the two overseers. At the inquiry which took place—and it was the inquiry I have already mentioned at which I met Mr. Skirrow—certain acts of gross negligence in the administration of the charity were proved. The funds which ought to have been administered for the benefit of the poor had been taken by the churchwardens and used for the purposes of the Church. In all these cases I think it is desirable that there should be a public inquiry. It tends to clear the atmosphere. In this instance, although it was at first supposed that the inquiry was instituted in hostility to the trust, it was soon made manifest that that was not so, and the vicar in the end was glad to get rid of responsibilities which he was unable to carry out under the new scheme. There are seven trustees; one, the Poor Law Guardian, is ex officio for the time being; four are representative and elected by the vestry every five years, and the two remaining trustees are co-operative trustees. Since the scheme has come into operation other villages are looking forward to a similar measure of justice. There is another important case, of which I regret I have been unable to give the hon. Member for Penrith notice, but I only received a letter in regard to it this morning. It is the case of a charity in the town of Warwick, a town represented by the Speaker of this House. There are in Warwick a number of charities which are called municipal charities. A scheme has just been put forward in regard to them, and it is provided that the first 6 vacancies out of a total of 21 trustees named in the scheme shall be filled by Representative Trustees elected by the three wards in Warwick. The 7th, 8th and 9th vacancies are not to be filled up at all, and the remaining 12 vacancies are to be filled by Co-optative Trustees, so that the total number of Trustees will be reduced to 18 in future, and when the first Co-optative Trustee is appointed he will be appointed by the 6 Representative Trustees and the 11 Co-optative Trustees. That is the reverse of popular representation, seeing that there will only be 6 Representative Trustees against 12 Co-optative Trustees, or two to one, and it is that system which I desire to see amended.

*(12.45.) MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): I wish to ask my hon. Friend the Member for Penrith to explain to the Committee two points in regard to the policy adopted by the Charity Commissioners in reference to the appointment of Trustees. Charity schemes, as we all know, come before Parliament, and Parliament is afforded an opportunity of considering them—not a full opportunity, but still an opportunity. But with the appointment of Trustees by the Commissioners, Parliament has nothing whatever to do. Therefore, I think, we have a right to watch with care how they use their powers in reference to these appointments. The rule of common sense as well as the principle of law is that persons should be appointed Trustees who will be loyal to the trust. You would not, for instance, place a Dissenter upon a Church of England Trust, nor would you put upon a Trust intended for education persons who are notoriously desirous of alienating the Trust from educational purposes. In appointing a Trustee you naturally appoint a person come before Parliament, and therefore it is practically impossible to offer any objection. I hope we shall have legislation introduced which will simplify the procedure.

(11.30.) MR. J. STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): I wish to refer to a matter I raised two years ago on a similar Vote, and to again complain that the auditing of accounts was not satisfactory. I believe I am right in saying that between 30,000 and 40,000 Charities send in statements of accounts annually to the Commissioners, who do not hold themselves responsible for auditing them. There is no uniformity, and the audit is conducted in a most perfunctory manner. I hope that the Charity Commissioners will make some more satisfactory arrangement for the auditing of the accounts in connection with the County Councils. The organisation of the County Councils supplies means of dealing with charities locally, and their co-operation might result in saving many charities from disappearance. Another point on which I desire information relates to the City parochial charities in London. As the Committee know, these charities are now devoted partly to ecclesiastical and partly to general purposes. The scheme relating to them left unallocated something like £10,000 a year, which was to be at the disposal of the new managing body created by the Charity Commissioners. This view is fully borne out by a clause on page 27 of the 37th Report of the Charity Commission. I cannot, offhand, assent to the proposals of the hon. Member for the Eccles come before Parliament, and therefore it is practically impossible to offer any objection. I hope we shall have legislation introduced which will simplify the procedure.

(11.30.) MR. J. STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): I wish to refer to a matter I raised two years ago on a similar Vote, and to again complain that the auditing of accounts was not satisfactory. I believe I am right in saying that between 30,000 and 40,000 Charities send in statements of accounts annually to the Commissioners, who do not hold themselves responsible for auditing them. There is no uniformity, and the audit is conducted in a most perfunctory manner. I hope that the Charity Commissioners will make some more satisfactory arrangement for the auditing of the accounts in connection with the County Councils. The organisation of the County Councils supplies means of dealing with charities locally, and their co-operation might result in saving many charities from disappearance. Another point on which I desire information relates to the City parochial charities in London. As the Committee know, these charities are now devoted partly to ecclesiastical and partly to general purposes. The scheme relating to them left unallocated something like £10,000 a year, which was to be at the disposal of the new managing body created by the Charity Commissioners. I wish to have the latest information as to the amount of these unallocated funds, for there is reason to believe that they are larger than the sum which it was at first understood they would amount to. The body intrusted with this money is thought by many persons to be not sufficiently representative, and there is not, I believe, amongst its members any one who has any special fitness to deal with the question of open spaces, which is one of the subjects to which attention is to be paid under the scheme, and upon which money is to be spent. I should like to know from some member of the Government before the Debate closes what provision has been made for the selection of persons best fitted for the due and proper administration of this portion of the fund.

(11.37.) MR. A. DYKE ACLAND (York, W.R., Rotherham): I only want to endorse the arguments which have been delivered as to the desirability of linking together those bodies which are specially concerned with charities and the County Councils. The experience of Wales shows that the Charity Commission can act harmoniously with the local representative bodies for the improvement of elementary and higher education. I wish the Government could see their way to bring in an intermediate Act for England on the lines of the Welsh Act, in order to enable the representative members of the County Councils to work in harmony with the Charity Commissioners, so that together they may utilise the endowments of a county in the best way. Small counties ought also to be able to join together in order to utilise their funds to the best advantage. The progress we have made in Wales in one year is simply marvellous, and soon we hope to have set up 70 or 80 new secondary schools of a cheap character, to which the children of agricultural labourers will have access, and there will be an abundance of scholarships; in fact, the Principality will be provided with a network of schools, being a real link between the elementary school and the University Colleges, such as I say, when complete, will not be equalled in either England, Scotland, or Ireland. I hope our little experiment in Wales will be an encouragement to the Charity Commissioners to help on a similar scheme for England. What under the Local Taxation Act is now in a purely experimental stage must pass into an organising stage. But that cannot be done without fresh legislation. I hope that some of our English friends will study the work we are doing in Wales, and I venture to say, in conclusion, that whatever complaint there may have been against the Charity Commissioners in the past, our experience in Wales shows that it is willing to work with us in a democratic spirit, setting aside all but purely educational considerations.

*(11.42.) MR. CREMER: I am glad to hear that the conduct of the Charity Commissioners in Wales has been of a highly praiseworthy character, and I want as much could be said as to their action in England. Without going quite so far as the hon. Members for South East Essex and Norwich, I think I can, generally speaking, endorse the charges they have made against this body. It will

*(1.15.) SIR H. DAVEY (Stockton): I do not think the Committee will regret the time that has been occupied in discussing this subject, because nothing could be more interesting to the country at large than the proper, the economical, and the due administration of its charities. The Charity Commissioners have often been attacked from various points of view; but I have seen a great deal of their work, both as regards general charities and more particularly with regard to the administration of their powers under the Endowed Schools Act; and I venture to say that any Member who takes the trouble to examine the work they have done will be struck by the very liberal-minded way in which they have exercised the powers conferred upon them. No doubt they are human, and have consequently in some cases made mistakes. They have been guilty, of course, of errors of judgment, but when the vast amount of property and the vast number of charities they have to deal with are considered, it will be realised that they have done their work well, and that the country owe a deep debt of gratitude to them. I propose on this occasion to address a few observations to the House as to the educational endowments of the country. There is no doubt in my mind that in past times, and to a large extent in existing days, those educational endowments have been very largely monopolised by the upper and middle classes, and have to a great extent been wasted, so far as any good to the general body of the people is concerned. I suppose there is scarcely a Member of the House who has not at one time of his life derived some benefit from the charitable educational endowments of the country. It may perhaps surprise some hon. Gentlemen who have been educated at Eton, Harrow, or Rugby to know that they have enjoyed the benefits of a charity in the shape of school buildings, for which they have had to pay no rent, and in the form also of chapels and playing fields. Many Members of the House—I include myself amongst them—have derived direct pecuniary benefit from those educational endowments by receiving more or less substantial exhibitions to assist in their support while going through their University course. I will say nothing as to scholarships or fellowships, because they are on a different footing. I prefer to confine myself to the educational school endowments of the country, and I venture to assert that the Charity Commissioners have rescued a good many school charities from extinction, because there are many schools now flourishing which were formerly moribund. Of that we have an instance within a very short distance of this House. I refer to the Westminster day schools. It appears to me, however, that the powers of the Commissioners are too restricted. In the first place, they are restricted by the Report of the Schools Inquiry Commission, which is embodied in the Preamble of the Act. They have, rightly in my opinion, held themselves bound by the policy which was indicated in that Report. Their powers also are restricted in the matter of applying to educational purposes charities which are not strictly educational, but which it would be for the benefit of the community to apply to such purposes. Their powers, too, of consolidating charities are limited. Therefore, if it is desired to secure anything like a scheme of management of those charities for the purpose—which I strongly support—of applying them to the secondary education of the people of the country, we must invest the present Charity Commission with larger powers, or we must create a Commission with sufficient powers for the purpose. There are a good many people nowadays in favour of applying charity money in support of elementary education. Personally, I think there is a good deal to be said in favour of that view, but it is not a popular one, and will probably not prevail in the House, because it will be suggested that the charities are being devoted to the relief of the rates. The subject of secondary education is one which before long—indeed, perhaps, within the next year or two—must engage the attention of Parliament, and if we are asked, as we probably will be asked, to provide cash out of public funds for its promotion, I think Parliament, before it votes the money for the purpose, ought to take in hand the whole re-organisation of the educational endowments of the country, with a view to Division, because they obviously require very careful consideration; but the Commissioners would welcome any arrangement which would bring them into closer relations with the localities, as represented by the County Councils, in dealing with the wishes of localities interested, and in dealing with the question of audit of accounts. The Commissioners have no power in connection with these audits, which are often of a very unsatisfactory character. I see no reason why the County Councils should not be brought in with a view to superintending and auditing the accounts.

MR. J. STUART: What is the surplus of the City Charities?

*MR. J. W. LOWTHER: I am informed that the surplus of unallocated funds originally expected was about £5,000; but I believe that a slightly larger sum than that is at the disposal of the Central Governing Body, who, in deciding its application, will have to consider the case of North London.

*(11.59.) SIR J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): One of my complaints against the Charity Commission is that in drawing up their schemes they insert a clause enabling the Steward or Trustee to take no less than 10 per cent. from the gross income of the charity. I think that that is an excessive allowance for management, and that 5 per cent. would be ample. Then, again, with regard to the auditing of the accounts, the present system is most unsatisfactory, for although the Charity Commission does not audit them, the Trustees or Managers, whenever any complaint is made locally, reply simply that the accounts have been before the Commissioners.

HANOVER CHAPEL BILL [LORDS].

(12.25.) MR. PICTON (Leicester), who had the following Notice of Motion on the Paper :—

"To move that the Order [14th July] that the Hanover Chapel Bill [Lords] be committed be read, and discharged.

That the Bill be committed to a Select Committee of Seven Members, Four to be nominated by the House and Three by the Committee of Selection.

That all Petitions against the Bill presented in accordance with the Standing Orders be referred to the Committee; that the Petitioners praying to be heard by themselves, their Counsel, or Agents, be heard against the Bill, and Counsel heard in support of the Bill.

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

That Three be the quorum,"

said: I believe that the noble Lord in charge of the Bill (Viscount Cranborne) and others who take an interest in the measure are willing to agree to a Motion to refer it to a hybrid Committee, providing that the number is not so large as seven. I therefore refrain from moving my Resolution, in favour of that which stands in the name of the hon. Member for the West Derby Division of Liverpool (Mr. Cross).

Order [14th July] that the Hanover Chapel Bill [Lords] be committed read, and discharged.

Ordered, That the Bill be committed to a Select Committee of Five Members, Three to be nominated by the House, and Two by the Committee of Selection.

Ordered, That, subject to the Rules, Orders, and Proceedings of this House, all Petitions against the said Bill be referred to the Committee, and that such of the Petitioners as may to be heard by themselves, their Counsel, Agents, or Witnesses, be heard upon their Petitions, if they think fit, and Counsel heard in support of the said Bill against such Petitions.

Ordered, That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

Ordered, That Three be the quorum of the Committee.—(Mr. Cross.)

VOL. CCCLV. [THIRD SERIES.]

MR. TATTON EGERTON (Cheshire, Knutsford): I do not propose to move the Instruction which stands in my name—

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee to alter Clause 13, and authorise the Charity Commissioners to amend the Trinity Chapel Scheme, and give to the new Church the same income as to the other Churches under the Scheme, and transfer the balance of the double portion given (under the plea of absence of endowment) to the Hanover Chapel, to the Mother Church of St. George's, Hanover Square."

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee to inquire whether the cost of building Hanover Chapel was not largely borne by the rates of the whole parish of St. George's, Hanover Square; and, if so, whether a portion of the surplus of the money to be derived from the sale of the chapel building and the site thereof, after providing for the erection of the new district church contemplated by the Bill, should not be used for the religious requirements of the whole parish; and, if so, the Committee, if they think fit, be at liberty to insert provisions in the Bill to apply a portion of such surplus accordingly."—(Mr. Thomas Henry Bolton.)

Objection being taken, the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed to-morrow.

CLASS II.

1. £25,867, to complete the sum for the Charity Commission.

*(12.30.) SIR J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): As the remarks which I was making upon this Vote were interrupted last night by the Rules of the House, I desire to continue what I was then saying. The complaint I have now to make against the Charity Commissioners is their disregard of the Resolution which was passed by this House in 1886, that the majority of the trustees and managers of a charity shall be elected by the ratepayers of the district affected. The Commissioners systematically ignore this requirement, and the consequence is, that in one charity I find the stewards' charges have been increased from £20 to £40, and that a law bill of £20, £30 or £40 is incurred, with rare exceptions, every year. I have no wish to give names, although I have them here. The accounts are not properly looked into, and the consequence is that the charities are robbed. Only this year, instead of the Charity Commissioners loyally carrying out the decision of this House that the majority of the trustees or managers should be elected by the ratepayers, in one of the schemes connected with the City of Lichfield there are only three out of 15 trustees directly elected by the ratepayers. There are eight representative trustees, which looks well upon paper, and gives a majority, but they are not elected by the ratepayers. They are nominated by the Town Council, who are identical with the Co-optative trustees and managers. I have often been asked the question, What is Co-optative Trustee? as many Members have failed to discover what their functions and duties are. It is, I believe, a position invented by the Charity Commissioners to enable a clique of persons, usually including the parson and the squire, to control and retain the control for ever of the Charity. The system is copied from the Municipal Act of 1837, when Lord John Russell, in order to carry his Bill through the House of Lords, had to submit to the pernicious system of Aldermen being elected by the Town Councillors in lieu of their being elected directly by the ratepayers. Whenever a vacancy among the Co-optative Trustees arises from death or bankruptcy, or any other cause, a new trustee or manager is elected by this body from among themselves. The pious founders of these charities nominated certain persons to see that their wishes were carried out in the future, and to see that the money was administered for the benefit of the poor in the place of their nativity. All what the founders looked to, was the proper administration of the funds, so that the poor, who they intended to benefit, should not be robbed of their rights. But the fact is, that under the present arrangements stewards are appointed who receive an excessive salary themselves, which is quite out of proportion to the work done, or required, and take care that their professional friends receive fees out of the funds. The Charity Commissioners say—"We are not accountable. Trustees and Managers have been elected, and if they will job away the money of the poor people we cannot help it." As they are practically out-voted, the poor have no voice whatever in the management of these charities. However small a Charity may be, if the managers have to go before a constituency at intervals, they will take care how they administer the trust, and, on the other hand, the constituency will see that they elect the best men as administrators. What I wish to see established is a system of election direct from the ratepayers. I know the Government say that the Resolution of the House was carried by a snatch Vote. My reply is, that if it was a snatch Vote, let Her Majesty's Government come forward and rescind it. I challenge them to do that, and to see what the opinion of the House of Commons is now. So long as the Resolution remains unrescinded, I think the Charity Commissioners ought to accept it loyally.

*(12.35.) MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E. Rugby): There are one or two matters in connection with this Vote which I should like to bring under the notice of the hon. Member for Penrith (Mr. J. W. Lowther.) In the first place, I believe there are a considerable number of cases in which the Trustees of Charities do not render their accounts as prescribed by the Act of Parliament. Indeed, there are thousands of cases in which the Trustees are still in arrear with their accounts. This arises, I believe, from the fact that in a great many instances the person who is supposed to keep the accounts is the incumbent, who is not, as a rule, a man of business, and in consequence, although quite unintentionally, he succeeds in getting the Charity into a great mess. In support of that view I may mention a case which occurred not long ago. I was present at a public inquiry into one of these Charities, which was conducted by the late Mr. Skirrow, one of the Inspectors. In the course of conversation with Mr. Skirrow he told me, quite unsolicited, and he had had a large experience in connection with the administration of Charities, that he only knew of one case in which a country clergyman had kept the accounts properly as a man of business would have done. Last night the question of popular representation in the appointment of trustees was brought up, and it was pointed out that the Resolution passed in 1886 has never been carried out. Personally I have had a good deal to do with the Charity Commissioners, and I have often benefited by the courtesy and consideration of the hon. Member for Penrith, and I must say that matters have been much better during the last two years than they were before. I do not see why, in regard to the smaller village charities, some uniform principle should not be adopted for the framing of a scheme in regard to the appointment of new trustees. In one of the Northamptonshire villages a scheme has been framed which ought to be converted into a model and advantageously followed in other places. The old trustees were the vicar, the two churchwardens, and the two overseers. At the inquiry which took place—and it was the inquiry I have already mentioned at which I met Mr. Skirrow—certain acts of gross negligence in the administration of the charity were proved. The funds which ought to have been administered for the benefit of the poor had been taken by the churchwardens and used for the purposes of the Church. In all these cases I think it is desirable that there should be a public inquiry. It tends to clear the atmosphere. In this instance, although it was at first supposed that the inquiry was instituted in hostility to the trust, it was soon made manifest that that was not so, and the vicar in the end was glad to get rid of responsibilities which he was unable to carry out under the new scheme. There are seven trustees; one, the Poor Law Guardian, is ex officio for the time being; four are representative and elected by the vestry every five years, and the two remaining trustees are co-operative trustees. Since the scheme has come into operation other villages are looking forward to a similar measure of justice. There is another important case, of which I regret I have been unable to give the hon. Member for Penrith notice, but I only received a letter in regard to it this morning. It is the case of a charity in the town of Warwick, a town represented by the Speaker of this House. There are in Warwick a number of charities which are called municipal charities. A scheme has just been put forward in regard to them, and it is provided that the first 6 vacancies out of a total of 21 trustees named in the scheme shall be filled by Representative Trustees elected by the three wards in Warwick. The 7th, 8th and 9th vacancies are not to be filled up at all, and the remaining 12 vacancies are to be filled by Co-optative Trustees, so that the total number of Trustees will be reduced to 18 in future, and when the first Co-optative Trustee is appointed he will be appointed by the 6 Representative Trustees and the 11 Co-optative Trustees. That is the reverse of popular representation, seeing that there will only be 6 Representative Trustees against 12 Co-optative Trustees, or two to one, and it is that system which I desire to see amended.

*(12.45.) MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): I wish to ask my hon. Friend the Member for Penrith to explain to the Committee two points in regard to the policy adopted by the Charity Commissioners in reference to the appointment of Trustees. Charity schemes, as we all know, come before Parliament, and Parliament is afforded an opportunity of considering them—not a full opportunity, but still an opportunity. But with the appointment of Trustees by the Commissioners, Parliament has nothing whatever to do. Therefore, I think, we have a right to watch with care how they use their powers in reference to these appointments. The rule of common sense as well as the principle of law is that persons should be appointed Trustees who will be loyal to the trust. You would not, for instance, place a Dissenter upon a Church of England Trust, nor would you put upon a Trust intended for education persons who are notoriously desirous of alienating the Trust from educational purposes. In appointing a Trustee you naturally appoint a person who will be loyal to the Trust. I want to know how far the Charity Commissioners in appointing new Trustees are prepared to uphold that doctrine, or how far they are prepared to throw it over. How far are they prepared to adopt the policy of nominating trustees who are opposed to the application of the trust? In the second place, I want to know what powers the Charity Commissioners intend to take themselves with regard to modifying the orders they may make. There are certain statutable regulations which the Commissioners are bound to comply with before they appoint new trustees. They have to publish the names of the persons proposed, to post them on the Church doors, and advertise them in different newspapers, so that everyone may know the names. That it is an admirable rule, but by another Act of Parliament the Commissioners are allowed to modify it, and without notice, to make some small variations in it. What I wish to know is, whether, after the Commissioners have promulgated their order and published it in the usual way, they can, under cover of rectifying some technical error or small inadvertence, re-construct the governing body? If a precedent of this kind is allowed to pass without remonstrance, where are we to stop? The Commissioners are a powerful body standing altogether outside Parliament. They seem to assume to sit in a judicial capacity, and to consider all these questions without reference to the Act of Parliament. Is the Act of Parliament to be carried out according to its words and spirit, or under the section which gives them powers of modification? Are the Commissioners virtually to be enabled to re-construct the governing body without notice to the community at large? The case which has been brought to my notice is this: The Commissioners "modified" an order by adding three to the four Trustees proposed to be appointed in the original order. I believe such a modification to be beyond the statutable discretion allowed to the Commissioners. The other point is this: The Commissioners nominated in their "modified" order three Trustees who were notoriously hostile to the existing application of the trust money to elementary education. They desired to apply the trust money to middle-class education. I ask my hon. Friend to say how far the Commissioners have a right to construe the law in regard to these modified powers according to their own absolute discretion, and to act according to their own ideas without statutory publication? I hope that Parliament will take care that this very powerful body is not allowed to become too powerful. At any rate, we ought to know what the principles are under which they claim to act.

*(12.53.) MR. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith): The first important point which was raised by the hon. Member for Lichfield (Sir J. Swinburne) was one which I am almost ashamed to go into again, seeing that it has been brought forward so many times by the hon. Member, and that I thought I had convinced even him of the justice of the course taken by the Commissioners. I refer to the question of the appointment of Representative Trustees. The matter stands thus: In the small hours of the morning the hon. Gentleman carried a Resolution to the effect that in the opinion of the House every scheme of the Charity Commissioners ought to provide that a majority of the Trustees or managers should be directly appointed by the ratepayers of the locality to which the charity applied. It was pointed out at the time that that was an impracticable resolution and ought not to be put in force. The matter came before the Committee which sat upstairs for two Sessions. It was fully gone into and the Committee reported that they had failed to satisfy themselves that the Resolution could be beneficially carried into effect. The hon. Member himself gave evidence before the Committee, and in his evidence he actually suggested that Christ's Hospital should be placed under the control of the Metropolitan Board of Works. I think that after evidence like that, it was clearly proved to the Committee that the proposal of the hon. Member was absolutely impracticable. The Committee recommended that the Charity Commissioners should be allowed to preserve freedom of action in organising the governing bodies of charitable schemes.

but that they ought to bear in mind that it was in the interests of education to enlist the sympathies of the localities in the welfare of endowed schools by giving them representation either direct or indirect through elected bodies. The hon. Member asks whether the Commissioners have loyally carried out the decision of the House, and my reply is that we have loyally carried out the decision of the Committee which sat upon and considered the Resolution of the hon. Member. At the present time we are constantly giving a large share in the management of charitable schemes to representation, either direct or indirect through elected bodies. In a recent scheme to which the hon. Member referred in connection with the Lichfield Charities, we have provided for a local election of trustees in every ward of the town. I am sure the hon. Member knows very well, from his experience of the work we have been carrying on, that in every case in which we have thought it right, we have given direct or indirect representation. The hon. Member must bear in mind that in many of the charities for which we make schemes the income is very small; and if we were to provide for direct representation, the whole of the income would be swallowed up by the cost of the election. But we provide representation indirectly through elected bodies. The hon. Member complains in regard to a certain charity that the lawyer's bill was too high, and that it was sent in by a firm of solicitors in which the clerk of the charity was a partner. But the lawyer's bill was taxed, and not reduced, as it was found that the charges had been properly made. The hon. Member also complains of the stewards' fees; but, perhaps, I may be allowed to say that the clause which deals with that question is purely permissive. If the trustees of a charity think that the salary received by their steward or clerk is too high, they have power to reduce it. If they consider that 10 per cent. of the gross receipts is too large a sum to pay the clerk for collecting the rents and acting as clerk they can reduce the amount. The provision in the clause is merely an optional one, and a maximum, and not a minimum, is laid down. The hon. Member for Rugby (Mr. Cobb) asked questions in regard to the accounts. The accounts received at the office during last year amounted to 27,942 against upwards of 31,000 in 1889, showing a considerable diminution. These figures might be misleading, however, unless I drew attention to the fact that many of the charities have been consolidated. The Commissioners have done what they can to simplify matters in this respect. They issue a form of a simple kind on which the accounts of the charities are sent in. The law on the subject, as the hon. Member no doubt knows, is that it is compulsory upon the trustees of charities to send in copies of their accounts to the Commissioners, and the latter have power, if they think fit to do so, to inquire into the accounts of any charity. As a matter of fact, we do not compare the number of accounts sent in with the number of charities on our books, and we do not call upon any charity to send in its accounts unless our attention is specially directed to the matter.

*MR. J. W. LOWTHER: That I cannot say, the accounts are coming in more regularly than they did, but still there is a considerable number—perhaps some thousands—of charities which do not send in any accounts. Even now a considerable number of charities exist which the Commissioners do not know of, but that number is decreasing every day. The hon. Member has asked me whether it would not be possible to have some uniform method of appointing new trustees. The requirements of localities differ greatly, so also do the trusts; some are applicable only to Church purposes, and others are of an open character; in some schemes one parish is, and in others two or more parishes are, interested, and this has to be borne in mind in fixing the number and nature of the trustees. Therefore, in my view it would be impossible, owing to the variety of circumstances which surround these different charities, to have a cast-iron method applicable to all cases. The hon. Member has spoken of the admirable results of public inquiry. I quite agree with him on that point, and experience has shown that in very difficult cases the local friction, which unfortunately so often exists with regard to charities, is modified, if not altogether eliminated, when one of the officials of the Commissioners is sent down to hold a public inquiry. The Commissioners hold a public inquiry wherever they can properly do so, and there is a reasonable chance of its being successful, because they have found that by doing so they themselves are not only better informed with regard to the charities, but the two opposing parties are brought face to face, with the result that in most cases the difficulties which divide them disappear. I am afraid that I cannot give the hon. Member the information he asks for in respect to the municipal charities of Warwick, but if he will put a question upon the Paper on the subject I will do my best to answer it. The hon. Member for Oswestry has asked me questions with respect to the appointment of trustees, and whether the Commissioners always act upon the principle of appointing only such trustees as are what he terms "loyal to the trust." That expression is rather vague, because, however disloyal to the trust the trustees may be, they cannot alter the trust in any way. All that they can do is to apply to the Commissioners to alter the trust, but in no case will the Commissioners allow the trust to be diverted from its original object to one totally different. The hon. Member has suggested, in illustration of his argument, that a majority of the trustees of a Wesleyan trust being Roman Catholics might change the character of the trust from a Wesleyan to a Roman Catholic trust. That, however, is an impossibility; indeed, it is the reason of the existence of the Commissioners to prevent such diversions of trusts, and they would not listen for a moment to proposals of that character. As a general rule, the Commissioners do not appoint as trustees of a charity connected with a particular form of religious belief any persons who have shown themselves hostile to that particular form of belief. In the case of open charities, however, where no question of Church or Non-conformist views is involved, the Commissioners do not think it incumbent upon them to make investigations into the religious belief of those persons whom they appoint trustees. It is quite true that in some cases the Commissioners, where, in their opinion, there is no reconstruction of the trust, do not republish the scheme merely because they have increased the number of the trustees. The Act of Parliament gives us power to dispense with such notice. We consider each case upon its merits and our judgment is guided by particular facts. The hon. Member quoted a case in which we originally proposed to nominate four trustees, but in which we altered our order and added three, without republication. The facts were that there were originally two Trustees who sent to us a requisition to appoint four more. We issued an order nominating the four suggested by the Trustees. Then we received Memorials from the Joint Education Committee—for the case occurred in Wales—that we should appoint three persons named by them. The case was fully considered in the locality. We received further Memorials, I think no fewer than five, and one signed by 200 or more, some of which favoured the appointment of the four Trustees named in our first order, and others recommending the substitution of the three other names, and in the end we decided to appoint all seven. Surely that was not such a re-construction of the body of Trustees as to necessitate republication. The hon. Member suggests that nine Trustees form too large a body to manage a charity of £60; but bearing in mind the conflicting representations made to us, we did the best we could, and probably gave satisfaction to neither party. As to nine being too large a number of Trustees, I may remind the hon. Member that the Joint Education Committee, when considering the new scheme for this very charity, voluntarily suggested that there should be nine Trustees, showing that they did not think it too large a body. The interests of more than one parish were concerned. I think I have answered all the question put to me on the subject, but I shall be glad to give any further information in my power. I can only thank the Committee for the patience with which it has listened to me.

versity course. I will say nothing as to scholarships or fellowships, because they are on a different footing. I prefer to confine myself to the educational school endowments of the country, and I venture to assert that the Charity Commissioners have rescued a good many school charities from extinction, because there are many schools now flourishing which were formerly moribund. Of that we have an instance within a very short distance of this House. I refer to the Westminster day schools. It appears to me, however, that the powers of the Commissioners are too restricted. In the first place, they are restricted by the Report of the Schools Inquiry Commission, which is embodied in the Preamble of the Act. They have, rightly in my opinion, held themselves bound by the policy which was indicated in that Report. Their powers also are restricted in the matter of applying to educational purposes charities which are not strictly educational, but which it would be for the benefit of the community to apply to such purposes. Their powers, too, of consolidating charities are limited. Therefore, if it is desired to secure anything like a scheme of management of those charities for the purpose—which I strongly support—of applying them to the secondary education of the people of the country, we must invest the present Charity Commission with larger powers, or we must create a Commission with sufficient powers for the purpose. There are a good many people nowadays in favour of applying charity money in support of elementary education. Personally, I think there is a good deal to be said in favour of that view, but it is not a popular one, and will probably not prevail in the House, because it will be suggested that the charities are being devoted to the relief of the rates. The subject of secondary education is one which before long—indeed, perhaps, within the next year or two—must engage the attention of Parliament, and if we are asked, as we probably will be asked, to provide cash out of public funds for its promotion, I think Parliament, before it votes the money for the purpose, ought to take in hand the whole re-organisation of the educational endowments of the country, with a view to providing the necessary funds. What is wanted is secondary schools, with at any rate a large number of free places to be set apart for scholars from the elementary schools who have most distinguished themselves by their industry and capacity. I know of no more advantageous mode by which we can apply the educational endowments of the country than that. There are three matters which it has occurred to me it would be necessary to provide for. What is wanted is a scheme of general organisation. We want in the administration of educational endowments some general system and some large scheme of administration, and for that purpose we require consolidation. We must take larger powers than at present exist for diverting charities from localities where they are not wanted, and throwing them into a general mass for the benefit of districts where they are wanted. I know that that is a very thorny subject, and will create a good deal of opposition; but if we desire to do anything in a large way we must put an end to the system of local charities and must consolidate those educational endowments, with a view to applying them to large areas and placing them under a single management, so as to secure the establishment of secondary schools in convenient parts of the country. We must also get larger powers than at present exist for sweeping into the educational net a number of the dole and bread charities and other charities of a similar kind. These charities, no doubt, hon. Members are familiar with. It will be admitted that in some cases they positively do mischief, while in almost all cases they do little if any good, and it would be better if they could be applied to educational purposes. At present the Commissioners have only power to divert those charities to educational purposes with the consent of the Trustees. In many cases that consent is, I am bound to say, forthcoming, but in some cases it is withheld, and in my opinion it is very desirable that these charities should be swept into the educational net and consolidated under a single Board of Management. I see no reason why the general management of secondary schools maintained by educational endowments in a county should not be given to a

Sir H. Davey

Committee of the County Council itself, or if that is objected to there might be a Board of Management for the secondary schools of the county on which there should be a large representative element. It is needless to point out the increased economy which would result from having one General Board instead of a separate system of management for each charity. I hope before long to see all charities under one general system of management, because that will do away with the clashing of interest, and we shall no longer hear of any such difficulties as those which occasionally crop up when masters of grammar schools insist on giving a classical education, though it is not desired in the interests of the scholars attending the schools. Neither will there be schools maintained in localities which are dwindling down, and which are maintained simply because those places were once populous and required such schools. If we had one general management we should find no difficulties of that kind. We should not only have more economical management of charities, but the charities would be applied more directly and more efficiently to the purposes for which they exist. I am well aware there are difficulties in the way, but difficulties of this kind are only made to be overcome. Probably public opinion is not ripe for the full measure I have ventured to sketch out. But if it is brought home to the people of this country that there are already public funds which, if better organised and administered than they can be under the present law, will, if not entirely, at least to a large extent, provide means for secondary education, public opinion will be enlisted in the matter. It is very difficult, no doubt, to get a body of Local Trustees to resign their management to a general body, and there is also difficulty occasioned by religious differences. The teaching in some of these schools is by charter, Act of Parliament, or otherwise confined to members of the Church of England. In others it is not so, and no doubt that is a difficulty which we shall have to face. But I do not think the difficulties insuperable, and I have made these remarks because I believe, after what has been done for elementary education, the question of secondary education is one which before long Parliament will have to deal with, and I am anxious it should be dealt with in connection with our charitable educational endowments.

(1.36.) THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I hope my hon. and learned Friend will not think it is from want of courtesy or because the Government underrate the magnitude of the question if I do not go into the matter which in a very interesting speech he has brought before the Committee. I recognise the importance of the question, but it is a very large subject to bring forward in connection with the particular point the Committee is now engaged on, and its discussion would occupy a considerable time. We should not make real progress with the Estimates if we were to follow up the matter the hon. and learned Gentleman has raised, and I would appeal to the Committee to allow us now to bring this discussion to a close. If hon. Members desire to bring their labours to a close in a reasonable time I trust they will do what I am doing in this matter, and that is exercise considerable self-restraint. But for that I should have liked to make some reply to the speech of my hon. and learned Friend.

*(1.40.) SIR J. SWINBURNE: I should be glad if the right hon. Gentleman will allow me a few moments in which to reply to some remarks made by the hon. Member for Penrith. I have no doubt the hon. Gentleman quoted my evidence before the Committee upstairs correctly, but he seemed to ridicule me for having suggested that Christ's Hospital should be put under the management of the Metropolitan Board of Works. I then knew, as many others did, that the days of the Metropolitan Board of Works were numbered, and that a representative body like the County Council would take the Board's place. I do not see why the County Council should not through one of its Committees make a very good governing body of Christ's Hospital, as has just been proposed by the hon. Member for Stockton. As to public inquiries, I desire to take this opportunity of thanking the Commissioners for acceding to my request that inquiries should be held in the evening when working men could attend. I have also to give the Charity Commissioners great credit for having merged, especially in Lichfield, a number of small charities together. But what I ask the Commissioners to take up immediately is the question of accounts. At present the Trustees of charities are not obliged to send statements of their accounts to the Commissioners. [Mr. J. W. LOWTHER: Yes.] I understood the hon. Member to say that many hundreds were not sent. At any rate, there was no power to enforce the rendering of accounts, and even when accounts are sent the Commissioners exercise no control over them.

*(1.44.) MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I quite appreciate the appeal just made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but I do not think that appeal should prevent us considering the items in this Vote. I should like to ask the hon. Member for Penrith what he means by his answer just now to the hon. Member for Rugby with regard to the taxing of solicitors' bills in the office? What means have the Commissioners of taxing lawyers' bills; and have those who oppose the bills any right to make representations in the matter? Then I find the sum of £25 for the purveyor of luncheons. I will not move a reduction in respect of that item, but I trust the hon. Gentleman will consider whether this should not be the last occasion on which the Vote should include such an item. Under Sub-head E I find £600 for travelling allowance to Assistant Commissioner. Last year £250 only was voted. I should like to know what is the reason of the increase. Then as to the City of London Parochial Charities Department. I understood the hon. Gentleman to say last night that the powers of the Commission would end in March, 1891; he explained to me afterwards that he should have said 1892. I had understood that the work of the Commission practically ended on the 23rd of February in this year, and I wish to know whether the hon. Gentleman seriously considers that it is wise or fair to go on expending this money, which should be used for the benefit of the people of London, and not in mere official expenses?

*MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): Perhaps I may be allowed to put the question I have put on other Votes, namely, how many hours the clerks in the Department are employed?

*(1.50.) MR. J. W. LOWTHER: With regard to the taxing of lawyers' bills, the Commissioners have power to tax such bills, and there are one or two clerks who perform the duty whenever it becomes necessary.

MR. MORTON: Are opponents allowed to be represented?

*MR. J. W. LOWTHER: I should think so. As to the item for the purveyor of luncheons, the circumstances have been explained more than once, and I have nothing to add to what has been said by the Secretary to the Treasury. Reference has been made to the increase in the travelling allowance to the Assistant Commissioner. The learned gentleman has under an Act of Parliament been appointed to attend all the meetings of the Welsh Intermediate Joint Education Committees. Such attendance involves a great deal of travelling about Wales now that the Committees are in full swing. As to the City of London Parochial Charities Department, I fell into an error last night when I said the powers expired in 1891: I ought to have said 1892. I believe it has been decided to continue the Act for, at least, six months, possibly a year. Anyhow, there will be a considerable diminution in the staff. The hon. Member is wrong in supposing that the whole labours of the Commissioners came to an end on the 23rd of February last. Only one scheme out of 20 or more schemes dealing with the City of London Parochial Charities came into force then. There are several schemes going through the mill now, and in order that they should reach the haven of approval by Her Majesty in Council it is necessary that the powers of the Commissioners should be continued. The hon. Member for Shoreditch asked what hours are worked by the clerks. A portion of the Upper Division clerks are 6-hour men, but I believe the average attendance is 6½ hours: many of them remain 7 hours and more at the office. The rest of the Upper Division clerks and all the Lower Division clerks are 7-hour men.

*(1.54.) MR. ROBY (Lancashire, S.E., Eccles): The hon. Gentleman in answering what I said last night referred me to a passage in the Report of the Charity Commissioners, in which the Commissioners themselves, recognising the permanent character of much of the Endowed Schools work, expressed a hope for its discontinuance and re-organisation in some shape or other. I cannot help thinking it would have been well if the Chancellor of the Exchequer, when he paid his fleeting visit to the House, had been good enough to explain in what way the Government propose to deal with the matter. I rise especially to ask the hon. Member for Penrith whether he will furnish a Return showing what endowments for educational purposes coming under the powers of the Endowed Schools Act, and still remaining within the jurisdiction of the Charity Commissioners, have not yet been dealt with by the scheme?

*MR. J. W. LOWTHER: I think that, so far as the charities have been ascertained to be within the Endowed Schools Act, such a Return can be given, but I cannot give a pledge in the matter without consultation with my fellow Commissioners.

Vote agreed to.

2. Motion made, and Question proposed,

(1.55.) SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I desire to move a reduction of this Vote, in order to call the attention of the Committee to what I think is a retrograde movement on the part of the Civil Service Commissioners in regard to the nature of the examinations which they prescribe for entrance into the service of the Crown. The Commissioners have reverted to the monkish notion that the soundest and most liberal education is the old classical training, and Latin has now been made a compulsory subject, while English composition has been relegated from the first to the third rank. That young men wishing to enter the Military Service should be compelled to take up Latin is absurd. Latin, taught from a philological point of view, may be very useful; but that is not the way in which it is taught at the public schools. The result of the change is bad for the Public Service, and is a retrograde step in the education of the country. These are days when the people do not want to acquire education that is not useful; they want that education which will fit them to become useful citizens of the Empire; but you limit yourself to the old classical education, and discourage the improvements and reforms of modern education by this policy. I protest against the idea that underlies what has been done on this subject, the idea that for an appointment in the Public Service you ought not to insist on any useful knowledge but upon the old-fashioned notion of what constitutes the liberal education of a gentleman. People travel freely all over the world now, and engage in great enterprises, and they want a modern education, including elementary science, modern languages, knowledge of the physical world and the distribution of its races, political economy—not that which has been banished to Saturn—and the principles of jurisprudence that underlie all laws. But you exclude, or rather throw into the shade of non-compulsory subjects, branches of useful knowledge in favour of the old idea of classical education. If you make your examinations for entrance into the Public Service upon subjects of useful knowledge, you will not only benefit the Service, but you will influence the teaching in the public schools. But this action is likely to check the movement in public schools in favour of modern education which public opinion has created. We have a modern side to our public schools, though it is somewhat starved and overweighted by the endowments on the other side. Still, there is a disposition to recognise modern acquirements; but now the Civil Service Commissioners throw their weight on the other side in favour of classical education. I do not deny that it is desirable, as the Secretary for War has said, to get young men to enter the Service from the public schools; but you will secure this, and you will influence the education given in those schools, by the compulsory subjects you insist upon. You should not adapt your subjects to the system of the schools. I am justified in protesting against the Commissioners, who prescribe the subjects for examination for candidates for the Public Service, throwing their weight in the scale in favour of classical education as opposed to the modern ideas of a liberal education. The elevation of Latin to a compulsory subject, and the relegation of other subjects to the optional class, is a retrograde step. The Civil Service Commissioners are the original offenders, and I move the reduction of the Vote under the head of salaries of the Commissioners by £500.

Motion made, and Question proposed
“That Item A, Salaries, be reduced by £500, part of the Salary of the Civil Service Commissioners.” — (Sir G. Campbell.)

(2.13.) THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): The hon. Member has entered his protest, of which we cannot complain, and he has discussed at considerable length his entire opposition to the views of the War Office and the Civil Service Commissioners. I do not feel myself qualified to criticise the action taken by the War Office and the Civil Service Commissioners. The change was made at the wish of the War Office, with the full concurrence of the Civil Service Commissioners, and I take it these two Bodies are charged with a duty they are well qualified to discharge. The hon. Member has spoken of a great change, but so far as I know no great change has been made.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: English is relegated to the third class.

MR. JACKSON: The change made by the Commissioners makes very little difference, as under the former system marks are assigned to the subjects which will be taken by the great majority of candidates. The hon. Member says changes have been made in subjects generally, but I do not think that is so. It is true Greek has been omitted from the Foreign Office list, but I am not aware of any other important change. I am quite sure that anyone who knows the care and attention given by the Civil Service Commissioners to their important duties will give them credit for the desire, so far as they can, to make the examinations fit in with the general system of education throughout the country, and to secure the best among the candidates offering themselves. Anyone who knows the care the Commissioners give to their duties will feel, whatever may be the difference of opinion, that they are a body very competent to form a sound judgment, and, so far as I am concerned, I am disinclined to criticise their action. This question was, I believe, raised on the Army Vote. It was then carefully considered and thoroughly discussed, and I hope that the hon. Member having made his protest we may now be allowed to go to a Division.

*(2.15.) GENERAL SIR F. FITZWYGRAM (Hants, S.): I know that a great many officers deeply regret that the Secretary of State for War has yielded to the public schools. If he had stood to his guns, he would have compelled the schools to teach modern science and modern languages. I quite agree with the spirit of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War when he said he desired to avoid the evil of young English gentlemen being sent abroad to learn foreign habits with foreign languages, but my contention is that if my right hon. Friend had stood firm he would have compelled the masters of Eton, Harrow, and our great schools to give the instruction required to obtain admission into the Army, and I regret that he has not done so. Another matter which ought to receive attention is that of plain, legible handwriting, most boys leaving school quite unable to write legibly. This is in a measure due to the practice of setting boys the imposition of writing so many hundred lines at a time. I am sure most hon. Members will recognise the importance of this. I confess my own correspondence presents many difficulties in this respect, and I attribute this defect to no fault of my own, but to my school training. There is another matter which, perhaps, I may here mention. The indistinct utterance of some of the examiners who set dictation leads to many of the candidates making mistakes which they would not otherwise fall into. I do not speak of any present examiners, but from complaints I have heard in years past. The Army generally do not acquiesce in the change which has been made with regard to classical learning.

(2.15.) MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): I do not agree with the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy, or with the hon. and gallant Member who has just spoken. In my opinion, the Civil Service Commissioners have done an exceedingly wise thing in endeavouring to meet the public schools half way; because the public schools have already gone far in the introduction of modern subjects into their curriculum. The Commissioners have acted wisely in making Latin, which occupies a high place in public school education, a compulsory subject of examination. The War Office are wise in endeavouring to get as many boys as they can from the public schools sent direct to Sandhurst or Woolwich rather than those who have been sent to crammers. I shall support the Government.

*(2.17.) MR. ROBY: I regret that the right hon. Gentleman has given the weight of his authority in favour of a change for which there does not seem to be any excuse. The effect of the change is to displace English as a necessary subject and to put it in only as an ornamental one. I admit I do not know much about the Army, but it does seem to me that the power of writing English with clearness of writing and expression is one of the most useful qualifications a public servant could possess, and I should have thought it an exceedingly useful one for officers of the Army. To substitute for that and for some knowledge of English history such a knowledge of Latin as will be got up by making it a compulsory subject is a great mistake. It is not a question whether due weight should be given to Latin or to previous training at a public school. That can be done by giving an adequate number of marks to each. But a subject should not be made compulsory which is not of distinct value to a particular profession. Optional subjects should be recognised, but nothing which is not of real importance to the business of a profession should be made compulsory. If it is to be a sufficient defence of such a change that the Commission recommended it, there is no use in Parliamentary supervision of these matters, and much that comes before us would be withdrawn, a great change being made in Parliamentary procedure. To make Latin a compulsory subject is to hinder many candidates from getting up subjects which would be of more use to them, and the amount of Latin which is acquired will often be worth nothing.

*(2.20.) MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I quite concur in the view expressed by the hon. Member who has just spoken. This change, by which Latin is made an obligatory and English an optional subject, has been brought about in a secret and clandestine manner. We find in the correspondence in relation to this subject that a communication from the head masters of public schools is not given because it was marked private. But I contend that any representation from head masters ought to be submitted in such a form that it could be laid before Parliament. Not only the change itself, but the reasons for the change ought to be laid before this House. I think the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Berwickshire (Mr. Marjoribanks) rather let the cat out of the bag. This is really a contest between the masters of public schools on the one hand and the so-called crammers on the other. The latter have secured more success in the examinations than the former, and the head masters of the public schools are accordingly trying to manipulate the examinations in their own interests.

(2.22.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: If I thought that this movement emanated from the War Office, and if it was confined to military candidates, I should have little to say; but it is clear that the initiative came from the Civil Service Commissioners.

MR. JACKSON: With their full concurrence.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Reference is made in the correspondence to representations made to them by the head masters of the schools. I will not enter upon a consideration of the question as between public schools and crammers. I do not question the view that it is desirable to get candidates from the public schools, but it is a question what education should be given in public schools. The question is whether the schools should give a sound and useful education to fit young men for the Public Service, or whether we should yield to the old prejudice in favour of this old monkish classical education. The War Office is guided by a small majority of head masters. Many eminent head masters are by no means in favour of this retrograde step. I have heard many complaints from parents who sent their boys to the modern side of a school and now have to send them back to learn Latin, because the War Office have suddenly turned round and made this change. In default of a better defence of the change than we have had I must trouble the Committee to divide.

Ayes 48; Noes 84.—(Div. List, No. 348.)

Original Question put, and agreed to.

3. £37,291, to complete the sum for Exchequer and Audit Department.

4. £4,972, to complete the sum for Friendly Societies Registry.

(2.57.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): I want to ask the Secretary to the Treasury some questions, but I see he is not here. There was a Select Committee sitting for some years inquiring into the question of Friendly Societies, and they made a Report in reference to the re-organisation of the Friendly Societies Office. I understand that the Registrar will retire next month, and that the Office will be re-organised. But I also understand that since the Select Committee sat a Departmental Committee has been sitting to consider the question of re-organisation, and has arrived at conclusions different to those of the Select Committee. I want to know from the Government what they intend to do. Do they intend to carry out the recommendations of the Departmental Committee? We have been voting £1,000 a year for the past eight or nine years for the preparation of a scale and tables, but they are not yet finished. As so much time has elapsed since they were begun, it will probably be necessary to revise the tables before they are published. Will the amount we are voting this year be the last that will be required, and when may we expect to have the tables issued? If they are to be of use we ought to have them at once, and if £2,000 or £3,000 is required to finish them, the money should be voted for the purpose, especially when we consider that a Bill has been brought forward by the Government to compel Friendly Societies to give paid-up or surrender policies to their members. Who composed the Departmental Committee, and how do their recommendations differ from those of the Select Committee?

A LORD OF THE TREASURY (Sir HERBERT MAXWELL, Wigton): I must apologise for not having been in my place when the hon. Member rose to put his question. The recommendations of the Departmental Committee were mainly three—first, that the Returns should be administered in the Department of the Actuary; secondly, that the rules should be dealt with in the Department of the Assistant Registrar; and, thirdly, that the general management of the Department should be under the charge of the Director of the Department. These recommendations have either been carried out already or are in process of being carried out. I hope the Committee will now allow the Vote to be taken.

Vote agreed to.

5. Motion made, and Question proposed,

*(3.4.) MR. S. SMITH (Flintshire): I desire to call the attention of the Committee to the question of emigrating pauper children. The number of pauper children who are annually emigrated appears to be exceedingly small. In 1885 it was 301, in 1886 it was 164, in 1887 the number was 411, in 1888 it reached 596, which is the largest total during late years, and in 1889 it was 428, and in 1890 it was 375, so that it will be seen that the number has fallen off in the last two years. On the other hand, the number of pauper children dealt with by the Guardians is very large, the total number in England and Wales being 241,000; of these, 51,000 are indoor paupers and 189,000 outdoor paupers, the latter number including 4,366, who were boarded out. I wish particularly to direct attention to the 51,000 children who are still in the large district pauper schools, there being also a considerable number of children in the industrial and reformatory schools belonging pretty much to the same class. The bulk of the 51,000 children in the pauper schools are either orphan or deserted children, and, consequently, are entirely at the disposal of the State, because they are, so to speak, wards of the State. It appears to me that from every point of view, whether we consider the interests of the children themselves or the interests of the ratepayers, the emigration of these children would be of immense advantage as contrasted with our present method of dealing with them. I may point out that for a number of years past several private agencies have carried on the work of emigration in the interests of children of this class with very great success. One agency with which I have been connected for the last 17 or 18 years has emigrated about 2,500 children, while the institutions associated with the names of Mr. Quarrier, Dr. Barnardo, and others are carrying on the same kind of excellent work, so that something like from 2,000 to 3,000 children are sent out every year to Canada and elsewhere with immense advantage to themselves, and at a comparatively small cost. The contrast between the position of a child sent out to a farm in Canada, and that of a child brought up in an English workhouse is enormously in favour of the emigrant. The pauper child in England is brought up in a huge school with probably 1,000 others, where there is a great want of that sort of natural life which is necessary to fit the child for its after career; and although much has been done to improve the system prevailing in this country, it was demonstrated by Mrs. Nassau Senior 12 years ago that about 50 per cent. of the girls used to go altogether to the bad, although of late years great improvements have been introduced, and that proportion is said to have been reduced to only 10 per cent. However, it is well known that a large number of those who are brought up in the pauper schools go back to their original position. The average cost per head of rearing the pauper children in London schools is £20 or £25 per annum, and as they are often kept, on an average, about five years, the average cost per head per child in the pauper schools is about £100, whereas we can emigrate them to Canada, paying the whole cost of the agency, for £10 or £15 per head per child. From two points of view the emigration system has an enormous advantage over our pauper system. In the first place, the future chances of the child are many times as good in Canada as they are at home; and, in the second place, there is a saving of from three-fourths to nine-tenths of the outlay that would otherwise have to be made. This is not a theoretical question, because we have thoroughly tested the system I am advocating. We have carried on this emigration work for many years with the greatest possible success. We have found that at least 95 per cent. of the children sent out to Canadian farms have turned out well. Before going out they receive the necessary amount of practical instruction, while at the same time the moral and religious element is duly attended to, and it is found that those who are doing these things as a labour of love are bringing influences to bear upon the children which are far superior to those of mere salaried superintendents. I do not know any system by which the results can be so well followed up as that which we have adopted. One of the difficulties raised by the Local Government Board arises from the fact that whatever pauper emigration takes place must be inspected by the Canadian Government, whereby the children are branded as paupers. They have to be sent out and distributed in Canada as pauper children, while in the case of the private emigration agencies the children's chances are much better than where they have to be described as paupers. The children sent out by these agencies are treated very differently from the pauper children here. They live upon large farms generally of from 200 to 300 acres. They sit at the same table as the farmer, partaking of the same food, and grow up in a few years strong and sturdy men and women. There is no comparison between the condition of such a child and a child brought up in an English workhouse. Then with regard to the economical part of the subject, here in England we have to expend a large amount of public money which necessarily comes from the pockets of the ratepayers; but if the children were emigrated this expenditure would cease, and the ratepayers would be saved a large amount of needless outlay. In some of the London pauper schools the children are costing as much as £20 to £30 per head per annum, whereas the whole income of the family from which each child is taken is probably not more than £40 per annum. A more wasteful system of bringing up children than that which is here adopted it is hardly possible to conceive, and yet it continues to go on in spite of all the representations that have been made against it. I have brought this matter before the House on several former occasions, and I am taking the same course to-day, with a view of our getting from the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board an expression of his views upon the subject. I only ask the right hon. Gentleman to put a spur on the Guardians, and I would suggest that he should send a Circular round to the different Boards asking them to freely communicate with him on this important subject. We have been talking about this matter for at least 20 years, and nothing of a really practical character has been done. Let us now make an early effort to find out what are the impediments to the adoption of a wise and sound system of emigration in the case of these pauper children, and we shall then be enabled to see whether they cannot be removed. I am sure I can count on the sympathy of the right glad to receive such a communication, and will take care that a full reply is returned.

*MR. ROWNTREE: I have to ask another question. A short time since I asked if the Local Government Board could not extend the practice of sending their Reports on sanitary matters, which, I think, are acknowledged to be of extreme value, to medical officers throughout the country. It appears to me almost grotesque that a Member of this House should if he wishes receive these valuable scientific Reports, while public servants who have charge of the health of the people should only be able to get them on paying for them, particularly when many of these medical officers help to collect the information contained in the Reports. No doubt I shall be told the difficulty may be met by the Local Authorities purchasing the Reports, which they have power to do out of the rates; but the fact is that medical officers do not care to trouble the Local Authorities on such small matters, and would prefer to have the Reports sent to them direct.

*(3.56.) MR. RITCHIE: The hon. Member referred to this matter on a previous occasion, and I then told him, as I tell him now, that whenever a strong desire is expressed by any Medical Officer of Health to be sent a copy of a Report, especially where he has himself contributed, a copy is almost invariably sent. If, however, these Reports were distributed wholesale they would not be much regarded. The Local Authority has full power to purchase anything of the kind out of the rates; but as hon. Members can have the Reports supplied to them they might consider whether they cannot advantageously forward them to their own constituencies.

MR. S. HOARE (Norwich): With regard to the question raised by the hon. Member for Scarborough, I may point out that the awards for the adjustment of the finances as between certain boroughs and counties are to hold good for five years. But as the rateable value of 1889 was taken as the basis of calculation, practically the award is for seven years. This is a matter which my constituents at Norwich feel to constitute a grievance. I wish to know whether there are any means by which the matter may be reviewed before the end of the term?

*MR. RITCHIE: There is no mode of altering the award given by the Commissioners.

MR. SUMMERS: The right hon. Gentleman promised to inquire as to the extent to which Local Authorities had availed themselves of the power of supplying periodicals and books to inmates of workhouses. Has he any information to give the Committee?

MR. RITCHIE: I have no details. I believe that Boards of Guardians have had their attention drawn to the desirability of availing themselves of this power.

Original Question again proposed.

*(4.10.) MR. MORTON: I have to move the reduction of the Vote by £100. The point I particularly wish to call attention to is what appears to be the use of improper lymph by vaccination officers at Southend about a month ago. A Mrs. Cooke was summoned because she objected to lymph being taken from her child and used at once in the vaccination of other children. She claimed that the vaccine was unfit to be used on account of her child and her family generally being consumptive. It is generally understood that it is the duty of vaccination officers to take care they use lymph that has been properly examined, so that there may be no chance of diseases being communicated by vaccination. In the case at Southend it appears the doctor took it upon himself to use the lymph immediately he obtained it, so that there was no possibility of the rule of law being observed. That is the point I wish particularly to call attention to—that it is the duty of the doctors to take care that only good lymph is used. The other matter—that of the age of the child—I have nothing to do with to-day. The lymph in the case I have referred to was about to be used immediately on being taken from an unhealthy child. The doctor, I believe, says he did not intend to use the lymph, but from all the evidence we see in the papers—

THE CHAIRMAN: I do not see how the hon. Member connects this question with the Vote.

*MR. MORTON: I understand that this is a matter which is under the charge of the Local Government Board. A large sum of money is taken here for things connected with vaccination.

THE CHAIRMAN: If the allegation were that the medical officer drew the lymph from the vaccination establishment of the Local Government Board the hon. Member would be in order. But that is not the case. It seems to me that the hon. Member's charge is one of misconduct on the part of the local vaccination officer.

*MR. MORTON: What I want is that the Local Government Board shall secure the use of proper lymph. The other point is whether it is right that the vaccination officers should sit on Boards of Guardians, thereby becoming prosecutors and judges, when the Guardians sit on the Magisterial Bench. Of course, under such circumstances people have no chance of getting their cases properly considered. I know of no other way of calling attention to this matter than by raising the question on this Vote.

*(4.17.) MR. COBB: I desire to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman opposite to a matter he has already had under his notice, which I think he will admit is of importance, namely, the case recently before the Rugby Rural Sanitary Authority of selling bad meat. The right hon. Gentleman was good enough to answer a question I put to him on the subject. A local butcher was three times convicted of having sold bad meat. Twice he was imprisoned for periods of six months, and the third time he was fined very heavily—£40 or £50. Notwithstanding that, quite recently again the Inspector of the Rural Sanitary Authority found the man with a number of carcasses of bad meat in his cart at the station, the carcasses being directed to a dealer in the London meat market, and there is no doubt they were to be sent off. The meat was subsequently examined by a Magistrate and the medical officer, and was ordered to be destroyed. The case was brought before the Rural Sanitary Authority at their next meeting, but owing to some dispute about a previous case, which, however, was not on all fours with this, it was decided by a majority of one that there should not be a prosecution. The right hon. Gentleman wrote to the Rural Sanitary Authority asking them to re-consider the matter. They did so; but there seems to have been some misapprehension as to the point on which they were called upon to vote. The local Press says that the division—which was against a prosecution—was somewhat confused. It is needless to point out how important it is that the public should have sound meat, and that the Act of Parliament regulating the matter should be properly carried out. This particular case affects London more than the country, for there can be no doubt that if this bad meat had reached its destination it would have been used for sausages, and many people might have been poisoned. I want to know whether the right hon. Gentleman will be good enough, seeing that the Local Sanitary Authority were under some misapprehension when they last voted, to write to them and ask them to again re-consider the matter? A letter to that effect could do no harm. Let the question be raised before them fairly and plainly, and then if they pass a resolution to the effect that they will not prosecute the responsibility will rest with them, and when next they come before their constituents for re-election I have no doubt their action will be remembered.

*MR. RITCHIE: I remember the case referred to, and will look into it again with the object of seeing whether any further action can be taken. As to vaccine lymph, the whole question is before the Royal Commission, which is taking evidence on the very point. No doubt the Report of the Commission will deal with the subject, and then the Government will be in a position to consider it.

*MR. MORTON: May I ask whether the prosecutions at Southend will be stayed pending the issue of the Report of the Commission?

*MR. RITCHIE: I cannot say anything as to that particular case; but with regard to the general question of stopping prosecutions until we have the Report of the Commission, we have no power to do anything of the kind. So far as I am concerned, I should be unwilling to do anything that would lead people to think that the law can be disobeyed.

(4.24.) MR. T. ELLIS (Merionethshire): I desire to call attention to a reply given to me by the Government the other day as to the refusal of the Local Government Board to constitute Corwen in Merionethshire a Local Board District. I think the objections the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board stated to the formation of this Local Board are such as to necessitate some attention being called to it in Committee. This town of Corwen is typical of a large number of small towns in rural counties. It is not merely a market town and a steadily growing town, but one of those towns so situated by closeness to the sea and in the midst of beautiful and attractive scenery as to bid fair to become a favourite resort for visitors. The right hon. Gentleman will admit that it is of the utmost importance that in places of this sort some power should be given by which the habits of the village—the worst habits of the village—can be done away with, and the best habits of a well-conducted town can be developed and encouraged. The town, I admit, is a small one, with less than 1,400 inhabitants, and has hitherto been governed by a Rural Sanitary Authority. Now, this Rural Sanitary Authority covers a very large district, and the great majority of the members on the Board are either landowners or farmers from the adjoining district. There are, I think, two members connected with the township of Corwen itself on it: but the town has, practically, no real voice in the management of its own affairs. One of the officials of the Local Government Board, six or seven years ago, reported that scandalous sanitary abuses were allowed to exist. In consequence of this, and in view of the rise of public spirit in the town, especially after seeing that it could be made into a prosperous town and a resort for visitors, an attempt has been made during the past three years to get it constituted into an Urban Sanitary Authority. The ratepayers decided by an immense majority to apply to the County Council to hold a public inquiry. A most exhaustive inquiry was held, and the County Council subsequently voted unanimously in favour of an order converting the town into an Urban Sanitary District. The order was sent to the Local Government Board, and I understand that it would have been sanctioned at once had it not been that the Rural Sanitary Authority petitioned against it. I would point out that that decision was arrived at without previous notice, in the absence of the Corwen representatives and on the motion of the Chairman, who has been all along one of the two or three most determined opponents to the formation of the Urban Sanitary Authority. So far as I can understand, the President of the Local Government Board rather welcomed this opportunity of going against the wishes of the people of Corwen, on the ground that it is only a small township containing less than 1,400 inhabitants. I, of course, speak with diffidence on this point, as I admit the experience of the right hon. Gentleman and his Board; but I cannot help thinking it is unfortunate for a Central Authority to repress the energy of a local community who are anxious to take the initiative in bringing about a great local improvement, and who wish to take a fair and intelligent part in local government. But the right hon. Gentleman has based the whole of his objection to giving these powers to Corwen on the fact that it is a small township. I asked him the number of towns of under 2,000 population and 1,300 population who have Local Authorities. The right hon. Gentleman admitted there are 116 Urban Sanitary Authorities with populations under 2,000 and 46 under 1,300, but he said this was due to the fact that many Boards were constituted before the Central Department had power to deal with them. I should be sorry to learn that the right hon. Gentleman refuses under any circumstances to sanction the conversion of a rural township into an urban district because of its small population. To fortify my position, I turn to Scotland, and there I find that this House has passed an Act to make provision for the better lighting, paving, cleansing, draining, and generally making better arrangements for the health of the population in the populous districts by the formation of Urban Boards, with powers to yond those we ask for in the present instance, and 44 police burghs in Scotland have all the authority and powers we ask for in the case of Corwen. So we have 116 authorities in England exercising the power of Urban Boards and 44 in Scotland in populations below 2,000. I should be surprised to learn that in these 44 cases the authorities do their work so badly that the right hon. Gentleman would, if he had control in Scotch affairs, suppress those authorities. Surely, with the views we know the right hon. Gentleman entertains in favour of extending and developing local government, and giving to small bodies powers of initiative, it would be unwise to set up an artificial and arbitrary limit of 2,000 inhabitants. Is it not better to welcome any signs of real energy in the inhabitants of a small township like Corwen, and wise to encourage them as much as possible? In this instance, not merely is the theory upheld, but we have the County Authority which the right hon. Gentleman himself has been instrumental in setting up, coming to a decision that it would be an advantage to convert the township into an Urban Sanitary District. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will hold out some hope that he will grant the almost unanimous request of the inhabitants of Corwen that they may have an Urban Sanitary Authority. As a matter of fact, opinion against the change is confined to two or three persons, a local landowner, a large farmer, and the doctor. It would be deplorable if the right hon. Gentleman should play into the hands of a very small section against the general local opinion. Apart from the residential population, there is a continual increase in the number of visitors who come to the district for recreation and health. It is one of the most beautiful districts of North Wales, and if the energy of the inhabitants had sufficient scope, there is no doubt that Corwen would be placed on the same footing as other towns in Merionethshire and Carnarvon. With urban powers, the abuses Inspectors have complained of would be swept away, and the town would become a credit to the county and a testimony to the wisdom of the Minister who sanctioned the change.

*(4.38) MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): I do not intend to enter into the particular question raised by my hon. Friend, but I support his appeal on general grounds. There seems to have been in the minds of officials who—perhaps generations ago—drew up the rules and conditions of Local Sanitary Authorities, urban and rural, an idea that the ordinary rules of health do not run in rural districts. The rules for the guidance of authorities having charge in rural districts are very deficient, and I should very much like to have them overhauled by an acute modern mind, such as that of the President of the Local Government Board, with the view of bringing the regulations up to the requirements of the present day. It was with considerable pain that I found not long ago that authorities in rural districts could not insist upon a damp-proof course in a building. Now, if a damp-proof course is required in a building anywhere, it is when that building is in a garden. A building surrounded by a pavement hardly wants a damp-proof course, but if the ground is cultivated up to the walls, a damp-proof course is absolutely necessary. That is one of the instances in which these rules should be brought into conformity with modern ideas. I have it on the authority of Dr. Fox, a Medical Officer of Health, who, with great zeal and tact, administers a large district in Mid Cheshire, that many cases of consumption in the district might have been prevented if the sanitary authority had had greater power. I do hope that the right hon. Gentleman will convince himself of this, that it is just as necessary that Rural Sanitary Authorities should have those powers in matters of public health which are accorded to Urban Authorities. Then there is another matter which I think comes under this Vote, the Inspector of alkali works. The law at present is in a very anomalous condition. There are a number of manufactories in the country where the business comes under the designation of alkali works. These works carry on operations on a large scale, and are prevented, under the Act, from the discharge of noxious vapours; but, strange to say, in other works, where they use the products made in the larger manufactories, the Act does not apply. In point of fact, there are smaller factories using the products of the larger works, and discharging fumes which do quite as much mischief as those which are evolved from alkali works. Oddly enough, if the Inspector can induce the owners of these works to consume these noxious gases instead of turning them out into the air, then the works come under the Act. Those who carry on their work in the most wasteful and harmful fashion are not watched, but as soon as a man ceases doing mischief to his neighbours then he comes under the watchful eye of the Local Government Board Inspector. If the right hon. Gentleman will consult with the officials of his Department, he will, I have no doubt, find that they are entirely at one with me in this matter, and he may be assured an amendment of the law will have the hearty co-operation of the manufacturers who do come under the Act. So far as the Sanitary Authorities who understand this matter—more especially in London, where the mischief is rife—are concerned, he may rely upon their support too. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will consider the representations made to him on this subject, and endeavour to put the law into a condition consistent with common sense.

*(4.45.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): I wish to endorse the appeal of my hon. Friend the Member for Merionethshire (Mr. Ellis). The County Council are absolutely unanimous, the inhabitants are practically unanimous, and the only opposition proceeds from merely two or three persons. The present condition of Corwen is anything but satisfactory from a sanitary point of view, and I hope the President of the Local Board will allow free play to local feeling in these matters. In reference to the objection on the ground of population, I may mention that, comparatively speaking, a population of 1,400 is a fair average for a small town in the mountainous parts of Wales, and Corwen is an important centre for an increasing number of visitors, and during part of the year the residential population is largely augmented.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): There is a matter to which I should like to call attention in relation to this Vote, and it comes to my notice from reading the Reports of the Inspectors of Factories furnished to the Home Office and laid before the House. The Report I refer to is that from Mr. Blenkinsop, the Inspector for the district of Beds, Hunts, and parts of Northamptonshire and Lincolnshire, as affecting the village of Raunds, in Northamptonshire, and anybody who reads this Report must allow it discloses a deplorable condition of sanitary affairs, demanding the instant attention of the Local Government Board. The village contains some 600 houses, it is $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles from Thrapstone, and it appears that the sanitary requirements are extremely neglected. A brook runs through the village, and is nothing but a common sewer, and cows are led to it to drink. Lime-washing is unknown, closets, &c., and the workshops are in a filthy state. The Chairman of the Rural Sanitary Authority and the Medical Officer have been communicated with, and some of the principal owners have taken up the matter and raised a commotion, which Mr. Blenkinsop says may in time have an effect, but meantime many of the workshops and dwellings are quite unfit for occupation. Typhoid fever is rife, and there were 12 deaths from this cause last year, and there were 60 cases of scarlet fever. A few years ago there was an outbreak of diphtheria. It seems to be necessary there should be the scourge of an epidemic before local action is taken in these cases. It seems that the Rural Sanitary Authority have not the power to deal with the position properly, but this Report reveals a condition of things that requires that something should be done without further delay. When we take up Local Government Board Reports we find the baldest possible statements; but strong side-lights are thrown sometimes from other departmental reports, and this Report of Mr. Blenkinsop discloses the fact that Raunds is a most neglected place and a disgrace to Local Government.

*MR. CREMER: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will, in his reply, give the information I have asked for in relation to other Departments—the hours of attendance of clerks and officials of the Local Government Board.

yond those we ask for in the present instance, and 44 police burghs in Scotland have all the authority and powers we ask for in the case of Corwen. So we have 116 authorities in England exercising the power of Urban Boards and 44 in Scotland in populations below 2,000. (5.4.) MR. T. ELLIS: I have to thank the right hon. Gentleman for his reply. At the same time I would point out that the attitude of the Rural Sanitary Authority has been for years one of dogged opposition to the Inspectors of the Local Government Board. I admit that the rate suggested was a very low one, but the promoters of the Local Board scheme would naturally and without any dishonest intention minimise the amount, especially in view of the opposition with which they had to contend from two or three of the leading ratepayers. I can quite understand that by dint of great effort those two or three leading men were able to obtain signatures against the scheme, but I would point out that they only got two or three hundred to support them, whereas the population of the village is 1,400. I admit that the right hon. Gentleman has made a strong point with regard to the salary of the Medical Officer of Health. It may be very ridiculous to propose that such a small salary should be given to a Medical Officer of Health, but I am looking forward to a time, not very far distant, when these Sanitary Authorities will be able to group themselves into districts and to appoint one competent medical officer to take care of the group. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will be able again to look into these facts, and to lay some stress on the wishes of the vast majority of the people, of the Committee of the County Council, and of the County Council itself. I desire to give notice to the right hon. Gentleman that on the very first opportunity I shall again call attention to this matter.

Question put, and agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

Mr. Ritchie

(5.8.) DR. CLARK: I have to move a reduction of this Vote. There are six Lunacy Commissioners for England each of whom is paid a salary of £1,500 a year, while there are two Lunacy Commissioners in Scotland, each at a salary of £1,000 a year. I do not wish to institute any unfavourable comparison between the six English and the two Scotch Commissioners, but anyone who knows anything about the matter will agree with me when I say that Sir Arthur Mitchell, one of the Scotch Commissioners, is known all over the world as one of the ablest men in this branch of medical work, whilst of the English Commissioners scarcely one is known out of England. I only intend to take three Divisions on these subjects, and I will enter my protest against the differences of salary on this one Vote instead of taking a large number of Divisions on the various items. The Scotch Commissioners are as able, or if not abler, than their English colleagues. The cost of living is as great in Scotland as in England, and, the taxation being higher in Scotland than it is here, I cannot see why if you can get men of this type to work for £1,000 a year in Scotland you should pay £1,500 a year to the English Commissioners. I move the reduction, not from the ordinary economical motives, because I think £1,500 a year is little enough to pay men in this position, but as a protest against paying 50 per cent. less in Scotland than in England. I beg to move the reduction of the Vote by £3,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed.
"That a sum, not exceeding £5,944, be granted for the said Service."—(Dr. Clark.)

(5.11.) DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): This is one of the many cases in which Public Departments in Scotland, which are worked with far greater efficiency than corresponding Departments in England, are paid at a much lower rate. I wish to repeat the protest I have made on several occasions previously, as to the absurdly small amounts paid to the Lunacy Commissioners in Scotland as compared with that paid in England. There are three Medical Commissioners and three Legal Commissioners in England. I have often asked what lawyers are wanted for on a Lunacy Commission. The chief business of the Commissioners is to find out whether alleged lunatics are improperly detained, and I think the presence of a lawyer on the Commission is entirely unnecessary. In Scotland the number of lunatic asylums is much smaller than in England, and they are worked with admirable efficiency. When it is remembered that we have on the Scotch Lunacy Commission such a man as Sir Arthur Mitchell it will be admitted that Scotland may well be admired and imitated by other countries. I am glad the point has been raised by my hon. Friend, whom I shall have much pleasure in following into the Division Lobby.

(5.15.) DR. TANNER: There can be no doubt that there is a great deal in the points raised by my hon. Friends. I do not know why lawyers should be placed on the Lunacy Commission. There is another point worth considering. There is exactly the same number of Commissioners now as there was about 10 years ago. There has been a large increase in lunacy of late years, and it is probable that additional Commissioners will have to be appointed. I hope that, in the event of new applications being made, those who are appointed will be of the medical profession. Perhaps one or two lawyers might be of use in giving legal advice on doubtful points, but I do not see why you should not have a larger proportion of medical men. It certainly is very unfair that the Scotch Commissioners, who do their work in an able manner, should receive so much lower salaries than the English Commissioners. I shall have very great pleasure in supporting my hon. Friends in the Lobby on this occasion.

MR. CALDWELL: I think we ought really to get an answer from the Government.

MR. JACKSON: This is not the first time the hon. Member has brought forward this question. The hon. Member's contention is that the salaries of the Scotch Commissioners are too low. At present, however, we are not on the Scotch Vote. He does not say that the English salaries are too high. If he institutes a comparison between the expenditure in the two countries, he will find that the figures are hopelessly against him, because the Scotch Vote amounts to £5,800, and the English Vote to £13,500. Taking into account the relative populations and the amount of work done in each case, it is clear that England has not as large a share of the total expenditure as Scotland.

(5.20.) DR. CLARK: Of course the right hon. Gentleman is aware that I am only bringing this subject forward by proposing the reduction of the English Vote. I know it is an absurd method of procedure, but it is the only one, as we are not able to move an increase of the Scotch Vote. I do not say the English Commissioners are overpaid; I think they are poorly paid, and they would do very much better if they were not State servants. The Scotch Commissioners are certainly very much underpaid. I am fighting for the principle that men who do exactly the same work, whether in Scotland or England, should get the same pay. According to the last Returns, Scotland pays to the Imperial Exchequer 2s. per head more than England, and very much more than Ireland. I shall take a Division for the purpose of protesting, as a Scotchman, against Scotch officials getting less than English officials.

DR. FARQUHARSON: Will the Secretary to the Home Office say what are really the functions of the Commission? There are no legal Commissioners in Scotland, and I would like to know what peculiarity there is in English lunacy which necessitates the presence of lawyers upon the Commission?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. STUART WORTLEY, Sheffield, Hallam): The Commissioners are often called upon to advise the Government respecting the conclusion of contracts and the purchase of sites, and other questions of the same nature, and it is therefore deemed advisable that lawyers should be on the Commission.

DR. FARQUHARSON: Is there not also a largely-paid Lunacy Board?

MR. STUART WORTLEY: The only paid members of the Board are three lawyers and three medical men. The other members of the Board are all laymen.

(5.23.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 67; Noes 136.—(Div. List, No. 350.)

Original Question again proposed.

(5.35.) THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): It is proposed to proceed with Supply on Thursday, and I beg to give notice that I will move the suspension of the 12 o'clock Rule, when Supply is taken, for the remainder of the Session. There will be not only acquiescence in, but a desire for this course in many parts of the House, and I believe that the Motion will meet with general approval.

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): I wish to ask if the Government will renew the undertaking given last year, to oppose any measure that is objected to?

MR. GOSCHEN: I can assure the hon. Member that communications have been made from my own side of the House that the proposal of the Government will meet with general acquiescence and I wish the House distinctly to understand that the Government have no desire to coerce the House in the slightest degree, but think that they will be meeting the general desire in endeavouring to bring the Session to a speedy termination. I am not in a position to offer and pledge with regard to next Session, and in reply to the hon. Member (Mr. Robertson) I must point out that the suspension of the 12 o'clock Rule only applies to Supply.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): Nobody who is not an Irishman, certainly nobody above the Gangway belonging to any Party, has a right to speak on behalf of the Irish Members. Will the right hon. Gentleman give an assurance that next Session the Estimates shall be taken at an early period in the year, and that the Irish Votes now shall be taken at a reasonable hour?

It being after half past Five of the clock, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow.

Committee also report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

SUPPLY—REPORT.

Resolutions [14th July] reported [see page 1198.]

First Resolution agreed to.

(5.40.) MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he would have any objection to lay on the Table of the House a Return showing the amount of money which, with the Bankrupt Estates Account, has been handed over to the Treasury, the amount of money which the Treasury has handed back again to the Bankrupt Estates Account, and what expenditure has been made from the same for the wants of the Exchequer, and showing also the amount in the hands of the Treasury?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I shall be extremely glad, and my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be extremely glad to give the fullest information that can be afforded with regard to this matter. If the hon. Member will put a notice on the Paper I will endeavour to meet his wishes.

MR. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith, &c.): I wish to know whether anything has been done to carry out the recommendation of the Committee on Forestry?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): The powers of the Department are limited to giving grants in aid of those Institutions which will aid themselves. We have had one or two applications for aid—one from the Scottish Agricultural Society, and we have given within the last two years a grant of £100 for Forestry to the Edinburgh University. We have now under consideration the giving of a grant to the Botanical Gardens in Edinburgh, and we have also undertaken, under certain conditions, to make grants to Chambers of Agriculture and Forestry for the establishment of schools.

MR. MUNRO FERGUSON: Will the £100 granted to Edinburgh be counted?

MR. CHAPLIN: Certainly.

*DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): All I can say is that nothing has been done to carry out the recommendation, and we always have been told to wait until the Board of Agriculture was established. The millenium has arrived in the person of the right hon. Gentleman. Yet it is very unsatisfactory that nothing has been done to develop what could be made a very remunerative process of agricultural arboriculture.

CONVEYANCING AND LAW OF PROPERTY ACT (1881) AMENDMENT BILL.
(No. 5.)

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 3.

(5.45.) Amendment proposed at the end of the Clause, to add the words—

"(2.) Provided that, in any case coming within the operation of this section, the lessor may require the assignee or under lessee, or other person to whom possession is given, at his own cost to produce to the lessor or his agent, and allow him to inspect or make a note of the deed of assignment or under lease, or other document transferring possession, and to pay a reasonable fee to the agent of the lessor for making the inspection and note, and also to execute and deliver to the lessor a deed of covenant on the part of such assignee, under lessee, or other person to pay the rent reserved by and to observe and perform the covenants and conditions of the lease, and any licence or consent given by the lessor shall in such case become void if such deed of assignment, under lease, or other document be not produced, or if a reasonable fee be not paid or tendered as aforesaid within six months from the date of such assignment, under lease, or other document, or if such deed of covenant be not executed and delivered to the lessor or his agent within the same time.

(3.) This section, and sub-section three of section two, are not to apply to any lease of,—

- (a.) Agricultural land;
- (b.) Mines or minerals;
- (c.) A house used or intended to be used as a public house or beer shop;
- (d.) A house let as a dwelling-house, with the use of any furniture, library, works of art, or other chattels not being in the nature of fixtures;
- (e.) Any property with respect to which the personal qualifications of the tenant are of importance for the preservation of the value or character of the property."—(Mr. Rentoul.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): Perhaps the hon. Member will give some explanation of the clause.

MR. RENTOUL: These Amendments have all been discussed, and agreed upon by those who are interested in the Bill.

MR. FLYNN: I move to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Flynn.)

SIR H. DAVEY (Stockton): I hope the hon. Member will not press his Motion. The Amendment simply contemplates the case of a man who has assigned his lease, and prevents engagements being entered into by the assignees.

MR. FLYNN: I am sorry to say that I cannot give way.

*MR. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.): I may explain to the hon. Member that I accepted the modification which is proposed by the Amendment to meet the opposition of some hon. Members on the other side. I cannot hope to get the Bill through this Session unless I submit to these Amendments.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): If you had allowed me to give notice, perhaps it would have prevented this Motion. We cannot allow the remnant of the Sitting to be taken up with this Bill.

Question put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress, to sit again upon Friday.

MOVABLE DWELLINGS BILL.—(No. 222.)

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 412.]

IRISH SUPPLY.

On the Motion for Adjournment,

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I would remind the Chancellor of the Exchequer that during the eight months of the present Session not one single Irish Vote in Supply has been taken. The whole of the Irish business has been postponed till after the eleventh hour, notwithstanding the pledge of the First Lord of the Treasury last year, that the business of Supply should go forward regularly from the beginning to the end of the Session. In these circumstances it will be my duty to offer any resistance in my power to any attempt to take any Irish Vote whatever, except in the ordinary hours for the transaction of the business of the House.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Har- over Square): I can assure the hon Member that in proposing the suspension of the 12 o'clock Rule the Government by no means wish to force discussion on an important Vote after 12 o'clock, or at any unreasonable hour, but experience has shown that there is often a discussion on a small Vote, that might be concluded in a few minutes, that under the 12 o'clock Rule has to be renewed on the following day, contrary to the wishes of the Committee. The Irish Members are fully entitled to have their Votes discussed at a time when there will be a full attendance, and all reasonable facility will be offered.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): This is a very gracious concession, for which I suppose we ought to be grateful. For years we have seen Irish business postponed to the last days of the Session, and it makes me feel, what I have felt for years, that the Irishman who trusts to a British Minister's word is not fit for public life.

*SIR J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): Can the right hon Gentleman say when the Post Office Vote will be reached?

MR. GOSCHEN: It may be reached soon if hon. Members curtail their speeches.

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): I did not get a very distinct answer to the suggestion which I made a few minutes ago. There are scores of opposed Private Bills on the Paper, and what I wish is that hon. Members may not find it necessary to stay late if they receive an undertaking from the Government to oppose all Private Bills after 12 o'clock to which they have received notice of opposition.

MR. GOSCHEN: I will consider it.

House adjourned at one minute before six o'clock

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): The powers of the Department are limited to giving grants in aid of those Institutions which will aid themselves. MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): If you had allowed me to give notice, perhaps

I believe it has not yet been circulated among your Lordships; but at the same time I am entitled to quote from it as it is on the table, though I will not go into any long detailed statement of figures, but merely mention the principal points. The ordinary Education Grant will amount this year to £3,712,254, and, in addition to that, the new fee grant, which is to be added under this measure, will amount, in round numbers—not this year, because the whole of the year will not be used—but the fee grant which is about to be added will in the year amount to about £2,000,000. Therefore, that miserable £30,000 with which the State began to aid the schools has materially increased, until the amount practically at this moment granted for Elementary Education in this country in the public elementary schools has risen to an amount of nearly £8,000,000. Now, when we are dealing with figures of that sort, your Lordships will see how great the support is that has been given, whatever view people may take. The investments on behalf of the voluntary schools made by their supporters have been enormous both in buildings and in subscriptions. Their subscriptions, though to a certain extent they appear to have gone down in proportion to the average of scholars' attendance, have on the whole increased. They have this year risen by some £8,000, and they have reached an amount of £758,670, and the rates which have been raised in connection with the maintenance of the Board Schools have at the same time risen to £1,326,177. So that, although the voluntary schools covered the larger part of the country in comparison with the Board Schools, and in proportion to the number of scholars, yet the voluntary schools have received support amounting to £758,670 in contrast with the rates which the Board Schools are receiving at present to the amount of £1,326,177, and those rates are still constantly increasing. Your Lordships will observe that these rates of which I have spoken are for the maintenance of the schools only. They do not include the rates levied for the purpose of repaying interest on loans. The loans at this moment amount to something like £20,000,000, which have been raised by Board Schools, and therefore you have to take that in addition to those rates. The school pence, during last year, that is up to 31st August, amounted to £1,940,546, and therefore you will observe that the new grant of which I have spoken, and which in round numbers we may call £2,000,000, will, in fact, merely cover the school pence already paid by parents. Now I know that this point has raised much controversy. I do not think it advisable that I should on this occasion enter very greatly into the controversy as to whether we are entering upon a new field in making this provision by the State. With regard to the payment by the State, it has been said that this policy will destroy parental responsibility; but I think people who argue it on that ground rather go by the question; for who has said at any time that the parents have ever paid anything like an amount in proportion to the cost of their children's education when you consider that we have been giving these grants one after another? You have not been destroying the parents' responsibility by your grants in the past nor if you increase the grant to 10s. will you do it more so than before. If it comes to that, look at the way in which you interfere with parents' rights as well as their responsibilities already. If you take away the payment of the child's fee you do little for the parent in proportion to what he might get by putting the child to work. For the sake of the education of the child you prevent the parent from sending him to work, and by paying the child's school fees you will do little for the parent in comparison with what you would do if you allowed him to send the child into employment at an earlier age than is now permitted. In comparison with the few pence the parent would get, perhaps, 6d. or 9d. a day, and therefore you may fairly grant the parent in this way the alleviation which you bring to him in paying the child's fees. This will relieve the poorer parents from that which has been an undoubted degradation to them, namely, the necessity of their going before the Board of Guardians for the remission of their children's fees. They had to address themselves through the relieving officers or others to the guardians in order to obtain a remission of the payment of the fees for their children, and they have to show that they are in a position which require poor relief to be given them. I may say this, with regard to this question, that it has never been one of principle; it is one of expediency; and if you argue it upon the question of expediency there is, no doubt, a great deal to be said both on one side and the other. There is a great deal to be said in favour of the maintenance of parents' responsibilities. There is a great deal of force in that argument. It has been said that it is expedient not to diminish the parents' liability, because you secure a better attendance if they are forced to pay for the education of their children, though upon that point there seems to be a great difficulty in coming to an adequate conclusion, because in those countries where the system of gratuitous education prevails, while in some cases the attendance is very bad, in others it is a great deal higher than with us. In France the attendance rises as high as 94 per cent. in the primary schools, showing that you can combine attendance to a very large extent with the remission of fees, which in other cases are paid. But, my Lords, it has been said that the Government have changed their policy and opinions on this question. This question of policy has never been raised before. As far as I am personally concerned, I am not aware that I have ever had occasion to argue it one way or the other. It must be remembered that this has never been a question of policy at all. There never has been, I suppose, a more determined opponent of the proposal that the State should pay school fees instead of the parents than the late Mr. Fawcett. Mrs. Fawcett has published his statements upon the point, endeavouring to show that he retained those opinions to the last, as I have no doubt he did. On the other hand, I have no doubt that my noble Friend, Lord Norton, will take exactly the opposite view to that of the Government. I happened to see a speech of the noble Lord's the other day, in which he was good enough to say, not on his own authority but on the authority of a very eminent gentleman who is not particularly friendly towards this Government, that the Government had received the Bill absolutely from Mr. Chamberlain; that it was not the Government's Bill at all, but Mr. Chamberlain's. All I can say is that if that is so Mr. Chamberlain must have been gifted with second sight, because so far from that being the truth, Mr. Chamberlain, as far as I know, never saw the Bill until immediately before it was introduced in the House of Commons, and he certainly never saw it in the course of its being matured in the office to which I have the honour to belong. But an Act was passed for this purpose in 1889 which very much changed the aspect of matters as regards this country, that is to say, concerning the grants which were made to Scotland in that year. That was insisted upon not by one party only in Scotland, but as far as I can recollect was supported by the whole of the Scottish Members in the House of Commons—both parties, with one accord, called upon the Government to hand those sums over for the purpose of freeing their schools. They did not absolutely free their schools, and in the towns of Glasgow, Aberdeen, and Govan, it is very remarkable to see how they have treated the matter. They have grouped their schools in these places. They have a certain number of fee-paid schools, as well as those entirely free. I do not go into other cases, but those three cases have been given into my hands, and therefore I know them. That fact shows that you can combine the two systems, that it is not necessary you should have absolutely free education because you give a grant for that purpose, but that you can treat it as my noble Friend has said on many occasions, not as free, but as assisted education. I think your Lordships will see that when the State adds to its other grants a gift of £2,000,000, which is to cover the school-pence which amount to some £940,000 odd, it would be impossible for such a grant to be made without adding that free places should be given so far as people require them. If the people do not require free places, and are ready to pay as they have paid hitherto, then there is no reason why they should not go on paying them. There are cases in England where there are no School Boards, and where, in order to keep out the School Boards, or for other reasons, the parents have practically supported the schools altogether. Let me take the case of Stockport. The other day a gentleman, one of a deputation, spoke with great pride of Stockport, and said, "Our schools are almost supported voluntarily by subscriptions." We know it may be an admirable thing in itself, and the State does not support the schools altogether; but besides that the parents are not the people who were considered in the first instance, with regard to these voluntary schools; the persons considered were the managers who were responsible for the schools and those who were subscribers. The subscribers were justified in having their own management, because they largely subscribed to the schools. I need not quote to your Lordships from what is called the Report of the majority in the late Royal Commission—those who were mainly friends of the voluntary schools—but they expressed themselves in very strong language upon the subject, saying that the only justification for voluntary management was the payment of subscriptions on the part of those who conducted the management of the schools. Although I am not finding fault with what has been done in many cases with regard to the payment of the fees by parents, yet I think it is unfortunate that there should have been a severance in certain parts of the Kingdom from the course which has been generally adopted. In the South of England generally, I may say, the subscriptions have been proportionately large; in the North of England they have been comparatively very small. If you come to look at the fees which have been paid in different places you will find that in some cases in the Board schools there are high fees and low rates and in other cases there are low fees and high rates; and therefore in the same way with the voluntary schools, the voluntary schools in some cases have only small subscriptions, while in others they have very high ones, so that they may keep the fees low. Prebendary Row, whose name is so well-known in connection with the question of education, said the other day that in Somersetshire the subscription averages 12s. 6d. per head of the children. When you come to look at other places you will find that nothing of the sort is the case. The voluntary contributions, for instance, at Leeds amount to 4s. 2d., at Birkenhead to 2s. 5d. per head, and so on, showing, therefore, that the necessity must have been imposed upon them of charging the parents very high fees. Then, when the question of free education arises, some people say "You should have dealt with all these schools in their present conditions, and given more than the 10s. grant where it is required." Your Lordships will see what that is. Instead of taking the average throughout the whole country, which you may take in round numbers to be a little over 10s., therefore not meeting the case, but very near it, adding the fixed sum, you will find that if you take those schools, the 10s. will not meet their case. Take, for instance, the Wesleyan schools. The Wesleyan schools' charges are about 16s. 1d. per head, and sometimes their subscriptions have been as low as 2s. 7d. a year. So far as I have ascertained, the Wesleyans have boldly met the Bill which has been introduced. They have accepted the sum which the Government propose to give, and so far as I am concerned as the head of the Department I have not had one remonstrance from them on the ground that we have not nearly met the necessities of the case. They are prepared, of course, to endeavour to add whatever is necessary beyond the 10s. in such way as they can, whether by fees or by getting more subscriptions, or in some other way; but they are prepared to meet it. Now it has been said that it is impossible for them ever to compete with the Board schools. Of course the Board schools having the support of the rates to fall back upon, it is much more easy for them to set their schools free than it is for the voluntary schools. But there is another point which I desire to notice, which is, that the voluntary schools in this country have held their own against the Board schools in the generality of places throughout the country though charging very much higher fees than the Board schools. That shows there is a demand in this country for the kind of schools which are comprehended under the name of denominational schools. Whether it be purely a religious question, or to some extent a social question, it is undoubtedly the fact that the difference in those fees has been maintained. In London that is fees for their children, and they have to show that they are in a position which require poor relief to be given them. I may say this, with regard to this question, that it has never been one of principle; it is one of expediency; and if you argue it upon the question of expediency there is, no doubt, a great deal to be said both on one side and the other. There is a great deal to be said in favour of the maintenance of parents' responsibilities. There is a great deal of force in that argument. It has been said that it is expedient not to diminish the parents' liability, because you secure a better attendance if they are forced to pay for the education of their children, though upon that point there seems to be a great difficulty in coming to an adequate conclusion, because in those countries where the system of gratuitous education prevails, while in some cases the attendance is very bad, in others it is a great deal higher than with us. If the people do not require free places, and are ready to pay as they have paid hitherto, then there is no reason why they should not go on paying them. There are cases in England where there are no School Boards, and where, in order to keep out the School Boards, or for other reasons, the parents have practically supported they are efficient. The Inspectors are required to see that the schools are kept in an efficient state. If that efficiency is not maintained as described in the Code, then they do not come up to the standard; they will receive the warning which is provided in the Code, and after the lapse of a year or two, if they have not amended their manners, and arrived at a state of efficiency, they will be taken off, not only from the fee grant, but from the other grants which they have received from the State. That is my answer to those who have put forward that point, and I cannot help saying it seems rather curious to me to be bombarded on this matter of fees with such objections on both sides. I have observed that in some of the arguments people have said, and some of my own friends, supporters of the voluntary schools, have said they would be injured by it, and you are sure to have universal secular schools. On the other hand, I have seen statements by those who object to handing over the education of the country to those persons who they say ought not to be entrusted with the education of the people. These attacks are mutually destructive one of the other. With regard to this point, and this is a personal matter, not one upon which I am speaking for others, I observe under the Scotch Code a system which I have always wished existed in this country, because I think it would meet many cases of difficulty, and would get rid of a great deal of trouble. In Scotland, if there is the want of a school suited to the needs of the people, it can be supported by the grants and rates as well. Of course, I do not expect it here in England; there is too much prejudice on the subject; but it only shows you the necessity of finding some outlet for the religious instincts of the people. They will have these schools, and in the Scotch Code it is provided that no grant for a new school shall be made unless the Department shall after due inquiry be satisfied that no sufficient provision exists for the children for whom the school is intended, regard being had to the religious belief of the parents, or that it is otherwise specially required in the locality. We have nothing of that sort in this country, and I think in many cases it would be very desirable. Even in cases where no rates were given at all, yet grants ought to be given in such cases, and when you come to look at instances—I do not know whether many of your Lordships have looked at the different returns, and the comments upon them in his able paper by Mr. Fitch—but those will show you what is going on in other countries. In the United States what has been the course of events? There they have a secular system in force. You may say the secular system there is practically universal. What follows? Why, an outbreak of private schools, where religion is taught. Therefore you do get private religious schools; people will have them, even at their own cost, and you will find that complaints are made, and grow louder and louder, that they think it very unreasonable they should be called upon to pay rates for schools which they do not use, and at the same time have to support their own schools at their own expense. That has been the case in the United States. What is the case in France? In France you have a rigidly secular system established in the primary schools, and yet one-fifth of the schools in France have already fallen into the hands of private managers. In Paris two-fifths of the schools are religious schools or under religious management. So that you find you cannot control the religious feelings of men. You may lay down these rigid rules, and say that the children shall not receive this religious teaching, that religion shall not be taught in the schools; but people will have it, and I would say here if there were nothing but secular schools in this country it would be quite as justifiable for religious persons who would not use them to refuse to pay rates for those schools as it would have been for anybody to refuse to pay a church rate in former days. It is contrary to religious instinct that a man should be obliged to support a secular school not having any outlet for his own religious views. Some people think it a monstrous outrage that they should have to do that. In this country we have kept clear of some of these difficulties. We began by assisting religious education; it was then purely religious education. We have supported it as part of our system of education and there is that outlet, and though people often may feel hurt at having to support by voluntary subscriptions schools of their own, when they are paying into the general rates for schools to be maintained in rivalry with their own schools, they are bearing with it, and there is no effort made to relieve them in this Bill. That is a subject which should be carefully considered. While I am upon this point of rates, I may say this, that the Government has had its attention called to the vast raising of rates which is going on in various places throughout the country, and especially in London, and it seems to them unjust, as it affects these schools, it is, therefore, their intention to consider the question of rates at an early period next year, if possible, with the view of mitigating the burden which is laid upon these schools, and in the hope of doing justice to all concerned. It is a question of considerable complication, but all I can say at present is that the Government will be prepared to deal with it at an early date next year. By-the-by, I ought to have mentioned Canada. In Canada there is a variety of education in the different provinces. In some cases in Canada there is purely secular education, but in most of them there is what I may call practically free education. In the provinces of Quebec there are a number of Roman Catholic and Protestant schools which receive grants and there they act together. It is only in that way that Canada has been saved from what is going on in the United States and elsewhere, that is to say, that by using such a system they have provided an outlet for that religious feeling which is burning in people's minds, and which will in some way find the means of teaching children for whom they are responsible. I ought to say one word more on that subject. It seems to me that by not dealing with the matter as we do in England you are alienating from yourselves the very people who are best fitted to take part in the education of the children of this country. You get into a dry and hard system of carrying it on as a matter of duty, though, no doubt, it is done excellently, but you lose the enthusiasm and earnestness of volunteers who are willing to do it at great sacrifice of money and time, and here I cannot pass by what has been done by the clergy in this country. Many remarks have been made as if they did it for the purpose of putting their own schools in the first place. One of the first duties of a clergyman is to address himself, not to the adults only, but to the young. It is the necessity of the case, and if he neglects the young he neglects the congregation that is growing up under his hands, and he cannot expect afterwards that the adults will go with him. I believe that nothing has so much attached parents to the clergy as the interest taken by them in their children. If they do their duty and visit the schools themselves for the purpose of imparting religious education, and do not leave it merely to the masters, they find their reward in the affection and love which they receive from the parents of the children of whom they take care. When I hear people expressing themselves as despondent about those things, I confess I do feel very sorry to hear that anybody can be despondent about a matter which depends upon the earnestness of the religious feeling in the country. If it is not there; if it be true, that for the sake of a few pence, it will all pass away, we have nothing more to say; and it must then be admitted that there is no reality or earnestness in it; but if it be true that those who are conducting the schools, and also the parents, have been, and are prepared to pay much larger fees, and to sacrifice much more for the purpose of getting religious education for the children, Why are we to be despondent? Why is it all to come to an end, and why are you not to be in a position to meet this demand in future as in 1870? As you then brought forward your millions, bring forward your thousands and hundreds of thousands, if it be necessary in this case, to meet the difficulties with which no doubt certain weak schools will have to contend. The supposition of some people with regard to an Education Bill seems to be that it should be a Bill to provide for every school. Those who know of the difficulties with regard to the conduct of education in this country, know that that is an impossibility. In dealing with this matter, the Government have to deal with the whole country; you are obliged to take your average throughout the country, and the attacks that have been made on the principle adopted in the Bill have been due to the fact that each person is apt to judge by the schools with which he is connected, and the difficulties that are met with in their management. We have to deal, I repeat, with the whole country, and we have endeavoured to deal with it, securing only that if people wish it they shall have free places. When people talk of the cost of the buildings and all these things, which have been thrown upon them of necessity, how absurd it seems. At this moment we have 4,500,000 using these schools, and there are seats for 5,500,000 in the schools; therefore, so far from there being necessity for building others to find free places, the question of free places is one which by arrangement and combination will be easily met. I know now, in the case of Liverpool especially, in the Roman Catholic schools there they have numbers of free places, and they have those free places where they are charging graduated fees from a penny up to fourpence, and even higher, in the same school, and yet they are able to conduct those schools with great advantage to the children and honour to themselves, because they are very efficient schools and receive the grants accordingly. This is not a new thing; it is actually going on now. People suppose that where the fees are paid they are always paid by the parents. I have spoken of parents applying to the guardians, but anybody in this country who knows anything about the matter must be aware that there are numbers of people who pay the fees for the parents to avoid the necessity of the parents having to go and show that they are unable to pay them. They naturally do not like to apply as paupers, and out of kindness, knowing the parents' difficulties, people pay these fees. If a man has one child it is a matter of comparative indifference to him that he has to pay a few pence; but if he has a number it may very well become a burden, and there are many persons assisted in that way whose children have practically free places in the schools. Now, my Lords, I do not know that I wish to dwell particularly upon any of the other subjects dealt with in the Bill before the House, because I do not suppose that they will be attacked in this place at all. This Bill has the peculiarity in this

House of being a Bill which deals with money, and that fact alone, therefore, makes it extremely difficult to know how far your Lordships may go in amending it. I would rather leave this question to be dealt with in Committee, in order that we may judge and see what the proper mode of dealing with the Bill is. I can only say, if there are Amendments which seem to me practically to improve the Bill, to remove friction, and to give a better position to those now holding schools of their own, I shall be happy to consider them very carefully. What the Bill does is this: it gives a free grant of 10s. on the average attendance from the ages of 3 to 15. Not logical? Well, I do not know anything that is absolutely logical in these matters. We began, as the Bill was originally introduced, by fixing the ages at from 5 to 14, the compulsory limits, but on that point we gave way. We felt for the educational interests, and we were ready to allow charges for infants, and in that way to enable the schools to recoup the outlay upon the infants, and I felt sure that the concession was inevitable at the time the Bill was introduced. With regard to the point of the increase of age from 14 to 15, the Bill seems to me to have gone a little beyond what was necessary. The truth is, that by going up to 15 without any classification you will practically make your elementary schools schools of secondary education. What is laid down in the Code previously to this Bill was that children might stay at school after the age of 14 and receive the grants if they had not passed the 7th standard—that is to say, if their elementary education was not completed; but now you have opened a door so wide that it may be that what may be called “trigonometry children,” as my noble Friend Lord Salisbury has called them, may be now the children who have really passed the 7th standard, and who will take advantage of the free grant, not for the purpose of elementary, but for the purpose of secondary education. Still, it is not a point on which I should wish to make a change though no doubt it involves a large sum; but I think the time is coming, and will come very soon, when you must make a more distinct declaration on this subject of what is meant by elementary nd secondary education. I hope that time will come, as it must come, when you will see the necessity of some alteration being made in the various grades of education. I only hope the connection between the schools will be maintained by picking out the best of the scholars to go to higher schools, and the rest will be allowed to go back to the ordinary work for which they will have been better fitted, no doubt, by the training which they have received. That, therefore, is the arrangement which we accept at present. Then as to the condition of the fee grant, there are mitigations in this way: that if there should be an unavoidable or unintentional failure in the observance of the conditions, we are not going to make that a reason for withdrawing the fee grants; but the reasonable excuses will be considered, so that people may not be placed in a difficulty for a failure which is not really their own fault. The practical result of this is, that when you come to the point that there is a demand for free education, then I find that controversy to a certain extent arises. Some of my friends seem to think that there is not sufficient protection for the voluntary schools to enable them to meet the deficiency before a School Board is brought into existence. Those who, like myself, have had an opportunity of working the Elementary Education Act, will know that that is not a matter which can be really disputed if it is fairly examined. But I leave that matter for explanation in Committee (therefore I do not trouble your Lordships with a discussion upon it now), should there be any Amendment on the subject introduced. There is one other point on which I should like to say a few words. There seems to be a general impression among my friends that the School Boards will want to pounce down immediately and seize everything into their own hands. Will they? In the first place, there are in this country, I am happy to say, a good many School Boards which are working in perfect harmony with the managers of voluntary schools, and in that way immense good is done. They act in harmony together, and I believe you will find that in those cases arrangements will be made which will be perfectly satisfactory. But your Lordships will observe, in the Report which is coming before you, the enormous increase which is going on in the rates, and in the expenditure of Board Schools. The statement made by Sir Richard Temple, who is the financier of the School Board of London, is alarming, as it seems to me, and a warning to other places not to be too ready to embark in School Boards, for they must not suppose they can do so without burdening themselves with intolerable rates. From these figures, it seems that the expense of a child in a voluntary school is on the average £1 16s. 6d., while the average in the Board schools comes to about £2 5s.; but in the London Board schools it is £3 14s. 11d.; and I would venture to call your attention to something beyond even that. Sir Richard Temple tells us that the charge, taken as a whole, is higher still, and that the total amount now is £5 10s. Just observe, my Lords: £5 10s. per head, or a one shilling rate practically; it is really something above 11d. Sir Richard Temple says that it practically amounts to a 1s. rate from the expenses of collection; that is the amount of the rates in London. How much do you suppose they are per head? In Birmingham, where there are admirable schools, perfectly good schools conducted on a wonderfully efficient system, it is 18s. and something over, and there the fees are 5s. 6d. or 5s. 9d. in the Board schools, but here in London the rates are £1 15s. 8d. per head. Compare that with the cost of children in voluntary schools. I think it is an argument which I may fairly use to those who say Board schools will come at once into existence, that the people will look this gift-horse in the mouth before accepting it when they see that here in London the cost is still an increasing quantity. What is the result? Sir Richard Temple says there is no stopping it; that it will increase at the rate of £100,000 a year, and that he does not know what rates we may have to pay. Then he goes on to say that the standard of instruction is not rising, nor is there any countervailing advantage to make up for this enormous increase of expenditure. He says, "I have to submit that we are spending too much money and yet are failing to make the educational progress we ought."

I am not going to attack the London schools; they are, no doubt, excellent; but I do attack this system which has become almost intolerable; and I say the time is coming when it will be necessary to put some stop upon the amount which School Boards shall be allowed to expend upon any schools, and that if the schools receive grants from the State they shall have at least to conduct them on economical principles; for what can be done in one place can be done in another. It is very difficult to compare London with any other place, but I thought that West Ham, which is almost a part of London itself, would be a good place with which to compare it; and I find that in West Ham the expense is £2 0s. 0½d. per head, whereas, as I have said, in London the expense is £3 14s. 11d. I put this forward for the reason I have stated with the view of showing that there will not be too great a readiness to rush into School Boards and Board schools when people see this increase of expenditure which is so steadily going on in Board schools, as anybody can see from the Report to which I have referred, and which has been going on, no doubt, to a certain extent in the voluntary schools, but to so limited an degree that it is hardly worth noticing. I have then to ask your Lordships to allow this Bill to go through, and in advocating it I am not asking you in any way to depart from that system of education which has gone on in this country ever since 1870, and which I contend by keeping covenant with the religious schools has been going on ever since those schools have received Government grants. I do not despond like many of those who have spoken on the subject in regard to the ability of these schools to hold their own. When I see what has taken place in the United States where they are without any grants at all, where there are any number of private schools for the purpose of imparting religious education, when I see what I have told your Lordships of in France, with an impoverished Church, yet where people go to an enormous expense in maintaining schools for the purpose of imparting to the children religious education, I confess nothing will persuade me that England will be wanting in that duty which up to this time she has performed. When I remember what has taken place in the North of England, from where I come, and in different parts of Yorkshire and Lancashire, and even further south, I cannot believe that people will fail in such an emergency to find the means themselves of carrying on those schools which have been so well managed and so well attended hitherto. I believe they will continue not to grudge either time or money in supporting those schools which they wish to support. I know that there are some who say that we are maintaining a sectarian system of education. Yes, my Lords, we are. It is, if you please, a sectarian or denominational system and it has a conscience clause, and with regard to that clause, whatever may be said about these matters no one can put their hands upon any breach of it, either in the exhaustive inquiry by the late Royal Commission, or any of the attacks which have been made upon these schools, whether Church, or Wesleyan, or Roman Catholic schools. I say that there has not been brought home to any of them any breach of this Conscience Clause, which is the title deed of these schools. There has always been an opportunity for those who have strong feelings against Church schools, or Roman Catholic schools, or whatever they may be, of setting up their own schools. There never has been any difficulty put in their way of setting up schools for themselves. The British schools used to represent what was called non-sectarian education, but the British schools are apparently beginning to die out. For myself, I believe there is no such thing as non-sectarian religion. I can quite understand secularism pure and simple, and I can understand your leaving religion out altogether; but if you come to something which you call unsectarian, if you leave out one thing it offends me, and if you put in something else it offends others, and you must divide the two. The so-called non-sectarian education is what happens to be the religion of the teacher and what he chooses to teach the children under his care. I have detained your Lordships for a little time, but I trust not too long, on so important a measure as this, and I will now conclude by commending the Bill heartily to your and secondary education. I hope that time will come, as it must come, when you will see the necessity of some alteration being made in the various grades of education. I only hope the connection between the schools will be maintained by picking out the best of the scholars to go to higher schools, and the rest will be allowed to go back to the ordinary work for which they will have been better fitted, no doubt, by the training which they have received. clear, I shall refer your Lordships, as shortly as I can, to the present system of giving national grants for education in the country. I think the noble Viscount stated that the sums given to national education out of the public exchequer amounted last year, or very recently, to somewhere about £3,700,000. Now, my Lords, that is a gigantic sum, and I venture to say anyone who has studied the subject, or anyone who has been connected with the Education Department, that the system upon which this is administered is hardly to be defended. This enormous grant is administered from a central department under rules which necessarily go into the most minute details. It is given on average attendances of children, and one of the factors of the grant is as low as 6d. per child. When we have to administer such an enormous sum in such minute details, and from a central office, I think your Lordships will agree with me that it requires machinery of a superhuman excellence to carry it out. Originally these grants began with very humble figures. The noble Viscount stated that when the first grant was made, it amounted to only somewhere about £30,000 a year. Well, now it has grown to this gigantic sum, and I cannot help thinking that some very great change will shortly have to be made in order to decentralise the administration of these grants. There was some very interesting evidence given on this subject by one who knows it as intimately as anybody—unfortunately, we have not at the moment the benefit of his presence in this House—that is my noble Friend, Lord Lingen. He pointed out the extreme difficulty of continuing the present system. It seems to me that before long we must devise some method of throwing on local bodies the administration of this huge sum of money, and of taking away the absolute control of the details of that administration from the central office. This argument as to the necessity of some change in the central office, is immensely strengthened by the enormous grant now to be made towards education in the country. The noble Viscount has said that at the present moment the fees in the schools amount to £1,940,000, and therefore, the Government, in preparing this measure, have calculate that something like a sum roughly of £2,000,000 will be required in order to take the place of those fees. I should like to ask the question. Will the sum of £2,000,000 be sufficient to meet the requirements of the country? I cannot help thinking that even that sum will be found miserably inadequate for the purpose. With regard to this point I should like to allude to the result of free education in countries which we can compare with our own. I am not going to make a comparison with the United States because there they have, I believe, no compulsion; but in places where there has been compulsion and where there is free education you will find that the moment free education has been introduced, a very large increase in the attendance of the children has taken place. I have here some reports on the subject, and in one of the educational reports there are some very remarkable facts stated. For instance I see this, that in the Manchester Free School, which is a school for the children of very poor parents, the result is most remarkable. Out of every 100 children on the books 98 attend regularly, and of those who attend all but one in every 100 pass the examination. In London there is a free Jews' school for the children of very poor parents. There the attendance is 94 per cent., while the general average over all England is not 94, but only 70 per cent. That I think is strong evidence of the effect of free education in increasing the attendance of children at the schools; but we have even a better example, namely, that of Scotland, after what took place with regard to that country last year. Scotland has always been in advance of England in educational matters. In Scotland there has been twelve months' experience of such system of free education as far as compulsory standards are concerned. The reports of the school inspectors show what has been the result. The relief from the fees, says one of the inspectors, has already increased the attendance of young children at many of the schools, even to the extent of causing difficulty in the matter of accommodation. I could quote a number of inspectors' reports to the same effect. Therefore I say again, it is certain, that the average attendance in schools would be enormously increased throughout England if this Bill is passed. There is a statement in the Report showing what that may mean. I find in the Educational Report of 1890 the statement that with our present population there might be 5,180,000, or 1 in 5 on the registers, and 4,800,000 odd, or 1 in 6 in daily attendance. Returns show only 4,750,000 on the registers, and 3,680,000 in attendance. Therefore that gives a large margin out of which we may increase the attendance in the schools. Now, my Lords, it is dangerous to prophesy, and I do not wish to attempt to be a prophet, but I cannot help thinking that at least 1,000,000 more children will probably be found in average attendance in the schools after this free education measure has come into operation. But there is another very important point which shows that the grants will be largely increased. There is a clause in the Bill which materially affects the important question of the limits hitherto put upon the educational grants by the Code. Everybody knows of the famous 17s. 6d. limit. The 17s. 6d. limit, as your Lordships know, limits the grant to a school unless the local contributions, speaking generally and broadly, amount to more than that sum. These fees will be allowed to count for that; and as these fees will in a great many instances exceed the pence hitherto paid, there will be a very considerable number of schools throughout the country which will be able to claim a further grant beyond the 17s. 6d. For those two reasons—first, the effect of free seats on the number of attendances, and, secondly, the effect of this clause—I feel confident that the additional grant will be very much larger than £2,000,000. Are we then, my Lords, with this sum of something like £5,000,000 from the national exchequer, to maintain the old machinery at the Education Office which was only intended to administer, at the beginning, £30,000 a year? I feel sure that, sooner or later, that must be altered. Hitherto I have spoken merely of the general grants to all schools, but I will come to another point; and I hope the noble Viscount will not object to what I am going to say, though he may consider probably that I am approaching something which is more controversial in its nature. Grants are now made, as your Lordships all know, to Board schools and to voluntary schools. I need not refer to the number of Board schools. In regard to the Board schools there is no doubt a great amount of popular control; but, with regard to the voluntary schools, I think I can show that this enormous grant is made by Parliament without obtaining sufficient popular control throughout the country. The grants to voluntary schools throughout the country are, as your Lordships know, very large indeed. There are 14,743 voluntary schools, and of those I believe there are something like 11,888 Church schools. I doubt whether it is right now, even if it has been right to go on so long, to continue the enormous grant made to these voluntary schools without obtaining adequate popular control. I know that I shall be told that I am attacking the voluntary system, and that I am encouraging those who desire to banish religion from the schools. [The Marquess of SALISBURY: Hear, hear.] The noble Marquess cheers that, but I do not wish to see religion banished from the education of the children in this country, and I do not believe that the extension of the Board schools, if that is the result of this measure, would result in the destruction of religious education throughout the country. When we know the large number of Board schools which there are in the country, and when we find that there are only 49 of those, as I believe, which give only secular instruction, we must admit that the Board schools have certainly not encouraged secular instruction throughout the country. If we come to the question of dogma, I admit, of course, that is different; but I maintain it is undesirable and not at all right that upon the question of education children should be taught dogma in the day schools. It is far more desirable that dogma, when it is taught to the children, should be taught to them at their parents' homes and those admirable institutions the Sunday schools. Then, are these voluntary schools sectarian? We are told by the noble Viscount that there is a Conscience Clause. I shall not go into that. I am not going to argue that the Conscience Clause fails in its mission, or that it is abused largely in the schools, but I cannot help thinking that there are other matters which are of grave consideration in this matter of exclusive schools. Take one matter alone. Take the matter of the masters and pupil teachers. I do not think I shall be contradicted when I say that there is hardly an instance of one Nonconformist who is a master or pupil teacher in Church schools in this country. That, I think, shows that these Church schools are of a very exclusive character, and it is clear, if I am right in what I state, that in every rural parish in this country where there is only one school, the child of a Dissenter is precluded from entering this very fine profession which now exists in the country, namely, the profession of teachers. I can hardly think that was ever intended—that it was ever contemplated or intended to give this enormous grant by the State, which will now be increased to a gigantic degree, as a kind of a concurrent endowment. Surely it is indefensible that a sum amounting to this enormous figure—hundreds of thousands—in fact, over a million, should be granted to denominational schools, and that the administration of those schools should be so exclusive. I argue, therefore, that both in the past, on account of the enormous sum to which this grant has from time to time been raised, and with much greater necessity in the future, it will be indispensable that some popular control should be given with regard to the schools. I quite admit the religious difficulty, but I do not understand that it is so great that it cannot be overcome. I quite admit that the conscientious objection of some denominations to certain school management is one which will have to be met. I cannot think that we can long continue this enormous State grant without a real check on the management of the schools. It has often been said that it would be monstrous to drive away the clergy in rural parishes from the management of the schools. I, for one, fully admit that the clergy of this country and the clergy of the Church of England have done enormous service in the past for education. They came forward and promoted education when education was not considered as essential as it is now; but because they did that I do not think it is necessary to act upon false principles at the present time, and because of what they have done in the past that without some popular control we should concede these large grants.

Earl Spencer

But I for one do not for a moment believe that if these School Boards were established in every parish—and I am not saying that there ought to be School Boards in every parish—the clergy would be ousted from their general influence in educational matters. They are experts in the matter—they know more about it than any of their neighbours; and on account of the advantage which that position gives them, I think it would be impossible, as it would be undesirable, to drive them away from the schools. Therefore, I think, the alarm which is constantly felt about displacing the clergy from their part in the management of the schools of this country is a false alarm. I hope it will disappear, and that the clergy will aid in bringing about this popular control, which I conceive in the future will be absolutely necessary for the proper administration of elementary education. There is one other matter to which I will refer. We keep referring to this large sum of £2,000,000, and, as I say, more being devoted to the promotion of popular education in the country, but I think it would be a very serious thing if we should lose this opportunity of increasing and raising the standard of education throughout the country. There are, I am quite certain, many places in the country where now the education is exceedingly faulty; nay, is extremely bad. Are we, in those cases, to put an actual profit in the managers' hands, and not demand that they should make their education better than it is at present? I feel very strongly on that point, and though it would be absurd for me to attempt to move Amendments in this House, I think this is one matter which may meet with some support in various quarters, and if no one else puts an Amendment down, I shall venture to put upon the Paper an Amendment on this subject when we get into Committee. My Lords, I have now made all the observations which I have thought it necessary to make. I hope the noble Viscount will not think I have made them in any Party spirit or in any bitterness. I, on the whole, most heartily support the general provisions of the measure; but I wish that, in passing this measure, the opportunity had been taken to put the administration of the grant on a better footing, and to secure greater advantages for education.

itself. At the same time, I do not consider that these objections necessitate my opposing the Second Reading of the Bill, and I shall, therefore, very heartily support the noble Viscount in the Motion he has made.

*THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: My Lords, I shall not be expected to follow the noble Earl who has just sat down into those great fields into which he has opened the view. I shall not touch upon the vast financial arrangements, necessary to carry out his ideal of the administration of this great fund. Neither is it necessary for me now to say a word upon the subject of the Conscience Clause. The noble Earl has given us no clue as to what scheme could be adopted by the Government in dispensing with that clause. It is enough for me to know at this moment, that the Church of England has, in the estimation of the whole people, a white record upon that subject. The noble Viscount who introduced the Bill has cleared out of the way of all Churchmen and supporters of voluntary schools, as well as out of the minds of other students of the subject, any imagination that this is a new principle introduced into the management of the education of the country. In candour I must admit that the principle is not novel. The scale of its application is wider, but it is the application of an old principle. Parents have been and are assisted in bearing the expense and burden of the education of their children to the extent, it would be no exaggeration to say, of three-fourths of the whole cost of it. It is therefore a question of degree, and in the first place it is matter of congratulation to all who support the cause of voluntary schools, that the pauperising of the poorer people inflicted upon them in relieving them of the other fourth, requiring them to appear before the Guardians is now to disappear. I thank the noble Viscount for removing so quietly in the course of the last few months, that we have scarcely realised it has gone, a great fear. For strong fear had possessed the minds of the managers of voluntary schools of every kind and description — almost till within a few weeks — that free education would bring with it that which the noble Earl on the opposite side of the House (Earl Spencer) would advocate, namely, a vast measure of popular control. I am persuaded that if that condition had been attached to the proposition of the Bill for free education it would have been impossible that the Bill could have been in its present position before your Lordships. It is a ground which would have been taken in the strongest way against the operation of the Bill. The Government have left the management of schools where it was. It is not that there is any desire in the Church to perpetuate the management of any schools solely by clergy, who have conducted it so far at great personal sacrifices. Very large numbers of the clergy, the great majority of them, would welcome a proposition which has been rejected with scorn by the enemies of the managers and supporters of voluntary schools, namely, that the parents of scholars should be joined with them by some method of election in the management of the schools. Large masses of churchmen would welcome that, but I will add that any proposal to associate parents on the Board of Management has been scornfully rejected, and the fact that the proposal has been so rejected is the best evidence we could have that the voluntary schools are now doing what the parents wish to be done. The proposal has been set aside on the ground that it would make no real change in the management of schools, and that things would go on much as they are now, if parents were associated in the management of the schools. I think we need not look any further for a clear indication that it is well enough known the present teaching meets with the approval of the parents. We have to thank the Government also for introducing provisions into the Bill to avert pecuniary loss to schools. Some schools will undoubtedly lose, and we shall have to consider what is to be done for them. But, upon the whole, the experts assure us that the small schools will gain, and as those small schools have been at all times the most difficult to maintain, it is no small matter that they will be put in a better position. There will be loss for the present undoubtedly in some counties where the subscriptions have not been so large as they have been in others, and it rests with the managers so threatened in loss to save their own schools simply by doing, as I believe they will, that which Churchmen do in other parts of the country. For my own part I am glad that the age at which children are to have their fees paid is extended to the ages between 3 and 15. Keeping them for the year between 14 and 15 I look upon as a step to secondary schools, but keeping them up to the age of 14 is an immense gain to parents and children. We all know in regard to education of a higher kind that the last year or two which boys spend at school are more valuable than all the years before, and that the principal part of their earlier education is brought out in that last year or two. I am sure at the present moment, from inquiries I have made in elementary schools and from conversations with masters and managers, that not only is there a great loss in not using those most intelligent years after the highest standard is passed up to the age of 14, but that not having those years at school causes a great deal of previous education to be entirely wasted. Masters have told me that bright boys who have been at the head of their schools, and were able to pass the higher standard in the most brilliant way, would, after being sent to agricultural labour from 11 or 12 years of age to 14, be unable when they come up for Confirmation at the age of 14, having left at 11 or 12, to "read their verses round." The boys who now leave school at 11 or 12 come back again to their clergy, at the age of 14 in preparation for their Confirmation, and then it is really found that the earlier education which they have received up to the age of 11 or 12, has very nearly disappeared with the large proportion of those boys who spend the whole of their days from early morning until late evening in continuous labour and have no power to do anything afterwards but go to sleep. So that I think the increase in the age from 12 to 14 will be a very great boon indeed to education. The alteration which the Government have made in the Bill by permitting expressly the practice of grouping the schools together will prove a great relief. In some parts of the country—I may mention that there are such places in my own diocese—there had been already started before the beginning of this year a scheme for enabling such schools as were within reasonable distances of each other to co-operate, so that the subscriptions of one parish might be applicable in another. We were feeling our way to some system of that kind to remedy the mischiefs we perceived. I need scarcely say, then, that the introduction of a scheme of grouping throughout the whole of the country will meet with the most cordial welcome, for this arrangement will have the effect of keeping the smaller and poorer schools upon their feet. I venture to differ from the noble Earl in thinking that one excellent point in the Bill is that no precise objects have been mentioned for using a surplus. That there will be any profit to any of the schools I do not believe. Whatever is gained in that way will very shortly be absorbed in carrying out the provisions of the new Code of last year. Those provisions will make such great demands upon the resources of many schools that they cannot easily meet them. As your Lordships know, many managers of schools are in great anxiety on that particular subject, as to how they are to meet the great expense which the new Code would necessarily thrust upon them. There will be very little left after the provisions of the new Code are complied with, and next, after that, the plan of grouping so that the schools which receive more may help those which have not enough will quite do away with any margin of profit. I must myself express the great regret I felt that the Bill did not contain any provisions to meet a most monstrous injustice, namely, the present system of rating school buildings. People have felt great indignation that when they have been doing their utmost to maintain a school in efficiency, it was itself rated for the purpose of maintaining schools on the principles of teaching which they did not approve: but the noble Viscount has given us so important a promise that it is not necessary for me now to go further into that matter. We shall look with greatest interest and anxiety for the provisions by which this promise will be carried out. There is still another point of great importance which is not clearly dealt with by the Bill. It is of itself. At the same time, I do not consider that these objections necessitate my opposing the Second Reading of the Bill, and I shall, therefore, very heartily support the noble Viscount in the Motion he has made.

There will be loss for the present undoubtedly in some counties where the subscriptions have not been so large as they have been in others, and it rests witness in recent years, this Bill is one of the most remarkable. It is all very well for the noble Viscount opposite, in the able speech which he made to-night, to minimise the change which this Bill effects. It is perfectly true, as has been said by him, and as has been said by the most reverend Prelate, who has just sat down, that it may be called at least a change in degree rather than principle. They say it has long been the policy of the State to assist parents in the education of their children, and that it is a very small and unimportant change to make education wholly eleemosynary. I venture to disagree with the noble Viscount and with the most reverend Prelate. Let us not be deceived in this matter. This Bill does make a great change in the educational system of England. It is well to observe how this change has come about. The noble Viscount gave an explanation of it which is the true one. It may be said, perhaps, that it is an accidental change; that it arose out of a financial question and nothing else. It is a very old part of our financial system—perhaps I ought not to say a very old one, but it is by no means a new policy to assess local rates from the Imperial Treasury; that has been done for many years; but it is a new thing, and wholly a new thing, to assign particular Imperial taxes to local bodies for local purposes. I am not quite sure who was the parent of this new invention. I believe that my right hon. Friend Mr. Gladstone—I think I am correct in saying this—first spoke of it, and that to a limited extent it was he who first adopted it; but it has been carried to a much further extent by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and I think it very possible that on the principle and policy of what has been called devolution, the business of Parliament being congested, it is not impossible that that policy may be conducted further. Now, my Lords, observe the indirect effects of this new change in policy. The Probate Duty fell to be dealt with a year and a half ago. It is to be given over in certain proportions to England, Scotland, and Ireland. The general purpose of these devolutions has been to relieve the ratepayer, and I believe that the English Members were agreed that Probate Duty in England should be devoted to that purpose, as I think very sensibly. The Scotch Members took a different view of it. Without any consultation, as far as I know, with their constituents, certainly with no public discussion in Scotland, without as far as I know, one single public meeting having been held in Scotland upon this question, without the Scotch public knowing one single thing about it, they agreed with certain Members of the Government, probably with my noble Friend opposite, the Secretary for Scotland, that the Probate Duty in Scotland should not be devoted to the relief of the ratepayers, but should, for the first time, be devoted to free, or, as I call it, eleemosynary education. The Government gave way on that point. It was pressed upon them not by their own Party alone, but by, I believe, the general concurrence of the Scotch Members. We must remember the position in which Members of Parliament are placed and were placed in this case. I have always been pleased when great sums of money are put into their hands to be devoted as they pleased for the interests of their constituents. We all know the old Benthamite doctrine of the greatest happiness of the greatest number. We know how that slides and glides down till it comes to be at last the granting of the biggest bone to the biggest number of electors. That is the great danger in the path along which we are going. I do not say the Scotch Members were wrong in this case, but we none of us heard any discussion of it, and the public heard of its being done without any public discussion whatever. So far as I have been able to judge, I should say not Conservatives only, but men of the most Radical opinions in Scotland were adverse to this change. I know such persons, friends of my own, of most advanced Liberal opinions, who disapproved of this change and who regret it still, but who held their peace because it was a foregone conclusion. This is not a satisfactory way of deciding great public questions involving great public issues. I do not think it is a matter of perfect indifference. I do not think it is a matter of very small importance that parents should be divorced altogether from all pecuniary responsibility for the education of their children. I think we ought first importance from our point of view, that the vast increase of voluntary schools effected by such great sacrifices in the past should not be checked, and I hope that before the House goes into Committee on the Bill it may be carefully examined whether as regards the expansion of their school system, especially in the matter of buildings, the voluntary schools will be allowed to carry on their work in the same free and unchecked manner in the future, wherever people are found willing to defray the necessary expenses, as has been the case in the past. Such expansion is vital. For many reasons I not only welcome the Bill as a whole, but I think the various provisions in it are extremely well considered. There is, in fact, only one matter which I desire to have cleared up, and that is as to the effect which it will have upon the voluntary schools in this matter of expansion. Like the noble Earl opposite (Earl Spencer) I do not desire either to be a prophet, but I have listened to a great many prophecies, and I find opinions and prophecies very evenly balanced. Statements of fact as to such questions even as the attendance in schools in America are not always consistent. Many who have gone into the subject here, maintain that the attendance will be much more regular on account of the education costing the parents nothing. On the other side it is argued that there will be increased indifference on the part of parents on the ground that they will not value that which costs them nothing. You must set one against the other. On one side we hear that the saved fee will only go to swell the Chancellor of the Exchequer's drink account, on the other hand we hear that it will be regarded as a relief from an immense burden. Some have prophesied that the effect of the measure will be anti-religious and anti-Christian, and others with equal force have maintained that it is a clerical measure from first to last. An able young manager of a school was showing me the other day that for his school it would be an El Dorado until the system of grouping was put forward. On the other side we have seen arguments in the public journals, to show that it will lead to an immediate deterioration even in the education given in the schools.

The Duke of Argyll

When judgments take so large a range, and are so exceedingly opposed to one another, one generally finds that the truth lies somewhere between them. For my own part, I do not believe that any remarkable difference will be caused by this measure either in the attendance or the quality of instruction in these schools, but the balance, it appears to me, will be on the good side. When one is considering that subject, one ought in candour to remember that the Bill was not intended for either of those purposes. It was not a Bill intended to make attendance more regular, nor was it intended to enrich schools or to make them poorer. It was not a Bill intended to introduce any change in the actual education. Very decided improvements in that were made last year, and great demands also on the strength of the schools. It is for none of those objects that this Bill comes before your Lordships; but to make education free. I believe that in that object it will succeed without being attended by any of those evils which have been anticipated. The difficulties in front of it were great, but I believe they have been met. I believe it will be felt as a boon by those classes in the country in whom we are most deeply interested, and who are themselves most deeply interested in this question. Of all things which are incredible, I think this is the most incredible—that in any school a religious system of teaching worth anything will be affected by giving it and the rest of their education free to the children in those schools. Nor do I believe that any religious system which has a hold on the hearts of the people can ever be disturbed by making education free. As regards the schools in the North and throughout the whole country, I believe it will be found that the stability of the Church schools must depend upon the stability of the Churchmen themselves. When the noble Viscount bids us as Churchmen, Wesleyans as Wesleyans, Roman Catholics as Roman Catholics, and all religious teachers, not to be despondent, my answer to the noble Viscount is that I do not despond at all.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: My Lords, it seems to me that among the many sudden changes, like transformation scenes, which it has been our lot to witness in recent years, this Bill is one of the most remarkable. It is all very well for the noble Viscount opposite, in the able speech which he made to-night, to minimise the change which this Bill effects. This is not a satisfactory way of deciding great public questions involving great public issues. I do not think it is a matter of perfect indifference. I do not think it is a matter of very small importance that parents should be divorced altogether from all pecuniary responsibility for the education of their children. I think we ought to have the courage of our opinion upon this point, if we have that opinion, and to avow what we think upon it. I believe it to be a good thing to maintain the responsibility, within limits, of parents for the education of their children. I think it an evil thing to divorce them altogether from that responsibility, and I for one repudiate altogether the only argument which I have heard used in support of this measure, that when you make education compulsory it is a corollary of that measure that you should make it gratuitous—that Parliament having imposed this duty upon parents must pay them to do it. Look to our system of sanitation. What is sanitation? For the sake of the public interest we compel men to do things which may have to be done at great cost to them, but because we make it compulsory upon a man to do this or that, we do not say that the State is to pay. There is no logic in that argument at all. And so with regard to food; if a parent does not feed his child he is guilty of murder. Feeding his child is compulsory upon him, but are we to undertake the duty of providing him with food? All these arguments from compulsion therefore fall to the ground. They are arguments intended to justify and excuse a foregone conclusion. I do not say there are not arguments in favour of free education. It has been advocated by eminent men, and we know it is the policy of some neighbouring countries. I am not quite sure that in all those countries it has been accompanied with good results. At all events that Scotch adoption of the idea of free education is the origin of this Bill. There is no doubt whatever of that. It was said that free education having been adopted for Scotland, it must be adopted for England too. We have not repealed the Union; we have not restored the Heptarchy. Principles which are adopted across the Tweed, and possibly across the Irish Channel, will cross those artificial boundaries; and I think the Government were right in assuming that that having been done which was done in Scotland it was necessary to solve the problem, for it is a problem, in England. Now, my Lords, I come to the Bill. The noble Marquess at the head of the Government has very frankly explained what his view and the view of the Government was in taking up this question—"The thing must be done, let us do it, because we can make the best of it upon what we think the right system of adoption." They thought it was better it should be done by them than by others not so friendly to the voluntary system. I think the Government were perfectly right in that view; and in that view alone I hail this measure as a most valuable one in the interest of the country. The great object of the Government, I apprehend, and it has been avowed by the noble Marquess, was to save the voluntary system. The noble Marquess shakes his head—

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): That is not the main object of the Bill. The main object of the Bill is to relieve parents.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: Perhaps the noble Marquess will allow me to distinguish between one object and another. One object was to prevent the application of this money by hands less friendly to those schools. I entirely agree with the Government in that view. I think that the preservation of the voluntary system of schools is most important in two respects. First, I think it saves the country great cost, and I, for one, am not indifferent to the accretions of outlay which are taking place as regards the general revenues of the country. I think that increase of outlay, that increase in our expenditure—sometimes out of all proportion to the certain income of the State—is assuming large dimensions. Everything is costing more. The Army and Navy every year cost more and more; the Civil Estimates are increasing in all respects, and I do not think it unimportant that so large a part of the education of this country should be borne by voluntary bodies. But, my Lords, there is another point on which I think the Government were right in introducing this Bill with the view of saving the voluntary bodies, and that is what was alluded to by the noble Viscount opposite in the first part of his speech in introducing the Bill, namely, the religious education of the people. Now, I am one of those who believe that the religious education of the people cannot be otherwise safeguarded than by being committed to voluntary bodies and voluntary work. The noble Viscount spoke of cases in which the School Boards have acquired an unfriendly spirit towards religious teaching; but I have known a good many other cases in which they have not so acted; and what the Government have to consider is what is the gradual tendency of the system of these rate-aided schools. It may seem odd that a Scotchman should say he has no confidence in Board schools. You may say that all our schools are Board schools. Yes, my Lords, so they are in a sense, but in a sense only. The Scotch case is a very peculiar one. We have had in Scotland national education for 300 years—a system founded upon assessment, with compulsory building of schools, and compulsory payment of salaries to schoolmasters, and all the other paraphernalia of an educational system. But we have had, too, in combination with it, the Church system. The managers, although the schools were supported by assessment, were the minister, the Parochial Council of the minister, and the inheritors of the parish. They were bodies in whose hands the interests of religion and religious education were thoroughly safe. That system could not be surpassed for efficiency, for liberality, in any part of the world. It is the universal system in Scotland to practise education under what is called the Conscience Clause. There are parts of Scotland where the Reformation never reached; there are parts of the Highlands where to this day three-fourths of the population are Roman Catholics. The whole of the children in those parishes were admitted to the schools without the religious education being insisted upon; and I have seen evidence from the Roman Catholic priests themselves that in the Highlands, the Hebrides, and in other parts of Scotland this system existed, and they never had to complain of the system or of undue interference. That was not done on account of the law. On the contrary, the old Statutes made much against it. My Lords, I deeply regret the change of circumstances which arose lately among the Presbyterian bodies when the Parochial Councils were turned into elected Boards. It was the effect of use and wont; it was the effect of long-established use in a country whose institutions were worked in a public spirit, and you can well understand, therefore, that though in Scotland all our schools are Board schools, they are worked on principles of use and wont—that is to say, that the Church Catechism is taught at certain hours; but all children are invited to attend without being so taught if it is desired. Under the parochial system—of which every Scotchman may be justly proud, for it was devised by the Scotch reformers and has made Scotland what she is, and Scotchmen what they are all over the globe—not only was there a Conscience Clause, but there was ample provision for the free education of those too poor to pay, not by men having to appear before a Board and showing themselves to be paupers, but it was done by the managing Board. It was the practice in Scotland that the children of the poorest in the land should be taught in those schools free if it was necessary they should be taught free. Now I think, my Lords, that a great distinction is to be made between England and Scotland in this respect. In England you are starting with a new system—comparatively new—not older than some 30 or 40 years. Board schools are a new institution; you have no old traditions or institutions upon which you have to work; you have to trust to the electing ratepayers of the day for the system upon which you have to work. There is a movement in certain places—I will not give names lest my information be not accurate; but there are places I believe where the Board schools have eliminated religious instruction altogether, where the reading of the Bible is struck out altogether, and all reference to religion is avoided. That system once begun, by the force of logic, is only too likely to spread. Now I say emphatically that the spread of Board schools must tend in that direction. Though I do not dispute for one instant that there are old traditions and old habits which impede progress, I confess that, looking at what has occurred in Europe, and America also, I cannot doubt that the system of rate-paid schools and rate-paid management tends, and must tend, and must end, ultimately, in the total elimination of religious instruction in the schools. I hardly know whether in this country we are fully aware what this so-called spirit of Liberalism really is all over the Continent of Europe, and certainly over a great part of America. Liberalism means, over a large part of Europe, hatred and defiance of all religious obligations. I was never so much struck with that as by a circumstance which happened to come under my own notice not long since at Cannes, in the South of France. Cannes was at that time visited by that celebrated man of whom your Lordships have heard, one of the greatest orators in my opinion—Père Hyacinth. He was delivering lectures there on Church and State. He took the theatre, and called a meeting there. The place was filled; it was not filled with the mob of Cannes—the lower classes; it was filled with gentlemen apparently. The bench before me was occupied by grey-haired men decorated with the Legion of Honour. Père Hyacinth had not spoken for two or three minutes when he had occasion to mention the Divine name. Incidentally, not controversially, he used the word “God,” and at once there was a universal and tumultuous cry over the whole of that meeting—a cry of anger and indignation. “Pas de religion!” was the cry. I shall never forget the way in which Père Hyacinth met it. As I have said, he did not introduce the name of God controversially at all; no man could have feared that his religion or non-religion would be insulted; he mentioned it incidentally only in connection with the worship of the Temple. It was a mere incidental allusion; but the very reverence with which the word was pronounced touched the feelings of what is called French Liberalism, and they tried to shout him down. Advancing to the front of the platform with folded arms he said—

“You call yourselves Freethinkers: I, too, am a Freethinker, and because I am a Freethinker I am a Christian also; and will you not bear the utterance of that word although you may be Freethinkers?”

By the force of his eloquence, and by the majesty—for no other word will suit it—of his presence he cowed that multitude, and was allowed to continue his oration to the end without further interruption. But, my Lords, the incident impressed me, in a way which I had never before experienced, with what Liberalism meant upon the Continent. I confess I cannot understand it. I can understand men having new difficulties about religion and about beliefs, but I cannot understand this want of toleration towards the bare idea that there is a Supreme Ruler over the world. I can understand men being Republicans or Democrats, or whatever they like upon those questions, but I cannot understand their believing that they are in this world not under the government of some Supreme Being; that we are not of a Kingdom which is an everlasting Kingdom, and which will endure for ever. For so it is. Now, is this spirit developing in England? I do not know, but I suspect it is; and I must say that although I should be the last to accuse my noble Friends behind me, because they are Liberals, of sharing in what I have called the Liberalism of the Continent—if I do not think it has yet invaded England to that extent, I am bound to say that the doctrines which I have heard laid down to-night by my noble Friend (Earl Spencer) tend a very long way to the exclusion of religion altogether. My noble Friend said he would abolish dogma altogether. What does my noble Friend mean by dogma? I should like to put him through a catechism upon that. Is the existence of God a dogma? Is the coming of the Lord a dogma? Is the corruption of mankind a dogma? Is whatever is taught in the name of Christianity anything else but a dogma? I hope my noble Friend will forgive me when I say that what he said to-night seemed to me to be simple nonsense. Talking of religion apart from dogma is pure nonsense. Religion is dogma, and I must say I honour highly the conduct of the Roman Catholic Church throughout the world, which has declared everywhere, even in our own colonies, under circumstances of great difficulty, that she refuses to submit to secular education. There is no man who disagrees more than I do with the system of the Roman Catholic Church and her doctrines, but I would infinitely rather have the people educated under them than I would have them educated under the system which has been advocated by the noble Earl, and the result of which I saw exemplified at Cannes—ininitely rather. I am not sure that I should have spoken at all to-night if it had not been for the practical application which my noble Friend made of his strange doctrine as to the no-religion he would have taught to the young. He backed that up by saying that there ought to be popular control; that these voluntary schools ought to be under popular control. What was his excuse for that? He said the central Department in London cannot go on in this way, continuing to be responsible for the distribution of such enormous sums of money—and my noble Friends opposite will appreciate the importance of this Bill, which, to some extent, they minimise, when they see the argument which is raised by my noble Friend behind me (Earl Spencer) that this enormous sum given into the hands of voluntary bodies must be under popular control. What does my noble Friend mean by popular control? Does he mean the ratepayers? Has he great confidence in the distribution of public money by the ratepayers? Does he think it will be better than the distribution made by the two bodies who are interested in their several religious teachings, interested in their own congregations, and under the check of their own able officers, whose ability no one knows better than my noble Friend? I, for one, do not believe that control by the ratepayers would be better either as regards economy or efficiency. I do not think it would be specially economical, or that it would result in special efficiency. But what right have local bodies to the distribution of this fund? It does not come from them. Suppose the Wesleyan Body starts and builds at great expense a new chapel, and goes to heavy expense in building schools and engaging a staff of teachers. They teach their own dogmas. Why should they not? Why should the ratepayers of that district, who contribute nothing to that school, demand to have control over it? I cannot see why. Of course, there must be popular control in another sense; there must be popular control in the Government of the country, who represent the whole people of the country, and that control will be preserved in this Bill. That is the very control which my noble Friend wishes to throw over to the local bodies.

As ratepayers they contribute nothing; as taxpayers they contribute something towards the fee grant. Then let them act through Parliament, but do not let them claim a control over expenditure to which they have given no contribution. Now, my Lords, I have spoken of the inevitable tendency of all public rate-aided bodies to become secular. I know something of the work of the religious bodies in this country. Let me refer to a case which has happened in Australia, in the Colony of Victoria. I am informed that there is one of the Members of the Episcopal Bench, who I am sorry to see is not here to-night, the Bishop of Manchester, who is intimately acquainted with all the facts of the case; but, as they have been represented to me, they are most remarkable. It is now 20 years since public education was undertaken in the Colony of Victoria. It began with what my noble Friend chooses to call concurrent endowment—that is to say, public money was given to various denominational schools. That was the original intention of the Victorian Parliament. But how long did it last? It lasted but a very short time. Very soon the doctrine was laid down that the State had no religion, and the inference was drawn that the State should, therefore, teach no religion, and then the further inference, which is not logical, was drawn that the State should not tolerate the teaching of religion at all. And so it has now come about, as I am informed, that, in Victoria, not only is the Bible excluded, but even all literary extracts are excluded from the course of instruction in the schools which contain the name of God or have any reference to the Christian religion. That, my Lords, is the state of things in Victoria. I am sorry to say that both the Presbyterian and Episcopalian Churches have submitted to that system. They all regret it now. The Roman Catholic Church alone have the high honour and satisfaction of standing out and saying that they would not pull down in their schools the everlasting standard of the Cross. It is not improbable that the resistance of the Roman Catholic people may be the germ of a strong reaction against the pure secularism—I venture to call it pure paganism—of the education of that country. There is already, I am told, a reaction against it there as there is in America. The Churches are beginning to awake to the duties and necessities of their position. They are insisting upon having schools of their own, and the time will come—and the noble Viscount has already hinted he thinks it may come soon in England—when the State will say it is not just to refuse them the public assistance which their schools deserve merely on account of the fact that they teach religion. And here, my Lords, I must say I cannot understand the position, not of the continental Liberalism, but of the modern Liberalism of England as it has been represented by my noble Friend to-night in demanding local control over these schools. I quite understand the doctrine—indeed to a large extent I should be willing to adopt it myself—that, the State being divided into so many religious sects, it is important for the State to teach religion. But what is the inevitable inference? The State may say, “We are very sorry; we cannot undertake religious education; but we are delighted that others should do so; let us pay for the secular education, and let others give the religious education.” To say, as my noble Friend hinted, that that amounts to concurrent endowment, is, in my opinion, the grossest of all fallacies. If you refuse to pay for that which you say the State wants—good secular education—then pay whoever gives it; if you refuse to pay those who give it simply because they are connected with religion, you are boycotting and persecuting religion, and it is not liberality at all, but gross injustice. It is not liberal to be unjust towards the Churches. After all, they are teaching what no other bodies can supply. I wonder what kind of religion my noble Friend who objects to dogma would like to see taught in the schools? Something, I suppose, about the Infinite and the Absolute, and words to that effect, which belong to the secular philosophy of the day. I do not think he would find them of much use in the moral up-bringing of the young. Now, before I sit down I want to say a few words about the prospects of this Bill. I was delighted to hear the most rev. Prelate who presides over the Church of England showing the manly and cheerful spirit in which that Church is prepared to act. I think the Church of England has only to arouse herself to use her enormous strength in order to do what is required. I do not wish to address the clergy or the Right Rev. Bench opposite, because, from all I have heard and seen, the clergy of the Church of England have long awakened to their duty in this matter. They have borne the burden and heat of the day in maintaining these religious bodies and in keeping up these schools. I doubt whether they have been sufficiently supported by the laity. I doubt it very much, for from some cases which have come before me this week I find that though it has happened, perhaps, in some places that one or two rich proprietors will give £5 or £10 a year, the mass of Churchmen give nothing for their schools. This ought not to be. Do not let us be deceived by optimistic views of this Bill. If it is worked in a cordial, generous, and kindly spirit, it will do well; but if our sails are left flapping in the wind it will do ill; the Board schools will make upon them, and secularism will be gradually introduced. I trust to see a great organisation on the part of the Church of England—some great central fund established, like that which exists in Scotland, for the support of all Free Church schools throughout the country. I am not a member of that Church myself, but still I honour it for what it is doing. I honour it for its historic position, for what it has done in the past, for what it is doing, and for what it is capable of doing. If it puts its shoulder to the wheel with the enormous wealth it possesses, with the energy with which it is now endowed, and with zeal for the great cause it has in hand, it will be able to do still more to promote, in its due proportion, the religious education of this great country.

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, but for the observations of the noble Duke who has just sat down, I should certainly not have troubled your Lordships with any remarks upon the present Bill; but those observations seem to me to be characterised by so much injustice to many of those who come within the scope of them that I feel it incumbent upon me, feeling that injustice—and feeling it very deeply—to offer my protest, at least, against it. The language of the noble Duke obviously pointed to this conclusion: that those who have advocated some popular control as regards the schools of this country in connection with such a measure as this are actuated by indifference, to say the least of it, to religion and religious teaching; that their opposition to it is dictated by those motives, and that it is because this measure would be likely to be a bulwark of religious teaching that they are antagonistic to it. I believe nothing can be more absolutely unjust. I believe that there are multitudes of those who, rightly or wrongly, contend for the introduction of some popular control in relation to the schools of this country, who are as earnest in their religion and as anxious to see the religious education of this country put and kept upon a proper and satisfactory basis as the noble Duke himself can be; but if the noble Duke means that the only teaching which can be of any advantage is the teaching of the Church of England in Church of England schools or Roman Catholic teaching in Roman Catholic schools, from that I entirely differ. The noble Duke has bantered the noble Earl behind me (Earl Spencer) with reference to his expression as to the teaching of dogma, and he has said perfectly accurately that every truth you teach, or what you believe to be the truth, is of itself a dogma. But the expression has often been used in a much narrower sense than teaching those general principles about which all Christians would be agreed; it has been used to describe the particular teaching of a particular Church, which distinguishes it from other Churches. It was in that sense that the noble Earl behind me obviously used the language he did; and because he said that the teaching in schools would not be a teaching of dogma, to suggest that on that account he intended to indicate that he would wish the teaching that there is a God to be abolished from the schools is obviously a misapprehension of what my noble Friend said, whether the particular expression he used was, or was not, open to criticism. I cannot help thinking that a great deal of the desire which has been expressed for some further control over the voluntary schools has arisen from the very language used by many of those who advocate the continuance of the voluntary system. When they talk about the Board schools as being "irreligious schools," when they talk about "hating the Board schools and all their works,"—and these are the general advocates and champions of the voluntary system—when we see the character of the teaching that is conveyed to the children in some of these schools—teaching certainly calculated to excite, not unnaturally, feelings the reverse of grateful in the minds of those whose religion is attacked, I think it is not very unnatural that there are many who think that teaching of that sort in schools which are the only schools to which their children can be sent, and which schools are supported wholly at the public expense, should indicate that there should be some means of local or popular control beyond what exists at present. That, I think, is the foundation of the demand for further control. The noble Duke himself is, no doubt, perfectly satisfied. I am not quite satisfied. If the noble Duke was a Nonconformist—I believe he is in this country—but if the noble Duke was a Nonconformist in the sense which he will perfectly understand, and if he found that the only school to which he could send his children was a school in which the other children were taught that if his children did not attend at the hours of religious teaching they and their parents were as bad as, or worse than, if they were without any religion at all; and if that school was supported almost entirely at the public expense, I do not think he would be satisfied with it. It is all very well to be satisfied when the religious teaching is one in which you are entirely in sympathy; but we have to consider whether it is an unnatural feeling, and whether it is a feeling which should not be consulted when objection is taken to the expense of schools which are the only possible schools, supported by the State, where the only religious teaching given is of that character. I do not say that is always or even generally the case in Church schools, but I do say that there have been instances of that kind, and a few such instances are quite enough to account for a great deal of the feeling of hostility and indignation and quite enough to account for anything being said about the necessity for popular control or for anything of the kind. I believe that in the vast number of the Board schools there is religious teaching which is of a very efficient character. The noble Duke seemed to assume that religion is saved, and that secularism will be barred of any progress, if only you have religious education in the schools, such religious education as he is speaking of as conveyed to the children in Church schools. Is it so? I suppose what may be called the upper classes, the vast majority of them, have been at schools in which there has been this kind of teaching. Is it the case that in all our public schools there is so very great an absence of scepticism, and that those attending them are brought up in absolute faith even in the elements of Christianity? Surely that consideration may at least give rise to doubt whether religion can depend upon such teaching as is given in these schools, or that if that teaching were removed it would be the destruction of religion in this country. I believe unless your religion in this country rests upon some safer foundation than that, it rests upon a very insecure foundation altogether. I am not saying it would not be a good thing; but it seems to me a great exaggeration to represent that the only security against the spread of secularism in this country is the necessarily very limited amount of religious teaching which is conveyed in the day schools of the Church of England or of any other sect in this country.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: I beg the noble and learned Lord's pardon; I did not say the only security.

LORD HERSCHELL: Nor any very considerable security. I believe the religious teaching of the children by their parents at home is infinitely more likely to influence them in future life and to instil into them religious principles than all the teaching from the Catechism which they get in the day schools they attend. And, further than that, I believe that the religious teaching they get at home and at Sunday schools, where religious teaching is provided to an extent which is impossible in the day schools, is of infinitely greater importance to their future life and to the prospect of the maintenance of religious education in this country than is the religious teaching in the day schools. I do not say for a moment that I deprecate such teaching in the day schools day by day, but I do say it seems to me a greater security against the spread of secularism than the children should have that other religious teaching. My desire is to protest against the contemptuous language with regard to all teaching in day schools which is not religious teaching, which is not the teaching of the Church of England, but the ordinary teaching of the Board schools. I have myself heard over and over again the term "godless" applied to those schools which are so conducted; I have heard them referred to as having absolutely no religious teaching at all. I believe that is entirely unjust, and that in a great proportion of them there is religious teaching day by day which is just as likely to keep the Christian faith alive in the children, and as likely to influence their future lives as the "Church teaching," as it is called, in the Church schools. It was really to make that protest alone that I rose, because it did seem to me that the noble Duke's language was calculated to cast aspersions most unjust and most unfair upon many who I am sure are equally as earnest in seeing the teaching of the Christian faith maintained as the noble Duke himself.

*THE BISHOP OF LONDON: My Lords, I should be sorry to seem as if I joined in any general denunciation of Board schools, or of the work done in them, and I should feel that I was laying myself open to the same kind of reproof which the noble and learned Lord who has just sat down seems to me to deserve for speaking as he has done of the schools of the Church of England. I will not deny that there are a few schools belonging to the Church of England here and there where it is possible, though I do not know of such a case myself, that very controversial doctrines are taught, and where language is used about those who belong to other denominations which certainly ought not to be used; but I know this: that whenever such language has been used, and where books have been used which appear to have shown that kind of intolerant spirit, the supreme authorities of the Church have never hesitated to declare that it ought to be condemned, and they have condemned it. It was some two years ago I think that we heard a great deal about a Catechism which has since been much attacked, and it was represented that that Catechism was used in a very intolerant manner, but the moment it was made known the Archbishop of Canterbury wrote to express his strong disapprobation of the use of such books, and I do not believe such a book is now used anywhere. It is impossible for any man to answer for the whole mass of the Church of England schools, which are more than 14,000 in number; but I may say that I did take great pains in the Education Committee to see whether I could find any clear instance of the disregard of the Conscience Clause or of its principles. We found instances of cases in which complaints were made that the parents were apathetic about the matter, and did not oppose the Church as they ought to have done. There was a great deal of the sort of spirit which is expressed by the "friend of humanity" in Canning's Knife Grinder. There was a great deal of the feeling, identical with the language employed there, "that the man whom no sense of wrong can rouse to vengeance is a very contemptible sort of man;" but we did not find that there was any charge of intolerance which could possibly be sustained against the Church of England in the working of her system. It is perfectly true that it is an evil and a mischief to introduce into the minds of young children, when you are educating them, any spirit of condemnation of their fellow-creatures, and still more of their fellow scholars; but, as far as I can judge, the amount of any such teaching in the Church of England schools is so exceedingly small that to reckon it as of any account in a discussion like this is altogether beside the mark. I do not mean to complain of the noble Lord opposite for protesting that those who are advocating local popular control over voluntary schools are not animated by any undue religious spirit. I have no doubt they are not, and I did not understand the noble Duke to imply that they were. What he meant, as I understood, was that he would warn those who felt in that way that this was the end of the line they were taking, and that, though they knew it not, they were in serious danger of ending at last in bringing the country to the neglect of religious education. It is a very different thing to say, on the one hand, that your course will end in this result, and, on the other, to say that you meant this result and desired it. The noble Duke, I am sure, never for a moment meant to impute that the noble Earl (Earl Spencer) had that desire, or to impute anything of the kind to those noble Lords who have spoken on the subject. I feel, nevertheless, that the maintenance of voluntary schools is a matter of the very greatest importance for religious education, and I say that, because I am convinced that the religious education of this country is, to a very large extent, maintained, even in the Board schools, by the existence of the voluntary schools. The thing which keeps up religious education in this country is public opinion. It is the general public opinion that education ought to be religious; and, in all cases, that which maintains public opinion is the existence of those men who feel strongly and deeply on the question concerned, and who are ready to make sacrifices for it. Sweep away the voluntary schools, and you sweep away all the testimony to the necessity of religious education, which supporters of these voluntary schools are now giving to the whole of the country by their action and by their self-sacrifice. If you sweep away the voluntary schools, you will no longer have any schools which on their very forefront bear the declaration that they exist for the purpose of giving religious education. The Board schools do excellent work of their own kind in secular teaching, and, as far as they go in religious teaching, they also do very good work; but in all those schools the religious education is necessarily a secondary thing. Her Majesty's Inspectors never look to it. It is left entirely to be given or not to be given, according to the judgment of those who are elected by the ratepayers. There is no distinct declaration there that religious education is the one thing that is to stand above everything else in the schools. With regard to the voluntary schools, we have always this to say: that if it were not for the purpose of giving a religious education they would absolutely cease to exist. How long would the subscribers go on maintaining them if once their religious character were to be sacrificed? The subscribers would say, and say justly, "If we can get the same thing done in the Board schools that is done in the voluntary schools, if religion is cut down in them to that level, then, of course, all reason for the voluntary schools is gone." If we have not the schools maintained upon a religious principle, they cannot be maintained at all. I know very well that it is constantly argued that these voluntary schools might possibly be so managed as that, instead of making so great a point of religious education, their instruction might be so modified, or ruled, or curtailed that everybody alike could be very well content to have the religious education which they gave. But there are two objections to it. You cannot get the great majority of religious teachers to teach under such conditions do what you will. They want to teach religion as they feel it on their own hearts, and if you say to them, "You shall not teach this doctrine because it is objected to, or that dogma because it is controverted," you will not get the religious teachers to come to you, and then your voluntary subscribers would at once say, "You have no reason to be here at all." I cannot conceal from myself that if the voluntary schools were to be very largely diminished in number, or very seriously hampered in doing the work they have to do, there will be a certain gain to the secularist movement in the schools, and that that gain will be a serious evil to this country. I can hardly imagine any man not feeling that in his heart, even though he may say, "I do not believe that result will follow." We have gone, my Lords, in this matter, perhaps rather far from the Bill. The noble Lord opposite suddenly took us to the distant future when everything is to be completely reorganised from top to bottom, and when, of course, these questions will have to be fought in a different manner from that in which they are fought now; and we should then have to be prepared for considering whether it was a very wise thing to give an enormous amount of Imperial money to popularly elected local bodies; because the experience of their history hitherto has shown that there is no extravagance like the extravagance of Local Boards when they have got possession of State money. As long as they are dealing with their own money they are tolerably restrained by the recollection that the ratepayers will think about it, and will have something to say about the matter, and may possibly call them to account for their extravagance; but when they have to deal with central money they always look upon it as a matter of pride if they can get more from their locality than other bodies can get from theirs. There is always competition who can get most, and if there is anything that will encourage extravagance more than this I should like to know what it is. These considerations do not belong to the present; they belong to the future we are promised will come about some few years hence, and I suppose we must be ready to fight that battle when the necessity comes. But the question is whether or not this Bill will do harm to the education of this country at this time, when it is relieving the parents from a large part of the duty and burden of educating their children? I confess I myself have looked with considerable apprehension at the proposal to relieve the parents of that burden to this extent. But I have always considered it is a question of degree. I feel that what the noble Viscount said is true; if you compel a man to send his child to school, you already compel him to bear a considerable burden, because the child, if left alone, would be contributing to a considerable extent to his own maintenance; to a certain extent he would be feeding himself; and if you compel the parent to send his child to school, you deprive that parent of money which the child would earn towards his own maintenance. It is not, therefore, as if you left the parent with nothing at all imposed upon him of his duty of looking to the interests of his own child. That is a very real sacrifice, and, therefore, I have never felt that this was a matter of principle at all; and the Government have taken it up in such a manner as to show that they really desire to make no breach in the present system. I am very grateful on the part of the Church of England for what has been done, in so far as it has been done, not only as far as the Church of England schools are concerned, but in regard to denominational schools generally. I still think some improvements may be made in it. I think there will be very sharp competition to be faced by the managers of voluntary schools in Lancashire and Yorkshire, and perhaps in counties further to the South, and I think we ought to do all we can to prevent that competition becoming very mischievous. The noble Viscount told us that the result will be that the ratepayers will be very unwilling to saddle themselves with such rates. Upon that I must point out that I think it would have been better if Clause 6 had not been put in the bald form in which it stands now, because according to that clause, any School Board now existing may saddle the ratepayers with a heavy burden of rates, and without the consent of the ratepayers themselves make that burden permanent. A School Board is elected under totally different conditions, and is it to be allowed to say there shall be this heavy weight put upon the ratepayers of a district, and that the ratepayers in that district shall not be able to remove the Board? for that is the exact construction of the clause. I wish that the matter should be looked to in that respect. There are other minor matters which I will not go into now, but which I will submit to your Lordships in Committee, and I cannot help hoping the Government will consider them with some regard for the difficulties in which many of our schools are placed. I cannot help very much regretting that just at this time nothing should have been done to relieve the pressure which is put upon the voluntary schools by the enormous burden of the rates they have to pay for their buildings. Those rates are enough to crush a good many schools, and I am confident, if nothing is done, that in the East of London particularly, some of our very best schools will be closed on account of this clause alone. I regret also that no opportunity has been taken to alleviate what is felt as a very considerable grievance by many, namely, the pressure of the 17s. 6d. limit. Personally, I think that a limit is perfectly sound, and I am strongly in favour of a limit; but I think that an opportunity might have been taken now of increasing that limit, and so taking off the great pressure which will be put upon many voluntary schools by the present operation of the Bill. My Lords, I will not go further into these details. I do not know that I should have felt called upon to speak at so much length if the noble Lord (Lord Herschell) had not seemed to me to be very much more unjust to the Church schools than the noble Duke was to those with whom the noble and learned Lord usually acts.

LORD HERSCHELL: I beg the right reverend Prelate's pardon, I distinctly said I did not make any such charge against Church schools universally, or even generally, but I said I thought that in many cases there might be some very strong feeling of the kind, though I believed they were exceptional cases.

*THE MARQUESS OF RIPON: My Lords, having been one of those who had a principal part in the introduction of the Education Bill of 1870, perhaps your Lordships will allow me to say a few words before this debate is brought to a conclusion. I do not rise with the purpose of offering any opposition to this Bill being read a second time. For a considerable time I have been convinced that it had become necessary to adopt the principle of free education in our elementary schools, and I rejoice that Her Majesty's Government have now come to the same conclusion at which I arrived some years ago. But I desire to touch upon some of the points which have been mentioned in the debate. I regret that no attempt is made to deal in the Bill with the demand for some further supervision on the part of the public. My Lords, I am one of those who desire earnestly the maintenance of that variety of system which is to be found in our educational arrangements at present. As long as religious differences exist between us in this country, it is, as it seems to me, essential to the fair demands of justice, that you should provide, as far as possible, schools suitable to the requirements, and acceptable to the feelings, of the various classes of parents in this country. I believe, myself, that as regards religious instruction, the religious instruction given under the large majority of Board schools is quite acceptable to the majority of people of this country; but there are other persons to whom that instruction is not satisfactory, who desire to have their children brought up in schools in which a definite religious teaching is given, such as my noble Friend behind me (Earl Spencer) would call dogmatic religious instruction.

should be one of those persons. I should not myself be satisfied to send my child to a Board School; I should desire to send him to a school in which the religious opinions which I myself hold would form part of the curriculum of the instruction. That is with many persons in this country an earnest and a conscientious opinion, and I say that in any system of education you are bound to provide, as far as you reasonably can, for meeting those views and those feelings on the part of parents. My Lords, in considering this question, whether in connection with the demand for free education, or whether in regard to the question of religious instruction, you must always take along with you the fact that the system established by the Act of 1870 was a compulsory system. I have always thought that the proposal to establish compulsory primary education in this country was a very bold step to take in 1870. I believed then, and I believe now, that it was a perfectly right proposal. I believe that it has been the means of promoting many of the most satisfactory results which have followed from the Act of 1870, and to which the noble Viscount opposite has alluded to-night. But when you compel parents to send their children to school, that does render it absolutely necessary that you should consider to the utmost of your power their opinions, their desires, and their conscientious feelings, and therefore I held then, and I hold still, that it is essential in a general educational system, under the circumstances of our time, that due provision should be made for the requirements of those parents, whether they be right or wrong, who desire that what has been called to-night "dogmatic instruction" should be given to their children. But, my Lords, there is one case, and it is a common one in this country, which, from this point of view, is exceedingly difficult to deal with, and that is the case of what I may call "one school districts." Where you have several schools in a district within convenient reach of the parents, schools belonging to different denominations — Board schools in the one case, schools belonging to the Church of England in another, schools suitable to Roman Catholics or Nonconformists in a third case—where you have those schools suitable for the requirements of parents of all classes, their choice is easily made. But where you have a different state of things, where you have only one school within reach of the parent, to which therefore the parent is required by law to send his children, then I say you put him in a position of considerable difficulty. No doubt in that case the system under which a choice of schools is afforded is the best, and I have always thought that the Education Department has acted in this matter in a somewhat narrow spirit. I have felt that they have not understood the intentions or the purpose of the Act of 1870, in not giving grants to new schools in these one-school districts, when they might have done so with perfect propriety very fairly under that Act. I have represented that fact to the noble Viscount opposite, and to other Lord Presidents at various times, but, I am sorry to say, without any success, and perhaps it may be because those representations, not from myself alone, but from many others, have not been attended to by the Department, that this demand for some more satisfactory mode of dealing with the case of single-school districts has become as strong as it is at the present time. My Lords, I do feel, I confess, that, in those districts, at all events, an increased amount of local public supervision is required. We have been told to-day that the conscience clause is perfectly satisfactory. I am old enough to recollect the days when the conscience clause was fiercely opposed by the Party opposite, and when it was very earnestly desired by Nonconformists. I believe that both parties have come to the conclusion that there was not much reality in that battle, and that the adoption of the conscience clause did no harm whatever to the schools of the Established Church, while, at the same time, it did not confer upon those who differ from that church the benefits which they anticipated. For, in the first place, it must always be remembered that when a parent withdraws his child from the religious instruction of the school under the conscience clause, the school becomes to him and his children a secular school and nothing else, because the children receive there no religious instruction at all; but beyond that, it is not only a question of the direct religious instruction which is given in the hours of religious teaching, it is a question of the general atmosphere of the school. Now what is it that those, who, like myself, desire religious instruction and religious schools, attach importance to? It is the fact that there is a religious atmosphere in the school. Take this case, and there are such cases: Suppose there was in any parish only one school, a public elementary school, to which, consequently, all parents were obliged to send their children. Supposing that school were a Roman Catholic school, would you think it possible to compel Protestant parents to send their children to that school? I think not. I think you would have the greatest difficulty in doing it. So, again, I think it is not right that you should compel or expect Roman Catholic parents to send their children to a Protestant school. Therefore, I do consider that in these single-school districts, some steps ought to be taken in the way of increased local control to mitigate the difficulty which arises under such a state of things. You cannot remove that difficulty altogether; you cannot place those districts in a perfectly equal position with districts where there are a variety of schools; but you can do something by establishing a local supervision of the school and of the proceedings which go on in it. I must also say I am greatly impressed by the conviction that now you have such a large additional sum of public money about to be given to denominational schools generally, you will not find it possible long to resist a demand in all those cases for some greater public supervision. I say that because it seems to me that the tendency of public feeling is undoubtedly in that direction; and, moreover, it is a very reasonable thing to say that where the largest part of the money expended in the school is derived from public sources, a greater amount of public supervision is required than would be necessary if that sum were much smaller, and, my Lords' continuous public supervision; and I do not see how that requirement can be adequately met by the general inspection of the Department. It must be local supervision. But I am not going to follow my noble Friend behind me into his dream of the future when the Education Department is, to a great extent, to cease to exist. My impression is that the Education Department is a very excellent Department. I was at it for several years, and I know the spirit in which men work in that Department. I believe it has done a great and valuable work in the country, and I should be sorry to see its supervision of Education in this country diminished. But you are taking the steps in this direction, not so much in elementary education as in other branches. You are handing these matters over to County Councils, and you will tend more and more in that direction, though I am not sure I shall live to see the system which my noble Friend has sketched out; and I am not sure that I altogether desire to live to see the establishment of that system. I prefer the term "denominational schools" to the term "voluntary schools," because to me their value is that they are denominational schools, and that they do teach definite religion. But I do not think that, provided you leave them free in their character as religious schools, provided you leave them free as to the religious instruction given in the hours set apart for that purpose, provided you leave them free as to the choice of the teachers, subject to such conditions of efficiency as exist at the present time, I do not think there would be really any cause to be afraid of such an extension of public supervision as I believe will inevitably come upon them before long. I am bound to say that in the interest of those schools I regret that this question has not been dealt with in this Bill. You are making an important change in our educational system, a wise and a right change as I think. You are going to lay out no less a sum than £2,000,000 a year for the purpose of giving free elementary education, and I do think it would have been a much better thing in the general interest of education in the country, and especially in the interests of denominational schools, if, at the same time and in the same manner, you had boldly and frankly dealt with this question of public supervision. You would then have placed this question upon a more settled basis; you would then have done a great deal to bringing to a conclusion these controversies which are in many respects so mischievous to the cause of Education in this country; and I believe you would have done a great deal to secure rather than weaken the position of the denominational schools among us. I shall very heartily say "content" to the Second Reading of this Bill, although I cannot regard it as a complete measure.

*THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Viscount CRANBROOK): My Lords, I have every reason to be satisfied with the course of the Debate which has taken place on this Bill. It is not my intention, inasmuch as the noble Lords opposite have expressed an intention of making some Amendments in Committee, to discuss the question arising on them now. But I will say, with regard to what the noble Marquess has just said as to making the Bill more satisfactory, and suggesting that we should have gone into the question of public control in this Bill, that that proposition gives me an idea of a length of Session which I am afraid to contemplate, and advice which would not be effective for the purpose of setting at rest the controversies to which the noble Marquess has referred. I will not detain your Lordships any longer, and I hope that the Second Reading of the Bill will now be granted.

Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

PENAL SERVITUDE BILL (No. 205.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said: My Lords, I was unable to make any remarks upon the Second Reading of this Bill, and I should not like it to pass without comment, though I shall not detain your Lordships long, particularly at this hour of the evening. The Bill is of great importance. The object of it is to remove the limitation of five years which now exists as regards sentences of penal servitude, and to enable sentences of three years to be imposed in future. That is contrary, no doubt, to the recommendations of a previous Commission on the subject, I think it was Lord Grey's Commission; and the opinion of that Commission was agreed in by a Commission, of which I had the honour to be the Chairman, which considered this question with regard to penal servitude. We were of opinion it was wise to maintain the five years' limit. I am bound, however, to say that there exists at present a gap between the term of two years' imprisonment, which is practically the maximum term of imprisonment that can be imposed, and the sentence of five years' penal servitude. I am not disposed to question the expediency of filling up that gap by enabling a sentence of three years' penal servitude to be imposed. What I wish to point out is—and perhaps the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack who has charge of the Bill will kindly listen to this point which I am anxious to obtain information upon—that as those who know our system of penal servitude will be aware, under the regulations which exist at present, a prisoner who conducts himself to the satisfaction of the prison authorities, and earns a sufficient number of marks which is required for that purpose under the present system may, if he is a male prisoner, obtain a remission of one-fourth of the whole term of his sentence of penal servitude, and in the case of a female prisoner a remission may be made of one-third of the whole term. I wish to point out that the results of this regulation will be very singular, because in the case of the male prisoner his sentence might be reduced from 3 to 2½ years, and the case of a female prisoner from 3 years to 2 years, which would be equivalent to a sentence of 2 years' imprisonment. I dare say this matter has been very carefully considered and adjusted, but it is necessary it should be considered, or else you would have a state of things which would not be conducive to good prison discipline. Hitherto a sentence of imprisonment has been different from one of penal servitude, because in sentences of penal servitude a portion of the sentence has been worked out during the latter part of it in outdoor employment, when the prisoner was suited to it, and such imprisonment was always considered to be less severe than confinement in a prison for two years, so that many people have considered that a two years' sentence is really in some respects a harder sentence upon a prisoner than a five years' sentence, except, of course, as regards its length. I wish to point out that it is very desirable we should have some further information as to the mode in which the Convict Commissioners and the Home Office intend to deal with this problem, and I am very anxious that some information should be given to us upon the subject, because, from the nature of the case, we remain to a great extent ignorant of what is done in these matters. The whole system of our convict prisons is one of secrecy to a great extent, and I think the reports of the Convict Commissioners have not, for the last three or four years, given all the information which might have been given on the subject. I do not, of course, suspect the management of the Prison Commissioners in any way; on the contrary, I believe they discharge their duties excellently; but, at the same time, such a system as this is one on which the public should have more information. From time to time we have had inquiries into the system, and I believe inquiries will be made in future at intervals, but I think we ought to have more information than we have had, especially when a new system is about to be introduced. I am anxious there should be laid before the public a thorough explanation of what that system is to be, not only in the interests of the prisoners themselves, but it is quite necessary for the judges who have to pass sentences, because unless those who have to pass the sentences thoroughly understand what the sentences should be, it is quite clear they cannot apportion them with that judgment and discretion which is necessary in the administration of the law. That is all I wish to say in the main point, but there is one other point to which I wish to draw the noble and learned Lord's attention. In the 8th clause, I think it is, a power is given in future to photograph and measure all prisoners confined in gaol. Hitherto the law has only enabled you to photograph compulsorily prisoners who have been convicted of crime, but under this clause permission is given to photograph prisoners tried and untried. With regard to untried prisoners it is very desirable, no doubt, that you should have the power of sending those photographs round to the different gaols and authorities throughout the country, in order that you may have some light thrown upon the prisoner and his antecedents, but I cannot help thinking that it is rather hard upon prisoners who may be acquitted of the offences charged against them that these photographs should exist in the prisons, thus earmarking the prisoners as belonging to the criminal portion of society. Therefore I would suggest to the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, that he might consider whether some Amendment in the Standing Committee might not be desirable, dealing with cases where a prisoner is not found guilty of the offence charged, and providing that in those cases the photograph or negative should be destroyed. I believe that some assurance of that kind was given in the other House, but I am not certain, and at any rate I desire to point that out. No doubt the noble and learned Lord will be kind enough to consider the matter before the next stage of the Bill.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, I do not wonder that the noble Lord, who speaks with great authority on this subject, should require further information with regard to some of the clauses in the Bill. As he knows, the whole system of prison discipline has undergone great changes, and one conspicuous change is that all those sentences which did not make a man what is popularly called "a convict," and which were worked out in the Houses of Correction under the County Authorities or County Magistrates, were subject to no remission, and the persons imprisoned in such places were subjected to a discipline so rigid, and to some extent so severe, that it was sometimes difficult to justify the imposition of such discipline. The result was a sentence of imprisonment was so injurious to the prisoner in mind and body, that hardly any of the Judges would consent to inflict a sentence so severe. That was intelligible at one time in the state of things under the old system. All that has now passed away, because the complete management of the prisoners has passed into the hands of Her Majesty's Government, and the principle upon which that kind of punishment was administered is comparatively inappropriate now. The particular question which the noble Lord asks I think I can answer at once, namely, that it is contemplated that the system of remissions of portions of sentences by reason of good conduct should apply to the shorter terms of penal servitude. That is the only alteration it is intended to make. For some reason or other, it is suggested that, in the alterations with regard to the shorter sentences of penal servitude, when this term of five years was imposed by Parliament there was some mistake made in drafting the Bill; certainly I do not think it was ever so intended. But, as a matter of fact, the difficulty was that the sentences of five years and seven years became so entangled, by the passing of the different Acts on the subject, that a great many of Her Majesty's Judges were of opinion—and the Home Office was memorialised on the subject from time to time—that, whereas a shorter sentence would have been appropriate in some cases, yet the gravity of the offence was too great for so short a sentence as they would have had to pass, but that the long sentence of penal servitude was too severe. That was the difficulty felt by the Judges, and it is to remedy that difficulty that the Bill has been introduced. I think, however, that should be further worked out, and I will take care that before the Bill leaves the House that explanation shall be given. I am not quite in accordance with the noble Earl upon the other provision which he refers to—the provision as to photographing prisoners. I am not quite certain that it is so much intended as a check upon as to some extent a security to the persons tried. My experience is that persons in custody have sometimes been recognised by prison warders and proved to have been convicted, whereas, as a matter of fact, they were acquitted, and there has been difficulty where no means of identification have been preserved. I can quite understand that it is very desirable that the photograph of a man should not be sent all over the country to proclaim that he has been tried and convicted of an offence when he has been acquitted, but, at the same time, I am not desirous of destroying it; even for his own sake it should be preserved. I understand that the view of the noble Earl is that no inquiry or annoyance should be inflicted on a prisoner under these circumstances, and with that I am quite in accord, but I am by no means certain that upon reflection the noble Earl will think that, supposing it be kept private, it is desirable that the photograph should be destroyed; however, that is a matter which shall be considered between now and the further stages of the Bill.

LORD HERSCHELL: Perhaps the noble and learned Lord will state whether some assurance was not given by the Home Secretary in the other house upon the point to which my noble Friend (the Earl of Kimberley) referred. I have a strong belief that I have read something of that kind myself.

House in Committee (according to order): Bill reported without Amendment; and re-committed to the Standing Committee.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 16th July, 1891.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

(by Order.)

Order for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [15th July],

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee to inquire whether the cost of building Hanover Chapel was not largely borne by the rates of the whole parish of St. George's, Hanover Square; and, if so, whether a portion of the surplus of the money to be derived from the sale of the chapel building and the site thereof, after providing for the erection of the new district church contemplated by the Bill, should not be used for the religious requirements of the whole parish; and, if so, the Committee may, if they think fit, be at liberty to insert provisions in the Bill to apply a portion of such surplus accordingly," — (Mr. Thomas Henry Bolton,)

—read, and discharged.

HANOVER CHAPEL BILL [LORDS].

Viscount Cranborne, Mr. Picton, and Mr. W. H. Cross nominated Members of the Committee, with Two Members to be added by the Committee of Selection.

Ordered, That the Committee on the Bill have leave to sit and proceed forthwith.—(Mr. W. H. Cross.)

PRIVATE BILLS.

Returns ordered—

"Of the number of Private Bills introduced and brought from the House of Lords, and of Acts passed in the Session of 1890-91, classed according to the following subjects: Railways, Tramways, Tramroads, Subways, Canals and Navigations, Roads and Bridges, Water, Gas and Water, Lighting and Improvement, Police and Sanitary Regulations, Corporations, &c. (not relating to Police and Sanitary Regulations or to Lighting and Improvement Schemes), Ports, Piers, Harbours, and Docks; Churches, Chapels, and Burying Grounds; Inclosure and Drainage; Estate; Divorce; and Miscellaneous."

"Of all the Private Bills, and Bills for confirming Provisional Orders, which, in the Session of 1890-91, have been treated as Opposed Bills; specifying those which have been classified in Groups by the Committee of Selection, or by the General Committee on Railway and Canal Bills; together with the names of the Selected Members who served on each Committee; the first and also the last day of the sitting of each Committee; the number of days on which each Committee sat; the number of days on which each Selected Member has served; the Bills the preambles of which were reported to have been proved; the Bills the preambles of which were reported to have been not proved; and in the case of Bills for confirming Provisional Orders, whether the Provisional Orders ought or ought not to be confirmed; the Bills referred back to the Committee of Selection, or to the General Committee on Railway and Canal Bills, as having become unopposed, and the Bills withdrawn, or not proceeded with by the parties."

"And, of all Private Bills which, in the Session of 1890-91, have been referred by the Committee of Selection, or by the General Committee on Railway and Canal Bills, to the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, together with the names of the Members who served on each Committee; the number of days on which each Committee sat; and the number of days on which each Member attended (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, No. 0.146, of Session 1890)." — (Sir Charles Forster.)

SELECT COMMITTEES.

Return ordered—

"Of the number of Select Committees appointed in the Session of 1890-91, including the Standing Committees and the Court of Referees; the subjects of inquiry; the names of the Members appointed to serve on each, and of the Chairman of each; the number of days each Committee met, and the number of days each Member attended; the total expense of the attendance of Witnesses at each Select Committee, and the name of the Member who moved for such Committee; also, the total number of Members who served on Select Committees (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, No. 0.147, of Session 1890)." — (Sir Charles Forster.)

SITTINGS OF THE HOUSE.

Return ordered—

"Of the number of days on which the House sat in the Session of 1890-91, stating, for each day the date of the month, and day of the week, the hour of the meeting, and the hour of adjournment; and the total number of hours occupied in the Sittings of the House, and the average time; and showing the number of hours on which the House sat each day, the number of hours after midnight; and the number of entries in each day's Votes and Proceedings (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, No. 0.148, of Session 1890)." — (Charles Forster.)

PUBLIC BILLS.

Return ordered—

"Of the number of Public Bills distinguishing Government from other Bills, introduced into this House, or brought from the House of Lords, during the Session of 1890-91; showing the number which received the Royal Assent; the number which were passed by this House but not by the House of Lords; the number passed by the House of Lords but not by this House; and distinguishing the stages at which such Bills as did not receive the Royal Assent were dropped or postponed and rejected in either House of Parliament (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, No. 0.149 of Session 1890)."—(Sir Charles Forster.)

PUBLIC PETITIONS.

Return ordered—

"Of the number of Public Petitions presented and printed in the Session of 1890-91; with the total number of Signatures in that year (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, No. 0.150, of Session 1890)."—(Sir Charles Forster.)

DIVISIONS OF THE HOUSE.

Return ordered—

"Of the number of Divisions of the House in the Session of 1890-91; stating the subject of the Division, and the number of Members in the majority and minority, Tellers included; also the aggregate number in the House on each Division; distinguishing the Divisions on Public Business from Private; and also the number of Divisions before and after midnight (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, No. 0.151, of Session 1890)."—(Sir Charles Forster.)

ARMY (COURTS-MARTIAL ON GAMBLING.)

Address for—

"Return, for the years 1888, 1889, and 1890, of the numbers of cases of Non-Commissioned Officers tried by Court-Martial, and punished, for allowing gambling or card playing to take place, or for participating in it, giving short particulars of each offence, the date, and the punishment inflicted."—(Mr. Cobb.)

RAILWAY SERVANTS (HOURS OF LABOUR) [INQUIRY NOT COMPLETED.]

Report from the Select Committee, with Minutes of Evidence, and an Appendix, brought up, and read.

Report to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 342.]

QUESTIONS.

SALE OF OPIUM IN THE BROACH DISTRICT.

MR. S. SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been drawn to the statement that the licence for the sale of opium in the district of Broach requires that the licensee shall sell not less than five and a half tons of the drug per annum, and that he was liable to a fine of Rs. 10,195 for selling one ton short of his guaranteed quantity, and whether the fine has been exacted; whether his attention has been drawn to the statement that the quantity of opium compelled to be sold to the population of Broach (326,930 people) equals 20,000,000 four-grain poisonous doses, and whether this statement is correct; whether it is the case that the opium licensee may open many shops under his one licence, and also that the Government takes power to compel him to open new shops; whether his attention has been drawn to the statement that in 16 districts of the Bombay Presidency the consumption of the drug has increased 30 per cent. in five years, and whether this statement is correct; whether his attention has been drawn to the statement in the Moral and Material Progress of India, that it is proposed to close the Cheendoo shops where prepared opium is smoked upon the premises, as the existence of these houses tends to spread the vice of opium smoking, which is of recent origin in most parts of the Punjab, and whether the Government will urge upon the Government of India the expediency of giving prompt effect to this proposal; whether the India Office has yet received a reply from the Government of Burma to the inquiry promised 26th February into the allegation that in the town of Akyab there are several hundreds of opium dens, though but one opium licence is reported as given out; and whether he will ask the Indian Government to withdraw provisions calculated to stimulate the consumption of opium in India, in accordance with the decision of the House of Commons?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): The reply to the two paragraphs of the hon. Member's question is in the affirmative. The facts are correctly stated in the question, but I am not aware whether a four-grain dose is poisonous or not. As to the third paragraph, the licence holder cannot open more shops than are named in the licence, unless required to do so by the collector. The reply to the fourth paragraph is that the information which the hon. Member has received is erroneous. The increase during the last four years has been about 7 per cent. Although there was a large increase in 1886-87 that increase was attributed mainly to the repression of smuggling. The answer to paragraph 5 is, that it appears from page 94 of the Report for 1889-90, presented in May last, that all the Chandoo shops in the Punjab have been closed, with satisfactory results. As to the 6th paragraph, the inquiry was sent to India in March, but no reply has yet been received. In reply to the last of the hon Member's questions, I have to say that it is not the policy of the Government of India to stimulate the consumption of opium or any other intoxicant.

COMPULSORY VACCINATION IN INDIA.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he can inform the House to what districts in India compulsory vaccination extends; whether Municipal Bodies and other Local Authorities have power to introduce compulsory vaccination within their respective local limits; whether the compulsory vaccination system is uniform, or whether its provisions differ in different localities; whether any provision exists in India analogous to Section 31 of the English Act of 1867 as regards cumulative penalties; and whether he can state the number of prosecutions and the number of imprisonments for non-vaccination that have taken place in recent years?

SIR J. GORST: Compulsory vaccination exists in four districts of Bengal, and 183 municipal cities and towns in different Provinces of India. The reply to the second question is that the extension of the compulsory law is effected by the local government, but generally on the initiative of the Municipal or other Local Authority. The provisions vary slightly in different Provinces. Provisions exist in the Indian Law analogous to those enhancing punishments under the English Law. The Secretary of State cannot state the number of prosecutions, but, so far as he is aware, there have been no imprisonments.

Sir J. Gorst

INDIAN NATIVE ENGINEERS.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Government of Bombay has refused to allow native applicants for certificates as engineers on board of local coasting steamers to be examined in their own language; whether the coasting vessels referred to are commanded and manned wholly by natives; whether in other countries candidates for such certificates are examined in their mother tongue; and whether he will cause inquiries to be addressed to the Government of Bombay on the subject?

SIR J. GORST: I must ask the hon. Member to postpone the question for the present.

SALE OF GANJA.

MR. M. STEWART (Kirkcudbright): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been called to the statement in the Allahabad Pioneer, of the 10th of May last, that ganja, "which is grown, sold, and excised under much the same conditions as opium," is far more harmful than opium, and that "the lunatic asylums of India are filled with ganja smokers;" whether he is aware that the possession and sale of ganja has been prohibited for many years past in Lower Burma, and that the exclusion of the drug was stated in the Excise Report of that Province for 1881-2 to have been "of immense benefit to the people;" and whether he will call the attention of the Government of India to the desirability of extending the same prohibition to the other Provinces of British India?

SIR J. GORST: The Secretary of State has seen the statement mentioned in the first paragraph of the question about the sale of ganja. The facts are as stated as to the exclusion of ganja from Burma. The answer to the third paragraph is that in Bengal—the Province where ganja is principally consumed—the price of duty-paid ganja has been greatly increased during recent years, making its consumption more expensive. The Secretary of State will inquire whether the Government of India will propose to take further steps to limit the consumption.

THE ANTI-OPIUM SOCIETY.

MR. M. STEWART: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he has yet received any answer from the Government of India in regard to the Memorial presented to Lord Cross from the Anti-Opium Society on 31st July, 1890?

SIR J. GORST: No answer has yet been received, but a reminder has been sent to the Government of India, in accordance with the promise I made to the hon. Member on the 29th of May.

OPIUM LICENCES.

SIR J. KENNAWAY (Devon, Honiton): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether his attention has been called to the issue of licences for the sale of opium by the Government of Bombay, and especially to the provision requiring a certain amount to be sold by the licensee under heavy penalties; whether, considering the assurance given by him that the policy of the Indian Government was to diminish the cultivation and consumption of the drug, he will cause representations to be made to the Government of Bombay, so that no such provisions should be inserted in future licences?

SIR J. GORST: The Secretary of State is aware that licensed opium vendors in Bombay engage to sell a specified quantity of licit opium. A table showing the minimum for each district is given at page 10 of the Bombay Opium Report. The Revenue officers of the Bombay Government believe that the existence of this minimum tends to prevent licensed vendors from dealing in opium illegally smuggled from the adjoining Native States. The Bombay Government will be invited to consider whether the existence of the minimum tends to encourage an increased consumption in British districts, and if it does so tend they will doubtless alter the system.

POSTAGE OF FRIENDLY SOCIETY CIRCULARS.

MR. COGHILL (Newcastle-under-Lyme): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he will allow the various Friendly Societies of the United Kingdom the same facilities for sending notices of arrears of subscriptions through the post, at the $\frac{1}{2}$ d. rate of postage, as are now given to tradesmen in issuing their quarterly or other statement of accounts?

MR. FURNESS (Hartlepool): I beg also to ask the Postmaster General what has been the result of his correspondence with the Treasury, intimated as long ago as 30th June of last year, regarding the postage on circulars of Friendly Societies reminding members of arrears of subscriptions; and whether it has been determined to include such circulars in the $\frac{1}{2}$ d. postage?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): In reply to the hon. Member for Boston on Tuesday last, as also on many other previous occasions during the present Session to other hon. Members, I have answered this question by pointing out that one of the principal objects of the Post Office Bill, which is on the Paper for to-night, and which has already passed through Committee, is to afford to the Friendly Societies the relief suggested. It must, however, depend on the co-operation of hon. Members interested in the subject if this Bill can be passed before the Prorogation.

TELEGRAPHS.

MR. BARCLAY (Forfarshire): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if, with the object of encouraging a reasonable development of the telegraph system, he will consider whether the conditions of guarantee now demanded for the extension of wires might with advantage to the public and the postal revenue be to some extent reduced?

*MR. RAIKES: I had already considered the subject to which the hon. Member calls attention, and I had made certain proposals to the Treasury. Those proposals are now under consideration. The hon. Member may have obtained that by an Amendment in the Post Office Bill, of which I have given notice. Power will be given to Local Authorities to guarantee the cost of these extensions.

ENLISTMENTS IN THE HIGHLANDS AND ISLANDS OF SCOTLAND.

SIR J. BAIN (Whitehaven): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the number of enlistments annually in the Western Highlands and Islands of Scotland have shown a falling off; and if he can state approximately the figures for last year as compared with 10 years ago; and whether, having regard to the over-populated condition and consequent privations in these districts, he can see his way to offer any special inducements for enlistment in the Army?

MR. ANGUS SUTHERLAND (Sutherlandshire): Is the assumption in the second paragraph of the question correct, that these districts are over-populated? Is it not notoriously the fact that they are the most under-populated districts in the whole of Great Britain?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): I cannot answer the question of the hon. Member (Mr. A. Sutherland) without making further inquiry. With regard to the question on the Paper, I may say that, as compared with the number of recruits raised 10 years ago, recruiting in Scotland north of Inverness-shire has not decreased. The actual numbers were 83 in 1881, and 89 in 1890, but it is quite true that in the intervening years the numbers were considerably higher. Every effort has been made to foster recruiting in the North of Scotland, but there does not appear to be much inclination there towards military service. The question of what inducements can be offered will, no doubt, be considered by the Committee now sitting on the terms of service.

MR. ANGUS SUTHERLAND: Is it not the fact that the Army has become unpopular in the Highlands and Islands because troops have been used for evictions and the extortion of rents?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: No, Sir; certainly not. As far as I am aware, the force generally employed has been of the Royal Marines. But in any case, the Army would do its duty if required.

PRISON CLERKSHIPS.

MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the next examination for prison clerkships (England) will take place; and whether it will be open to candidates from all parts of the United Kingdom?

Sir J. Bain

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): No date has been fixed for the next examination for prison clerkships in England. Reductions are still being made in the prison staff, and the prospect of an examination being held is therefore remote. The competition is not open, but limited to selected candidates, who come from all parts of the United Kingdom.

FULL-TIME WORKERS.

MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has considered the desirability of raising the educational standard for full-time workers under "The Factories and Workshops Act, 1878;" and, if so, what standard of the Code he has fixed upon; and when will it come into operation?

MR. MATTHEWS: The question of raising the educational standard for full-time work in factories and workshops only, as distinguished from other employments, and of applying that higher standard to all factories and workshops alike under Section 26 of the Factories Act, 1878, is a question which cannot be decided without careful inquiry into the circumstances of various industries and conference with the Education Department. I will take an early opportunity of conferring with the Education Department, but I am unable at present to state what course will be pursued?

THE NAVAL MANŒUVRES.

MR. GOULEY (Sunderland): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if he will be good enough to state the objective character of the exercises in which officers and men are to be employed during the forthcoming Naval Manœuvres; whether the squadrons are to be located and directed under orders from the Admiralty; if so, are the divisions to be grouped in defensive and offensive classes; and if it correct that the employment of one of the divisions is to be confined to practice in letting go and the heaving of anchors?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The programme of the present year's Naval Manœuvres has been already made public through a Memorandum published in the daily newspapers, and consists partly of a series of tactical exercises and partly of operations of two squadrons of torpedo boats opposed to one another. This Memorandum will give the hon. Gentleman all the information he wants.

WRITERS IN THE ROYAL NAVY.

CAPTAIN PRICE (Devonport): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether it is the case that the class of writers in the Royal Navy have had no increase of pay since their introduction in 1867, although their duties and responsibilities have greatly increased since then, during which time they have been gradually taking the place of the junior Accountant Officers; whether official representations have been made to this effect; and whether the Admiralty are prepared to consider their case?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): With certain small exceptions, no increase of pay has been given to writers since the introduction of the class in 1867; but as it was intended at the time to substitute them for junior accountant officers to a considerable extent, I cannot admit that their duties and responsibilities have increased beyond what was contemplated. In March last, an addition was made to their pay of 1s. a day when serving in ships not allowed an accountant officer, and also certain allowances were granted to chief writers, who might re-engage on completing their time for pension. The existing regulations being sufficient to attract good candidates, and the case of the writers having been already considered this year, I am not prepared to now re-open the question.

TRAFALGAR SQUARE.

MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether his attention has been called to the filthy condition of the water at the fountains in Trafalgar Square; and whether, in the interests of the health of the inhabitants of the Metropolis, he will have the matter attended to?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, Dublin University): I find that on the day on which the hon. Member put down his question on the Paper the fountains in Trafalgar Square were awaiting their regular cleaning, and they have since been cleaned. They are emptied and thoroughly cleaned and filled again with 80,000 gallons of water about once every three months, and in the intervals between such quarterly cleanings the water in the fountains is refreshed about once a fortnight. Within the last three and a half months the quantity of fresh water thus supplied to the fountains has been 250,000 gallons. I will consider, however, whether these fountains cannot during the hot weather be more frequently supplied with fresh water.

DR. KLEIN.

MR. S. SMITH (for Mr. M'LAREN, Cheshire, Crewe): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether Dr. Klein is a permanent salaried official of the Local Government Board, or whether he merely makes an Annual Report regarding his own private experiments; what salary or remuneration Dr. Klein receives; whether any and, if so, which of the inoculation experiments referred to in his last Report were performed with diphtheritic membranes received from the Fulham Fever Hospital, and which of them were made in England; and whether, to prevent future misunderstanding, he will request Dr. Klein to specify in future Reports which of his experiments are made in England and which abroad?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I have communicated with the hon. Gentleman who gave notice of this question, and have requested him to defer it until Monday.

ASSAULTING A TITHE BAILIFF IN WALES.

MR. S. T. EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the account appearing in the South Wales Daily News of the 8th July instant, relating to a charge against eight persons for an alleged assault on a tithe bailiff named Robert Lewis, at Crymmych, Pembrokeshire, on the 19th June last; whether he is aware that the accused were on Monday the 6th July arrested under a warrant early in the morning, and afterwards taken to a lock-up, and marched in single file through the public streets of Cardigan town, and that the police refused to produce the warrant to the accused or their solicitor; whether, in the interval of nearly three weeks between the alleged offence and the arrest, there was any indication given, or any reason to suppose, that the defendants could not be served with a summons, and would not appear in answer to a summons; what was the reason of their being charged within the Cilgerran Division, and whether the alleged offence was committed outside that Division; whether he is aware that the clerk to the Magistrates in the Cilgerran Division is also the local solicitor to the Clergy Association of South Cardiganshire and North Pembrokeshire, and whether this gentleman in his capacity as such solicitor has recently applied for the aid of the military or large forces of police to attend at tithe distrains and sales and has been refused; by whose authority and on whose initiative the warrant for the arrest of the accused was issued; and whether the arrests under a warrant without a summons having been previously issued are under the circumstances sanctioned by him; and, if not, what steps he will take in the matter?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed by the Chief Constable of Pembrokeshire that seven of the defendants were detained in the lock-up while waiting for the train. On arrival at Cardigan they walked with the police from the station to the office of the Justices' clerk, about 400 yards, and were there admitted to bail. It is not the fact that the police refused to produce the warrants. They were read over and explained in Welsh to each person when arrested. I am informed by the clerk to the Justices that on June 28 he received from the Chief Constable a list of the names and addresses of nine persons who were present in the crowd when the alleged assault took place. On June 30 the complainant laid an information on oath that he had just and reasonable cause to suspect these persons, and applied for warrants, which were issued. He was doubtful whether the accused parties, who were personally unknown to him, would appear to a summons. Under these circumstances, the Magistrates, in the exercise of the discretion vested in them by law, granted warrants in the first instance. The alleged offence took place partly within the Division of Cilgerran and partly within that of Cemmaes, and within 500 yards of the boundary of Cilgerran Division. Had the defendants not been charged in Cilgerran, it would have necessitated their being taken a distance of 15 miles, and their waiting more than a week for the case to be heard. The clerk is acting as described for the Clergy Association, and has applied for military or police protection for the bailiff attending tithe distrains. To avoid the embarrassment which might arise from his acting in this capacity, he took no part in the hearing of this case on the 7th, but obtained a substitute to act for him. It is no part of my duty to interfere with the discretion of Magistrates in the matter of issuing warrants. They are guided by the special circumstances of the case, and have full power to act as they did under the Statute 11 & 12 Vic., c. 43, s. 2.

FATAL RAILWAY ACCIDENT.

MR. WOOTTON ISAACSON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been drawn to a fatal accident to J. R. Gay, aged 10 years, who was travelling in an East End excursion train on the London, Tilbury, and Southend Railway to Southend, when, owing to the door of the carriage being left unlocked, the child fell out and was killed; whether he is aware that the communication cord of the train was out of order, and the train was not stopped until a considerable time after the accident; whether he is aware that this is the fifth case of a child having fallen from a train during the last 10 days; and whether he can take any steps in the matter?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): My attention has been called to the fatal accident referred to which occurred on the London, Tilbury, and Southend line. It appears that while the deceased, aged 10 years, was returning to London from Southend he turned the handle of the carriage door and fell out. The company state that the fastening of the door was in working order, and that the communication cord was not connected because it was not required under the Act, as the train was not running 20 miles without stopping at a station. I am aware that similar accidents have recently happened, but in most of them there appears to have been a want of caution on the part of the sufferers. It is difficult to provide against accidents to which the carelessness of passengers contributes, and there are obvious objections to locking as well as fastening the carriage doors.

MR. NEPEAN.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War under what circumstances Mr. Nepean, the late Director of Contracts, resigned; and whether he receives any pension?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Mr. Nepean retires at his own request under a Treasury authority which, with a view to considerable reductions and economy, sanctions the retirement of members of the higher establishment of the War Office who are over 50 years of age or have over 30 years' service on the pensions they have earned by service without any addition on account of premature retirement. Mr. Nepean has had 38 years' service, but in view of all the circumstances of the case he will not draw any pension till he has attained the age of 60 years, when he would be entitled to retire under any circumstances.

LIVERPOOL POST OFFICE.

MR. CROSS (Liverpool, West Derby): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he can state the result of the negotiations for the acquisition of a site for a new post office in Liverpool?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): Arrangements have been made for acquiring a site for the Liverpool Post Office in Victoria Street. The cost, however, is very heavy, and will require a Supplemental Estimate, which is included among those ordered by the House to be printed a few days ago.

NEWFOUNDLAND.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies if Her Majesty's Government have held out any expectation that people in Newfoundland who have set up lobster factories, or otherwise acted in opposition to the modus vivendi, will be compensated by the Imperial Government at the expense of the British taxpayer; and whether they have any reason to suppose that there is any foundation for the suggestion that, since the decision in the Baird case, new factories have been started with a view to their being closed and their owners enabled to claim heavy compensation from the Imperial Government?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. DE WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): I would refer the hon. Member to the Despatch of March 12, printed at pages 34 and 35 of the Parliamentary Paper C. 6334, presented in April last. This Despatch has been published in the Government Gazette of Newfoundland. Her Majesty's Government are aware that a considerable number of new factories have been erected since last season, but they have not received information which would enable them to state that fresh ones have been set on foot since the decision of the Baird case with the object indicated in the question.

IMPORTATION OF SPIRITS INTO WEST COAST OF AFRICA.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if the importation of European spirits for the use of the natives is still permitted in the Protectorates and Chartered territories on the West Coast of Africa, and if it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to continue to permit that traffic; and if there is foundation for the complaint of the Chartered Niger Company that, while they levy heavy duties on that importation, in the Oil Rivers Protectorate the importation is free or much more lightly taxed?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): The question of the importation of spirits will be regulated by the Brussels Act, when ratified. Where it is permitted it will be controlled. In large districts, such as the Mussulman territories of the Western Soudan under the Niger Company, and territories under the other Chartered Companies to which the 91st Article of the Act applies, it will be altogether prohibited. Hitherto it has been impossible to levy duties in the Oil Rivers Protectorate, but they will be levied in future under the Customs system organised by Major Macdonald.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Am I to understand that Her Majesty's Government require that spirits shall be admitted at duties provided by the Brussels Conference, or can they exercise their own will?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: I am not prepared to say any more on the subject than I have done. I cannot go into particulars without further notice.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, in all the British Crown Colonies on the West Coast of Africa, the importation of European spirits for the consumption of the natives of the interior, as well as in the colonies, is still permitted; and if it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to continue to permit that traffic?

BARON H. DE WORMS: We have requested the different Governors of Her Majesty's possessions on the West Coast of Africa to report what steps it will be necessary to take to give effect to the recommendations of the Brussels Conference, one of the most important of which deals with the importation of spirits. As regards a duty, however, we already levy a higher rate of Customs duty than the minimum prescribed by the Conference, and, it is believed, higher than that at present levied by any other European Power on the coast. The Revenue chiefly depends on the Customs receipts, and if the importation of spirits were altogether forbidden the only effect would be to divert the trade from our own colonies to those of other Powers which border on them. We do much by exacting as high a duty as it is possible to levy without encouraging smuggling, which already largely exists.

PLEURO-PNEUMONIA.

VISCOUNT NEWARK (Notts, Newark): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether he is aware that certain cattle, belonging to T. Potter, esquire, W. M. Oates, esquire, and Mr. Ibbetson, farmer, all in the County of Notts, have, without apparent reason, been slaughtered by order of a travelling Inspector of the Board as having been exposed to infection from pleuro-pneumonia; and whether he can state the circumstances under which they became exposed to this infection?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): No, Sir; I am not aware of any cattle having been slaughtered without reasons in Nottinghamshire, whether the reasons were apparent or not. Three animals belonging to Mr. Potter, one heifer belonging to Mr. Oates, and one belonging to Mr. Ibbetson have been slaughtered, not by order of the travelling Inspector, but by direct order of the Board. Of Mr. Potter's animals one was found to be diseased, and although the cattle belonging to Mr. Oates and Mr. Ibbetson were found to be free, these animals were some of many sold by Mr. Tucker, of Southampton. Disease, it has been found, as I stated two days ago, has existed on his premises for a long time, and it has been necessary to trace as far as possible, and in some cases to slaughter, those which have recently left his premises. Out of 65 animals thus traced and slaughtered 13 have been found diseased, and I am informed that five others died previously. I regret to have to add that in the case of two other gentlemen in Nottinghamshire who bought cattle from Mr. Tucker pleuro-pneumonia was found to exist in both cases upon the slaughter of the animals.

EDUCATION IN SCOTLAND.

SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether the Government adhere to their decision to refuse to grant a Return of the funds devoted to secondary education in Scotland during this Session; and whether, referring to the promise of the Government to procure information on this question before dealing with the surplus grant next year, that information will be laid before the House of Commons, and in what shape?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): I have already stated the reasons why the Government are not prepared to grant the Return referred to, which would not, in our opinion, add materially to the information furnished in the last Report of the Educational Endowments Commissioners. It will be the duty of the Department not only, as I then stated, to obtain the most recent statistics on the subject, but also carefully to examine these, and to gather as full information as possible with regard to the organisation of higher education and the operation of funds devoted to it. In connection with any consideration of the question of assistance to higher education, we shall necessarily state to the House the results of these inquiries; but it would be premature, until the materials are collected, to determine the shape in which such information may be most conveniently submitted.

SIR G. TREVELYAN: I hope that the information will be first presented to the House in the speech of the Minister who moves the proposal.

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The right hon. Baronet is looking a long way ahead. I have no doubt that the course taken will be satisfactory to the House.

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): I beg to ask the Solicitor General for Scotland upon whose authority, and upon what evidence, he made the statement, on behalf of the Government, that School Boards in Scotland have made their financial arrangements for the current year upon the basis of the Minute of the Scotch Education Department of 11th June last; whether he is aware that the latest statutory date for School Boards certifying to the assessing authority is 12th June in each year; and whether, considering that the Minute of the Department only became law on 12th inst., the Scotch Education Department had any evidence that one single School Board in Scotland had made their financial arrangements for the current year upon the basis of the Minute?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I understand that the Solicitor General referred to the fact that the proposal to extend relief of fees to 14 years of age had been before the House for some months, and that the terms of the Minute were announced to the House on the 11th June, and published in the Scotch newspapers next day. The arrangement contemplated was thus known to the School Boards at the date when the requisition to the Parochial Board had to be made, and we have reason to believe that, as a general rule, School Boards will be able, with the additional 1s. of capitation grant, to meet the financial results of the Minute, but that any extension of the terms at this period might lead to serious financial difficulty.

JAMAICA.

CAPTAIN PRICE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been called to a question which has lately arisen in the Jamaica Legislature with reference to the holding of seats in that body by two gentlemen who are the solicitors to the Jamaica Railway, a property which is still to a considerable extent owned by the Crown; whether he is aware that the question was submitted to a Committee of the elective members of the Council, a body numbering only nine, including the two members referred to; and whether the Secretary of State for the Colonies proposes to take any action in the matter?

BARON H. DE WORMS: The question was lately raised in Jamaica whether the seats in the Legislative Council of two gentlemen had become vacant by reason of their having, as solicitors to the Jamaica Railway, become parties to a contract with the Government. The Legislative Council, in which the decision of such questions is vested by the Constitution, referred the matter to a Select Committee consisting of the Attorney General and four elected members, who reported that the two members referred to were not parties to a contract with the Government, and had not vacated their seats. This Report was adopted by the Council. The Council consists of seven official and nominated members, and nine elected members. The two members whose seats were in question were, of course, not members of the Select Committee. The Secretary of State for the Colonies does not propose to take any action in the matter.

NAVAL KNIGHTS COLLEGE AT WINDSOR.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether the Admiralty has come to any decision in regard to the contemplated scheme for the better utilisation of the endowments connected with the College of the Naval Knights at Windsor; and, if so, when it will be promulgated?

LORD G. HAMILTON: Any alteration in the foundation of the Naval Knights of Windsor will require legislative sanction, and I do not propose to introduce a Bill to deal with the question this Session. This institution is founded on celibate and monastic principles, which in practice we find do not always harmonise with the habits of the 19th century, and it has been extremely difficult to find candidates who will carry out the spirit of the founder's wishes. Certain circumstances were brought to my notice last year which convinced me that a considerable change, sooner or later, is necessary to secure the benefits of the Trust to deserving naval officers.

METROPOLITAN RAILWAYS.

MR. COGHILL: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, in view of the great inconvenience that is caused to the public by the constant failure of the South Eastern Railway and the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway to keep to the times in their published time-tables, he will take steps to restrict these companies from putting more traffic and running more trains on their lines than they have the requisite accommodation for?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The matters referred to by the hon. Member are not among those with which Parliament has authorised the Board of Trade to deal.

MR. COGHILL: Am I to understand that the Board of Trade have no power to place any check or limit on the number of trains run in the course of a day; and, if so, has not the time arrived for the Department to come to the House and get further powers in this direction?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Most certainly not. In my opinion, that would be practically giving over to the Board of Trade the decision as to the working of the railways.

VOLUNTARY SCHOOLS IN WHITE-CHAPEL.

MR. MONTAGU (Tower Hamlets, Whitechapel): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether his attention has been called to the enormous increase in the rating of voluntary schools in Whitechapel; whether he is aware that in several instances the rating has been doubled and trebled, with the effect of rendering the existence of these schools most difficult; whether he is aware that, in the case of St. Stephen's School, Quaker Street, the rating has been raised from £20 to £92, and that, in consequence of the non-payment of rates, the furniture and a harmonium have been seized; and if he will take steps to prevent this increase in the rating of these voluntary schools?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): I am aware that a crushing addition to the rating of voluntary schools in the Metropolis was threatened, but no information has reached me as to the disastrous result which has attended the step in the school to which the hon. Member has referred. The Department has no power to interfere, but looking to the extreme gravity of the crisis in its probable effects upon many voluntary schools, I hope the support of the hon. Member will be accorded to any attempt that may be made to deal with the difficulty next Session.

METROPOLITAN OVERSEERS LISTS.

MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will grant the Return to be moved for to-day in reference to the Metropolitan Overseers Lists for the coming revision?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. STUART WORTLEY, Sheffield, Hallam): I am making inquiries as to whether this information can be obtained with sufficient accuracy for presentation to Parliament. In any case, the wording of the Return has to be very carefully considered; and it is not clear that it ought to be confined to the Metropolis. Should it seem desirable to extend the Return to the whole of the United Kingdom the Scotch and Irish Governments will have to be consulted.

AGRICULTURAL AND DAIRY EDUCATION IN WALES.

MR. S. T. EVANS: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture what is the amount expended out of the Exchequer during the past year towards the cost of Agricultural and Dairy Education and Attendant Expenses in Wales; and what portion of £8,000 estimated expenditure for Agricultural and Dairy Education for the year 1891-2 is allocated for England, Scotland, and Wales respectively?

MR. CHAPLIN: The grants to agricultural and dairy schools for agricultural experiments are not allocated according to any geographical considerations, but awarded to such institutions as in the judgment of the Board, after inspection and after consideration of the local support accorded, appear to have the highest claims for assistance. In 1890-91 a sum of £4,840 was expended in grants. Of this sum, £500 was awarded to the University College of North Wales at Bangor, the highest sum awarded by the Board to any institution in Great Britain. No other Welsh institution preferred a claim, but the Bath and West of England Agricultural Society received £350 in respect of its itinerant dairy classes in 1890-91, and among the counties visited by that Society were Radnor, Brecon, and Pembroke, so that a portion of this grant, which cannot be separately distinguished, was expended in supply agricultural instruction in South Wales.

SEAMEN'S HOSPITAL AT SMYRNA.

COLONEL HILL (Bristol, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to convert a portion of the Seamen's Hospital at the Port of Smyrna into a chapel; if so, whether he is aware that the available space in the hospital is barely adequate for the present wants, while the increasing trade of the port will certainly require additional accommodation; and whether, in consideration of the fact that even the reduced dues levied upon shipping for the support of the hospital more than defray the whole of the expenses, Her Majesty's Government will re-consider the proposal with a view to refusing its sanction?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: A suggestion to this effect was made, but upon investigation it has been rejected.

BRUSSELS ACT.

MR. CROSS: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the time for completing the Brussels Conference has been extended; and, if so, to what date; and whether he can state what action Her Majesty's Government propose to take in view of the course taken by France and Portugal?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The principle of extending the period for ratification has been accepted, but the limit has not been decided. Her Majesty's Government have concurred in this extension in view of the postponement of ratification by France, Portugal, and the United States. Nothing can be stated as to what course may be taken after the period is fixed.

THE ROXTETH RIFLE RANGE.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to a serious accident which occurred last week in Northolt Road, Eastcote, to Mr. Walter Heron, while passing along the road, whose skull was badly fractured by a bullet fired at the Roxteth rifle range; whether he is aware that for some years this range has been looked upon as dangerous to the public using the road; and whether steps will at once be taken to close the range?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: An accident on June 3 was reported in connection with one of the two ranges near Harrow used by the Volunteers. The ranges have been closed for some weeks pending inquiry.

THE INLAND REVENUE.

MR. COBB: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he can state when the reply will be sent to the Petition of the supervisors, officers, and assistants of Inland Revenue which was some time ago presented to the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury; whether he is aware that a considerable number of Members on both sides of the House have been asked to interest themselves upon the subject of the Petition, and that it will be raised and debated at length on the Estimates; and whether, with a view of saving the time of the House, he can, on an early day, make some statement which will be satisfactory to the petitioners and render any discussion on the Estimates unnecessary?

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover-square): I considered last year, with the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, the representations of the Excise staff, to whom the question of the hon. Member refers, and, after careful and prolonged examination, we came to the conclusion that on some points the officers made out a fair case, and that on other points they did not. In pursuance of this conclusion I sanctioned additions to the pay and allowances of the force, which involved a charge on the taxpayers rising in four or five years to nearly £70,000 a year. The memorial which is now before me raises one or two questions, such as that connected with the cost of agricultural statistics, which we have been able to meet, but, in the main, it asks for the concession of those points which neither I nor the Board of Inland Revenue thought ourselves justified in granting last year. So far as I see at present, the memorialists do not bring forward any substantial new reasons in support of their claims. At the same time, I am anxious that all members of the Service should feel that claims are thoroughly and carefully investigated and considered. This I can assure the House is done. With reference to the second part of the hon. Member's question, I am aware and deeply regret the fact that political pressure is sought to be put on Members of this House. Indeed, if this system of lobbying should go beyond its present dimensions, I can scarcely foresee the consequences which may ensue, both to the discipline of the force and the cost of the Service. But I hold that the Executive Government of the day is bound by every consideration of duty to be insensible to that pressure when they are not convinced of the equity of the claims which are urged. With reference to the last question, I doubt whether it will be possible for me to make any further statement satisfactory to the petitioners beyond that which I have now made; and, if necessary, I must defend our course in the Debates on the Estimates. At all events, I must not be influenced in a matter which would involve an additional burden of £100,000 on the taxpayer, beyond the increase of £70,000, the future burden of last year's concession, even for the purpose of saving the time of the House.

MR. COBB: Before a final reply is made, will it be possible for some of the petitioners to see personally the head officials at Somerset House in order that they may place their case before them?

*MR. GOSCHEN: That is a question for the Board of Inland Revenue to consider. As far as I am aware, the Board of Inland Revenue has shown the utmost desire to meet the view of all parties. I will communicate with the Board on the subject.

THE TRAINING SHIP "SOUTHAMPTON."

MR. ATKINSON (Boston): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will withdraw the order to refuse boys under 12 years of age admission to the Humber Training Ship Southampton, such a change being most likely to ruin a prosperous school ship; and whether he is aware that this change will only affect three school ships, and, therefore, cannot be founded upon any proper experience of harm done by accepting boys up to 12 years of age, the three ships in question having a most prosperous record of the work done by them during the last 25 years?

MR. MATTHEWS: The operation of this order has been suspended. I do not wish to dispute that excellent work has been done by the managers of these ships, and the inspectors do not specify any particular case of hardship having arisen on any particular ship as necessitating an alteration of the rule, but their experience has led them to the conclusion that it is to the public advantage, both on moral and physical grounds, and in the interests of effective training for sea service, that boys should not be admitted to these ships at a very tender age. The rule excluding boys under 12 is either in force, or agreed to by five out of the eight industrial school ships, and is compulsory on all school ships certified since 1876.

ANCIENT MONUMENTS IN EGYPT.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs what steps have yet been taken to carry out the promise of the Egyptian Government to appoint two inspectors charged with the duty of examining and taking steps for the due custody and preservation of the monuments of ancient Egypt; what sum it is proposed by the Egyptian Government to appropriate for the purpose of this preservation on the Ancient Monuments; and whether any Papers can be presented to Parliament relating to this subject?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: Nothing definite has yet been settled. £910,000 has been allotted in the Budget for the current year.

DAM ACROSS THE NILE.

MR. BRYCE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether there is any truth in the report that the Egyptian Government are considering a scheme for the construction of a dam across the Nile at the top of the First Cataract immediately below the Island of Philae; whether the effect of the construction of such a dam as is proposed would be to raise the summer or flood level of the Nile more than 50 feet above the point which it now reaches, and thereby to submerge for some weeks the greater part of the temples on the Island of Philae, effacing thereby the colour of the wall paintings, covering the columns and sculptured walls with mud, and involving the ultimate destruction of the temples themselves, which are among the most interesting monuments of Egyptian art; and whether alternative schemes have been suggested for the construction of dams at other points higher up the river than Philae, by which little or no injury would be done to any historic buildings, while the object of obtaining a reservoir of water supply would be equally well attained?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: There is no information in the Foreign Office with reference to this report. The hon. Member's question will be referred to Her Majesty's Acting Agent and Consul General at Cairo.

ASSAULT AT DRUMLAMPH.

MR. LEA (Londonderry, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that two men, named Porter and Fullerton, were assaulted without the least provocation on the evening of the 29th of June, at Drumlaph, in the County of Londonderry, by a band marching home from some party fete; that Porter was badly injured, and has been under medical care since; and that two constables were present but did not afford any protection, and can he explain why no proceedings have been taken against the assailants?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The Constabulary Authorities report that it is the case that the two men named were injured by members of a band. Warrants have been issued against two men charged with the offence, and who, it is reported, have absconded; but every effort is being made to effect their arrest. One constable was present. A complaint was made against him by the injured men, and the County Inspector at once took steps to have it inquired into. The case against the constable is still sub judice.

DEATH FROM EXPOSURE.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that James Gallagher, upwards of 80 years of age, who in a distress state lived in the village of Ardhoum, electoral division of Meelick, was obliged to travel over four miles every day to relief works in another division, and that he was taken ill from exposure on 17th June, and died on 20th, and whether it would be possible to open relief works in the division of Meelick, so as to render it unnecessary for old and feeble these works were advanced to the Local Drainage Board by whom the money was disbursed. The first estimate was £74,000. The excess over that amount was sanctioned by the Board of Works on the application of the Drainage Board. Of this excess about £25,000 arises from the accumulation of interest on the advances, owing to the delay which took place in executing the works. The cost of maintaining the works will vary, and under good management by the Local Board may be considerably less than £1,000 per annum. The accounts of expenditure have from time to time been furnished to the Board of Works by the Drainage Board, properly signed and dated, and have been duly audited by the Board of Works Accountant.

IRISH RELIEF WORKS.

MR. FOLEY (Galway, Connemara): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that numbers of the poor people in the Division of Selerna were struck off the relief works at this most critical period of the year, leaving them without any sustenance whatever; if he will instruct the Local Government Board to have them at once reinstated to prevent widespread distress; and if he will also take steps to provide relief works for the starving people of Leam, who have been deprived of work in consequence of one of the gangers being sent away, no work having been laid out for him?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I believe it is the case that a number of persons have been struck off the relief works at Selerna, but only after a careful inquiry into the circumstances showed that the continuance of relief was not necessary. As to the last paragraph of the question, perhaps the hon. Member will put it down again, further defining the district.

In reply to Mr. SEXTON,

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said: There is no date fixed for the continuance of relief works, but the condition of the different localities is taken into account.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if it is true that a number of relief works instituted by the Government in West and South Cork will be left unfinished, and that it is proposed to tax the cess payers of the County of Cork, as suggested by the County Surveyor to the West Riding of the County of Cork, to supply the alleged deficiency; and, if so, which of the works in course of construction will be left unfinished?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not yet been able to obtain the information that would enable me to answer this question.

DR. TANNER: At what date will the right hon. Gentleman be prepared to answer it?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Probably to-morrow.

DR. TANNER: Then I will repeat the question to-morrow.

POTATO BLIGHT.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture which of the proposed remedies for potato blight is considered the best for use in Ireland, namely, the sulphate of copper dressing, the sulphate of iron, or Bichon's patent remedy; and whether, in the opinion of experts, any of these dressings can be successfully applied without complete destruction of all infective refuse and thorough preparation of the soil where an infected crop has been recently grown?

MR. CHAPLIN: What is most desirable in Ireland is a matter, I think, more for the opinion of the Chief Secretary than mine; but, generally speaking, I may say that the question of the best remedy for potato blight is now the subject of a series of experiments which are being carried out for the Board of Agriculture by the Royal Agricultural Society in England, and by the Highland and Agricultural Society in Scotland. I believe that further experiments are also being made in Ireland. Until these experiments have been reported on, I shall not be in a position to give a definite reply to the hon. Member's question. All the information in the possession of the Board of Agriculture respecting foreign experiments and the steps to be taken as to the destruction of infective refuse has been published in the Report of the Intelligence Department of the Board and in a recent leaflet, and in that Report special attention is directed to the necessity of destroying all infective refuse.

Ireland if any instructions could be given to relieve from the severity of immediate arrest engine drivers whose engines may accidentally cause death on railway lines; is it the fact that, even in cases where suicide is committed by persons throwing themselves under the engine, the arrest of the driver follows; and, as engine drivers, when arrested in these cases, are frequently wet, cold, and hungry after their trips, will the attention of the police be called to the great hardship of detaining them overnight in the cells to await magisterial investigation instead of taking their names, or allow some discretion to the police, at any rate, where the driver himself reports the occurrence?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University) promised to make inquiries on the subject.

QUEEN'S COLLEGE, IRELAND.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in the event of vacancies arising in the Chairs of the Irish Queen's Colleges, the claims of properly qualified Queen's College students will be taken into account; and if the Queen's Colleges are unable to turn out men so qualified, will the Government consider the propriety of decreasing (or discontinuing) grants to these Colleges?

MR. RENTOUL (Down, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the education given in the Queen's Colleges in Ireland has been proved by all possible tests, such as the examinations for the Indian Civil Service and other public appointments, to be equal or superior to that of any other colleges in the Empire; whether he is aware that the Queen's Colleges cannot always produce the best men for their own professorships owing to the fact that the Queen's Colleges have not got fellowships which would enable their students to pursue their studies to such an extent as to fit them for professorships; and whether, in view of this excellence on the part of the Queen's Colleges, as far as their endowments enable them to go, he will, in the event of the Queen's College students not being found sufficiently learned for any professorships that may shortly become vacant, consider the propriety of increasing the grants to these colleges so as to found fellowships connected with them?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The claims of all properly qualified Queen's College students who may be candidates for vacancies in the chairs of the Irish Queen's Colleges will receive careful consideration. There is no reason to suppose that these colleges are unable to turn out men so qualified, but in promoting the usefulness of these institutions it is considered advisable to open the chairs to all comers, and to select from among them the man who appears best qualified for the duties. The students of these colleges have in all professions and in the public competitions acquitted themselves with honour to themselves and with credit to their colleges.

LOUGH ERNE.

MR. H. CAMPBELL (Fermanagh, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Local Board at Enniskillen, by whom the Lough Erne works of arterial drainage and navigation have been carried out during a period of ten years, was under the supervision and control of the Commissioners of Public Works in Dublin; were all moneys advanced by the Treasury disbursed by the Commissioners of Public Works; is he aware that the Commissioners, although in 1880 they approved an estimate of £74,000, to be repaid from 17,500 flooded acres, on 9th October 1890 sanctioned an outlay of £178,330, and that, in addition, there is a yearly charge of £1,000 for the maintenance of the works, repayable in 98 half-yearly instalments of £3,631 3s. 2d. each; is he also aware that the Commissioners have made this award upon accounts furnished without date, audit, or signature; and whether, having regard to all the peculiar circumstances of the case, the Government will grant a sworn inquiry into the matters, to be held in Enniskillen, the central town of the drainage district?

MR. JACKSON: The Lough Erne Drainage Works were carried out by the Local Drainage Board, who were not under the supervision or control of the Board of Works. The loans sanctioned by the Treasury for the execution of these works were advanced to the Local Drainage Board by whom the money was disbursed. The first estimate was £74,000. The excess over that amount was sanctioned by the Board of Works on the application of the Drainage Board. Of this excess about £25,000 arises from the accumulation of interest on the advances, owing to the delay which took place in executing the works. The cost of maintaining the works will vary, and under good management by the Local Board may be considerably less than £1,000 per annum. The accounts of expenditure have from time to time been furnished to the Board of Works by the Drainage Board, properly signed and dated, and have been duly audited by the Board of Works Accountant.

IRISH RELIEF WORKS.

MR. In reply to Mr. SEXTON,

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said: There is no date fixed for the continuance of relief works, but the condition of the different localities is taken into account.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if it is true that a number of relief works instituted by the Government in West and South Cork will be left unfinished, and that it is proposed to tax the cess payers of the County of Cork, as suggested by the County Surveyor to the West Riding of the County of Cork, to supply the alleged deficiency; and, if so, which of the works in course of construction will be left unfinished?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not yet been able to obtain the information that would enable me to answer this question.

DR. TANNER: At what date will the right hon. Gentleman be prepared to answer it?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Probably to-morrow.

DR. TANNER: Then I will repeat the question to-morrow.

POTATO BLIGHT.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture which of the proposed remedies for potato blight is considered the best for use in Ireland, namely, the sulphate of copper dressing, the sulphate of iron, or Bichon's patent remedy; and whether, in the opinion of experts, any of these dressings can be successfully applied without complete destruction of all infective refuse and thorough preparation of the soil where an infected crop has been recently grown?

TULLAMORE PRISON.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will communicate to this House the terms of the Report of the Experts on the sanitary condition of Tullamore Prison?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There will be no objection raised on behalf of the Government if the hon. Member desires to move for a return of Reports of Sir Charles Cameron and Mr. Kaye Parry on the drainage of Tullamore Prison.

PIER AT RED GAP.

MR. JORDAN (Clare, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he has received any resolution or memorial from the inhabitants of Labasheeda, county Clare, in reference to the building of a pier at Red Gap on the Shannon, from which to ship and unload the imports and exports of that locality; and whether, having regard to the fact that when the Lord Lieutenant was on his late tour in that district, Colonel Lloyd and Mr. Reeves brought him to Red Gap, pointed out the necessity for the pier, and obtained His Excellency's promise that it would be erected, and also to the fact that there is neither pier nor landing stage nearer Labasheeda than 7 miles on the one side and 12 on the other, he will advise or authorise the erection of a small pier at this point?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is the case that a memorial signed by Mr. Reeves, Colonel Lloyd, and others, praying for the construction of a pier at the place mentioned was forwarded to the Lord Lieutenant; but there is nothing to suggest that His Excellency gave a promise of the nature stated. On the contrary the memorial expresses regret at his inability to visit the place. On the general question, however, I may say that having regard to the large sums of money recently provided by Parliament for public works in Ireland the Government would not feel justified at the present time in bringing forward proposals for further grants.

THE CRIMES ACT.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland how many prosecutions of men on strike have been made under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Perhaps the hon. Member will repeat the question on a later day. I have not been able to obtain the information.

WEST CORK MAILS.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Postmaster General what was the exact amount which the proposed acceleration of the mails to Skibbereen and West Cork would cost; and whether the Cork and Bandon and West Cork Railway had offered any facilities in the matter?

*MR. RAIKES: The Railway Company expressed their readiness to afford the suggested acceleration of the day mail train for a further payment by the Post Office of £2,703 a year, to that extent increasing the cost of a service on which there is already a loss of £1,680 a year.

THE PLYMOUTH TRADE UNION CASE.

MR. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck): Will the Home Secretary lay on the Table a copy of the judgment of the Court of Appeal in the Plymouth Trade Union case?

MR. MATTHEWS: If an authentic copy of the Judgment of the Court of Appeal in the Plymouth Trade Union case can be obtained, I shall have no objection to cause it to be issued as a Parliamentary Paper.

PUBLIC BUSINESS.

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): I wish to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he can now answer the question which I put to him yesterday, whether, in the event of his Motion for the suspension of the Twelve o'clock Rule being accepted, he will on the part of the Government undertake to oppose after 12 o'clock all private Members' Bills as to which notice of opposition may have been given?

MR. LEA (Londonderry, S.): If private Members will not come down to air their obstructive tactics after 12 o'clock, is it the business of the Government to do anything to assist them?

*SIR J. SWINBURNE (Stafford, Lichfield): Will the Chancellor of the Exchequer include the Hanover Chapel Bill in those measures which the Government will oppose after 12 o'clock?

MR. GOSCHEN: The question put by the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Robertson) really concerns the House more than the Government, and I can well conceive that there may be two opinions on the subject. There are, as the hon. Member is aware, certain Bills which are almost unanimously approved by the House. There is one private Member's Bill, for instance, on which there is a considerable feeling on both sides, and that is the Betting of Infants Bill. Members on both sides almost unanimously desire to see that Bill passed. If it were the general wish of the House, I should cheerfully accede to the view of the hon. Member, but I am reluctant to exclude all possibility of Bills being advanced which the House almost unanimously desires to see passed, and I should not like to exclude them without further consideration and inquiry. I will make further inquiry, and endeavour to ascertain the views of hon. Members in all parts of the House on the subject.

*MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire): Will the Army and Navy Votes be taken after the Civil Service Estimates?

MR. SEXTON: When will the Lords' Amendments to the Irish Land Purchase Bill be taken?

*SIR J. SWINBURNE: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered my question in reference to the Hanover Chapel Bill.

MR. GOSCHEN: The Hanover Chapel Bill is a private Bill, and must follow the ordinary procedure. It is proposed to take the Lords' Amendments to the Irish Land Purchase Bill on this day week, if that falls in with the general wish of the House. It is not proposed to take the remaining Army Votes until Class 4 of the Civil Service Estimates has been passed.

MR. MUNDELLA: When will the Education Statement be made?

MR. GOSCHEN: It will be made when we reach Class 4.

MR. MUNDELLA: It is usual to give notice beforehand.

MR. GOSCHEN: I will endeavour to meet the view of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): May I ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer to pledge the Government that when Government business extends to one o'clock, private Members' Bills shall then be opposed by the Front Bench, so that Members who have given notice of opposition shall not be compelled to attend after that hour?

MR. GOSCHEN: The latter proposal I will accept at once. If the House has gone on sitting beyond one o'clock there ought to be no necessity for any hon. Member to come down. I thought that was understood.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Will Classes 2, 3, and 4 of the Estimates be taken in regular order?

MR. GOSCHEN: Yes, without interruption.

MR. H. CAMPBELL: When will the Irish Estimates be considered?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: They will be taken in their order. I cannot forecast the time which will be occupied with the Estimates which intervene, but I hope it will not be long.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): May I ask, Mr. Speaker, whether the half-past 12 o'clock rule still obtains, or whether it has been repealed?

*MR. SPEAKER: The half-past 12 o'clock rule does not exist.

NEW MEMBER SWORN.

John Hammond, esquire, for the County of Carlow.

NAVY (SQUADRONS ABROAD).

Copy ordered—

"Of Return showing the Comparative Strength of our Naval Squadrons Abroad in June, 1886, and June, 1891."—(Lord George Hamilton.)

Copy presented accordingly; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 343.]

MOTION.

SITTINGS OF THE HOUSE (SUPPLY AND WAYS AND MEANS).

(4.25.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That for the remainder of the Session the proceedings of the Committees of Supply and Ways and Means be not interrupted under the provisions of any Standing Order regulating the Sittings of the House, and may be entered upon at any hour, though opposed."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

MR. ATKINSON (Boston): I beg to move, as an Amendment to the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman—

"That this House regrets the manner in which the privileges of hon. Members are constantly being taken away, and by way of protest against such Motion, declines to accept the proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer."

*MR. SPEAKER: I am afraid that the Amendment is not relevant to the Motion. The Motion refers only to the taking away of the Twelve o'clock Rule, and the rights of private Members are scarcely affected thereby.

MR. ATKINSON: Then I presume that I may speak against the Motion if that is in order?

*MR. SPEAKER: Quite in order.

MR. ATKINSON: I think that five minutes may be usefully employed in showing that private Members are treated very badly by both Front Benches. It seems to me that it is no use a Member coming into Parliament as a private Member, even if he should express the opinions of all the people of England, because the two Front Benches make little arrangements of their own by which everybody is to be smothered unless he is a right honourable or hopes to become one. [An hon. MEMBER: That means everybody.] It does not include me. I am not one, and never shall be one; but I know that in regard to many important Bills which have been brought before the House, the opinion of the people is my opinion. Take, for instance, the Sunday Closing Bill for Ireland, and also for England and Wales. I consider those Bills better than any 10 Bills which either the Government or the Opposition have produced in the present Session. The People of England—with a capital "P"—will be more glad to have those Bills than any which will be passed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and his Colleagues, or the Front Bench opposite either, even if the Session lasts until the 31st of December. The Front Benches play into the hands of each other, and ignore their friends. It is very discouraging to men who give up their time and energy, and occasionally make themselves ill in trying to do their duty to their constituents, to find that their leaders treat them with contempt—I mean, of course, in a Parliamentary sense. I do not say that the right honourables insult them. They say they will do the best they can for them, but nothing ever comes of it. Having some very good measures of my own, the Second Reading of which has been accepted by both sides, I think I and my constituents are as much entitled to be heard as right hon. Gentlemen. I am as much a Member of Parliament as any one of them, and I feel as much sense of my own importance as they do. Consequently, I protest against the Resolution being carried, because it is not the proper method of doing business, and to show that I am not to be treated in this way, I shall certainly divide the House. In another Session I will obstruct a good deal further, because then I shall do as the hon. Member for Northampton said he would do at the beginning of this Session. If I cannot propose my Bill, which I consider better than those of the Government, I will show that I am not to be defeated in this way. I think I am entitled to speak for my constituents as well as other Members for theirs.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I have listened to the eloquent and wise discourse of the hon. Member, and I feel bound, as one who seldom speaks here, to give him my warm sympathy and assistance. I sincerely hope that he will stick to his point in the way he has indicated, and that he will defeat this proposition put forward by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I feel very deeply the insult which is offered to Ireland. I have a little Bill of great importance to the labourers of Ireland. It is to grant them half an acre or an acre of land; but the opportunity for it is past. I protest against the time of the House being taken in this fashion, and the injustice which is being done to Irish Members.

(4.35.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I listened with great interest to the instructive, and what I call the noble protest of the hon. Member for Boston against the coercion of private Members. I think the time has come when they ought to deliver themselves from the slavery under which they have laboured. I also agree with him that the several measures which he has mentioned are more deserving of attention than most of those which have been proposed by Her Majesty's Government. I believe measures of Sunday closing in Ireland, and in other places, are more valued by the country than the measures which have been passed by the Government. Sir, you have pointed out with perfect truth that these observations have not a direct bearing upon the Motion before the House, because sitting beyond 12 o'clock will not in any way affect the chances of private Members. I am afraid I myself come under the displeasure of the hon. Member for Boston, for he has levelled his complaints against gentlemen sitting on both Front Benches. Still, I think both sides of the House are anxious to bring the Session to a close, especially after they have been put to the inconvenience of meeting in November; and, under the circumstances, Supply should have been put in a prominent place, that it might be properly discussed. Over and over again I have said that any attempt to reduce the Votes by a few pounds is seldom successfully attempted, but it is a great opportunity to question and examine the conduct of the Executive Government in all its departments. To thrust Supply to the fag end of the Session is, therefore, practically to defeat the inquisition which the House of Commons has the right and the duty to perform. It is quite plain that at the fag end of the Session a great number of Members must be away, and that the Government are placed in a position with reference to Supply which they would not be in if it were brought on at a proper time of the Session. I confess that when this Motion is made it is right we should protest against the position in which we find ourselves with regard to Supply. Ireland is now lying under the exceptional law of the Coercion Bill, and Irish Members have a special right in Committee of Supply to question the action of the Executive Government, and it is very hard upon them, I think, that they should be placed at any disadvantage in matters of this kind. With regard to the Motion, I hope the right hon. Gentleman will give the House the assurance that if this Motion is passed the Government will not abuse the licence, and that it is not meant to extend the sitting beyond one o'clock. If it is only intended that the strict rule of 12 o'clock shall not interfere with securing a Vote which has been discussed, and that it is not intended to extend the sittings to an unreasonable hour, I for one shall not be disposed to oppose the Motion.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): As I said yesterday, this is a grievance to Ireland. We have protested from time to time against the unbusinesslike way in which Supply is conducted. As the right hon. Gentleman has said, we are living under an exceptional coercive law, and owing to the extent which in recent Sessions and this Session, the Government have taken the time of private Members, we are deprived of all opportunity to call attention to Irish administration save in Committee of Supply. Is it not scandalous, does it not involve a most injurious reflection on the capacity of Members, that after a Session of eight months, not one Irish Vote has been taken, and we have had no opportunity of calling attention to the action of the Irish Secretary with regard to the Coercion Act? It is an intolerable grievance to be obliged to consider these Votes when the House is empty, and under conditions which preclude the public press from reporting discussion in which the country is deeply interested. I would point out that on the order of the Votes the Scotch Votes will be taken first, and it is very likely indeed that the Irish Votes will not be reached until after midnight. I move as an Amendment—"Provided that no Irish Vote in Supply be proceeded with after 12 o'clock."

Amendment proposed, at the end of the Question, to add the words "Provided that no Irish Votes in Supply be proceeded with after midnight."—(Mr. Sexton.)

(4.46.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): If the Chancellor of the Exchequer assents to the Amendment, I shall move that no English Vote be proceeded with after 12 o'clock, and I have no doubt my hon. Friend the Member for Kirkcaldy will take a similar course with regard to Scotch Votes. The fact is, we are all suffering from an intolerable grievance, and we must take our chance. I ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer for some sort of assurance, and a positive assurance, that next Session we shall have an opportunity of discussing the Estimates. I confess I am unable to see why we should go to bed at 12 any more than at any other hour; so, personally, I have no feeling in the matter. At the same time, I know that after 12 o'clock there is difficulty in reporting discussions in which our constituents are interested. There is, however, a general desire to bring this Session to an early close, and I therefore hope the Chancellor of the Exchequer will assure us that he will not go beyond a little after 12 o'clock or a quarter to 1. I know from experience that our Irish friends are able to lengthen a Debate on any particular Vote, and in that respect they can always take better care of themselves than we unfortunate English can take care of ourselves. The fact is, the poor Englishman is nowhere in this House. Scotch and Irish Members occupy the time, and we are introduced in the interstices of Debate to discuss matters of millions and millions of pounds. I cannot vote with my hon. Friends, because I have my own grievance, and I cannot redress their grievances at the expense of my own.

MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): I wish to point out that it is an invaluable rule which provides that the Votes shall be taken in their consecutive order, and I would remind the right hon. Gentleman that Vote 4 has always been succeeded by the Minister's statement. We have not yet had that statement for the year, and it is one of which we have always received due notice. Is that course to be pursued this year, and are Members to have the Report of the Inspectors as usual, and before the annual statement is made?

MR. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I wish to know whether there is any possible chance of discussing the Eight Hours Bill? [Laughter.] Hon. Members may laugh at a question in which millions and millions of our workpeople are engaged; but I am within the recollection of the House when I say that the First Lord of the Treasury made a promise—a half promise, or section of a promise—that he would find a day for the discussion of the measure.

*(4.52.) THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): As I am one of the victims of the eloquence of my hon.

Friend behind me, being one of the Members of the Front Bench, I can assure him that there is no desire whatever to suppress either the individuality or the legislative desires of any of those who sit behind us, and I should be sorry if there is any lurking feeling that any discourtesy was intended either to himself personally or to any hon. Members. In answer to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby and the hon. Member for Northampton, I have to say that the Government do not propose to sit beyond a reasonable hour after 12 o'clock. Our intention is rather to remove the limit than to extend the Sitting. The convenience of the officers of the House would be considered, and the House may rely upon it that we should only propose to sit so long as we had the general concurrence of hon. Members; we would not push matters beyond an hour which was convenient to them. I am sorry that I cannot assent to the Amendment of the hon. Member for West Belfast, and the hon. Member for Northampton has shown that it would be extremely hard on the members of other nationalities. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby said Irish Members have a special grievance; but I would point out to them that 34 or 35 days were devoted to the Irish Land Purchase Bill, in which Irish Members took a very considerable interest, and, although they have not had time for the discussion of special grievances, I think it will be seen that they have had a fair share of the full time of the House. However, I recognise the special circumstances of Ireland, and it is natural that Irish Members should desire to be able to discuss their grievances on Votes of Supply. But an Irish Estimate might come on early, and might be stopped by one or two Members about midnight. I can assure the Irish Members that there will be no attempt to prolong the Sittings after 12 o'clock against their desire. But a Vote may have been discussed from 8 to 12 o'clock, and may only have reached its termination when 12 o'clock arrived, and though it probably might have passed in another half-hour, we should be obliged to stop its consideration at 12 o'clock.

MR. SEXTON: How if an important Vote came on at half-past 11?

*MR. GOSCHEN: If there was no chance of getting the Vote we should be prepared to deal with it in the spirit I have indicated. I put it broadly that there is no intention to force discussion; all that is intended is the introduction of a little elasticity in dealing with Supply, thereby affording a better opportunity of taking important Votes at a reasonable hour. With regard to the question of the hon. Member for Lanark, I see very little hope of taking any discussion on the Eight Hours Bill in the present Session; but the Government are not at all insensible of the immense importance of the question, and the interest which is taken in it out of doors. The appointment of the Labour Commission is surely an indication of the desire of the Government that these questions should be thoroughly threshed out. As to giving a positive pledge that Supply shall be taken earlier next year, I am afraid that it would be useless to give the hon. Member for Northampton a vague assurance. But I would point out that it is quite possible that Members might be so much interested in a Bill as to bring pressure to bear upon the Government to push it forward before taking Supply. I am sure, therefore, that every Member of the House will see that it is really out of my power to give any positive pledge as to Supply, and clearly it would not be of any use to give any vague assurance. Still, it will be remembered that a certain portion of Supply was taken early this year, and, with regard to the observation of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, that there ought to be a serious inquisition of the Foreign, and Colonial, and other Departments, I would observe that both the Foreign and Colonial Votes were pretty fully discussed, and that the inquisition which he thinks ought to take place should take place in the course of the present Session. With regard to the Education Vote, I will communicate with my right hon. Friend the Vice President and see whether his statement can be taken as usual as the first Order of the Day.

*(5.0.) MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): Whatever course the hon. Member for West Belfast may take, I hope the House will emphatically protest against the proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and that we will teach this and successive Governments that they must bring forward the Estimates at a very much earlier period of the Session. I may say with truth that the speeches made in the recent discussions in Supply showed an honest desire on the part of the Members on this side of the House that the business of Supply should not be delayed. To discuss items of Supply after 12 o'clock, when there is a handful of Members, and those half asleep or so impatient that they drown the speaker's voice by cries of "Divide," is an absolute farce. It is absurd to ask Members to vote millions of the money of the labouring classes of this country at 1 or 2 o'clock in the morning. I hope we shall divide the House, and that a large minority—we have no chance of a majority—will teach this and succeeding Governments that the Estimates shall be taken at a time when they can be fairly considered.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): There is no disposition on this side of the House to deny that the time has arrived when the Government may fairly ask for some concession. It was promised that we should rise by the 1st July, and it should not be forgotten that in November and December the Government made unparalleled progress. They got the Address after two hours' debate, and the Second Reading of the Land Purchase Bill in the course of two or three days. They also got the Land Department Bill, and they met at the end of January with a clean slate and two months ahead. I do not understand how it is the Government have got into distress as they have, but I feel that the promise made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer is not unreasonable, and I do not think my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast (Mr. Sexton) will be disposed to press his opposition. At the same time, I am bound to say that, when Governments ask the House for time, they are much more disposed to make promises than they afterwards are to perform them. The speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer reminds me very much of a speech made by the First Lord of the Treasury, whose absence we all regret when he was moving the closure rule. The right hon. Gentleman then told us that it was only to be used when every body had spoken except two or three Members. We all know that the moment the Government got the closure into their hands a Member could hardly open his mouth before the closure was moved. I am sure, however, that the Government will adhere to their promises on the present occasion. For my part, I have never been sorry when Estimates have been rushed through at the end of the Session, because I think we have much more power to extort concessions from the Government under such circumstances than when Supply is finished earlier in the Session. As I understand, we are this year to address ourselves to Class II. of the Irish Estimates first. There are two Votes standing over from Class I.—those relating to railways and the Board of Works—and I will ask the Government whether it is intended to take those two Votes before dealing with the more important Votes in Class II.?

*(5.3.) MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I desire to protest against this attempt to interfere with the rights of private Members. The Motion has been thrown upon us without any explanation or any excuse being given; and when the Chancellor of the Exchequer did attempt to answer some questions put to him he did not endeavour to give any reasons for the adoption of his proposal. There is no complaint whatever, either inside or outside this House, of any obstruction or attempted obstruction in regard to Supply. [Cries of "Oh!"] It is all very well for hon. Members opposite to indulge in these inhuman cries. I will appeal to the leading organ of the Government, the Times, which stated distinctly yesterday that there is no attempt, in their opinion, at obstruction in the discussion of the Estimates. This proposal is especially hard upon those who attempt to take an interest in the spending of the people's money. Nobody will deny that the most important part of our duty in this House is to supervise that expenditure. The Government have really nothing to gain by their proposal, because, at the very utmost, we should be only asked to stay a few days later if the 12 o'clock Rule were not suspended. I do not believe we shall be able to beat the Government to-day, but I hope the time is coming—perhaps it will come next Session—when we shall have a day a week from the commencement of the Session for the discussion of the Estimates. The Government have occupied all the time of the Session; first of all, in giving money to their friends in the Church out of the tithes, then in giving their friends the landlords of Ireland, as much of the public money as they could; and then in protecting the Church schools. When the greater part of the Session has been occupied in this way, we are asked to pass all the Estimates in the course of a few days. The greatest grievance of all is that they will not even give us tea and coffee at the bar outside.

MR. SEXTON: I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Longford (Mr. T. Healy) that the concession made by the right hon. Gentleman is reasonable, namely, that no Irish Vote shall be pressed to an issue after 12 o'clock against our will. [Cries of "No!"] That is the concession as I understand it.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I will consult with my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary as to the precise time at which Classes I. and II. of the Irish Votes shall be taken. With regard to the remark of the hon. Member for West Belfast, what I said was that no important Irish business should be taken after 12 o'clock against the protest of the Irish Members. There would be no wish to force any Vote through against the wish of any considerable body of the House. I include the Irish Members in that. I trust they will facilitate matters also, and will not stop the Irish Votes at 12 o'clock if they are going through.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I am glad to hear the right hon. Gentleman say he will consult the Chief Secretary for Ireland. It has been the habit in former Sessions to make arrangements for the discussion of the Irish Votes which would conduce to the convenience of hon. Members from Ireland, who are placed at considerable disadvantage by the fact that they are so far from their homes. I hope special arrangements will be made on this occasion to meet the difficulties in which they are placed.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): Will the right hon. Gentleman adopt the same course in regard to Scotland, and take the Vote for the equivalent grant before the ordinary Estimates?

*MR. GOSCHEN: What we propose to do with regard to the Scottish Grant is to take it at the conclusion of Class IV., after the Free Education Vote has been passed.

SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): I think the Vote would come far more fitly after Vote 31 than in Class IV.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I will consider the point.

(5.10.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): I think the explanation of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is very satisfactory, and I should feel inclined not to vote against the Resolution, but for the fact that the whole of the private Members' time on Tuesdays and Fridays has been taken away by the Government, and that, now we are bringing forward our grievances in Committee of Supply, we are to have the Twelve o'clock Rule suspended. I wish to ask why the services of the Deputy Chairman should not be used every evening at dinner time. We lose two hours and a half a week by not employing him. I think also it would be better to meet earlier, say at 1 or 2 o'clock, than to sit later than we do at present. [Cries of "Oh!"] Of course, Members who give merely the fag-end of their day to Parliamentary work will object to such a proposal, but I protest against the business of the country being arranged merely to suit the convenience of professional men who devote merely their odd hours to their duties as legislators.

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): The Chancellor of the Exchequer says the House is fairly unanimous with regard to the Infants Bill, and he has expressed his own approval of it. This Bill is one of great importance, and I do not think any measure which extends the criminal law should pass this House without adequate discussion. I would suggest that, as the Bill is regarded as so important by the Government, they should give their own time for its discussion, and should report Progress some night, say at 10 o'clock, so as to allow of its discussion.

MR. A. M'ARTHUR (Leicester): I hope my hon. Friend will not put the House to the trouble of a Division. At the same time I must point out that private Members have been placed at a very great disadvantage year after year and Session after Session, and that they have been worse treated this Session than in previous Sessions. Under these circumstances, if the Amendment is pressed I shall vote for it.

DR. TANNER: I wish to support what was said by the hon. Member for Dundee. If the Government are anxious to pass a Betting Bill they should use their own counters.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put.

(5.15.) The House divided:—Ayes 175; Noes 89.—(Div. List, No. 351.)

Ordered, That for the remainder of the Session the proceedings of the Committees of Supply and Ways and Means be not interrupted under the provisions of any Standing Order regulating the Sittings of the House, and may be entered upon at any hour, though opposed.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 416.]

PUBLIC WORKS LOAN BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Jackson, Bill to grant money for the purpose of certain Local Loans, and for other purposes relating to Local Loans, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Jackson and Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 417.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES, 1891-2.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS II.

1. £8,944, to complete the sum for the Lunacy Commission, England.

(5.27.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): Last night, just before 12 o'clock, this Vote was very nearly being taken, and I thought that if hon. Members had read the Reports of the Commissioners, which are full of the most distressing facts, they would not have been willing to agree to this Vote without making a strong effort to do something more for the benefit of the poor people dealt with by the Commission. One point to which I wish particularly to draw attention is the large number of suicides that take place in the asylums, and I think the fact furnishes ground for believing that sufficient supervision is not exercised over the patients. A great number of these suicides have been allowed to take place in consequence of neglect. Another feature of the Reports is the extraordinary number of these unfortunate people who appear to get their ribs broken without any definite cause being distinctly proved to have brought about the result. The number of cases this year is about the same as last year. In every case, when it comes to be investigated, we find that there are chances of these poor afflicted people being treated with brutality by the attendants or warders. That in itself ought to cause us to demand some explanation. Take the case of "T.C.," a man aged 34 who was in the Cumberland and Westmoreland Asylum. That unfortunate man was subject only to slight seizures. He slept in the observation dormitory. One night he attempted to rise from his bed; an attendant rushed over and he fell back on the bed. The attendant held him for five minutes. It is said that no blow was struck, and that the patient did not make any complaint of ill-usage. Two hours later, however, he complained of pain, and he died soon afterwards. It was subsequently found that there was a rent more than two inches long in the intestines. Speaking as a medical man, I say that could not have been brought about without some severe injury being inflicted on this unfortunate man. There is evidently brutality at work in the wards of some of your asylums—brutality that ought not to be overlooked—and we ought to try by every means in our power to safeguard the well-being of these unfortunate persons. The next case occurred in the Kent County Asylum. The patient was 60 years of age. He had no injury of any kind on his admission to the asylum on the 14th of August. He died on the 20th of June. On the 21st a certificate of death was given to the effect that he had died from general paralysis, accelerated by fracture of the ribs and sternum. The jury found death was due to natural causes; but the injuries found on a post-mortem examination were the fracture of 12 ribs and the breaking in of the breast bone. In another case a man in the Rainhill (Lancashire) Asylum had nine ribs fractured. At Colney Hatch a man 79 years old had two ribs broken. There are a large number of these cases year after year. Then there are a number of patients who die from suffocation. In nearly all these cases they are supposed to be of suicidal tendencies, but still the deaths constantly occur, mostly amongst the epileptic patients. Most of the wards in the asylum in which epileptic cases are treated are too large as a rule. You find a number of cases this year in which these unfortunate people have been smothered in their sleep and the attendants in three or four cases have stated on oath they had seen their patients 10 or 12 minutes previously, and when they came the next time the poor creatures were dead. Well, that ought not to be, and I think the sooner some strong steps are taken in this matter the better. Then in all these Reports you find complaints made by the Commissioners of limited space. You find allegations made that there is an increase of lunacy, and, that being so, existing lunatic asylums have not sufficient accommodation, overcrowding follows, and disastrous results. Going through this book it is very evident there is a want of accommodation. Then, again, it is evident that the licensed houses where patients are allowed to be kept are not so much on the wane as they were when the first Act was introduced some three or four years ago, and that is a disadvantage. There can be no doubt, and I defy any medical man who goes into the matter and sees these places to deny it, that there is nothing to be said in favour of the private asylums as against the public asylums open to public inspection and looked after by public Trustees. I hope to see the day when there will be no such thing as a private lunatic asylum. I regret, however, to find that the number of private asylums is not decreasing. We find in the Report of the Commissioners that they only pay one visit in 12 months to some of these asylums. That is a lamentable state of affairs, and under it you certainly will have a laxity in the conduct of these asylums. Then I notice that in the average cost the county asylums show a lower rate than the borough asylums, the county asylums average 8s. 7½d., and the borough asylums 10s. 1½d. per head. This is somewhat strange, for it seems to me that with an asylum in a borough the cost of all supplies should be less than in the country. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman can throw a little light on the point. I know that Irish asylums do not come into this Vote, but I mention by way of illustration we have a large asylum outside Cork—

THE CHAIRMAN: This part of the subject is not under the control of the Lunacy Commissioners.

DR. TANNER: It is reported upon here in this Book, which is supposed to throw light upon the Vote with which we are dealing; but, of course, Sir, if you say it is not in order I will discontinue my argument, hoping that we shall have some explanation as to this difference in cost in counties and boroughs. Then I find the Commissioners express themselves against the practice in workhouses of appointing pauper attendants to inmates of unsound mind. There is much on this point calling for remark. In these workhouse asylums you find several instances of these poor people being struck by pauper assistants with fatal result. The Commissioners report very strongly against the employment of such assistants, and I hope we shall hear the last of the practice. It is better to have persons mentally afflicted under the care of persons who will treat the patient according to proper medical methods, and apply the proper remedies for different phases of the disease. On the evils of overcrowding, the Commissioners make many remarks, and they give numerous instances of asylums in many counties and boroughs where the accommodation is insufficient to meet the increasing requirements. There must be something radically wrong in your system when, year after year, the same complaints are made. We are sadly neglecting our duty in allowing these most afflicted of God's creatures to be treated in the way they often are. Much has been done, I know, in the past, but much remains to be done, as this Report shows clearly, by way of increased accommodation and supervision. Even with that magnificent institution at Earlswood the Commissioners find grave fault in this respect, and if in this noble institution, upon which money is fully lavished—I hope with good results—there are shortcomings, how necessary it must be that stricter supervision should be exercised over other institutions for these our unfortunate fellow creatures throughout the country.

*(5.53.) DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I do not take the pessimistic view. the hon. Member does as to the position of lunatics in our asylums. Considering the difficulties under which it is necessary to do the work, and the amount of skilled assistance, I think the work is done extremely well. Charges, I think, are often made without foundation. No doubt such is human nature that you do find instances where a tantalised person in a moment of irritation vents his evil feelings on one of these unfortunate lunatics under his charge, but it is a question whether many of the deaths resulting from fractured ribs and other injuries are not inevitable. Mental disease, like any other disease, should be treated scientifically. It is necessary sometimes to apply mechanical restraint to check violence, and I am afraid it must unfortunately happen that the muscular struggles bring about accidents. The hon. Member, however, has done good service in calling attention to this Report, and pointing out the evils that undoubtedly exist under the present system of administration, fully recognised by the authorities, who press them year after year upon the custodians of the Public Purse. It is to be noted that in London the lack of accommodation is worse than elsewhere. There are nearly 3,500 pauper lunatics boarded out of London—sent away to distant parts of the country—and it is a hard thing to send them away from their friends and the civilising influences of home life which are brought to bear by the occasional visits of members of their family. But my object in rising was to draw attention to certain difficulties in the working of the Lunacy Act. It suggests a caustic commentary on the work of the framers of the Act that even now, when the Act has been in operation only a year, it is found necessary to introduce an amending Bill. I am bound to say that if the Government had not treated with what I must call contemptuous indifference the recommendations of experts, I think probably the evils would not have arisen. I followed the proceedings of the Committee upstairs and attended all the discussions in this House, and I must say that a good many of the evils that have arisen and brought matters to a dead-lock were predicted by those prophets who prophesied because they did happen to know. If the advice of experts had been taken, the difficulties which I do not think it is too strong an expression to use have brought things to a dead-lock in lunacy matters would not have arisen. We know that the Lunacy Act was passed because doctors were afraid to certify because of actions that might be brought against them, and the Bill was introduced in order that medical men might discharge their functions under the sanction of the Judicial Bench. It should be well known that in cases of lunacy it is important to act promptly. The idea is not yet credited that lunacy is some occult disease or evil spirit that enters into a man, as we are assured on good authority it is entered into the lower animals, that it arises not from natural, but supernatural causes. But those who have more knowledge of such matters must treat each case of acute insanity——

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member appears to have missed the object of the Vote, the expenses of the Lunacy Commission.

DR. FARQUHARSON: I am sorry to have travelled beyond proper limits. May I be allowed to direct my observations to the amending Bill to be introduced?

THE CHAIRMAN shook his head.

DR. FARQUHARSON: I will simply ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is intended to provide that all Justices are to have jurisdiction under the Lunacy Act? It is a difficulty in the way when exceptions are made, and it is necessary to act promptly; therefore, all Justices should act in lunacy matters. I think all the Justices of a particular county should act in these matters. I think, also, it would be well that no action on this subject should be brought against a medical man until the costs have been deposited in Court. I have in my mind one very hard case in which a well-known medical man was charged with certifying wrongly. The proceedings were undertaken by one of the class of pettifogging attorneys who take up these cases for the sake of what they can get out of them, and the Judge over-ruled what is, I think, the clear intention of the Lunacy Law, namely, that no case of the kind shall be brought until the costs have been deposited.

(6.2.) DR. TANNER: I wish to say that I made a mistake a short time ago. The institution I referred to was not a private asylum, but a hospital registered under the Lunacy Act. I think the question of alternative exits in case of fire should receive immediate attention, and also the question of the separate treatment of infectious diseases.

THE UNDERSECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. STUART WORTLEY, Sheffield, Hallam): The Committee ought to bear in mind that places for the reception of the insane are in the main places maintained by Local Authorities, or places conducted by private enterprise under strict supervision, and I submit that the whole tenour of the Report of the Commission shows there is increasing vigilance respecting the method of conducting these establishments, which is leading to continually improved results. The hon. Member for Cork (Dr. Tanner) has very properly drawn attention to the fact that in the past year there has been an increasing number of suicides, but the fact that there have been only 18 suicides out of 86,000 lunatic paupers cannot be dwelt upon as a matter which shows so grave a proportion as to indicate great defect in the administration connected with these cases. The hon. Member referred to the Barming Heath case, where the finding of the Coroner's Jury was unsatisfactory. I think that the review of that finding by the Commissioners is one of the very best justifications that could be given for the existence of the Commission, and for the retention of legal members upon it. As to the use of pauper inmates as attendants in workhouses, the Lunacy Act of 1879 has tended very much to diminish the number of insane persons who are found in workhouses, and, therefore, to decrease the evil of which he speaks. It is impossible here and now that we can go into minute discussions of particular cases, nor could that be done at any time without notice, but I submit that the very existence of this Report, drawing minute attention to these points, and inviting the public to take an intelligent interest in the direction and control of the insane, entitles the Committee to conclude that the Commissioners have done their work during the past year so as to deserve the confidence of the House, while it shows that an approach to a more satisfactory and more perfect treatment of the insane is constantly being made.

*(6.7.) MR. MORTON: I should like to ask whether it is the duty of the Commission to see that the nurses and attendants do not work too long hours, and that sufficient holidays are provided in order to enable them to perform their duty to the poor patients in a satisfactory manner. I have had complaints sent to me to the effect that in some asylums attendants are not treated as they ought to be, considering the extraordinary nature of their duties. I do not wish to detain the Committee over this Vote, and I would not have troubled the hon. Gentleman but for the complaints that have been sent to me.

*MR. CREMER: I wish on this Vote to ask the same question as I have asked on other Votes, namely, what are the office hours of the clerks in this Office?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): Six hours for the Upper, Sir, and seven hours for the Lower.

DR. TANNER: I take exception altogether to the reply of the hon. Member the Under Secretary for the Home Department. Anyone would imagine from what he said that I was exceeding my duty in calling attention to what absolutely appears in the pages of the Report. Are we to understand that, in the opinion of the Government, because matters are reported in these pages we are not to call attention to them?

MR. STUART WORTLEY: I said the hon. Member had most properly drawn attention to the cases that were reported. With regard to the question of the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Morton), no doubt the Commissioners have a general power to do what is necessary in order to keep up the standard of efficiency, and this power will include the duty of seeing that the officials are not worked to excess.

Mr. Stuart Wortley

*MR. MORTON: May I ask whether the Commissioners do make inquiries with regard to the hours of work of attendants?

MR. STUART WORTLEY: I will ask them.

DR. TANNER: I accept the assurance of the hon. Member. I hope the few remarks I have made will have the effect of producing some remedy with regard to the number of visits paid to the asylums by the Commissioners. I ask the hon. Member whether one visit in 12 months to such an asylum as Earlswood is, in his opinion, sufficient?

Vote agreed to.

2. £25,000, to complete the sum for the Mercantile Marine Fund (Grant in Aid).

*(6.15.) MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): In March last I asked a question of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade with regard to the erection of a lighthouse on Rattray Head on the north-eastern point of Scotland, as urged by the Northern Lights Commissioners. The right hon. Gentleman told me the Board had sanctioned the scheme. On the 13th of April he told me that the Board of Trade had asked for detailed plans, and if they were satisfactory the work would probably be commenced during the present financial year. I wish now to ask whether the work will be commenced this year? The Northern Lights Commissioners say they receive perfectly fair treatment when they can get at the Board of Trade, but they say the interests of the north coasts are not properly looked after because they have to go first to the Trinity House for grants of money, and can only go to the Board of Trade on appeal. In view of the crowded state of the English Channel, many ship-masters would take the northern instead of the southern route from the west to the east coast of England if it was better lighted. This is, therefore, not so much a Scottish matter as one affecting the welfare of the seafaring community all round the coast. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will give his attention to the subject.

*(6.20.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): We have received from the Commissioners of Northern Lights the details of a plan for the Rattray Head light involving a cost of £15,200. The work is to be commenced soon, and £2,000 has been set aside for it during the present year. The erection of two other costly lighthouses in the same district is also to be undertaken. I do not admit the accuracy of the hon. Member's contention as to the unfairness of the allocation of the Mercantile Marine Fund. The amount of shipping in the northern seas is comparatively small compared with that in the English and Irish Channels, and in allocating the funds it is necessary to remember that the shipping pays for the lighting. The Board of Trade has every desire to establish lights wherever they are required for the purpose of navigation. In this spirit I have sanctioned these three new works in the last few years. I think that is a fair answer to the hon. Member's suggestion that the interests of the northern coasts are not fairly considered.

*MR. BUCHANAN: I did not impute unfairness to the right hon. Gentleman or the Board of Trade. I said the Northern Lights Commissioners thought they were perfectly fairly treated by the Board of Trade. Of course, the shipping going round the northern coast is comparatively small now, and it is to relieve the crowded and dangerous state of the English Channel that I am advocating the better lighting of the northern coast.

*(6.25.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I entirely agree with that view, and it is precisely with that object that I have sanctioned this expenditure.

DR. TANNER: May I ask how it is that we have not more lighthouses on the Irish coast? I think that some of the more important lighthouses in Ireland should have the electric light. I understand that a flashing electric light can be seen at a much greater distance than any of the oil or gas lights that are in use. The use of such a light would be of manifest importance to the shipping off the south-west coast of Ireland.

*MR. MORTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman tell us to what extent and with what success the electric light has been used on the British coast?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The number of electric lights in use in lighthouses is not large; but that at St. Catherine's Point, on the south side of the Isle of Wight, is, I think, one of the best in the world. As to the electric light in Ireland, there has been a feeling on the part of the Irish Light Commissioners that gas is rather preferable to the electric light. Of the two places to which the hon. Member for Cork specially alluded, there is a very powerful and good gas light at Galley Head, and it would be practically impossible to establish the electric light at the Fastnets. I can assure the hon. Gentleman that the whole subject has been well considered.

Vote agreed to.

3. £48,686, to complete the sum for the Mint, including Coinage.

(6.32.) SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I rise for the purpose of expressing the hope that there will be no decrease in the use of half sovereigns. "Threatened men live long"; but I hope that half sovereigns are not even threatened. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has told us that it is a more wasteful coin—by wear and tear—than the sovereign. The half sovereign is a domestic coin, and a very useful one. It is used very little on foreign exchanges, and what I would suggest is that if the half sovereign is wasteful the difficulty might be met by debasing it—making it a token—for domestic use. Possibly that might be a gain to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. As regards the superscription upon the sovereign, we have been told that a committee is engaged in considering the question. With regard to the silver coinage, I hope there is no diminution in the use of the shilling. I should not like that, though I know tradesmen are very apt to count out change in the big silver, which discourages the use of the shilling. Then I hope the Chancellor of the Exchequer will tell us something of what is going to be done about the variety of the coinage. There can be no more perplexing coin than the 4s. piece, and I think it very desirable indeed that you should abolish it and the florin or half-crown, though I confess to a conservative feeling in respect of the half-crown, which is a piece to which I am partial. There is confusion among different classes as to the silver coinage, and some simple people can be taken in.

*(6.37.) MR. SINCLAIR (Falkirk, &c.): I understand from a recent answer of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the artistic question in connection with the coinage has been referred to a Committee from which, no doubt, it will receive full consideration. But I regret to find that a more important question has been referred to that Committee, namely, the necessity of having stamped on each coin its value, either in words or figures. I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer is scarcely aware of the very strong feeling which exists among the public in favour of each coin showing its value. I have not met a single person, with the exception of two Members of this House, who are not of that opinion. Last year I was pressed by others to obtain signatures to a Memorial, and in three days I obtained 150 signatures to that Memorial, which was to this effect—

“We, the undersigned Members of Parliament, desire to convey to you” (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) “our opinion that in all future Mint issues the coinage, whether gold or silver or copper, should have the value of each coin expressed.”

Not only foreigners and Americans, but the people of the colonies have a difficulty in understanding our coinage; hence the necessity for them, as for our own people, to have the value impressed upon each coin. There is another matter to which I wish to shortly refer. The total amount of our gold coinage is variously estimated by statisticians at from £100,000,000 to £120,000,000. That estimate, by a late estimate of Mr. Giffen's preparation, is reduced to something like £75,000,000. Now, that is a very much smaller amount than has been generally supposed to be current throughout the country, and I should like to know whether that includes the amount in the hands of the Bank of England and of other bankers, or only that which, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer said, is popularly supposed to be in the pockets of the people? If the amount of gold is so small it is imperative that steps should be taken to increase the gold reserves of the country.

THE CHAIRMAN: This is entirely out of order.

*MR. SINCLAIR: I shall not continue the matter further, and I hope I may be able to get a simple answer to the questions I have raised.
Sir G. Campbell

MR. COGHILL (Newcastle-under-Lyne): The Chancellor of the Exchequer obstinately refuses to put the value not only on silver coinage, but all kinds of coinage. Exactly the same question has arisen in America, but there the Government do not entrust to the discretion of a Committee whether the value shall be stated. I think it is difficult to understand why the Chancellor of the Exchequer refuses to state the value on all coins.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I do not.

MR. COGHILL: Then I hope he will allow the value to be stated. With regard to our colonies, they have the word “sovereign” expressed on that coin. I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer ought to be prepared to take lessons from the colonies. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, himself shortsighted, should consider shortsighted people in this matter. There were frauds in connection with the Jubilee sixpences, which had not their value expressed, by gilding them over and passing them as half-sovereigns. If the words “half sovereign” had been expressed such a fraud could never have been committed. At night, if the sovereign is worn, it is difficult to distinguish it from a half-sovereign. I certainly hope there will be no further issues of the 4s. piece; and I would point out that in a great number of the country districts there is a great scarcity of change. It is difficult to get change for a sovereign at the present time.

*(6.48.) MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): The hon. Gentleman must be under a delusion. I do not understand that the right hon. Gentleman is obstinately refusing to put the value on coins, and that all he has done is to relegate to a Committee the consideration of designs. I distinctly understood the Chancellor of the Exchequer also to say that he would withdraw the 4s. piece. But now these questions have been raised, I think it is very desirable that we should have a definite answer from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, because hon. Members who take an interest in this question quite understood that he was quite willing to have the value expressed.

MR. J. PARKER-SMITH (Lanark, Partick): The bronze coins have not yet been mentioned, and I want to know whether the Committee has power to consider that coinage. The bronze coinage, though half the weight of the copper coinage of former days, is still far too heavy, and I would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman the propriety of considering whether nickel coins, which have proved so satisfactory in Germany, could be substituted for bronze?

*MR. MORTON: I have been requested by my hon. Friend to ask what are the hours of the different classes of workmen in the Mint, and also what are the working hours of the clerks, or rather the hours during which they attend. Then I should like to know why the amount of the wages for piece and time work has been increased by £6,500, and why sub-head B has been increased by £4,000. As to the question of our coinage, it would be well if we had the good sense to do what many of our colonies have done, that is, to adopt the decimal system. With regard to the supply of silver coinage to the colonies. I see there is an increase of from £2,000 to £3,000 on that account. I should like to ask why the Imperial Funds should be at an apparent loss for conveying silver coinage to our colonies?

*MR. GOSCHEN: The increases to which the hon. Member refers are due to the extra amount of work done at the Mint, involving an increase of wages. There is also an increase of charges through the Government having undertaken the transmission of silver from London to the provinces. It was found that the bankers were not much inclined to pay the cost of such carriage, and the consequence was that silver was not supplied in sufficient amount to the provinces. The Government undertook to pay the charge, which was about a quarter per cent., and the result has been an increase of the profit from silver of £600,000. I think the hon. Member will admit that that is a very good profit for the small expense incurred. I cannot give any pledge with regard to the half-sovereign beyond saying this, that I do not propose to effect such an economy in its use as would be an inconvenience to the public. But often hon. Members will have experienced that in getting change they get more half-sovereigns than sovereigns. As to debasing the half-sovereign, though it is a step which might be taken, I do not think it is one which I should be prepared to take myself. I certainly have no intention whatever of diminishing the use of the shilling. The more shillings there are in circulation the more convenient it is to the public. The hon. Member complained that there is not enough silver in the provinces. Over and over again I have explained that the Government have no means or no power, except in the payment of their own employés, to stimulate the circulation of any particular coin. The only reason why shillings are not more fully in circulation is that people do not ask for the coin in change, while tradesmen find it easier to give change in florins or half-crowns. As to expressing the value of each coin on its face, the hon. Member opposite said he had obtained the signatures of 150 Members to a Memorial. It is extremely easy to obtain signatures, especially under the fascination of my hon. Friend. But I myself have not received letters from more than three or four Members since I held office urging me to adopt the view of expressing the value upon each coin. Seeing the interest which is taken, however, in the subject by hon. Members, I shall give every consideration to the representations which have been made in this House before coming to a decision. I confess I should have thought a poor man would be able to distinguish between a florin and half-crown with the greatest readiness, and as to the half-sovereign and sovereign, I can tell my hon. Friend that, though short-sighted, I could distinguish between them by touch in the dead of the night. I believe a particular class of our fellow-subjects pocket the sovereign or half-sovereign without looking at it, knowing, even as it passes through their hands, what has been the generosity of the man who gives the coin. I notice the importance which the House attaches to this question, and I shall give full consideration to their representations, though I give no absolute pledge that the course which they propose will be pursued. With regard to the Committee, artists are engaged in preparing designs for their consideration, and it will rest with them to consider what will be the convenient denomination of the coins. I am not prepared to say that I would substitute nickel for bronze coinage. There is nothing about which the people of England are more Conservative than their coins, and I certainly should not, without the very gravest consideration, be prepared to substitute nickel for our present bronze coinage.

*(6.54.) MR. SINCLAIR: Can the Chancellor of the Exchequer say when the Committee are likely to report?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I think they will report by October.

*MR. SINCLAIR: Will the 4s. piece be withdrawn?

*MR. GOSCHEN: No more will be issued.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: The right hon. Gentleman confirms what I have said as to the difficulty of getting change. Will the 4s. piece be withdrawn?

*MR. GOSCHEN: As they come into the Mint they will be withdrawn.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Will the right hon. Gentleman discontinue the florin?

*MR. GOSCHEN: The half-crown was discontinued at one time; but there was general desire for its re-introduction. Both the florin and the half-crown are extremely useful on occasions.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: What I would suggest to the Chancellor of the Exchequer is this: The present 3d. piece is so small as to be inconvenient, and could not the right hon. Gentleman substitute a nickel coin which would be useful in giving change for 6d., when perhaps only a penny is to be taken for a newspaper, and when to receive 5d. in copper in change is exceedingly burdensome to the purchaser. I think a nickel coin to take the place of the 3d. piece would be exceedingly useful?

MR. JACKSON: In reply to the hon. Member for Peterborough I may say that the hours of the clerical staff are seven daily.

Vote agreed to.

4. £9,031, to complete the sum for the National Debt Office.

5. £6,749, to complete the sum for the Public Works Loan Commission.

6. £14,532, to complete the sum for the Record Office.

7. Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £14,530, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1892, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Department of the Registrar General of Births, &c., in England.”

(7.4.) DR. CLARK: Some years ago I asked the Government to bring in a Bill repealing 6 and 7 Will. IV., chap. 6, under which £21,207 is paid for Registrars, because it is inequitable to compel the Scotch people, who pay their own expenses in this respect, to also contribute towards the expenses of England. This is the third of the three grievances which I have announced my intention of taking a Division upon. It is of no use for private Members to introduce a measure for the repeal of this Bill, because so little of the time of Parliament is placed at their disposal. Therefore the only way to get it done is through the Government, and, in order to induce them to take up this question, I shall move the reduction of the Vote by £10,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That a sum, not exceeding £34,530, be granted for the said Service.”—(Dr. Clark.)

MR. GOSCHEN: I trust the hon. Member will not press his Motion to a Division. He has made his protest. He knows that nothing can be done now to pass such a Bill, and therefore I hope he will save the time of the Committee.

DR. CLARK: In previous years I have taken 20 or 30 Divisions, but this year I promised to take but three. That would not have been necessary had the Government given me one night for the discussing of the whole of these questions. Through the Ballot I secured two nights, but the Government took them both. I might repay them by taking 30 Divisions, but I want the Session to end as quickly as possible and therefore shall content myself with three Divisions. I deem it necessary to place this protest on record.

(7.7.) The Committee divided: Ayes 74; Noes 118.—(Div. List, N 352.)

(7.18.) MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Cardarvon, &c.): On this Vote I wish to raise a question as to the Census

Wales. There was a special provision in the Census Act that the papers should contain a column with a view to ascertaining the number of the Welsh-speaking population. Now, not only has the spirit of the Act been evaded, but so also has the letter. We put a series of questions to the President of the Local Government Board three months ago on this subject, and we called attention to the omission of the language column. The Secretary to the Local Government Board promised that steps should be taken to remedy the defect. I have not discovered, however, that anything has been done. In addition to the omission of the language column, I find that in many Welsh-speaking districts, such as Denbigh, Anglesey and Merionethshire, the great majority of the papers distributed were in English; and hence the only way in which the people could discover what was wanted of them was by seeking the aid of some neighbour who understood English. The papers were probably filled in by some one else. In one case I found that out of 750 papers distributed in a Welsh-speaking district, in which probably the the number of resident English people did not exceed 30, only 50 or 60 were printed in Welsh, and in another case, out of 1,000 papers distributed, only 200 papers were printed in Welsh. It is monstrous that in districts known to be Welsh-speaking the papers should have been in the English language, and without any sort of direction to the people in Welsh. I shall move a reduction of the Vote. This is not merely a sentimental matter; it is one of great practical importance. The representatives of Wales in this House have constantly urged successive Governments to appoint Welsh officials in County Courts and other public offices in the Principality. Where the great majority of the people speak Welsh, and Welsh only, it is only proper that the public officials should understand the language. We wished the census to be taken in such a manner as would elicit the facts on this matter, we wanted to find out how many of the people were Welsh-speaking, but the returns will not help us. My hon. Friend the Member for Denbighshire recently brought before the House the question of appointing a Welsh-speaking Inspector for the collieries in Wales, and the Home Secretary on that occasion admitted that it was practically impossible for an Englishman who did not understand Welsh to elicit from the workmen full information as to the facts of an explosion or a breach of the Mines Act. As the Census Returns have not been taken in such a way as to enable us to get the information we desired, I beg to move the reduction of the Vote by £5,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £39,530, be granted for the said Service."—(Mr. Lloyd-George.)

(7.26.) MR. T. ELLIS (Merionethshire): We have to complain that the officials of this Department, the enumerators in various districts, have not carried out the concessions which the President of the Local Government Board so courteously promised us last year. As soon as we explained our wishes on the matter, the right hon. Gentleman placed Wales on the same footing as the highlands and islands of Scotland, and arranged that a column should be provided in the Census Papers for those persons who speak Welsh, while papers printed in Welsh were to be distributed for Welsh-speaking people. It is of little use for the Welsh Members to secure concessions from the Government if they are to be set aside in this way by the officials. Owing to these omissions the Returns are unreliable. For instance, I consider that in my own county of Merionethshire the omission of the language column was most injurious as regards the reliability of the Census. I have received a great many representations from my constituents on this subject. The cases quoted by my hon. Friend are not isolated cases. There were numerous and flagrant cases as we know throughout North Wales, and I have no doubt many occurred in the southern part of the Principality. It seems to me that the whole purpose of Parliament and the whole value of the concessions of the Government have been defeated by the neglect of the officials to do their duty, and consequently the Census will be unreliable and inaccurate. The Government promised to take steps to rectify the omission, and I hope we shall to-night be told what has been done in this direction, and with what result.

*(7.30.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I regret that I did not receive some notice that this question would be raised, because in that case I might have been able to obtain detailed information. The complaint is twofold. The hon. Member for Carnarvon places the greatest stress upon the fact that there was not a sufficient number of papers printed in the Welsh language, and the hon. Gentleman who has just spoken lays the greatest stress on the other point, namely, that there were papers distributed in Wales with only one language column. I think that the mistake is much more important in the one case than in the other.

MR. T. ELLIS: Both mistakes are important.

*MR. RITCHIE: I acknowledge the importance of both, but I agree with the hon. Member for Merioneth in attaching greater importance to the mistake in regard to the language columns. In regard to that the instances given by the hon. Member for Carnarvon were very limited. The hon. Gentleman mentioned two or three parishes in which there had not been a sufficient number of papers with two columns distributed. When each of those cases was brought to my notice I communicated with the Registrar General, and he undertook that the error should be at once rectified. I have received no further complaint and therefore I presume the error has been rectified. I am sure there was every desire on the part of the officials to carry out the undertaking I gave last year. If there has been a mistake made it has been from no desire to frustrate the wishes of hon. Gentlemen, and I am sure that in the multiplicity of details it is quite intelligible there may have been an error committed in one or two cases. No doubt, in some places there was a want of supply of papers printed in the Welsh language, but how did that arise? The demand in some places was greater than could reasonably have been expected. Hon. Members from Wales knew that an effort was made to get the Welsh people to use the Welsh form. I make no complaint, but I think a good many Welsh papers were used when

Mr. T. Ellis

English papers would have done just as well so far as a knowledge of language was concerned. So long as the real object was attained, and it is not contested that it has been, I do not think it matters whether the Return was made on Welsh or English papers. I admit that the supply of Welsh papers ought to have been as great as the demand. The experience of the taking of this Census will undoubtedly lead to fewer mistakes on future occasions. My own firm belief is that no real injustice has been done, and that any real mistakes that were made were rectified.

*(7.38.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): There is no desire to make any complaint of the right hon. Gentleman personally, but I am bound to say I have received a good many complaints from Denbighshire that no Welsh papers were distributed. The consequence was that many people really did not know what they were doing. A Census taken under such circumstances is a perfect mockery, and is not worth the paper on which it is taken. Under the circumstances, the Census Returns will lead people to believe that there are far fewer Welsh-speaking people than there really are. The right hon. Gentleman says that in future care will be taken to avoid such mistakes, but considering that ten years will elapse before the next Census is taken, that is rather cold comfort for us.

(7.39.) MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I apologise to the right hon. Gentleman for not giving him formal notice. I certainly thought notice was given at the time questions were asked across the floor that the question would be raised in Supply. The reason why I laid more stress upon the absence of Welsh papers than upon the omission of the double column was that according to my information there were very few cases where the language column was omitted altogether. But there was hardly a parish in Wales where the supply of papers in Welsh was not sadly less than it ought to have been. I only mentioned two or three parishes, because I did not wish to weary the Committee with reading a long list of names. I have here a list of 20 or 30 parishes in which the supply of Welsh papers was insufficient. There is one little mountain village in which there are 50 houses. I believe there are there between 30 and 40 householders who cannot speak a word of English, and yet only two or three Census papers in Welsh were distributed there. I think it is highly probable that the real object of the Census has not been attained. I therefore must press my Motion to a Division as a protest against the way in which the Census was taken in Wales.

*(7.42.) MR. MORTON: I am glad to hear that my hon. Friend intends to go to a Division. The old English practice of insulting small nationalities has been pursued in this case. Much material harm may not have been done, but such proceedings as these create bad feeling between the different nationalities. The Prime Minister insulted the Irish people by calling them Hottentots, and insulted our Indian fellow-subjects by describing one of them as a black man. The Scotch have not fared so badly. I suppose that Bannockburn is not quite forgotten. The Welsh people have not been fairly dealt with, and I protest, as the Representative of an English constituency, against any insult being offered to the smaller nationalities either in regard to Census papers, or religion, or anything else.

*MR. BROOKFIELD (Sussex, Rye): I desire to ask the right hon. Gentleman if he can inform us when the Census Returns for England and Wales will be published? Some partial information relating to special localities has already been divulged, and the result is that an erroneous impression prevails outside the House that the whole Returns are published. This has caused a certain amount of inconvenience.

MR. RITCHIE: The last sheets of the Abstract have gone to press, and I think copies will be distributed to the House this week.

Ayes 46; Noes 87.—(Div. List, No. 353.)

Original Question again proposed.

*(7.55.) MR. WOODALL (Hanley): In the Vote now before the House a considerable sum is included for the expenses of Superintendent Registrars, and among other things for collecting certified copies of marriages from the clergy. The careless, unskilful, and untrustworthy manner in which marriages in the Established Church have been registered was matter of notoriety. I would like to know what amendment has been effected, and how far such amendment has been accomplished, by the intervention and supervision of the Registrar General and his staff of officers throughout the country. Can the right hon. Gentleman give us any information as to the manner in which the registration of marriages is now conducted? I know that the attention of the office has been given to the subject with the object of securing some improvement in the system, and I believe there are fewer cases of complaint than there were a short while ago.

*MR. RITCHIE: The hon. Gentleman has answered his own question. The duty of the Registrar is now performed in a manner more satisfactory to those concerned, and there are fewer complaints. I shall be happy to give the hon. Gentleman any information I can in answer to a question if he will give notice, but, as I daresay he is aware, the details of these matters do not come under my immediate supervision. I shall be glad to give him any information he desires.

*MR. WOODALL: I should have liked to have known how far pressure has been applied by the Local Government Board, and with what result? I will avail myself of the right hon. Gentleman's offer, and will endeavour to bring out the facts in another way.

*MR. CREMER: Before we pass this Vote, may I ask how many hours are worked by the clerks in the Registrar's office?

MR. JACKSON: Seven hours.

*MR. MORTON: Allow me to call attention to an entry here, or rather the absence of an entry. Last year there appeared an entry of £20 allowance to purveyor of luncheons, but nothing appears this year. This shows, I think, that such items can be taken out of the Accounts, although yesterday the right hon. Gentleman seemed to think it was impossible to do without them.

MR. JACKSON: I did not say impossible; I said for convenience they were inserted.

Question put, and agreed to.

8. Motion made, and Question proposed,

(8.0.) MR. A. E. PEASE (York): Upon this Vote may I call the attention of the Secretary to the Treasury to a complaint of provincial printers that they are shut out from any share in the Government printing contracts, in consequence of a clause in all the Schedules of specifications which have come to my notice requiring that the work shall be executed in London. I can understand that there are certain classes of work must be done in London, but there is also a great deal which might be economically and equally well done in the country, for instance, telegraph forms and other forms. It is only fair, I think, that country printers should have a chance of tendering for Government work, which they could do equally well with London firms. I do not move a reduction, but I hope the right hon. Gentleman will concede this point.

MR. JACKSON: There is not the slightest objection to meeting the hon. Member to the fullest extent. The Stationery Office would be only too glad to obtain additional competition intenders. The hon. Member is mistaken in supposing that none of the Government work is done in the country. The clause to which the hon. Member refers, if I remember aright, merely requires that the printer shall have an office in London. That, of course, is a matter of convenience, because frequent communication has to be made between a Government Department and the contractor. As a matter of fact, a large portion of the work has been actually done in the country. I shall be most happy to carry out the hon. Member's wish.

DR. TANNER: I propose to move a reduction of £200 in the salary of the Controller, in order to call attention to a matter which I referred to a short time ago by question, and which I wish to seriously press. I find in the Telegraph Office in this House, and in several, if not all, telegraph offices a bad, a stupid, and exasperating kind of German pencil is being used. Since I raised the question I have found there is very general complaint of this, and I have been inundated with letters on the subject. When I put my question, the right hon. Gentleman answered me with an unnecessary curtness, not at all characteristic of him. I am not a neophyte in these matters, and I have always found that when the Government have a bad case to meet in Committee of Supply they confine themselves to a bald and curt reply to a question. But I want to know why this boycotting of an English industry? Surely the Government know that for a long time the lead pencil manufacturers in this country have been in far from a flourishing condition. How is it that they are not given fair play? I have letters from persons in the trade who formerly supplied Government Departments, and it appears from what they write that they have been deliberately boycotted in favour of German goods. I consider it my duty here to say a word in favour of promoting native industries. Our Home Rule principles in Ireland induce us to do this as far as we can with Irish manufactures, and undoubtedly when the Government find that a particular English industry is depressed they should do what they can to encourage it in its difficulty. I should like to know the terms of the contract upon which these German pencils are supplied from Bavaria. I have letters from English firms which formerly supplied the Government with pencils, and I am informed that on the last occasion when tendering their samples were returned to them unopened. Now I think that indicates that fair play is not given to the English competitor. I should prefer that an English Member should take up a matter of this kind as being more concerned with the working classes in their constituencies. Things of this kind show that the interest of the Government in the welfare of the working classes is not altogether sincere. Unless I get a more satisfactory answer than I have had I shall certainly carry my Motion to a Division.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item A, Salaries, be reduced by £200 part of the Salary of the Controller."—(Dr. Tanner.)

*(8.6.) MR. MORTON: I desire to support this reduction. I listened to the answer given by the right hon. Gentleman the other day with astonishment and indignation. I gathered from that answer that the Government found it impossible to get these pencils in Great Britain.

MR. JACKSON: I did not say so.

*MR. MORTON: I gathered as much from the answer given, though, perhaps, the right hon. Gentleman did not intend to say as much. Now, if we cannot in this country produce lead pencils good enough for a Government Department then we had better shut up business altogether. It seems to me the Government have gone out of their way in this small matter to promote the foreign against the English manufactured article. I say nothing against fair foreign competition, but I protest against a predilection in favour of things German being carried out to such an extent as this. I hope the Motion will be carried to a Division, for the names will indicate who are the Members who are in favour of encouraging the foreign against the British article.

MR. JACKSON: I am afraid, after the testimony of the hon. Member, there must have been something in my answer the other day which certainly I did not intend to convey. The facts are these: The Stationery Office called for tenders, and, as a matter of fact, these pencils to which reference has been made were supplied by an English firm. A number of samples were put before the Post Office authorities, and they selected those which in their opinion were best suited. I do not suppose they knew whence the pencils were supplied.

DR. TANNER: Each pencil has the manufacturer's name stamped upon it.

MR. JACKSON: I am quite aware that under the Merchandise Marks Act the pencils imported have to be marked. Tenders with samples were offered, and the most suitable tender was accepted; that is the whole story. The objects in view were, first, to get the kind of pencil which best suited the requirements of the Department; and, secondly, to get it as cheaply as possible. If the hon. Member for Mid Cork will give me some particulars about the samples which are said to have been returned unopened I will institute inquiries on the subject.

(8.12.) DR. TANNER: I will only ask the right hon. Gentleman if, on going into a telegraph office to send off a telegram, he does not invariably take out his own pencil, because he knows perfectly well it is impossible to write with the official pencil supplied? Only yesterday a gentleman remarked to me it was an unnecessary precaution tying up these pencils, because nobody would attempt to appropriate the thing unless he wished to perpetrate a malicious joke upon a friend by tempting him to write with this indescribable pencil. However it came about, you have got about the worst article you could get. I have several letters from gentlemen who state beyond doubt these samples were never opened; and I say there is every reason to suppose there is some jobbery in connection with this matter, and that the British manufacturers have not been treated fairly.

*(8.15.) MR. CREMER: I desire to enter a protest against the doctrine that the Government are justified in buying in the cheapest market irrespective of other considerations. I know that is an old doctrine of political economists; but when we consider the inhuman conditions under which the working classes in Germany live, working for 14 or 16 hours a day at half the wages paid to our operatives, I say that the Government ought not to support such a state of things by continuing to buy goods produced under such conditions. I know there is a great deal of talk on public platforms about the protection of native industries; but when these professions are put to the test they prove to be worthless. By way of illustration I may mention that in this building it was, until recently, impossible to obtain a British-made cigar from the Refreshment Department. We had to pay 6d. for a cigar, a high price for the poorer Members of this House, and the justification urged was that a foreign cigar could not be obtained for less. So that even here among the champions of native industry it was impossible to obtain a cigar of British manufacture. We have them now, but they are miserable things; and we do not get better, I suppose, because they would prejudice the sale of the foreign made article. I only mention this as an example of the hypocrisy there is among those who pose as the champions of native industry. I have no objection to goods being obtained from France, Germany, Italy, or elsewhere if a clause is inserted in every Government contract that goods supplied to them should be manufactured by workmen who receive such wages as enable them to live under decent conditions of life. This view workmen are very apt to take; it finds expression outside this House, and will more and more find expression in the House. If such a condition was insisted upon it would check the importation of these German pencils produced under the conditions to which I have just now referred.

*(8.19.) MR. MORTON: I am not at all satisfied with the answer of the right hon. Gentleman as coming from a Tory Government professing a desire to protect the interests of British workmen. I think you ought not to accept tenders at all from German manufacturers. Get the goods as cheaply as you can consistently with the workmen being paid proper wages, and there should be no occasion to have anything to do with foreign manufactures. If the right hon. Gentleman carries out his principle of getting everything in the cheapest market, there must be considerable reductions in the Stationery Office and every other Department. He can get German clerks at a third of the salaries now paid, and I have no doubt from the same source we could obtain a Chancellor of the Exchequer and a Financial Secretary at a much lower income than we think it right to pay. I shall vote for the reduction as a protest against this Germanising tendency — as a protest against the exclusion of British work, and in favour of fair play being given to our own workmen.

*(8.20.) MR. JORDAN (Clare, W.): I rather sympathise with the right hon. Gentleman in endeavouring to obtain the best contract, but the question is, have we got the goods we contracted for? I think we must all admit, if we have had experience of these pencils, that we have got a very bad rubbishy article, and such as certainly should not have been introduced into the Public Service. If the Post Office consider the pencil well fitted for its purpose, then there is little credit to their judgment. I have visited the works of the Keswick manufacturers, and I confess I felt some sympathy with them in the depressed condition of their trade since they lost the Government contracts. I found they supplied good value for money. I bought a quantity of them for my own use, and I think that pencils good enough for commercial purposes ought to be good enough for a Government Department. Certainly the Department ought to get good value for money, but they should see they get the article contracted for.

DR. CLARK: If my hon. Friend goes to a Division on this question I am afraid that I must support the Government. It is a pity the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Agriculture and the right hon. Member for Thanet are not here; they would be delighted with the arguments used, and might think from the remarks of the hon. Members near me that they might have an opportunity of going back to their first love. For my part, I am perfectly satisfied with the answer of the right hon. Gentleman—that he deals in the cheapest and best markets. The arguments of the hon. Gentleman near me, if carried out to their logical conclusion, would land us again in Protection. In the American Congress I have heard Radical Members who go in for Protection use the very arguments employed by my hon. Friend, but here I think the Radical Party adopt the principle of Free Trade. If you go back to Protection you must give it general application, and, of course, apply it to our biggest industry—agriculture—with the consequences. I am surprised that the hon. Member for Shoreditch should come out in this new character.

*MR. CREMER: I will not waste the time of the Committee in breaking a lance with the hon. Member, nor do I think it is seemly that we should enter into a personal controversy. The majority of the working classes in this country are Free Traders, and they have not the slightest desire to prevent foreigners from sending their goods to this country. What they do insist upon, however, is that those who manufacture the goods that are imported into this country should live under decent conditions. When you buy pencils from a manufacturer who keeps his people at work some 16 hours a day and pays them half the rate of wages paid in this country, I say the conditions of life for these people are intolerable, and this is what the working classes here object to. I reiterate the expression of my opinion, which is not shaken by the observations of my hon. Friend.

(8.25.) MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): Let me point out to the hon. Members who favour a protective policy that no country is more dependent upon Free Trade for its prosperity than England, because if we shut our doors against foreign goods foreigners will close their markets to ours, and we shall be the greatest losers. It has been said that we cannot compete with the long hours of work on the Continent; but that, I think, is a mistake, for we have the advantage of large capital and appliances, and the command of trade, and can work shorter hours. If it were a question of shutting out foreign competition, I should vote against the hon. Member who has moved this reduction, but I agree with him as to the inferior quality of the pencils supplied; we know it from our own experience. Therefore, if I vote against the Government on this question it will be because the foreign goods which the Government have purchased are of an inferior quality. If Englishmen have fair play they can produce a better article at a lower price than can be obtained abroad. We need not fear because here and there on some small point foreign competition gets the better of us; our capital and appliances, and our command of trade ensure us an advantage generally. If the right hon. Gentleman wants any assurance as to the justice of the complaint against these particular pencils, he has only to go into a telegraph office and try to use the pencil provided for public use. But, of course, he, like most of us, uses his own pencil. A saving to the Estimates results perhaps, but I do not think this is an advantage to the Public Service.

*(8.28.) MR. MORTON: I must protest against the hon. Member for Caithness bringing in the question of Free Trade and Protection. I am, and have always been, a Free Trader, but this is not a question of whether goods are of English or of foreign manufacture, but whether they are of good or of bad quality.

MR. WALLACE (Edinburgh, E.): I wish to explain that the reason I intend to vote against the Government on this question is because I believe that the Government have purchased not alone in the cheapest, but in the worst market. These pencils are universally condemned as bad, and it does not follow that because the price is low the goods are cheap. You may buy in the cheapest and in the nastiest market, and the statement of the right hon. Gentleman is a mere travesty of the doctrine of Free Trade.

(8.30.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 32; Noes 85.—(Div. List, No. 354.)

(9.10.) DR. CLARK: I have to congratulate the Treasury on the reduction of this Vote, and I think that if the First Lord of the Treasury were more careful and less mechanical in regard to the printing of Amendments to Bills which cannot possibly be reached on many of the days on which they are put down, a few thousand pounds extra might be saved. The contract for publishing what is known as Hansard is now ended, and the Hansard Publishing Company has ended with it. I protested against the contract made with that company at the time it was entered into, and I protest against any other contract of a similar character being made. I know that the majority of the Committee was in favour of the view carried out by the Treasury, and also that the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) was a strong supporter of it, while the hon. Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool suggested the course which has been adopted in the House of Lords. For my own part, I do not care whether we have a special report of Parliament or not. I am perfectly indifferent on that subject. We have the Times, which gives a very fair report, and a very full report, and we have the local papers in various parts of the country which give fuller reports of particular Members, so that those persons who desire fuller reports than are given in the Times are able to get them. Therefore, I say I am not particular whether we have a special Parliamentary report or not. What I do say is, that if you want to have a full report, you ought to have an accurate report. Year after year Hansard's Company have sent to me reports of my own speeches and I have chucked them into the waste paper basket unopened, because I have not wished to be troubled by going through them. Hansard condenses what is said to about one-third, and it is utterly impossible to do this without a great many inaccuracies. If a thing is worth doing at all it is worth doing well. We ought to have an accurate report and a full report if we are going to spend public money for such a purpose. Of course, it suits those who have the control of these reports to take them from the local papers and re-produce them. They are catering for outside people, and, therefore, they give full reports where they think it will assist them, and they condense them where they think it desirable to do so. They are, in fact, merely trying to sell their wares. I happen to know something of the gentlemen with whom the Treasury made this contract, and who have used this as a lever for taking over Hansard's Company and a great many other companies, and I know also that a great many Members of this House have lost a considerable amount of money in this business. The Hansard Publishing Company offered to do for nothing that for which we have previously been expending £5,000 a year in the shape of subsidy, not because they could make a profit out of it, but because by getting the contract they would be able to throw dust in the eyes of the country, and induce people to believe that with their £1,000,000 at their back they were doing something very good. Their contract, however, will end with this year, and a new contract will doubtless be made by the Treasury. I want to know from the Secretary to the Treasury what course the Government intend to take in regard to this matter. Is it intended to put the reporting to contract again, and accept the lowest tender, permitting the speeches to be condensed to one-third of their real length, which, as I have said is the present system—taking a word here and there, very often without making sense of it. If the Government propose to do that, I shall take every opportunity of opposing it, unless the feeling of the House is with them, or a Select Committee recommends such a course, in which case my action would be useless. If the Treasury intends to revert to the system which existed years ago, or to carry on the system that has prevailed during the last three years, it will be a waste of public money, and I shall go dead against it. I think the general feeling is that we should have a full report which ought to be an accurate one, and that there ought to be no question of sweating in the production of the report. A short time ago the gentleman who edits these Hansard Reports sent round a circular, in which he suggested that there should be two contracts, one for the reporting and the other for the printing. I do not know that that would be a wise system to adopt, because it would afford the Secretary to the Treasury the opportunity of saying, when any complaint was made, that this or that was due to the printing, or, on the other hand, that it was due to the reporting. I think the right hon. Gentleman ought to be responsible for both the printing and reporting. I can only repeat that I am glad there has been a reduction in this Vote, and I think it would be well if the Government were to adopt the suggestion I have made and refrain from printing so many pages of controversial Amendments relating to Bills which have no opportunity of being discussed, on many of the occasions on which they are put down. I should also like to know what the Treasury propose to do in reference to the Hansard contract.

(9.20.) MR. ROBY (Lancashire, S.E., Eccles): There is one point I wish to bring before the House, and that is with reference to the absence of the Law Reports from the Library. It seems to me exceedingly desirable that hon. Members should have access to those Reports. Doubtless the answer that will be given is that they can be obtained from the House of Lords, but I must point out that the House of Lords is not always sitting. Moreover, it does not sit either so early or so late as we do, so that during a considerable portion of the time we are sitting we may be unable to obtain such volumes as we may require. Those who are in the habit of consulting the Law Reports know that they are constantly obliged to consult earlier cases, and this necessarily involves repeated references to the different books. I submit that as a question of practical convenience hon. Members ought to have copies of the Law Reports in the Library of this House. No doubt the lawyers are able to obtain access to the Law Reports at the Lincoln's Inn or Temple Libraries, but those who, like myself, do not have access to those Libraries have no means of getting at the Reports. Doubtless we might go to the British Museum, but that would hardly be a very convenient course. I would therefore suggest that, as these Law Reports contain what the Judges lay down from time to time as the law of the land, it is necessary that those who are engaged in legislative duties should not only have their own children by them, but should also have access to those belonging to the other branch. It may be said that it would be difficult to find room for these Reports, but I do not think the Librarian would find much difficulty in affording the requisite space. I hardly know what answer the Government may give to me. I certainly think the question of expense would hardly be a sufficient ground for refusing my request. What I would suggest is not that we should in the first instance obtain the whole of the Reports necessary for a lawyer's library, but that we should make a commencement with the more modern Law Reports. It might be convenient to take at first only the reports of the last 30 years, technically known as the Law Reports, because practically the legal decisions contained in those reports have the most bearing on matters coming before us as legislators. I think if you confine your attention at first to the reports of the last 30 years, you will thus have a manageable collection of volumes which would be very convenient for the use of the House.

MR. J. POWELL WILLIAMS (Birmingham, S.): I should like to call attention to the desirability of getting at certain portions of the Historical Manuscripts, which have become very rare, and are now very difficult to obtain. These MSS. are of enormous historical value, and are being very much sought after; and persons who begin to make a collection find it almost impossible to render that collection complete, because three or four of the MSS. he requires are out of print, or have become so rare that what could at one time have been bought for 3s. or 4s. now costs £4 or £5. If the Treasury would undertake to republish those rare MSS., it would very much help the sale of the other MSS., and be of great advantage to historical scholars throughout the Kingdom. It would also be well if there could be some revision in the numbering of the volumes, which is now exceedingly complicated. What is wanted is that they should bear consecutive numbers, so that those who possess them could easily see whether they have a complete set. I hope the Treasury will give a favourable consideration to the suggestions.

MR. JACKSON: The hon. Member for Caithness has drawn attention to the fact that the Hansard contract is about to terminate, and has asked whether it is intended to call for a new contract. It would be a difficult position for the Treasury to occupy if they were to endeavour to make any arrangement with an individual firm without submitting the matter to public competition. I think, therefore, that the proper course is to invite tenders for this important work.

DR. CLARK: What will they tender for?

MR. JACKSON: The tenders will be for that for which we have invited tenders before. The Treasury are acting in this matter upon a Report of a Joint Committee of both Houses, and the present contract was based on the recommendation of the Committee. We have no other basis before us. The question as to whether we should have a full report or a condensed report of the proceedings of Parliament is undoubtedly an interesting, but it is hardly a practical, one at this moment. I may state that I have not heard any complaints as to the form in which the Reports have been published. I think that on some occasions they might be a little fuller than they are, and this might be a point to insert in the specification, but I know of no other alteration that is necessary. The whole question was carefully gone into by the Committee to which I have referred, and my recollection is that the Committee were unanimous except on one point, and on that one point the hon. Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool was the only exception. With regard to the question of providing the Law Reports which has been referred to by the hon. Member for Eccles, that is a matter which has been under consideration for some time, about eight months. I promised to make inquiry as to whether there was space in the Library for the edition known as "The Law Reports," and I found there was great difficulty in finding space for so many volumes. With regard to the "Historical Manuscript Reports," the question referred to by the hon. Member for South Birmingham is at the present moment under the consideration of the Printing Committee. The hon. Member promised to write to me, but he has not done so.

MR. J. POWELL WILLIAMS: I promised to communicate with the right hon. Gentleman, and I have done so in this way.

MR. JACKSON: I have caused inquiries to be made, but have not been very well informed as to the particular volumes.

MR. J. POWELL WILLIAMS: If it is more convenient I will communicate with the right hon. Gentleman and tell him exactly what volumes are out of print. The matter may be left where it is for the present.

MR. JACKSON: I shall be glad if the hon. Member will communicate with me.

(9.32.) MR. CALDWELL: I was glad to hear the answer the right hon. Gentleman gave as to the Law Reports. I presume he will include Reports of Scotch Law as well as English Law and Irish Law. As to space, I think I can point out a convenient place for the Reports in the Reading Room downstairs. Shelves could be there arranged which would contain all the volumes, and it would be convenient to have them there as they would be easy of access. If the question of space is the only difficulty, I think there is no reason why the volumes should not be provided at once. I should like to call attention to the profit made on printing the Gazettes. I have found the profit on the three Gazettes, London, Edinburgh, and Dublin, to be £25,000. I think that this is a most unnecessary profit and an unnecessary tax upon trade. Not only is it a tax upon trade, but it falls upon unfortunate traders, because it is the bankrupt traders who are compelled by Statute to insert notices in these Gazettes. In the case of the Edinburgh Gazette the cost of production is £284, and the receipts are £3,799, which shows a net profit of over £3,500. That, I think, is out of all proportion, and is highly objectionable as a profit made out of the misfortunes of unfortunate traders. It is not a reasonable principle on which to levy taxation. Of all sources of revenue this is the one least to be commended, and, therefore, with the view of ascertaining the opinion of the Government in the matter, I beg to move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £100.

Motion made, and Question proposed: "That item L, printing, &c., of Gazettes, be reduced by £100."—(Mr. Caldwell.)

MR. CALDWELL: I think I am entitled to some reply from the right hon. Gentleman.

(9.36.) MR. JACKSON: I do not know what reply the hon. Member expects to get. It is certainly a curious complaint to make, that the Government should make a little profit out of the printing of the public Gazettes. It is true that we have lately made some changes by which we have saved a few thousand pounds a year, but I think that the charge is not unreasonable, and I do not think that I can promise any alteration.

MR. CALDWELL: The publishing of the Edinburgh Gazette only costs £284 and the fees amount to £3,799. I think that the right hon. Gentleman can hardly maintain that this is a reasonable charge. Can the right hon. Gentleman give an instance in business, or anywhere else where such an enormous profit is charged as 1,000 per cent.? The rate of these fees is calculated by the Exchequer. They can charge what they like.

because the Statute compels the placing of these advertisements in the Gazettes. This tax upon trade—and on unfortunate traders—is utterly unworthy of the Government and of the principle upon which the taxation of the country is based. We tax the country on its wealth, or supposed wealth, and here the Government tax the people on their misfortunes, and leave them no means of evading the tax. And this operates more heavily against Scotland than against England, because the amount received from England is only five times the amount received from Scotland; and not only that, but Scotch traders in some instances are bound to advertise in the London Gazette as well as in the Edinburgh Gazette, so that money from Scotland goes to swell up the profit made on the London Gazette. I trust the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury will regard this matter not merely from an official point of view but from an unofficial point of view.

DR. CLARK: How long has the present printer a right to publish the Gazette; when will the contract cease, and what does he pay for it?

MR. JACKSON: I believe the present contract for publishing the Edinburgh Gazette is for seven years, of which two or three years have run. The sum paid for publishing it is £1,100.

Ayes 28; Noes 93. — (Div. List, No. 355.)

(9.50.) MR. MORTON [Cries of "Divide!"]: I rise to move the reduction of this Vote by the sum of £100. I gave notice of the reduction because I want, if possible, to get a full statement of particulars from the Government as to what they intend to do in regard to the Parliamentary Reports. In the first place, I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman if he would be good enough to comply with the request of the hon. Member for Caithness, to give the Committee the name of the person with whom the Government entered into the contract which is now about to come to an end. I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman, amongst other things, whether, in connection with the new contract he says they are just considering, he will have regard to the advisability of bringing the reporters into the body of the House, as has been done in the House of Lords. I do not know whether what is going on upstairs now can be called sweating, but certainly complaints have been made. I wish to say that I do not think the reporting is badly done; on the contrary, I think it is very well done indeed, especially as we only pay for it indirectly by taking a certain number of volumes per year; but there are those who think we should have longer reports. ["Oh!"] It is all very well for hon. Members to cry "Oh!" I am not at all satisfied that we could not get longer reports for the same money we pay for short reports. [Laughter.] Well, that is the evidence we receive from the House of Lords. I should like to know whether in the new contract that is to be made, the right hon. Gentleman will arrange that the price of the daily edition to Members of this House shall be 3d. instead of 1s., which is almost prohibitive. [Laughter.] It is not, perhaps, prohibitive to Attorney Generals, who receive plenty of fees from the public as well as from this House. Probably they do not mind whether the charge is 1s. or 3d.; but those gentlemen who have not an opportunity of receiving, or are not allowed by law to take fees as lawyers are in connection with the Public Business of this country, would find it greatly to their advantage to get the daily parts at 3d. instead of 1s. I hope that care will be taken in the new contract to see that the names of the House of Commons and the British Government are not used for the purpose of promoting bogus companies and plundering the British public. Undoubtedly, those names have been so used in connection with the existing contract that the British public have been plundered to a very large extent. I do not pretend to say whether the work ought to be done by one or two contracts. So far as I understand them, I do not agree with the statements in the pamphlet sent round to hon. Members by the editor of Hansard, for I think that somebody ought to be responsible for the printing and publishing, so that we may know whom to blame in case of delay. If we had two contracts, one party might blame the other, and we should not know to whom blame could be attached. I think we should also be able, no matter at what cost in reason, to employ the very best reporters that can be got, and on such terms that whoever gets the contract shall be able to keep the reporters specially for this work from year to year. Whether we have short reports or long reports, everyone is agreed that we should have some report in the nature of Hansard, and I think all are agreed that the reporting should be done in the best manner. I do not wish to detain the Committee at any length, but it is a matter of considerable interest not only to this House, but to the country, that we should settle this contract on the very best terms. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman when he accepts the next contract will not do so on behalf of the Government simply because it is the lowest tender, so that it may be made use of again simply for the purpose of plundering the public. I desire to get as many particulars as I can with regard to this matter, and if we do not get sufficient information from the right hon. Gentleman I shall go to a Division. I move that the Vote be reduced by £100.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item M, Parliamentary Debates, &c., be reduced by £100." — (Mr. Morton.)

(9.57.) MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I am one of the few Members in the House who objected to the change when it was made three years ago. I thought then that it would be a very unfortunate change for this House, and it has turned out to be so. The only thing I wish to urge is that in making the new contract considerations other than those of mere cheapness should influence the Government. I think that for the dignity of this House, the old reputation of Hansard should at least be kept up. I am bound to say, having looked over the reports issued under the new conditions, that, notwithstanding the fact that they are a little more lengthy, I fail to find in them that completeness, compactness, and fulness in the proper sense of the term that were to be found in the old Hansard. In making this comment it is only fair that I should urge on the Government that they should not have consideration merely to the 130 or 120 copies that they purchase from the contractor, but that they shall have in view the necessity of doing something to preserve the historical records of this House. Often in various parts of the world the only thing to refer to as to the Debates in this House is Hansard. The Times' reports are exceedingly good, considering that they are out on the morning after the Debates. I do not wish to say one word against the Times' reports, but we want something which will be accepted as an authoritative report of the proceedings of the House. I would press upon the right hon. Gentleman that some consideration other than cheapness should be taken into account in making a new contract, and if that is not done I, for one, shall certainly draw attention to the matter next Session.

*(9.59.) MR. CREMER: I only wish to say a few words with reference to the subject under discussion. I cannot agree with my hon. Friend (Mr. Howell) in regard to the character of the reports now supplied to us. For my part, I think that Hansard is decidedly improved. There is no comparison between the present and the past. I agree, however, with what has been said as to the use that has been made of the name of Hansard and the disastrous results that have followed. I hope that in the new contract the Treasury will take care to safeguard the honour and dignity of the country against a repetition of such shameful practices. But I rise simply for the purpose of joining in the appeal in favour of a reduction being made in the price of Hansard, at least to Members of the House. I think that half the price now charged would be quite sufficient. I presume the Treasury will oppose an attempt to reduce the price of Hansard to Members; but when I recollect the by the Gazettes of London, Dublin, and Edinburgh there is made a profit of something like £25,000 a year, it seems to me in that profit there is an opportunity afforded to the Treasury of making a little sacrifice in the direction indicated. What do we find takes place in other countries? In the United States there is a full and official report. I hope the time will come when we shall have a report of the same character. Of course, I should like our report to be free from the abuses which have crept into the report in the United States. It is quite a common practice there for a member to prepare a long speech and commence to read it; but when he has been on his legs a few minutes the other Members become impatient and he sits down, on the understanding that his speech will be published in the Congressional Record. Thus the speech is palmed off on outsiders as one that has been delivered in the House. I do not wish to suggest for a moment that we should tolerate anything of that kind, but we ought to have some kind of official report, produced under the supervision of a Department of the State, and issued at a cheap rate. I hope, at all events, the Government will strain a point to supply Hansard to Members at a cheaper rate than it has been obtainable at hitherto.

(10.5.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I am bound to say, having read in the papers all about the Hansard Union business, that I do not think the Government can be acquitted of having been the cause of ruin or great loss to hundreds of people. The Treasury had no business to enter into this contract. It was necessarily a ruinous contract for the company, who were not paid for the work they were doing. I do not read the Hansard proofs, but throw them in the waste paper basket; but the company have been doing better work than was ever done in the olden times. Therefore it must have been evident to the Treasury that the work was undertaken by the company as a kind of catchpenny, just as a tradesman puts an article in a shop window at a price that cannot pay, in order to attract customers. The contract was taken by the company for the purpose of sharking the public, who were led to believe it was a profitable contract, and were thus induced to invest their money in shares. The public were never informed that the whole basis of Hansard was a matter of £1,000. Upon this the Union, with something like £300,000 capital, was floated, to say nothing of the Anglo-Austrian Paper Company, or Papier Mâché Company. It was a wrong thing on the part of the Government to allow all this to go on, knowing as they did how the Government contract was being dangled before the eyes of the public. All this has been done by a man whose record in the Bankruptcy Court the other day was one of the most amazing disclosures that even London or South African finance has yet shown. A man who had not a sixpence ten years ago has been able to get from the public hundreds of thousands of pounds, and all on the basis of this contract giving the right to use the historic Parliamentary name of Hansard. There is not a sharper man in the world than the Secretary to the Treasury. I know something of the way he has done his work in Ireland, and I think he is one of the keenest and most competent men that ever occupied his position, and that being so his blame is, in my judgment, all the greater. The right hon. Gentleman ought to have known something about Bottomley and the way in which he was using this Parliamentary contract for company-mongering. By the use of the name of Hansard, dust was thrown into the eyes of thousands of people, because it is absurd to say that if the company had been called John Smith & Co., or any name of that kind, the public would have taken up the shares. I think the right hon. Gentleman when giving the contract to this company ought to have seen that they were asking a figure which would pay. I wonder whether the widows and orphans who have been ruined by Hansard know what Hansard was getting out of the Government. I will tell them. What the Government did for Hansard was to buy 120 copies, and sundry odd copies, of the report at £5 5s. 0d. each. In all they paid £650. I suppose it cost Hansard £5 to produce each set of volumes, so that the profit may have been 5s. a set. I suppose they made £30 a year profit, if as much. And this contract was the foundation on which many unhappy people lost their money. I say that in this matter a great responsibility lies with the head of the Treasury. Having brought about this great scandal what is the next step? What is going to be done with regard to Parliamentary reporting? The present Government are not to blame for this penuriousness in the matter of reporting; they only adopted the policy of their predecessors. When a Minister is out of office he is anxious for an official report, but when he is at the Treasury he sneers at such a report, and asks the public to do the reporting. At the present moment the reports for Hansard are being done for both Houses by a receiver: the Commons have a receiver in the gallery, and the Lords on the floor of the House; that is what we have come to. What has happened ought to be a warning to the Government. Reporting is a great craft. The reporter requires to know his craft and a great deal about many subjects. This Parliamentary work ought not to be given to a person coming into the market to make a profit. While we are condemning sweating at the East-end this contract was a palpable absurdity. Something ought to be done to give a proper status to the reporters of the Debates, and some explanation is due from the Government to the unfortunate shareholders of the company.

(10.15.) MR. JACKSON: The hon. and learned Gentleman has thrown blame on the Treasury for what they have done in connection with the Hansard Company. I do not think the Treasury, if they had the business to do over again, and had the knowledge they possessed at the time this contract was entered into, would take any other course than that which they have taken. There had been a Joint Committee of both Houses which recommended a certain course of action. In order to give effect to the Committee's recommendation the Treasury must do one of two things—they must either enter into arrangements privately with some firm, or they must invite public tenders. It would not have been satisfactory to the House if they had made a private arrangement, and in that case I am sure the condemnation of the hon. Member who has just spoken would have been quite as strong as is his condemnation of what has occurred. I think it is the essence of questions of this kind that there should be thorough publicity as to what is required; and, secondly, that there should be open competition, that there should be a fair field and no favour to all those who are competent to discharge the duties. Tenders were invited. The Treasury fixed no price themselves, but followed the recommendations of the Committee. I believe it was a recommendation of the Committee that the price of the daily parts should be 1s; and one condition laid down was that the Treasury would take 120 copies for distribution amongst the Departments. In response to the invitation four or five tenders were sent in, and the firm which made the lowest tender was accepted. It must be fully understood that the Government had every reason to believe that the firm whose tender they accepted was fully capable of discharging the duties which they had undertaken, and I do not think that hon. Members have any complaint to make as to the way in which the work has been done. In these circumstances, the Government could take no other course than to accept the tender of the firm who offered to do the work upon the lowest terms. The hon. Member has spoken as if the tender was made by the Hansard Union, and we knew what was going on. The firm who took the tender was Macrae, Curtice, & Co.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I asked that question last year, and it was denied.

*MR. MORTON: Is that name in the tender that was sent in?

MR. JACKSON: Certainly. The question of the hon. and learned Member for Longford may have been put in such a form as to make the answer to it convey that impression. When the firm sent in its tender it was registered under the Joint Stock Acts. The day has gone past when you can make much distinction between a company and a private concern, but the Government took extra precaution in this matter by requiring the company to give security for the due performance of the work. In these circumstances, I fail to see what other course the Government could have taken than the one they adopted. Hon. Members have complained that the Government accepted the lowest tender; but if all other things are equal, and the Government had reason to believe they were in the present case, surely we are bound to accept the lowest tender. It is perfectly true that Macrae, Curtice, & Co. has been bought up, and has been consolidated with other businesses into a great concern, and that that concern has not been successful, but it was impossible for the Government to ascertain the real state of the case at the time they entered into the contract. The Government, however, when the real position of affairs came to their knowledge, took the earliest opportunity of terminating the contract, and, as a matter of fact, the contract will terminate at the end of the present Session. The Government will, of course, invite fresh tenders, and will endeavour to select some firm who, so far as we can judge, is perfectly competent to perform the work in a satisfactory manner. Beyond that, it is quite impossible for me to give any pledge in the matter.

DR. CLARK: I think in fairness to the right hon. Gentleman I ought to say that when Macrae, Curtice, & Co. took this contract they were a very respectable firm. There was a fusion of two firms, a printing and publishing firm. The printer, Mr. Durant, was the Member for Stepney in the last Parliament, and Mr. Curtice was a publisher for 30 years, and he carried on a very good business. But Mr. Horatio Bottomley came in as managing director and ruined the business. The Treasury were aware that Mr. Bottomley was arranging the contract. It was announced that the company were going to push the Reports amongst the trade and thus make the thing pay. I protested then, as I protest now, against the invitation of the Government to firms to tender not for a full or even a fair report, but merely for a report that will give one-third of what a speaker says. It is left to some reporter in a corner of the Gallery to determine what that one-third shall be. If the Member feels aggrieved with the report he has to write out what he wishes to appear; he has, in fact, to edit his own speech. The hon. Member for Northampton does not want a report, and I would much prefer to have no report at all rather than have such an one as we now get. If you are going to have a report let it be an accurate one. A better report than that of Hansard is to be found in the Times, although I am ready to admit that the form in which Hansard is furnished to hon. Members is very convenient. The Government will have to make up their minds whether they will have the reports based upon the commercial principles or whether they will give a subsidy. Personally, I think the present method of tendering is the one wrong one.

(10.25.) MR. CREMER: The right hon. Gentleman has defended the action of the Government by saying that the price of the daily parts was fixed by the Committee, but it is quite competent for the Government to over-rule the decision of that Committee as they have those of so many other Committees. This is the only country in which Members are called upon to buy the official report. In the United States, where Members are paid for their services, every Member of Congress receives six copies of the Congressional Record free every day. I hope, therefore, that my very modest request of reducing the price to 6d. will be acceded to.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I hope that if the request of the hon. Member is acceded to some means may be provided for those hon. Members who do not want the reports to signify the fact to the Government. For my own part, I never read anything that I have said, because I hope that I get wiser every day of my existence. I look sometimes with regret on what I have said, because I hope to be able by practice to speak in a briefer fashion. When we begin to thresh out our differences of opinion as to what we consider an accurate report, we find ourselves at loggerheads. There is a verbatim report, and outside a verbatim report there is only good and bad reporting. The reporter must compress, and it depends upon the reporter whether the compression is well done or not. Speaking generally, I do not think the reports we at present are very good. When Hansard took the Times report, I do not say it was what it should be, but it was fairly good. Hansard's report was better than is the Company's report. The reports we have are not, I think, up to the reports of speeches we get in provincial newspapers. I venture to suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that it is always very desirable in accepting a tender to consider who those who tender are. Anybody may tender to do the work badly, but what we want is a thoroughly good report. I do not say a verbatim report. I do not think a verbatim report either possible or desirable, but a fair and reasonable précis of what is said in the House would be useful. That we do not get at present, and I doubt very much whether we can get it without paying something for it. I was on the Committee, and I confess that I was very much surprised to hear that the firm referred to had tendered to do the work gratis, particularly as Hansard had received over £5,000 per annum for it, and I do not suppose that Hansard, even in the perfunctory way in which the work was done, got anything like £5,000 a year by it. It may be a melancholy fact, but it is undoubtedly true, that the general public are not so anxious to read our speeches as we may think, and, for my own part, I cannot possibly imagine any sane human being buying Hansard's reports and sitting down to pass a cheerful evening reading them. The fact is, the work is not one for general circulation, and to imagine that any firm can make money by reporting all the speeches in the House, and then publishing them in a presentable form, is an entire illusion. I only rose, however, to suggest that, if we are to have a good and satisfactory report, it would be well that the Treasury should look closely into the firms which tender, and in order to secure such a report I do not think a reasonable sum would be badly spent by the House.

Mr. Labouchere

*(10.34.) MR. MORTON: I understand the hon. Member for Northampton does not read his speeches, but he thinks he is improving day by day, and I hope that is so. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury has not replied to the suggestions I made, nor given me any assurance that the Government will even consider them. I first asked a question about the charge made for the daily copies of Hansard to Members. The right hon. Gentleman tells us that the price was recommended by the Committee, but surely that does not settle the matter for ever; surely he will go so far as to say the Treasury will consider the wishes of Members in the matter. I asked, next, whether the Government would consider the suggestion of placing reporters on the floor of the House, as in the House of Lords, where the plan has been very successful I am told. I suppose we could find as much room for them here. I am sure there is no desire, so far as I know, to imply that the right hon. Gentleman had any idea of the use to which the contract in question was going to be put; but I can only say that in a few hours, or in a very short time, it was known in the City of London who had got the contract and what was going to be done—that the contractors were about to apply to the public for money. This was known almost before the contract was signed. I shall certainly go to a Division on this matter unless I get an assurance that the Treasury will consider the questions of enabling hon. Members to get the daily copies of the reports for 3d. each, of placing reporters on the floor of the Chamber, and of making it a condition of the contract to have, not simply one-third, but a fair report of the proceedings of the House.

(10.35.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I heard with some surprise the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury, in which he said the Treasury could not know how the contract would be used. I have referred to the Estimates for 1887, the year before the Hansard Union was founded. The public who have lost their hundreds of thousands should understand what has been done. The right hon. Gentleman tells us the Treasury had but one duty, to make the best contract they could in the interests of the taxpayers. But the taxpayer can be bled not only by taxes, but by losses. You have saved the taxpayer $\frac{1}{4}$ d. in taxation, you have let in the taxpayers who subscribed to Hansard for losses to the extent of hundreds of thousands of pounds. Here is the estimate for Hansard this year: 120 copies of the Debates, at £5 5s.—£650. The Estimates show that in 1888 a grant in aid was made to Hansard, and in that year Hansard received £5,150 for doing what in the present year they are doing for £650. It is absurd for a Minister to talk about a contractor coming to the Treasury and saying he was going to form a Limited Liability Company, and would do for nothing work which cost Hansard £6,000 a year to do, and without making any money by it. Surely the Treasury ought to have had their eyes open as to what was going to take place. On the face of it it is absurd. Does it not point to some job, something in the City, something smelling, a job the scent of which the nostrils of the Government ought to have scented. Now the right hon. Gentleman asks, what were the Treasury to do? Well, I must say I think if a man were to come to me and offer to do for £650 work for which I had been paying £6,000, I should be disposed to ask: "My friend, how are you going to work it? How are you going to get the bulge on the public in this thing?" I think most men not in the habit of dealing with Treasury millions would take that view. Certainly the shareholders of the company in question would have thought it extremely curious that the Treasury was to get this work done for nothing, whereas the old contractor, not a Limited Liability Company, got more than £5,000 for it. The right hon. Gentleman lays down the proposition that the Treasury had only to get the work done anyhow, but here we have the evil result. The Treasury may have saved a few thousand pounds, but the public have lost £300,000; that is how the profit and loss of the thing stands. Why, if a man comes to the Treasury and offers to run the whole British Empire for £1 a week—

Army, Navy, Volunteers, and all—are you to accept the offer as a matter of course? The blame of the transaction rests on the Treasury, and the right hon. Gentleman has not met the case by the statements he has made. So much for the past, but what as to the future? It is not creditable to the House or to the country to leave the question of reporting our Debates in the way in which it now stands. For my own part, I do not care a brass button whether Hansard is given up or not. I am quite sure nobody cares much about it outside the House; but if it is to be kept up, let it be on a well understood and responsible system. The Houses of Lords and Commons have sat in Committee on this subject, and now what it comes to is that you get somebody to do the work for nothing. I say the business of reporting our Parliamentary Debates ought not to be jobbed about in this way. I think it is pretty well understood Hansard did not make a profit out of the subsidy. I do not imagine the £4,500 included the admirable work done in Select Committees? [Mr. JACKSON: No.] Well, then, I say in reference to the question what is our Parliamentary reporting to come to, would it not be possible to have a combination whereby the admirable craftsmen who do the work of the Committees could afterwards, supposing there is a sufficient staff, be turned on to give a précis of the proceedings in the House? The hon. Member for Northampton has said Hansard did well when adopting the Times' report. Well, as regards English Debates, I will admit the Times' reports are very good. But that is not the case when the Times deals with Irish Debates. It seems to be the rule in the Times' report, when an Irishman makes a point, to leave it out. I suppose this is somewhat on the Johnsonian principle "taking good care the Whig dogs did not get the best of it." That is my experience of the Times; at any rate, during the last few years. But I say a system by which the Debates are adapted from the Times, and produced by a cheap staff, is not a satisfactory state of things. The Government should say exactly what it is that they require. It is not enough to invite tenders for a report. Is it to be an original report—a Times report—what is it to be? I do not suppose anybody wants a verbatim report. Whatever it is you decide to have, let the contractor know what it is you want; and if for an original report a subsidy is required—£4,000, or £5,000, or £10,000—let it be granted if you want such a report.

(10.45.) MR. JACKSON [Who could only be imperfectly heard]: There is no difficulty about the matter; all the particulars are set out in the specifications, and if any further information is required, it, of course, can be obtained at the Stationery Office. But the whole thing is set out in the specification. It is part of the arrangement that there shall be always in the House a reporter to watch the proceedings—Questions, General Debates, Committees; in fact, the whole proceedings. The question raised by the hon. Member for Peterborough with regard to bringing the reporters downstairs was considered by the Committee. The difficulty in the House of Lords was owing to the acoustics of the Chamber, and the fact that in the Gallery the reporters could not properly hear. The consequence was, that in order to enable them to hear the reporters were brought downstairs. There is no difficulty of that kind in this House. I think there are objections to fixing the price of Hansard to hon. Members lower than to the public. Whatever the price fixed to Members of the House, we ought to allow the public to purchase at the same price. If there is any feeling on the matter, I am perfectly willing to consider it, but I do not think there is likely to be a great sale.

*SIR J. GOLDSMID (St. Pancras, S.): I hope the Treasury will not reduce the price, because it will only tend to increase the amount of small talk in Supply. For this reason, I would rather have the price increased than diminished. It will merely satisfy vanity and meet no public demand.

(10.50.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 35; Noes 131.—(Div. List, No. 356.)

Original Question again proposed.
Mr. T. M. Healy

(10.57.) MR. ATKINSON (Boston): Some time since I drew the attention of the Treasury to the grievances of the Custom House clerks in relation to the bills of entry, and there can be no doubt that they have been most unjustly treated. I do not know who was answerable for the change, but I do know that it was most unjustly made.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is referring to something that was done many years ago, and has no reference to the expenditure in the present year.

MR. ATKINSON: I find the accounts here, and I submit that I am in order in discussing these.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member's criticisms would only apply to action taken some years ago.

MR. ATKINSON: Very well, Sir; I move the reduction of the Vote by £500. I can substantiate my case, and next Session I will move for a Select Committee on the subject.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The arrangement in question was made some years ago, and has no reference to the present Estimate.

MR. ATKINSON: I shall move the reduction of the Vote by £500, and shall ventilate my case next Session.

Motion made, and Question put: "That Item N, Printing, &c., for Bills of Entry, be reduced by £500."—(Mr. Atkinson.)

(11.4.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 14; Noes 160.—(Div. List, No. 357.)

Original Question again proposed.

(11.14.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: I wish to ask who is the Minister of the Crown responsible for the printing arrangements. We have continually to make complaints about the printing, and especially of delay in the issue of Papers, but we are invariably told by the Ministers to whom the complaint is made that they have no control over the matter. I think there ought to be some one in a position to answer our questions. I think sometimes that the Treasury is not particularly anxious to bring the printers under a general control, because it is convenient for Ministers to be able to hurry on some Papers and delay others without assuming any responsibility towards Parliament. I repeat I think there should be a Minister responsible to Parliament for the printing arrangements, whom hon. Members can question as to delays in the printing of Papers.

MR. JACKSON: The hon. Member asks who is the Minister responsible for the delays that take place. I may point out that the printer has to get the Papers from the several Departments, each Department sending in its own. In any case where the printer has not used despatch, if the matter is brought to the notice of the Chairman of the Printing Committee, the Member for Wigton, it will be inquired into.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: That is all I want to know. If in future we have to complain of delay, our inquiries must be addressed to the Member for Wigton.

*MR. CAUSTON: I must, as a Member of the Parliamentary Papers Distribution Committee, say I do not think it is part of our duty to accelerate the printing of Papers.

MR. JACKSON: I did not say it was; I only suggested that the Chairman of the Committee would inquire into any complaints as to delay.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I think the charges for Parliamentary Papers are too high. There are a great many Blue Books which contain information that would be valuable to a great number of persons, and it is a mistake to charge so highly for them. I would suggest that the Government should follow the system adopted especially in the book business, and try to get large sales with small profits.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I have another matter arising under this Vote to which I wish to draw attention. I see the sum put down for Parliamentary Papers for the free libraries is £100. That shows a very niggardly distribution. There is a good deal of humbug about some of these libraries. Their only use is to provide three-volume novels for young persons, and it would be desirable to provide them with some solid reading. More solid reading than these Blue Books could not be found. If these books are of any value at all to the free libraries more of them ought to be distributed.

*(11.20.) MR. CREMER: What are the hours of the clerks in this Department?

MR. JACKSON: Seven; from 10 till 5.

Question put, and agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. CALDWELL: I rise for the purpose of moving the reduction of the Vote which stands in the name of the hon. Member for Inverness-shire, and my object is to call attention to the question of the alienation of rights in salmon fishing in Scotland. In Scotland certain salmon fishings are vested in the Crown, not as a personal emolument, but on behalf of the public. In 1872 the Woods and Forests Department began under an Act to alienate salmon fisheries, and a considerable amount of irritation has been created in Scotland. The question has been raised on former occasions, and the Government have undertaken that no more alienations shall take place until the matter has been definitely determined. A Committee has made substantial recommendations as to the salmon fishings being utilised for the benefit of the public by way of licences in such a way that public rights may be utilised for the benefit of the public in general. I wish to know whether the Government are still prepared to carry out the policy of having no more alienations of these salmon fishings in Scotland; and, further, whether the Government are prepared, and to what extent, to carry they had not a proper title. I think that until a better case has been shown for a general inquiry it would be inexpedient to undertake what would be a very lengthy and very delicate business. I decidedly think that no case has been shown for such an inquiry.

MR. MARJORIBANKS: I did not suggest that an inquiry should be held into the titles of all people holding rights under the Crown, but I did suggest that all persons so holding should be required to register their title within at least two years, and that if they failed to do so, then it should be considered that these salmon or mussel fisheries were still vested in the Crown, and the Crown should be able to deal with them as seemed best for the public.

*MR. BUCHANAN: The hon. Gentleman has suggested that I did not accurately explain to the Committee the facts of the case with regard to Loch Morar, and the consequences of alienating their rights. What took place was this—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The case of Loch Morar was only incidentally cited as an illustration. It is not relevant to the subject under debate to go into the facts connected with it.

*MR. BUCHANAN: I only desired to justify what I had said on the subject. This is really the first case in which the Office of Woods and Forests alienated any such rights in a large enclosed sheet of water, and I believe that they did it in ignorance of the consequences that might ensue to the public. It was only subsequently that they appreciated the evil results. I want now to get a definite pledge on the part of the Woods and Forests that no such alienation of fishing rights shall take place in the future as has taken place lately.

(11.54.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: I also wish to press the Government for a definite pledge that this alienation of the fisheries shall not continue. With regard to information as to title there is a very great difference between Scotland and England; if the Public Register is looked at in Scotland, the title can be decided at once. But there are a large number of people who claim to exercise their rights of salmon fishing who have not a shred of title.

MR. JACKSON: I do not think there is any difference between the views of the Government and hon. Members as to the general policy to be pursued. The Government are as anxious as hon. Members opposite to take care that no alienation of fishing rights shall take place. There have been no such alienations since the inquiry by the Commission, but I do not think it would be wise or right to say that under no circumstances shall there be no alienations in the future. As I know the view taken by the Department of Woods and Forests, I may say that the general policy of the Department in future will be such as to meet with the approval of hon. Gentlemen opposite.

MR. CRAWFORD: I was rather surprised that the statement of the hon. Member who sits below me as to the necessity for inquiring into the title of members of the public who claim rights of salmon fishing received the answer that such inquiry would be impossible. The Department have not carried out the recommendation of the Royal Commission in regard to leasing fisheries. The Government ought to see that these recommendations are carried out, and not declare it impossible to trace everybody's title. The Report of the Commission speaks of a belief that there are still many unchartered waters. It is a matter of great importance that inquiry should be made.

*SIR H. MAXWELL: There is no difference between the attitude which I have taken up on this occasion and the language of the Report, but there is a difference between examining into particular cases and a general investigation. Inquiry should be made in cases where reasonable doubt exists.

DR. CLARK: I think that the hon. Gentleman might have gone further, and laid it down that in the renewal of salmon leases the same course will be followed as used to be taken under the old toll system, of putting them up to tender. By that means a fair price would be obtained. After the scandals which have occurred in the past, the Government ought to take great care to prevent a renewal of them.

(12.4.) The Committee Divided:—
Ayes 56; Noes 121.—(Div. List, No. 358.)

Original Question again proposed.

*(12.12.) SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): I wish to call the attention of the House to the action of the Woods and Forest Commission in letting Crown lands in allotments. Application was made to the Department to let for that purpose certain Crown lands in Billingborough. This House declared in the Allotments Act that one acre was the proper size of an allotment, but the Woods and Forests Commission have taken it into their heads to declare that half an acre is sufficient, and, in a communication sent down to Billingborough, it was said—

“Half an acre is as large a quantity of land as can be properly managed by an agricultural labourer, unless under exceptional circumstances, and, as at present advised, the Commissioners would not be disposed to grant to labourers an allotment exceeding that quantity.”

I wish to obtain an assurance from the Government that the Commissioners of Woods and Forests will in future comply with the terms of the Allotments Act, and grant allotments of Crown lands to the extent of one acre, whether in England or in Wales, to labourers who apply for them. It is surely a piece of official tyranny to tell a poor man that he is incompetent to manage more than half an acre of land. If he is able to pay the rent for an acre, he should be allowed that quantity of land, and no Government official ought to deprive him of the right to it.

(12.15.) MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I wish to ask a question, not as to a poor man, but regarding one at the other end of the scale. The hon. Member for Wigtonshire said just now that the Government were bound to make the most of their revenue. Surely, then, it is incumbent on them to get in the debts which are due to the Department. I find in the list of unrecovered debts one in the name of the Duke of Fife for a capital sum of £400, and interest, which in five years has amounted to £75. What security did the Department take from the Duke when the money was advanced? Is there any power of foreclosing? Do the Department stand in the position of mortgagees? Have they any personal security? Surely a person of the rank of the Duke of Fife could get some one to act as surety for him. Why has not payment been enforced? Why should the Duke be treated differently from a poor man?

MR. JACKSON: With reference to the question raised by the hon. Member for Ilkeston, there will be no difficulty in granting the full quantity of land fixed by the Allotments Act to labourers who apply for allotments out of lands under the control of the Commissioners. I do not think there is any desire to restrict the grants to half an acre. With regard to the question of the hon. Member for Donegal, I do not know the particulars of this case, and I cannot, therefore, give him the information he asks for. I anticipate the debt is the subject of a dispute. I will, however, make inquiries into the matter.

(12.20.) MR. A. O'CONNOR: I think the answer of the right hon. Gentleman most unsatisfactory. I can see nothing on the Estimates to explain the delay in the collection of this debt. For years and years the Department have allowed the debt to exist, and the interest on it to accumulate. The Duke is in the position of a debtor who has not paid his debts. I suppose the Department has taken no action against him, simply because he is the Duke of Fife. But the House of Commons ought not to be afraid of the Duke, and as we have been unable to get a satisfactory explanation, I shall move to reduce the Vote by the amount of the debt, namely, £400.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item A., Salaries, be reduced by £400, part of the Salary of the Chief Commissioner." — (Mr. Arthur O'Connor.)

MR. JACKSON: I do not think the reply that I have made is unreasonable. It is impossible for me to be in a position to enter into details on this subject, as I have received no notice. There are some thousands on the Votes. How can I be expected to be acquainted with each one?

MR. A. O'CONNOR: This debt has been going on for years.

MR. JACKSON: But my attention has not been called to it before; I have no doubt there is a full explanation to be furnished. I am not asking too much when I request the hon. Member to withdraw his Motion. If the Vote is now allowed to pass I will undertake to give the hon. Member full particulars on Report.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I think the attitude of the Government is most unsatisfactory. This debt has been standing since June, 1885, just about the time the Conservatives came into power. It is most extraordinary that while poor Irish farmers who owe the Treasury a few pounds are sold up if they do not pay, this noble Duke, because he is the husband of a lady who gets thousands of pounds from the taxpayers of the country, is allowed to owe this large amount year after year. I can imagine the Attorney General denouncing the wretched ruffians of Irish tenants who fail to fulfil their contracts, but when it comes to be the case of a Duke who heads a South African Company, it is loyal and patriotic not to ask him to pay his debts. If it had been a poor man who owed this money he would have been forced to pay. An Irish tenant who owes £15 for two years is promptly sold up and turned out of house and home. Members of the Government talk about the dishonesty of the Irish tenants, but why not make the Duke pay his debts. [Loud cries of "Order!"] Members of the Tory Party do not like to hear about this, and as they will not give me a fair hearing I beg to move to report Progress.

THE CHAIRMAN: I cannot accept that Motion.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Then am I to have a hearing?

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member must expect to be interrupted if he says offensive things.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I have said nothing offensive to this House. You expect Irish tenant farmers to pay their small and miserable debts, while you do not make the Duke pay his. That is all I have said, and I do not consider that offensive to anybody.

(12.27.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 43; Noes 115.—(Div. List, No. 359.)

Original Question again proposed.

(12.36.) DR. CLARK: I beg to move, Sir, that you do now report Progress. Two very important matters have yet to be raised on this Vote, namely the condition of the gold industry in Wales and the mal-administration of the Crown quarries in Wales.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress and ask leave to sit again." — (Dr. Clark.)

*MR. GOSCHEN: I would point out as regards the gold mining industry in Wales that a Royal Commission is inquiring into the whole question of royalties. Great concessions have already been made, and a discussion on the matter before the Commission has reported would lead to no result. The moment the Commission has reported I will take up the matter. I could not deal with it until the Commission has reported, so I think it would scarcely be worth while to take up much time now in discussing it. I hope the Committee will now discuss the question of the quarries in Wales, so that we may be able to take the Scotch Votes first thing to-morrow. I shall keep my pledge, and not force the Estimates, but I make an earnest appeal to the Committee to allow us to take this and the following non-contentious Votes.

MR. T. M. HEALY: It is absurd to think of taking the Secret Service Vote to-night.

*MR. W. PRITCHARD MORGAN (Merthyr Tydvil): I cannot consent to the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman that we should not ventilate our grievances in this House. We have now nearly arrived at the end of the Session, and no opportunity has been afforded to private Members to ventilate their grievances until this hour—after midnight. I shall occupy at least one hour in calling the attention of the Committee to the condition of the gold industry in Wales. I have determined, at whatever cost, to ventilate our grievance before the Committee. In 1888 the Chancellor of the Exchequer promised eight or ten Members of this House he would give the matter his consideration. A little while ago I sent him a round robin signed by 73 Members asking him to receive a deputation, but he has not had the courtesy even to reply. He promised on the Vote on Account he would give the matter his immediate attention.

*MR. GOSCHEN: May I interrupt the hon. Gentleman? So far has our attention been given to the matter that we have changed the scale and sent it to the lessee of the mine.

*MR. W. PRITCHARD MORGAN: I regret to say I cannot withdraw from the position I have taken up. It is true the Government have changed the scale, but even the new scale is both monstrous and absurd. I intend to support the Motion to report Progress.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I regret I cannot respond to the appeal made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The matter I intend to raise is one of considerable interest to my constituents, inasmuch as the working of an important quarry is involved.

(12.42.) Question put, and agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported to-morrow.

Committee also report Progress; to sit again to-morrow.

SUPPLY—REPORT.

Resolutions [15th July], (see page 1274) reported, and agreed to.

REDEMPTION OF RENT (IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 377.)

COMMITTEE.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

(12.47.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I presume the Government will assent to the Amendment, which is merely formal.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 11, after "Commission" to insert "after an application in the prescribed manner."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 12, to leave out "renewal fines (if any)," and insert "circumstances of the case."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I do not think there is any objection to introducing words which would bring in every circumstance material, but it would be a pity to leave out the words "renewal fines," which are very important. I suggest that the hon. and learned Gentleman's view would probably be adequately met if after the word "any" his words were added.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 12, after "any," to insert "and all the circumstances of the case."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I presume the Government will assent to my next Amendment; and, acting on that assumption, I should like to ask if they have considered at all how the Land Commission is to ascertain whether there is a full agricultural rent or not? Of course, if they only look at the valuation and compare that with the rental, legal examination or anything of that kind would not be required, and it was with that view that I wished to leave out the words "renewal fines (if any)."

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 14, after "to," to insert "apply in the prescribed manner to"—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no objection to the Amendment, but I must point out that it would be impossible for the Government to assent to an amendment of the Bill which would allow these leases to be broken in cases where the full agricultural rent is not being charged.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I quite concur, and I think it would be very unjust if any such view were insisted upon. I think that in 1887 the Government stated that 20,000 leaseholders had applied. Even supposing 10,000 men apply, and say they hold at full agricultural rent, that would entail a very long inquiry, and, in the meantime, men would have to go on paying at the old rate. I assume the Land Commission in all these cases will have to hold some inquiry. I think the Government are imposing a condition which is very stringent, and will lead to a block in the system.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The Government's view of this Bill is the one I desire to carry out in this Amendment, but I think without the Amendment a view foreign to the view of the Government will prevail. As I understand, the view of the Government is that when a tenant desires to redeem his rent or desires to have it ascertained whether injustice prevails, he should go to the Land Commission. If the Land Commission declares that he holds at a full agricultural rent, the man will go to the landlord and ask to be allowed to redeem. The landlord will then say "Yes" or "No." You provide that the tenant shall redeem his rent by paying such a capital sum as may be agreed upon; he would have to make an offer of a capital sum. That is not the view of the Government. Their view is that the tenant should put to the landlord the point, "Will you allow me to redeem or not?" and not be required to offer any capital sum. I therefore beg to move the Amendment standing in my name.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 14, after "rent," to insert—

"Whereupon, if the lessor or grantor, as the case may be, signifies his consent within the prescribed time and in the prescribed manner, including consent to such sum being retained as guarantee deposit as the Land Commission may think necessary, then such redemption shall be effected."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): It will be necessary, under the Land Purchase Bill, to retain a guarantee deposit in every case of sale.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I submit that the position is wholly different in the case of redemption of rent and the case of land purchase. Land purchase is agreed upon by agreement. The landlord knows he is going to get four-fifths in land, and that another one-fifth is to remain out for 15 years. All the landlord has to do to block redemption is to say, "I will not allow my one-fifth to remain for 15 years; give me cash down." The landlord knows that if he did not agree to redemption the tenant would take him into Court and insist upon having a fair rent fixed. Accordingly, I submit this is absolutely necessary and—

It being One of the clock, the Chairman left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again to-morrow.

And, it being after One of the clock, Mr. Speaker adjourned the House without Question put.

House adjourned at one minute after One o'clock till to-morrow.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

INFLAMMABLE CARGOES IN PASSENGER SHIPS.

EARL DE LA WARR: My Lords, I wish to give notice that early in next Session I propose to move for a Select Committee to take evidence and report upon the question of inflammable substances being carried as cargo in passenger ships, and to consider whether legislation on the subject is desirable.

THE CHANTREY BEQUEST.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

*LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY, in rising to ask Her Majesty's Government whether the Trustees of the Chantrey Bequest are not infringing the intentions of the bequest by purchasing pictures from old Academicians

VOL. CCCLV. [THIRD SERIES.]

instead of from rising artists; and whether Her Majesty's Government have used their influence to dissuade the Chantrey Trustees from persisting in outraging the feelings of their Catholic fellow-subjects, said: My Lords, before I address you on the subject of the notice which stands on the Paper in my name, I desire to state that I do not hold any brief either from the Roman Catholics or from the Dean of Durham and those members of the Church of England who equally dislike the profanation of sacred things. Neither have I consulted with Roman Catholic Peers further than to ascertain that I was not trespassing upon ground which would be more properly occupied by one of them. I would add that I had some reluctance in putting down this notice because of a recent occurrence which induced fear on my part that there might be some risk of a speech on such a subject in case of my sudden death leading some member of that Church to claim me as an adherent, whilst I am simply desirous of doing what I conceive to be an act of justice. The reasons which have induced me to put down this notice are, first, certain articles in the Codes, which I will refer to later, and also that one of Her Majesty's Ministers has expressed the opinion that this question is one to be settled by public opinion; and there is no place more fitted to guide public opinion than your Lordships' House. One of my Radical friends has told me that this House does not initiate public opinion, but that it guides and perfects it, and I hope that the utterances of some of your Lordships may give that tone to public opinion which is wanted to remove the scandal which has arisen and the heartburnings which it has caused. A very general impression prevails that the bequest of Sir Francis Chantrey was intended to encourage rising talent; this impression probably originated with some friends of the late Sir Francis Chantrey who gave it currency, and I do not believe that it has any other foundation. It is, however, certain that his will directs that the pictures to be purchased from the funds he bequeathed should be selected for their artistic merit alone, without favouritism, and not with regard to the needy circumstances of artists whose works do not reach the highest artistic merit. He also extended the benefits of his bequest to men of all nations, provided that their work has been executed in England. The exact words of the will are these:—

“And my will further is that such President and Council in making their decision”

—that is in selecting pictures to be purchased from the fund—

“shall have regard solely to the intrinsic merit of the work in question, and not permit any feeling of sympathy for the artist or his family by reason of his or their circumstances or otherwise to influence them.”

Now, I do not wish to press more severely than I can help upon the author of the incriminated picture; but I have no hesitation in accusing the Trustees of the Chantrey Bequest, or the Committee of Selection, or whoever it is that acts for them, of favouritism and incapacity. They have to select the best picture of the year, and they have passed by such pictures as “The Emperor’s Choice of a Wife,” “The Doctor,” “The Return of Proserpine,” and other paintings superior as works of art to the one they selected. The picture they selected is a historical picture, but it is historically untrue. Granted that they did not know it is untrue—that it is a libel in paint, granted even that it were historically true, it is not high art; for the rule of Horace that Medea should not kill her children before the public applies equally to pictures, and the Chantrey Trustees ought not to have given the prize to a picture the indecency of which shocks every beholder. Many of your Lordships may have seen the picture of Susanna giving thanks and praise after her acquittal on the false charges of the Elders, in the Berlin Gallery of the German Exhibition. If His Majesty the King of Prussia and Emperor of Germany had seen that picture and had then been shown Mr. Calderon’s performance as the champion picture of England, he would possibly have repeated the saying of his Royal ancestor, that the Sovereign of England had not got a painter fit to paint a religious picture, a taunt which led Hogarth to paint his burlesque picture of Paul before Festus, and to commemorate the saying of the King of Prussia by inscribing it at the foot of the print of his picture. In naming Mr. Calderon’s picture with the “Susanna” in the Berlin Gallery as a religious picture, I am only following the artist’s apologists, who have described it as a reverent picture. That the Trustees of the Chantrey Bequest or their Committee of Selection should have been so blind to its defects shows the measure of their incapacity, and this is not the first time that they have given dissatisfaction, and that public complaints have been made. A few days ago I visited the South Kensington Museum to look at some of the pictures purchased under this bequest, and to my surprise I found among them a picture which some years ago at the Academy had excited the derision of the late Sir Philip Egerton and myself on account of the colouring being so untrue to nature. As the painter of that picture was in no way deserving of blame such as attaches to the painter of the picture purchased this year, and as he may still be living, I will not describe it more closely. If the Chantrey Trustees should make another unfortunate selection, such as this which they seem to cling to, it will probably lead to an appeal being made to the Charity Commissioners, and to those gentlemen framing a scheme for the better administration of this bequest, and for more impartial selection on artistic grounds alone, in accordance with the will of the testator, by a jury of foreigners. The Chantrey Bequest is of very considerable value. I believe it amounts to £80,000, so that I think it would be as deserving the attention of the Charity Commissioners as the Parish Piece of Leicester. The exhaustive Report which they made on those 17 acres will show the Chantrey Trustees what they might have to expect. If, instead of consulting a mediæval Latin text which he misunderstood and garbled—for Mr. Calderon omitted the next sentence, which plainly says that the confessor of St. Elizabeth held her back from renouncing all her possessions, so that she might pay her husband’s debt—if Mr. Calderon had consulted Butler’s Lives of the Saints he would have found nearly at the beginning of the account of her life that in her early youth she was devoted to almsgiving and to prayer; and the author added—

“If nobody was there, prostrating herself upon the ground: her devotion she indulged with more liberty in her private closet.”

Mr. Calderon might have understood from this that a woman who thus shunned observation was not likely less than 10 years later to desecrate herself in the way it has pleased him to depict. It is hardly necessary to explain why this picture of St. Elizabeth outrages the feelings of Roman Catholics and of all religious people, yet, as one of the principal papers of the Metropolis of secularism has denied that any feelings are outraged, a few words on this point may perhaps be allowed. The outrage is twofold. In the first place, the picture insults the memory of a woman who won the veneration or respect of all those who were acquainted with her life. The life of St. Elizabeth is very similar to that of Queen Elizabeth of Portugal, whose birth was 64 years later. Both devoted themselves almost entirely to works of charity, but there was one great difference between them, that the Portuguese Queen lived to the age of 65, while the Margravine only lived 24 years. As regards the Queen of Portugal, her charity was so harassed by her husband that the bread she was taking to the poor had to be disguised as roses at the gate of Coimbra. Some authors have attributed this incident to the Margravine, but she had no occasion for it, for it is narrated that her husband, on one occasion, when one of the officers of his household complained to him that his wife was ruining him, asked, "Has she alienated any of my land?" and when the officer answered "No," he was told to be silent. St. Elizabeth of Hungary was canonised by Pope Gregory IX., after long and mature deliberation, in 1235, only four years after her death, an unusually short time. Roman Catholics naturally feel aggrieved at an insult to this saint, and those who are not Catholics may well think that the merits of the Margravine are so well authenticated by history that she ought to have escaped from contumely. But, in addition to the insult to the saint, the Roman Catholics have other grounds of complaint. The picture is a libel on their Church, for it represents their priests as bringing a woman naked into a church in the presence of men, which might cause ignorant Protestants to believe and to say that these are the usual ceremonies for nuns taking the veil. I referred at the outset to certain articles in the Codes which have induced me to bring this matter before your Lordships' House; and the most obvious of these is the command or maxim of doing to others as you would have others do to you. I think that maxim might have been more present in the minds of those Academicians who dictated the very curt reply which was sent to the remonstrance of the Duke of Norfolk. If the Parliamentary printers had not been so dilatory, and if the Report of the Mission to Rome had appeared earlier, and had not been delayed until so late as a few days ago, perhaps those who wrote that answer would have shown him a little more respect. There were two courses open to those who sent that letter. First, they might have followed the example of the Gainsborough Magistrates, who, finding they had illegally sentenced a man to hard labour, clubbed together to indemnify him, or they might have taken a hint from Mr. Anstey's very entertaining book, The Fallen Idol, and have asked Mr. Calderon to occupy an hour or two on a Sunday morning in painting the habit of undyed wool which the Margravine received from Conrad of Marburg, her confessor. But assuming the command to do to others as you would be done by, is imperative, I think the obligation is even more imperative to do to others as you have been done by. In the course of last year certain persons wrote to me to ask for assistance in a similar case where their feelings were being outraged. I wrote to a Secretary of State on the matter, and I was very glad to have the satisfactory answer that he had already anticipated my wishes, and those who desired me to write, and that he had rendered them justice. But there is another article in the Code which is much more definite and much more to the purpose. The noble Marquess at the head of the Government has more than once publicly praised the principal framer of the Indian Penal Code, Sir James Stephen. I trust that the noble Marquess will, on this occasion, follow the spirit of one of the best articles in that otherwise too Draconian Code. I refer to the article which prohibits one Indian subject from insulting the religion of another. Is Benares, I would ask, more inflammable than Belfast, and if the works do not reach the highest artistic merit. He also extended the benefits of his bequest to men of all nations, provided that their work has been executed in England. The exact words of the will are these :—

“ And my will further is that such President and Council in making their decision ”

—that is in selecting pictures to be purchased from the fund—

I refer to the article which prohibits one Indian subject from insulting the religion of another. Is Benares, I would ask, more inflammable than Belfast, and if the restriction is valuable and reasonable in India, ought not its spirit to be followed in this country also, when a portion of the Queen's subjects, through their authorised spokesman, protests against an insult to their religion being permanently established in public galleries maintained at the national expense? If it be thought by any of your Lordships that I am expecting or asking too much I will put the question the other way, so as to obtain a reductio ad absurdum, and ask if our painters and Academicians are to be at liberty to placard the walls of our National Galleries with pictures which are insulting to some of us at home, why are Hindoos and Mussulmans to be debarred from insulting one another, and smearing the thresholds of their places of worship with the blood of pigs and cows, which is the usual method of treading on the tail of the coat of religious or political opponents in India? I do not wish to make a joke of the matter, but I think that shows that the same feelings of forbearance ought to be shown in this country as have been imposed in India by one of the best articles in the Indian Penal Code.

VISCOUNT HARDINGE: As I happen to be one of the Chantrey Trustees, I wish to say one word on the question which the noble Lord has brought forward. I think he has no accurate information at all as to the character of that body, or how the pictures are purchased. The Chantrey Bequest is administered by a Committee presided over by the President of the Royal Academy, and they are principally laymen. I happen to be one of that body. The pictures are bought by the President and the Council, and the President and Council buy those pictures out of the funds committed to them on their own sole responsibility. The noble Lord assumes that the President and Council have acted ultra vires in purchasing these pictures by the Royal Academicians. I can assure him that is not the case. The Chantrey will leave the Council perfectly unfettered, and, at their discretion, they can purchase any pictures they please as long as they belong to the British School. Sir Frederick Leighton states in a private letter which he wrote to me that

"The purchases of these Chantrey pictures represent young and old insiders and outsiders, Idealists, Realists, and even Impressionists."

So that, in fact, this Chantrey collection, instead of being confined, as the noble Lord thinks, merely to Academicians, embraces nearly the whole range of Art. Well, that answers, as far as I am able to do it, the first part of the noble Lord's question. Now, the second part, whether Her Majesty's Government have used their influence to persuade the Chantrey Trustees from persisting in outraging the feelings of their Roman Catholic fellow subjects, is a matter which it is not my business to answer, and I shall leave some Member of the Government to answer that portion of the question. But before they do so I must draw the noble Lord's attention to a paragraph in a letter which has been addressed to the Duke of Norfolk, as President of the Catholic Union of Great Britain, in which the President says—and I must say I think it is written in a tone with which our Roman Catholic fellow countrymen ought to be well satisfied, for it is written in decidedly an apologetic tone—

"The President and Council deeply regret to find from this that the exhibition of the pictures has raised a strong feeling of indignation among Roman Catholics. Nothing the President of the Council will know would have been more foreign to the mind of the artist than the thought of showing any disrespect to St. Elizabeth, or wounding the feelings of those who share her faith, and in that they note with satisfaction that justice is done to them by the Council of the Union. They would venture indeed to affirm, and they are in a position to do so, that the picture was conceived and carried out in a grave and truly reverent spirit."

Now, I venture to think that the gentlemen of the Union might have been fairly satisfied with that answer; but, as I said before, it is for the Government to answer that part of the noble Lord's question more fully than I have done.

*THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY) My Lords, after the speech of the noble Lord who has just sat down, my hopes dissipated that he would have undertaken to answer on this subject himself. The noble Lord seeks to make me responsible for the action of the Trustees of the Chantrey Bequest. I think it would be rather hard on me to do that

My burden would, indeed, be considerable if I were to be made responsible for the action of every Trust and every independent Corporation in the country; and, perhaps, I may venture to say that in a matter of art it is rather hard to call upon me when there is a distinguished representative and guardian of art sitting near me, the Lord President of the Council, whose business it is to guard these questions. My noble Friend was kind enough to warn me that this question was coming forward a few days ago. It was very courteous of him, and gave me an opportunity, if I could have availed myself of it, of seeing this picture. Unfortunately, I have not been able to do so. I have been very much engaged, and regret that I have not been able to see the picture. The only idea I have conceived of it has been derived from a picture I saw in Punch of Zæo showing her back to members of the County Council. I am wholly unable to enter into the discussion to which the noble Lord invites me, until he can lay down for me some canon as to the course artists should pursue in dealing with the question of clothes or no clothes. Artists take a different view of the subject from that taken by the majority of mankind, and some of the matters which they represent as wholly innocuous and, indeed, praiseworthy would, if translated into ordinary life, attract the attention of the police. As far as my experience goes—though that is a small one—even in the representation of sacred subjects I have observed on the part of artists that a desire to exhibit their knowledge of the human form and their command of flesh tints has overcome the inclination to clothe saintly persons with a sufficiency of garments. I would invite my noble Friend the next time he goes on the Continent to visit the Magdalen of Guercino at Naples and the Magdalen of Correggio at Paris. Neither of these two pictures would meet the views generally entertained as to clothing at the end of the 19th century, and yet I have never heard any suggestion of profanity made against either of the artists of these pictures, which are exhibited in countries where the Roman Catholic faith prevails. I am, therefore, unable to say to my noble Friend that if I had had the power I should have interfered with the Trustees of the Chantrey

Bequest on this occasion, because I fail to see what is the canon of art which he would lay down in this matter. There is one topic of consolation, however, which I would suggest to the noble Lord. I have not been myself to the gallery in which this picture is to be placed. But some friends of mine have been there, and they assure me that it is in a place of great seclusion suited to the exhibition of works of this kind. They went one Saturday afternoon; it was a free day, and there was not a soul in the place. Well, if that is so, I would ask my noble Friend to kindly consider whether any better disposition of this picture could have been made. If the picture had been sold to a private owner it would have been exhibited by him in his gallery, and all kinds of persons, including maid servants and others, would have seen it every day; but placed where it is it will be reserved for the study of those who are practising art and who are superior to the prejudices which have invaded the mind of my noble Friend, and, at all events, it will be deprived of the power either of injuring public morality or offending the prejudices of religious minds. I can only say, in reply, that I entirely disbelieve that the artist had the slightest intention or belief that he would offend the feelings of any Religious Body, that I do not think such pictures ought to be allowed to offend them, and I do not think that the picture will have the tendency in any degree to diminish the reverence which I am sure all who are acquainted with the subject feel for the memory of St. Elizabeth of Hungary.

*LORD HERRIES: My Lords, I do not wish to prolong the discussion on the subject of this picture; but as the opinion of Roman Catholics has been mentioned, I think the noble Marquess has totally misapprehended the reason for the objection which has been raised by Roman Catholics to this picture. The reason that Roman Catholics have objected to this picture is that the picture represents a gross act of indecency committed in the presence of men by a lady whom they have all held in the highest veneration. That is the reason Roman Catholics object to this picture; and when we are told to look at the picture of Magdalene and others in different galleries in various parts of Europe, it will be seen that they are not in comparison. Those are pictures of saints represented alone, and they are supposed to be represented in ideal form; but this is a picture of a saint, a Queen of Hungary, who has been held in the highest veneration for centuries, and who is supposed to have thrown off every stitch of clothing in the presence of men. That is an act which, I venture to say, neither she nor any other canonised saint would have performed. I think, therefore, we have very great reason to object to the representation of what is supposed to have taken place. I think that a work of art should be a true representation, and, however you wish to represent ideal forms, you must still have some regard to historical facts, and show what really did take place. I believe, and I think it has been proved most satisfactorily in the correspondence which has been before the country, that this saint never did perform this act. I have got here a passage from one of her biographies, which almost proves the opposite. It says of this saint, "She wore underneath the golden purple simple woollen garments, and a hair shirt which she never laid aside," and it shows that she would never have performed the act shown in this picture. She is there kneeling, it may be said, in a reverent position, and I daresay, as far as the artist is concerned, he wished to make it as reverent as possible, but she is shown naked in front of an altar in a public church (for this act is supposed to have taken place in a public church), without a vestige of clothing. I say this is an act which she certainly could not have performed. But there is another reason for objecting to it: We are aware that the British public often take their facts of history from Shakespeare, or Sir Walter Scott, or even from Harrison Ainsworth, and it is not impossible, therefore, that in future this picture may be taken as a proof that this occurrence did take place. I have been informed that even whilst this picture has been exhibited in the country a man was seen to walk up and down in front of it, and was heard to say in a loud tone of voice, "You see you Protestants what is expected from your daughters if they turn Roman Catholics." This may be thought by some a matter to laugh at; but, at the same time, I say we are, as Catholics, aware that assertions of that sort are made. There is no more solemn and impressive sight than the ceremony of clothing a nun. When a lady comes forward to make her vows in a church she is clothed in bridal costume, and after taking her vows she is led away and comes back, having taken off her worldly garments, clothed in the dress of a nun. That is a most impressive ceremony; and to say that this picture is the sort of thing that takes place when nuns are clothed does a very serious injury to Catholics; and I can assure your Lordships that I have not spoken to a Catholic lady who is not filled with the greatest horror and disgust at such a treatment of the subject in reference to a saint for whom we have always had so great a veneration. I only wish your Lordships would look at the life of Queen Elizabeth of Hungary by Comte de Montalembert, and you would recognise that such conduct would have been impossible on her part. I would not have brought the subject before your Lordships, as it is a distasteful one to Roman Catholics; but, as it has been brought forward by the noble Lord, I think it proper to make my protest against this picture being bought and considered an example of the British Art of this century.

COUNTY COUNCILS AND THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

*THE MARQUESS OF RIPON, in rising to ask Her Majesty's Government on what grounds the Local Government Board assume to themselves the right to compel County Councils, who are unwilling to do so, to make compensation to the officers of Local Boards and others whose interests are supposed to be affected by orders made under the powers conferred upon County Councils by Section 57 of the Local Government Act, 1888, said: My Lords, under the Local Government Act of 1888 a power is given to the County Councils, and, indeed, I may say a duty is imposed upon them, to make orders in certain cases in which it is proposed to extend or alter the boundaries of local districts. Under that power, in many parts of the country, numerous orders have been made. The Act lays down the subjects with which County Councils may deal in regard to these matters, and in the section of the Act explaining the powers of the County Councils these words occur—it is Section 57 of the Local Government Act, 1888—

“Any scheme or order made in pursuance of this Act may make temporary provision for regulating the duties, position, and remuneration of officers affected by the scheme or order and applying to them the provisions of this Act as to existing officers.”

—that is to say, the provisions of Section 120 of the Act, which gives to the existing officers of County Councils a claim to pensions and compensation in the case of their offices being abolished. Those words, in their apparent meaning, leave the County Councils a full discretion as to whether they shall or shall not make such provision for compensation or pensions in the orders which they may issue in regard to the question in hand; but there is a clause in the Act which lays it down that these orders prepared by the County Councils shall receive the confirmation of the Local Government Board; and that clause provides that the Local Government Board may modify the orders as they may consider necessary for carrying into effect the objects of the orders. Under that power of modification, the Local Government Board claim to themselves the right to insist that the officers of the Local Bodies, Local Boards, and others affected by any of these orders shall be entitled to compensation and treated as if they were existing officers of County Councils. To an ignorant layman like myself it certainly would not appear to be obvious that under that power of modification the Local Government Board had any right to order the County Council to provide compensation in matters of this kind if they do not think fit to do so, more specially as the words, as I have said, are specially confined to the objects of the order; and when the order makes no allusion whatever to this question of compensation, it is not, perhaps, very easy to see how such compensation can come in as one of the objects of an order which does not allude to it; but the Local Government Board have informed the County Council with which I am connected that they have taken the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown on the subject, and that the Law Officers say they have this power. Of course, not having seen the case submitted to the Law Officers, it is impossible for me to say what may be the exact bearing of their opinion; but I am not so presumptuous as to attempt to contest the opinion of the Law Officers on this point. The Local Government Board may have the power; then, if so, I want to know whether it is wise and reasonable that they should exercise it? There is a strong feeling in many County Councils, which I can say is very prevalent indeed in the West Riding County Council, against compensation and pensions, and they have omitted from their orders any provisions of that kind. I do not remember, in the cases that have been dealt with by that Council, that any body has raised this question at all. It is brought in as a measure ab extra by the Local Government Board themselves, and it appears to be their general intention to insert this clause, as far as I can understand, as a kind of common form clause in all their confirmations of orders made in County Councils in this respect. That may not be so, but I have heard of it in various parts of the country, and I am inclined to think that they do intend generally to enforce it. If they do intend generally to enforce provisions of this sort they ought, I think, have put them into the Act of Parliament. The Act of Parliament does not lay it down as a general rule; it leaves it to the discretion of the County Councils whether they will adopt this principle or not; and if the Local Government Board are going to make compensation a general rule, I say that those who brought in the Act of 1888 ought to have put a clause into the Act to that effect, and have given these persons a title to compensation just as if they were existing officers of the County Councils. But they did not do so. The County Councils have believed up to this time that they had free discretion in dealing with these matters. Suddenly they are told that that discretion is to be taken away from them, and that the Local Government Board insists upon their making compensation in all these cases. No doubt the compensation does not come out of the general county rate; it will come out of the rate of the district affected; but the order is to be made by the County Council. It is in the order so made by the County Council that the Local Government Board import this matter of compensation; and I certainly do myself think that they are going, if not beyond their legal powers, certainly beyond their just and reasonable powers in insisting without any regard to the feelings or desire of County Councils in this matter that in all cases, or nearly all cases in which these alterations of boundaries are made—and they are being made in some parts of the county very widely just now—this hampering clause of compensation should be introduced. If that is so, the only effect will be that a great many County Councils will refuse to entertain these proposals at all; and I think the powers of the Local Government Board are being stretched in a manner which, even if legal, is certainly unreasonable and unwise.

LORD HENNIKER: My Lords, perhaps the best way to put the matter before your Lordships is to give the facts of the case upon which this question is brought forward—that is, with regard to the County Council of the West Riding of Yorkshire which the noble Marquess mentioned just now. The County Council of the West Riding of Yorkshire made an order under the 57th section, which the noble Marquess has referred to, for the formation of a new Local Government district. This district was to take in parts of three urban districts and a part of a rural sanitary district. As the noble Marquess has said, this order under the Act of 1888 was submitted for confirmation to the Local Government Board, and the section under which the order was confirmed provides that the Board may make such modifications therein, as the noble Marquess has stated, as they consider necessary for carrying into effect the objects of the order made as the Local Government Act provides. The Act provides in this way—this is a short summary of it—That every officer who, by virtue of the Act, or anything done in pursuance or in consequence of the Act, suffers any direct pecuniary loss by the abolition of his office, or by diminution or loss of fees or salary, shall be entitled to have compensation paid to him for such pecuniary loss by the County Council to whom the powers of the authority whose officer he was are transferred under the Act. The object of the County Council was to set up a new administrative area, and, therefore, the setting up of a new administrative area in confirmation of the order involved necessarily an alteration of position and also of the emoluments of the officers of existing authorities. Before the Act of 1888 passed such a district could only be formed by a Provisional Order under the Public Health Act. That Act provides that if an officer is removed or deprived of the whole or part of his emoluments the Local Government Board may award compensation as they think fit. Moreover, it has been the constant practice of Parliament of late years, in local Acts extending boroughs or otherwise altering areas under local Acts, to approve of clauses providing for compensation to officers injuriously affected by the changes brought about by those Acts. The rule, therefore, seems to have been established that where local areas of administration are altered and dealt with in such a manner that the pecuniary interests of existing officers may be injuriously affected, it is a necessary and proper course to provide compensation clauses under which any just claims by such officers can be dealt with. The Local Government Board propose, in the case in question, to follow the course which has been adopted in other similar cases since the Local Government Act was passed, and to apply to any officer of any Local Authority the provisions of that Act as to compensation for loss of office or emoluments, with the necessary modifications. The West Riding County Council raised objection to this proposal, and the Board, before proceeding further, thought it right to submit a case for the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown. The Law Officers advised that it was clear that some provision should be made for compensation in the case of officers affected by the order; and that as the language of Section 120 of the Local Government Act as to compensation, though distinct with regard to the principle, did not in terms refer to the case of an order under Section 57, it was clear that similar provisions should be made in the case of orders of the character referred to, and that it was within the power of the Board to make such modifications of the order of the County Council as they proposed. It was under these circumstances that the Board inserted in their Confirming Order the provisions to which exception has been taken by the noble Marquess and by the County Council of the West Riding, a similar clause having been introduced without objection in every other case in which an order has been made by a County Council for the constitution of an urban district under Section 57 of the Local Government Act of 1888. I hope I have answered the noble Marquess's question. The Local Government Board are of opinion that they have the power, and that it is a power which they ought to exercise.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON: My Lords, I did not intend to take any part in this discussion, because I was in hope that my noble Friend would have given the noble Marquess opposite a satisfactory reply. I confess I was very much astonished to find—it is my ignorance no doubt—if a County Council thought it advisable to grant pensions or retiring allowances to any of their officers, that having agreed to do so by the resolution passed by the Council, that may be overridden by the Local Government Board, who may say they think that ought not to be. The noble Lord who answered the noble Marquess has given the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown, as I understand; but it would have been more satisfactory, to my mind, had he given us the case which was put before the Law Officers, because we should then know what it was exactly that the Law Officers were answering. I have frequently found, when you get a legal opinion, that it requires to be read by the light of the case which has been put before the gentleman giving you that opinion. The noble Lord alluded to a state of things which had taken place before the passing of the Local Government Act of 1888, when there were no districts formed, and I think he quoted what took place then as a justification of what has been the practice apparently, in some cases, of the Local Government Board now. But the noble Lord must have lost sight of this fact, which I think is important, that at the time when he was alluding to this practice there was no County Council in existence, and, therefore, the Local Government Board had not to overrule resolutions which had been come to. I confess I am rather startled at the opinion expressed, that the Local Government Board were within their powers in the action which they have taken, and I think it would be rather surprising to County Councils to find that if in, as they consider, the exercise of their discretion, they wish to pension officers under them, they are liable to be overruled by the Local Government Board, who say, "You know nothing about the merits of your own officers, but we claim to know more about them than you do, and the proposal which you make to pension them is one we cannot allow." I may have taken a wrong view of the situation, but, judging from what has happened in the West Riding, I trust the same thing may not happen in West Sussex, because I am afraid my County Council there would be astonished to find themselves in that position.

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: We do not feel quite clear, from the answer of the noble Lord, as to what the Local Government Board intend to do. As regards the Law Officers' opinion, which, of course, I bow to entirely as a layman, it does not seem to conclude the point raised by the noble Marquess by any means. The point, as I understand it, is this: Under the Local Government Act there is a distinct provision that all the officers who were at the time serving under the Magistrates, and who are transferred to the County Councils, if they are removed from their offices are entitled to compensation. That is an absolute enactment, leaving no discretion at all. But then comes something quite different. There are, it seems, officers serving in places where the County Councils may make a new Local Government district, or alter it by adding to it, or grouping the districts, or in other ways; and the question has arisen, as I gathered, whether or not the officers in such districts, who may be displaced by the orders thus made by the County Councils, are entitled to compensation. Now, I gather from the opinion of the Law Officers that it is not absolutely clear that they are entitled to compensation under the Act; but they say they ought to have compensation, which is quite another thing. Then it is discovered that the Local Government Board may, under another clause, which, as I think, was inserted for a totally different purpose, import into it this order creating a Local Government district, or altering it, the clause in the Act requiring compensation to be given, because all such orders require confirmation by the Local Government Board. I think I am right in that; the Local Government Board may, under the clause in the Act, insert such modification and conditions as they deem necessary. Now, the view I take of it is this: They deemed it necessary that there should be compensation in all these cases. They then put into the order a requirement that there should be compensation, and by that contrivance, which is really nothing more or less than driving a coach and four through the Act of Parliament, they create this right to compensation which is not given by the Act of Parliament itself. I think that is very sharp practice and very objectionable. I can quite understand there may be cases in which the Local Government Board would think it right to interfere and say compensation should be given; but I think such a case ought to be decided on its merits. Each case ought to be decided with reference to the tenure of office of the officers who may be displaced—the time they have served, and other considerations which may be weighed in deciding the matter; and I gathered—and upon this point I want information—that the Local Government Board have determined, in every case where an order has been made by a County Council to compel compensation, to make those orders subject to the same requirements as the Act of Parliament as regards the case of officers serving under the Magistrates. If that is not the case, I should be glad if the noble Lord will tell me; and if it is the case, I think this is going rather beyond what the Act of Parliament really intends.

*THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I have no knowledge in this case——

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: No, more have I.

*THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: But as I gather, and I have listened very carefully to the Debate, it is desirable we should have further information. My impression is that a good deal turns on small points, and it would be more convenient for elucidating the true state of matters here that the noble Marquess should move for Papers, so that we may know exactly what the Local Government Board has done. I think without that we shall hardly come to a satisfactory solution.

*LORD HENNIKER: I may be allowed to point out to the noble Duke behind me (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon) that I think he has rather misunderstood the case. The Local Government Board have never wished, or attempted to interfere with a grant of compensation to the servants of County Councils. This was simply a question of the County Councils making an order under the provisions of the Local Government Act, and they made another for confirmation by the Local Government Board that a certain district should be formed. Under that order the Local Government Act empowers the Local Government Board to make an order, and then in making that order they can make what provisions they please as to compensation of officers. The noble Duke, I think, misunderstood that point.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON: Not at all.

*LORD HENNIKER: Then, my Lords, as regards this case, which was laid before the Law Officers of the Crown, I did not bring it forward. It contains three pages of closely printed matter, and I do not think the noble Duke could expect me to do so. I merely read to your Lordships a résumé of the opinion.

*THE MARQUESS OF RIPON: I should have no objection to accept the proposal of the noble Marquess opposite (the Prime Minister), and move for Papers in this matter, only I am afraid it will not bring the matter very clearly before the House. I can only move for Papers in the case which is known as the Mytholmroyd case. If I move for Papers in that case, and they are laid before the House, they will only show what the Local Government Board did in that case; but what I want to know is, do the Local Government Board intend to lay down this rule in all cases irrespective of the merits of the cases A, B, and C? Are they going to use this power of making compensation generally and thereby do what the Act of Parliament did not do—to make that compulsory on the County Councils which the Act of Parliament left in their discretion.

LORD HENNIKER: The Local Government Board consider that they have acted in accordance with the Act in making these orders, and their present intention is to continue to make them.

FRANCE AND SIAM.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD LAMINGTON, in rising to ask Her Majesty's Government whether they can give any information as to the correctness of a telegram appearing in the Standard of 1st July, stating that the French had occupied the Province of Luang Prabang belonging to the Kingdom of Siam, said: My Lords, before putting this question, I may be allowed to make a few remarks upon it; for unless your Lordships are endowed with special geographical knowledge, I fear it will not be easy for me to make myself clear. The French are making claim to the Province of Luang Prabang in the Kingdom of Siam, and also to the whole district to the east of the great Mekong River. Their claims upon that territory rest entirely upon tradition, and in Indo-China, if claims are to be recognised which are based purely on tradition, the state of affairs would be rather involved, because the history of Indo-China has been one of constant warfare, and no doubt old traditional claims might be made for a wider extension of the old Kingdom of Cambodia, but on similar grounds a claim might equally be made by Italy to this Island because the Romans once held it. The district claimed by the French lies within the frontier between Annam and Siam. The recognised frontier between those Kingdoms is the watershed which lies to the east of the Mekong River. That represents the frontier, generally speaking, in one way, because the Mekong does not at the present time belong to the district of Annam. The French have at various times asked permission from the Siamese Government to have Consuls at Luang Prabang and other places on the Mekong

River, and only last year they asked that the Customs Duties which existed on that river should be taken away in favour of themselves. It seems that they demand, and it is their intention if possible to get hold of, these territories. I have here a French paper of Tonquin, in which they claim the valley, and openly avow their intention of taking possession of the Mekong. Their own official Reports show it. They have been putting steamers of late on that river, and the new Governor, M. de Lannessan, is well known to entertain pronounced views on the subject of the extension of the French frontier to the west, and to be bent on a policy of aggression. I have had personal information which has clearly brought home to me that the French intend to make some territorial aggrandisement at the expense of the Kingdom of Siam. Within the last two days I have heard that the Siamese have taken alarm at the appointment of M. de Lannessan, and had sent their Princes along the eastern frontier. No doubt at the present time an attempt will be more likely to be made on the part of the French to carry their views on account of the Siamese Government endeavouring to run a railway from Bangkok to the town of Korat, which is in an easterly direction to the Mekong River, and which would be intensely disagreeable to the French. This country has, on former occasions, displayed interest on behalf of weak nationalities. We have put, or are putting, in order our frontiers with Siam, but the French have purposely left this undetermined, so that at any time when occasion presents itself they may make a further advance. Even if we had no sympathy with the Kingdom of Siam; and if, in this case, our feelings could not be aroused on the score of justice, our self-interest alone ought to prompt us to move in the matter. The trade of Siam is almost entirely in our hands. We have there thousands of British subjects, Malays, Burmese, Siamese, and Shans, all of whom are recognised as being under the protection of the English Government. It is not unlikely that with those interests and the further advance of the French in Siam there would be great difficulties arising if the French take possession of this Province of Luang Prabang. I know from official French Reports they consider that if they once get possession of that place it will serve as a point d'appui to interfere with the northern Shan States, and your Lordships will be aware that they will then most likely come into collision with our Indian Government, because with the advance of the French to the Makang or by the acquisition of Prabang they would be nearly approaching our Burmese positions, and awkward questions of delimitation would be sure to arise. The frontiers would then be almost coterminous. Again, if further south they advanced beyond the Mekong, difficulties would occur with our numerous Burmese, Shan, Chinese, and Malay subjects to whom I have already referred, and who are recognised by the Siamese Government as under our protection. I repeat, then, it is to our interest that we should, if possible, help Siam at the present time. I only wish to point out, first of all, that Luang Prabang and the Mekong River belong to the Siamese; that the French have shown in various ways they realize it; that it is the evident intention of the French, if possible, to secure those territories, and that if we allow them to do so we shall in all probability drift into serious difficulties with the French; and I also think if a Power which is friendly to us, as is the Kingdom of Siam, is threatened in such a manner, we should, if possible, help them. I dare say the Prime Minister might be able to suggest some means of doing so, and with all modesty I would suggest that the chief European Powers might be induced to act in concert, and to clearly delimitate the frontiers of Siam; then, having done so, to guarantee the independence and integrity of the country in the same way as Belgium has her independence secured to her. I do not imagine, from my knowledge of the country, and the impossibility of military movements taking place during the wet season, that the French have yet taken over this Province of Luang Prabang, and, therefore, there is yet time for us, if we choose, to take action in the matter. In the words of one of the most able advisers of the Indian Government, I would urge upon your Lordships that we should never lose sight of the importance of supporting and strengthening Siam.

Lord Lamington

*THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, my noble Friend has given us the interesting results of what must have been a very interesting journey in these distant countries of which he has just been speaking, and he has acquired a facility of dealing with Siamese names and with their pronounciation which, I hope, he will not expect me to imitate. I have made inquiries with regard to that place which he has referred to very often, Luang Prabang, which I believe is a very important place indeed in its own locality, and there is, I believe, no ground whatever for the rumour that the French have occupied it. I believe that the French are not within 100 miles of the place. My noble Friend speaks very confidently of what the intentions of the French are in the future. I should be sorry to hazard any opinion upon the subject; but I do not think it is quite fair, knowing the kind of intentions which English newspapers attribute to the English Government, to judge of the intentions of the French upon statements in a newspaper.

*LORD LAMINGTON: I said it was in a French newspaper.

*THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Even in a French newspaper. I do not think I should be prepared to listen to statements in French newspapers of what the French Government intend to do. My noble Friend has mentioned two questions constantly in this matter which he dealt with without distinguishing them. One is the question of maintaining the independence of the Kingdom of Siam, and the other is the question of boundary as to where Siam ceases and Cambodia begins. I agree with him we have a great interest in the Kingdom of Siam and in its independence. I have not the slightest ground for believing that it is threatened, and I hope it never will be. The question of boundary must be dealt with, not by general statements, but by an examination of the points at issue. Any general statement on my part would be most unjustifiable, and could not possibly lead to any good. I do not anticipate that the remedy which my noble Friend suggests is a practical one. I do not think we should ever induce the Powers of Europe to guarantee the independence of Siam in the same way as they have guaranteed the independence of Belgium. They have guaranteed the independence of Belgium because that is exceedingly important to all of them, and if I may use the word "guarantee"—though probably that is a term of art which I ought not to use—but they have, at all events, entered into engagements which are highly favourable to the independence of Belgium. The independence of Siam is a matter of great importance to us. I hope it is of great importance to the French, but I hardly know any other Power which has any strong interest in that country. Therefore, I do not think there is any possibility of appealing to that valuable instrument the European concert for the purpose of maintaining the independence of Siam. But I earnestly hope, and thoroughly believe, that the apprehensions which my noble Friend has expressed do not rest upon a solid foundation. The noble Lord may be assured of our great sympathy with Siam. I agree that the independence of Siam is of great commercial importance to us both in India and elsewhere; and I hope he will never live to see the day when we shall have to ask ourselves whether that independence is in any manner really threatened.

CHARTERED ACCOUNTANTS BILL

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, the object of this Bill is a very simple one. The calling of a Chartered Accountant is one of considerable importance. It is often provided that very important accounts have to be audited by Chartered Accountants, and there exist institutions connected with them and incorporated by Royal Charter in all the three Kingdoms. But it has been found that there is no means of preventing a person who is not a Chartered Accountant from holding himself out as such and practising his calling under the title of a Chartered Accountant. The object of this Bill is to prevent a person doing that which is obviously the means of deceit, namely, holding himself out as a Chartered Accountant when he does not belong to any society holding a charter. I hope your Lordships will see no objection to give a Second Reading to this Bill.

Bill read 2^a (according to Order), and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

PUBLIC HEALTH (SCOTLAND) ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 228.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*LORD HAMILTON OF DALZELL: My Lords, I regret extremely that a Bill of so much importance should fall to be moved by one of so little experience in your Lordships' House as myself. But I have been asked to take charge of the Bill by the Local Authority most interested in it; that is, the Local Authority of the Middle Ward of Lanarkshire, which has some 200,000 population and nearly £1,000,000 of valuation. The Bill passed through the Lower House without any opposition. It did not pass, however, without being considered, for several Amendments were made; but in the end it passed without any opposition whatever. I had hoped it might have been equally fortunate in this House. I am sorry it has not been so fortunate here, and, therefore, I am obliged to trouble your Lordships with a few words. I am very sorry it should not pass unopposed, because it deals with a very serious evil. The mineral districts in Scotland have lately been suffering from what is nothing less than an absolute water famine. Tens of thousands of people can scarcely get water. I know a very large village where the women and children have to go nearly a mile to fetch water, and those who will not do so have to get it from the ditches, dipping up the water with cups, though it is more than half mud. The origin of the mischief is that the mines which brought that large population to the district have, at the same time, dried up the springs, and the result is that water cannot be got in the neighbourhood, but must be got from long distances. It is impossible for these mining villages, however organised, however brought together in local districts as the law at present allows, to get that water for themselves. There is every readiness on the part of the Local Authority to carry out the necessary work. They have a large scheme before them, but they find under the present law they cannot get the money to bring that water in. They find the present law to be unworkable. The law at present is this: There are two ways of providing water; one is by forming a water supply district, comprising the places which actually want the water, the area of which is regulated by the Sheriff, and he limits that area to the houses. No power is given to take any land around or any of the area under which these mines are working. The consequence of all this is that these districts are too poor to get the water for themselves. By the Act of 1867, under which these local water districts are established, the rate is limited to 2s. 6d. in the £1. There are now, I think, in the Middle Ward of Lanarkshire nine water districts. In three of those the assessment was thought to be so small that no water could be got, and in the other six the supply of water is very inadequate. This state of things cannot be improved, as far as we can judge, by any other means than by obtaining the present Bill. The only other alternative which must be adopted if this Act is not passed, is to assess the district under the Act of 1867 as altered by the Act of 1889, the money coming out of the general assessment of the county, and payable, half by the landlord, and half by the tenant. That is the law at present, and under it there is scarcely any limit, certainly none but the 2s. 6d. Therefore, if the present law is enforced, it might be possible to rate all the property in the district up to 1s 6d. or 2s. in the £1—that is to say, that the mineral owners may be assessed to that extent to provide water for other people. But by this Bill an alternative is provided. It is proposed by it that two rates should be levied—one a general rate called a public rate, to be levied over the whole district; but instead of the large sum which might be levied under the present law, it is by this Bill limited to 3d. in the £1, 1½d. on the landlord and 1½d. on the tenant. There is also to be a second rate called the domestic water rate, to be paid by the owners of the property to which the water is supplied. Those two rates combined would enable water to be supplied to the whole district, and without, as I think, doing injustice to anybody. I would only add that the Bill is not compulsory. It cannot take effect until the County Council shall, upon the application of a District Committee, have passed a resolution at a meeting to be called after special notice, that the resolution will be submitted to them. Any of your Lordships who belong to County Councils will, I am sure, feel pretty confident that no County Council of above 60 members will levy a rate which is unfair, more especially as it has first to be passed by the District Committee consisting of above 70 members. Those two bodies must both have agreed before you can have the rate made. The object of the Bill, I may say, to meet one objection to it could not have been obtained by a Private Bill, because it is not only for the Middle Ward of Lanarkshire, but also for one or two neighbouring counties; and as the object of the Bill is to limit the rate which is now levied I cannot see any objection to it. I believe, now, something of the same sort might be done under the present law, and even if not, I do not think there can be any objection, as it gives a power which may be most valuable and which cannot do any harm. I beg to move the Second Reading of the Bill.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Hamilton of Dalzell.)

*THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: My Lords, I have to ask your Lordships not to read this Bill a second time for reasons which I will proceed to give. The noble Lord, in describing the Bill, has explained to us that it is a Bill which is brought in with special reference to the wants of Lanarkshire. He has spoken a great deal of the wants of those in his own immediate neighbourhood, and the difficulties they find themselves in. His proposal, however, goes beyond Lanarkshire, because it proposes to alter in a very important manner the whole law of rating with regard to water in Scotland. The first remark I have to make with regard to this Bill is that no notice has been given of it generally in Scotland. Nothing is known of it. I have, within the last two days, received letters from conveners of County Councils asking me to call attention to the measure in the House of Lords, and apparently they are in complete ignorance about it. I myself should not have noticed the Bill if my attention had not been specially drawn to it. With regard to the history of the Bill, let me just tell your Lordships what it is. This Bill was introduced, and ordered by the House to be printed on the 16th of June last. It was introduced there by one of the Members for Lanarkshire, and it is introduced in this House by a noble Lord who, as he says, also specially represents the wants of Lanarkshire. The County Councils have had no opportunity whatever of seeing this measure, which proposes to interfere with the whole law of rating for this purpose. So much for that. That is one of my reasons, but by no means the strongest, for asking your Lordships not to give a second reading to this Bill. I think it is a matter on which surely all the County Councils ought to have an opportunity of expressing an opinion, for, remember it is not only Lanarkshire or one or two counties which are interested in minerals which are affected by this Act, but it is intended to apply to the whole of agricultural Scotland. So far with regard to that point. Now, the noble Lord made a remark with regard to the law affecting water supply, which I really cannot pass over altogether in silence. He told us very truly that at the present time in some cases it is usual to create special water districts, and to supply water by that means, and that, if a special water district is not created, then the obligation attaches to the whole county district; and when the word "district" occurs in this Bill your Lordships will be so good as to remember that it means "county district." The obligation attaches to the county district, as being the public health area, to find the water required and to find the necessary rate. As a matter of fact, this question of special water supply has, up to the present time, to my best belief, been wholly and entirely dealt with—not in towns, but in the country—by means of districts marked out by the sheriff, and, as far as my own personal knowledge goes, I do not know of any single district in which water is supplied by the district and a district rate. So much for that part of my noble Friend's argument. Now, let us turn to the Bill itself. The Bill is to come into effect after certain proceedings in the County Council and District Committee, with regard to which I shall have a word to say presently, but when the Act takes effect, if your Lordships will look at Clause 4 you will see that the district—and remember that is the County district—or the special water district, is to pay the expenses incurred out of the assessments authorised. Turning first to the assessments it provides for—

"An assessment upon all lands and heritages within the district, or special water supply district, as the case may be, which shall have been supplied by water—" that is the domestic water rate—

"And that rate is to be levied at such an amount in the £1 as shall be sufficient, along with the public water rate hereinafter mentioned, to meet the expense."

Then we go on to Sub-section 2, and we come to the public rate which is to be the first rate imposed. What do you find there? You find that that is to be an assessment

"Upon all lands and heritages within the district, as the case may be, but such rate shall not exceed 3d. in the £1."

The result is this: that you commence by levying a rate, not upon the persons by whom the water is required, but the first rate is levied upon the whole of the occupiers and owners in the County district, but the total rate is not to exceed 3d. in the £1; the remainder will then be levied upon those persons to whom the water is supplied by means of the domestic water rate. I leave it to your Lordships' notions of fairness to say whether that is not exactly the reverse of the process which ought to be followed. Surely the proper course is that the persons who are supplied should be first rated, and if the district is not prepared to rate itself in the manner in which the present law provides, you might then levy a public water rate upon these owners and occupiers who have no concern whatever in the water supply. Your Lordships will also please to bear this in mind, that the county district being now the public health area under Sub-section 2, it may happen, and will happen undoubtedly in no inconsiderable number of cases, that persons will be rated for the supply of water to a special water district from which water supply they themselves will receive no benefit whatsoever, and from which they will be perhaps 30 or 40 miles away. How can such a proposal as that be regarded as just? My noble Friend says it will do injustice to nobody, and he says under the present law it is impossible for them to provide this water for themselves; he further said it is impossible for this reason: that it is impossible for a limited water supply district, such as is allowed by the Act, to do so. Now, I should like to call your Lordships' attention to the words of the Act. There is no limit whatsoever upon the discretion of the Sheriff. The words are—

“Upon a requisition by any 10 inhabitants of the district an application is to be made to the Sheriff, and the Sheriff may either find that no special water supply district should be formed, or he may enlarge or limit the special supply district as furnished by the resolution of the Local Authority, or he may find that the special water supply district should be formed and he may identify the limits.”

There is not in the law at this moment any limitation at all upon the discretion of the Sheriff, and if he chooses he may say that that special water supply district shall be coincident with the whole district. So far as that goes, then my noble Friend is not correct in point of fact. Well, let us pass on from that point. The next clause to which I would like to draw your Lordships' attention is Clause 6. I am not going into it at great length, and I will only read sufficient for your Lordships to follow it. That clause says—

“Where there shall exist within the district of any Local Authority a special water supply district, wherein a sufficient supply of water has not been obtained, or is not maintained, and where water has been provided as arranged for under the provisions of Section 89 (one) of the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867, for the district of such Local Authority which is, or can be, supplied to such special water supply district;”

and so on. In other words, this clause enables any existing water supply district, of which there are a very large number, and they are very largely increasing in Scotland, if it can obtain a resolution in its favour at a meeting of the District Committee to abrogate and destroy the water supply district, and to come in under this Bill and fix themselves upon the county. Whatever may be the merits of this Bill as a general measure, it seems to me it is impossible to defend this particular clause; and I am certain that the person who inserted this clause in the Bill is not, in my judgment, a proper person to entrust with the rating in Scotland of a water supply district for that reason. Now, let me go to another point. I think it was the last mentioned by my noble Friend. He says—

“After all, this Bill is not compulsory, and can only be adopted by the county if the county chooses.”

But look at Clause 2, which says—

“This Act shall not take effect within any district or special water supply district in any county until after the County Council shall, on the application of the District Committee, have passed a resolution approving of its taking effect within such district or special water supply district.”

Now that is a clause which will explain itself, I am sure, to every one of your Lordships who are familiar with Scotch Local Government. I sit constantly on a County Council and District Council, and I will tell your Lordships exactly how this will work. Some districts will want water. They have it in their power, as you have already been told, either to have themselves marked out into a special district, or to apply to the District Council and endeavour to obtain a supply that will be paid for by the whole district. But they will take neither of those courses. They will collect all their friends and go to the District Committee. I know this perfectly well, because I have been on many of these meetings myself where they have not had above 9 or 10 present—and if they have a majority they will carry the thing and then go to the County Council. Well, then, this is very likely to happen. I have seen this sort of thing attempted many times, and, therefore, I am not speaking of what I do not know myself. Everyone is naturally anxious to put his own taxes on the shoulders of somebody else. That is only human nature. But what would happen in the County Council would be this: The County Council would say—“This district is certainly a public health area; it alone will be taxed; the other parts of the country will not; it is no affair of ours, and as they have adopted this Resolution among themselves they may come in under this Act”; and under those circumstances those persons will get their own water, and, to the extent of 3d. in the £1, others will pay for it. Then there is another matter, and this, I think, is a much more important one. This Bill applies to water, but if you are going to deal with water in this way, why are you not to extend it to drainage too? What possible argument can you urge for supplying water in this way which will not equally apply to managing the drainage of a district? If you do that a very considerable portion of the cost of draining a district would be expended in the same manner. It is perfectly true, as my noble Friend said at first, this is a Bill which has been brought forward by Lanarkshire, and the other County Councils have not considered it, and have had no opportunity of considering it. My noble Friend mentioned the case of his own district as a case of very great hardship. Well, I will tell you how to deal with it. He says they cannot deal with it under the existing law; but he can deal with it quite easily if he chooses so to do. The case is this: it is a case of certain mineral lands under which the coal has been excavated, which has cut all the streams of water supply, and which, no doubt, has made it very difficult to get a water supply for that district, but on the other hand they have had very material advantages. Why cannot they take the rough with the smooth, and supply their water for themselves, even if it does cost a little more? It is surely very mean that they should ask their neighbours who are living in another part of the county to subscribe to a rate to the extent of 3d. for a supply from which they would never be able to derive any benefits; because your Lordships must bear this in mind, that upon this question of district rate we have now the district as the authority. As long as it was the parish it was possible, if the rate were imposed on the whole parish, that it might be made upon some persons in the parish who did not benefit, but after all they were not a great distance off. Now the case is very different. Some of these districts contain as many as 20 parishes, and a man who will be taxed under this Bill, as I told your Lordships before, may very frequently be a great many miles away. Then there is this further consideration which many of your Lordships who know Scotland will well understand.

There may be three or four such places which would come forward and apply to the District Council in the same way, and if they were to succeed the county district would find itself for no purpose of its own saddled with three or four rates of 3d. a piece. Whatever may be the merits of this Bill I feel confident there is nothing to be said for Clause 6. The Bill certainly requires consideration by the County Councils of Scotland and because it suits Lanarkshire to bring it forward I do not think your Lordships will accept it as a good reason why you should change the law of rating all over Scotland at the instance of Lanarkshire without giving the rest of Scotland the opportunity of being heard in the matter. For that reason I move the postponement of the Bill.

Amendment moved to leave out ("now") and insert ("this day three months.")—(The Earl of Camperdown.)

LORD WATSON: My Lords, I trust the House will not be influenced by the eloquence of the noble Earl to reject the Bill, the Second Reading of which has been moved by the noble Lord opposite (Lord Hamilton of Dalzell.) I do not think the noble Earl has sufficiently appreciated the scope of this Bill. It is by no means such a dangerous and far reaching measure as the noble Lord who has just spoken would desire to represent. It may be right to revert for a moment to the position which the County Councils now have, as the Local Authorities, charged with supplying with water those particular parts of the County which stand in need of a supply. Before the Local Government Act of 1879 the Parochial Board in each parish was the Local Authority, the parish was the area of assessment. Now that is changed; the county, where it is not divided into districts, is the area. The district is the unit instead of the parish, and the noble Lord has rightly said that in some counties, such as Lanarkshire, a district includes from 14 to 20 parishes. The duty now is laid upon the County Council, through its District Committee, in all cases where water destitution exists. They must, because the Legislature have laid the duty upon them, find means of discharging it. That has been done in many cases by availing themselves of a power created by the Public Health Act of 1867, to apply to the Sheriff to have a small area defined as constituting an assessment area for the purpose of its water supply. But I desire to make this observation because the fact appears rather to have escaped the notice of the noble Lord, that within these areas, the county, the district, the parish, or the supply district, fixed by the Sheriff, the mode of rating is precisely the same. The County Councils and their predecessors, as the Local Authorities, have had no power to levy any, except one uniform rate, upon all land and heritages within the district, parish, or county, whether those lands or heritages took the benefit of the water supply or did not. I should have gathered from the argument of the noble Lord that that was a state of things which did not exist, and that this Bill brought into existence for the first time the unequal rule of making the agricultural land, or a tenement not supplied with the Local Authorities' water, pay part of the consumers rate. As a matter of fact, such tenements and such land were invariably paid upon where there was a water supply given at the same time as was paid by the consumer himself.

*THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: I wish to correct the noble and learned Lord, because I think he has rather misunderstood me. I never intended to say—it was certainly a mistake if I did—that within the area of supply, whatever it might be, the rate was not uniform on the landlord and tenant, and was not uniform all over the area. What I did say was that water was always supplied by means of the special water supply district, and not by the district.

*LORD WATSON: Well, I regret that I should have attributed to the noble Lord the observation in the terms I did, but I shall repeat the remark I have made that the rules of rating which the Local Authority could adopt was one and the same; they could charge no other rate to persons who did not benefit by the supply than they charged to those who did. I do not doubt that the noble Lord correctly stated that in many cases the want was met by having a district, and that district did not include many—I believe it did generally include some — lands and tenements which derived no benefit from the water supply; and those lands and tenements, I must say, in my own apprehension, somewhat unfairly to the non-consumer, paid precisely the same sum. There are parts of Scotland which are very deeply interested in this Bill, and to which probably the Bill is most of all applicable, in which they have hamlets without a supply of water, the rating value of which — because there is a rating limit imposed by the Statutes — is absolutely insufficient to provide a proper supply of water, if you confine the rating area to the area upon which those dwellings stand; and therefore such a mode of fulfilling their duty is one which no County Council, desirous of discharging its duty, would think of resorting to. The only alternative they have is this: Take the case of the Middle Ward of Lanarkshire, with some 14 parishes; the only alternative they have is to give a water supply to some one or two small villages in one or two of those parishes, and then they can only meet the cost by rating every proprietor and every farmer in the other 13 parishes. That is the only provision which the law, as it stands, has made. Now, in these circumstances, I do not think it ought to be a matter of surprise that not only the hamlets which are to be benefitted by the supply are willing to pay a larger share of taxation than that which is thrown upon the rest of the district, but that those who are ratepayers in the rest of the district should think that the arrangement an exceedingly fair and proper one. Now that is the arrangement and the sole arrangement which the present Bill, in its leading clause, professes to enact. There is no new rate imposed; there is no alteration of the rating area; there is only a provision that the rate raised within that area shall not be a uniform rate, but that the heavier part of it shall be borne by the consumer, and the lighter part of it by those who derive no benefit from the water supplied. That is a principle not unknown. It is common in all Local Burgh Acts, where it is usual to give a burgh limits providing for its future growth; and it appears to me to be a perfectly reasonable principle. All that your Lordships are asked by these clauses in the Bill, which have been severely commented upon, is to do that by this Bill. As to Clause 6, I can only say, and to some extent I share in the observations which have been made by the noble Lord, that it is in some respects a little beyond the lines of the Bill. It would certainly require some consideration and some change, and I dare say the measure might be an effective one, although Clause 6 were omitted altogether. Now, it is said that County Councils have not had any notice of this Bill. I think the very statement made by the noble Lord is sufficient on this point; he says there are a great many County Councils in Scotland which are not interested, and I have not the least doubt, though this measure may not affect nine-tenths of them, yet I think it will not greatly concern them until they come to work their minerals, or when great industries are established throughout the rural districts of Scotland. The Bill may be more important then; but I think the observation is met by the answer that the Bill is not compulsory upon any County Council which does not think the principle embodied in it a just one. If they think it a right thing that the consumer and the non-consumer should pay the same, let them have the power of doing it, and it is only right, the circumstances being such that the non-consumer is to pay less and the consumer more, that they should have their choice whether they will take the benefit of the provisions of the Act. In these circumstances, I trust your Lordships will give this Bill a Second Reading, in order that it may be considered in Committee.

LORD ELPHINSTONE: My Lords, in spite of what has fallen from the noble and learned Lord, I trust your Lordships will hesitate before allowing this Bill to be read a second time. I ask your Lordships to hesitate because I am quite at a loss to understand the manner in which this Bill has been rushed through Parliament. It was introduced into the other House of Parliament on the 16th of last month, and was laid on your Lordships' Table last Tuesday with a notice on the Paper that we were to read it a second time that very same day. Not one of your Lordships had seen the Bill, by the merest accident the noble Lord opposite became aware that the Bill was going to be read, and I believe that accident only happened from the promoters of this Bill having gone to him to ask for his support. In that way he became aware of the Bill, and other members, in consequence, became aware of it too. Now, my Lords, I am not going to recapitulate the arguments which have been used by the noble Lord opposite; it would occupy too long a time to do so; but I would ask the noble Lord who introduced this measure in this House whether the Bill has been submitted to any County Council or any Local Authority in Scotland at all. I will answer that question myself, by saying not one of them, not a single authority in Scotland, has seen the Bill or ever heard of it. Yet your Lordships are asked to rush it through Parliament under these circumstances. When I saw the Bill on Saturday I sent it down to the Convener of my own county, namely, Mid Lothian, and I immediately got a telegram to get it stopped. A letter followed; it is very short and concise. I will ask your Lordships' permission to refer to it. It is from the Convener of Mid Lothian, than whom there is no one better able to give an opinion in Scotland. Let me read what he says—

"I know nothing of the Bill of which you sent me a copy, nor has it ever come before the County Council or the District Committee for their opinion; in short, outside the small circle of its promoters, who I suppose are pressing it for their local purposes, no one here knows anything about it. A Public Bill, so wide in its action as this Bill is, ought not to be allowed to pass in such a manner, and the House of Lords will be doing Scotland a good turn by stopping the progress of the Bill for this Session, which will give time for its examination. Great defects will probably be discovered in the working of a measure which has not received adequate consideration. I do trust you, and other Peers whose attention has been called to the Bill, will do all in your power to stop this Bill. It can be brought in again next Session early enough to enable its provisions to be examined."

Before I read the letter I was going to make some suggestion, and to urge upon the noble Lord who moved it that he should consent to withdraw it for this year, and arrange that it shall be brought in early next Session in time to allow of its provisions being sent down to Scotland, and there considered and discussed by the Local Authorities.

If my noble Friend will assent to this I shall be very much pleased. If he will not do so, and the noble Earl opposite divides the House, I shall certainly go into the same Lobby with him.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON: I wish to add my suggestion. I hope that the proposition of the noble Lord near me will be accepted by the noble Lord who has introduced this Bill. I think it would be a very dangerous thing that a measure brought in evidently to meet a difficulty in a certain part of Scotland should alter the entire water rating legislation for the whole of Scotland. I quite agree with my noble Friend that it is obvious that a measure which was not introduced into the House of Commons until the 18th of June, and is now brought on for Second Reading here on the 17th of July, cannot have received that attention which a measure of this importance demands at your Lordships' hands. I do not think that the object which the noble Lord opposite has in view would be frustrated if he withdrew the Bill now and brought it up again in the early part of next Session when it can be considered. By this time next year the authorities will have had ample opportunity of discussing, and of seeing the merits or demerits of the Bill. I think it a very strong measure to introduce and to try to carry through Parliament a Bill of this character, a measure which has never been—and I believe my noble Friend is perfectly right upon that—before one single County Council in Scotland for approbation or the reverse. I join with my noble Friend in begging that this measure may be postponed, and not brought in for another year. I shall, therefore, with the greatest pleasure, support the noble Earl opposite in the Motion he has made.

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, there is one point which the noble Lord has not adverted to, and which my noble Friend behind me has not taken notice of. It is, perhaps, a matter which will be considered of some slight importance, that this measure has passed the other House where there are, I believe, 60 representatives of Scotland, who come from every part of Scotland, who have seen the Bill and have had no objection to it. That, I think, is a circumstance which ought, to some extent, influence your Lordships in the view you may take of this Bill, and to satisfy you that the Bill is not of so dangerous a character as has been represented, and which, I venture to submit to your Lordships, it would be absurd for this House to set aside without strong and urgent reason for doing so. The Bill must have met with the assent of the Scotch representatives, or it would not have been permitted to pass the other House. Therefore, your Lordships have it coming up from the other House of Parliament unopposed by those who represent the Government in the other House, and with the unanimous assent of all the representatives of Scotland in the House. Surely under those circumstances it would not be advantageous to this House or to its position, unless some strong ground were shown, that your Lordships should throw out the Bill, and it is not a matter to be left undealt with for another year. I think this is the more important consideration, seeing that the Bill as it stands will not impose an absolute obligation on any locality in Scotland, but will leave it to each locality to determine whether it will adopt the Bill or not. If you were going by this measure to impose a rigid system upon every part of Scotland, no doubt there would be a good deal of force in the argument that it has not been sufficiently considered by the local authorities. But it is brought before Parliament by one most important county—the county of Lanark. It is, therefore, a matter of very pressing necessity; you have very considerable districts there which are really troubled with a want of water, because under the existing system there is not the means of obtaining it. A Bill has passed the other House which will enable that county to deal with this pressing want with approval; and your Lordships are asked to deprive the county of Lanark of an opportunity of supplying the water wants of an important portion of their constituency for another year. Supposing the Bill is passed, what harm will it do to any other locality? No County Council need adopt it unless they please. Possibly, it may be unsuited to the wants of other localities. That is why it is made permissive. If it is so they will not adopt it. Then, if that be so, what is the harm in giving them a discretionary power which, if it be unsuitable, the will not exercise? Would it be reasonable of them to ask that because it may not suit them, and therefore they may not want it, that the people in Lanarkshire should be deprived of the opportunity of doing that which they feel they urgently need?

*THE EARL OF LAUDERDALE: My Lords, with regard to what my noble Friend below me has stated as to the County Councils not being acquainted with the purport of this Bill, I may say that on Tuesday I forwarded a copy of it to the Convener of my county, and he has replied by telegram that he has not had time to consider the Bill, and therefore he is not able to offer an opinion upon it. I do hope, therefore, that the House will not pass the Bill this Session. In any case, if the noble Lord opposite (the Earl of Camperdown) divides the House, I propose going into the Lobby with him.

*LORD SALTOUN: My Lords, I rise also to support the noble Lord on this side of the House who has proposed the rejection of the Bill for this Session. I have sent a copy of this Bill up to the Convener of my county, but he has not had time to reply. I do, however, feel that it is most important the Councils should have the opportunity of considering this Bill before it becomes law. If the noble Earl opposite divides, I shall also go with him.

*THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (The Marquess of LOTHIAN): My Lords, although this Bill is not a Government measure, as it affects the whole of Scotland, you will probably think it right that I should say a few words upon it; at the same time, I wish it to be understood that any action I may take is simply in my private capacity as a member of your Lordships' House, and not necessarily as representing the Government. It is unnecessary for me to go into details upon the existing system in Scotland, which this Bill is proposing to alter. That has been so fully laid before your Lordships, not only by my noble Friend who introduced the Bill, and the noble Earl who has moved that the Bill be read this day three months, but by the noble Lords who have spoken in favour of the Bill, that it is quite unnecessary for me to say anything further upon it; but I would venture to say a word or two upon the objections which have been taken by the noble Earl and other noble Lords with the view of postponing the measure. The chief objection, as far as I can gather from the later observations which have been made, is on the ground that the County Councils have not had time to consider this Bill. The Bill was introduced into the House of Commons on the 16th of June, and laid on the Table. That is giving the Councils a month up till now, and I do not know what the clerks of the County Councils can have been doing if this matter has not been laid before their County Councils or the Conveners, so that opinions might have been sent as to whether this Bill should or should not pass your Lordships' House. But I do not think it is a matter simply of not submitting the Bill to the County Council. I do not think that is a matter in itself of importance, because, although the noble Earl says it makes no difference whether this Bill is permissive or not, yet I think the fact that the Bill is purely a permissive Bill must remove a great deal of the objection on the ground that the County Council had not had time to consider it. No convener, I am bound to say, does his duty more assiduously than the noble Earl; but I feel, at the same time, rather nervous about the reception which he will receive when he goes back to Scotland, because, as I understand, he says that, according to his own experience, the County Council of Forfarshire whenever they want to adopt a measure call a meeting, that the meeting is packed, and resolutions passed without reference to the general opinions of the majority. If that be so, I am bound to say I do not think it is the case elsewhere; but, at the same time, if there is any risk of that sort of thing taking place, I should suggest to the noble Lord that he should consent to some Amendment by which such proceedings may be made absolutely impossible. I would suggest that words providing that the vote should be passed by an absolute majority, or a two-thirds majority, or in some other way to prevent a snatch vote being taken, should be introduced. I hope the noble Lord will assent to some such Amendment.

*LORD HAMILTON OF DALZELL: Certainly.

*THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: Then objection was taken to the second clause, and the chief objection to that was that it was absolutely essential under the Bill that the district rate should be levied before any domestic rate is levied at all. Upon that point I have some sympathy with the noble Earl. I think it might be possible to reverse, by some machinery, that proposal, so as to make it possible that where a domestic rate is imposed it should not be necessary for the County Council first to impose a rate on those who do not benefit. I would leave it to the County Council to decide whether such a rate should be levied, and its amount. As the Bill stands, it is compulsory upon the County Council to levy a rate upon the whole district, and then, having levied that general rate, they are to levy a domestic rate. I should like to reverse that process, and put it that the domestic rate should be levied first.

*LORD HAMILTON OF DALZELL: I rather think they go together pari passu.

*THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: I think the noble Lord is mistaken. If he will look at the end of Clause 4 he will find that is so.

*THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: If the noble Earl will withdraw his objection I would ask the noble Lord who has introduced the measure to make an Amendment of that kind in order to meet the difficulty. Then the next objection was with regard to Clause 6. I do not share the anxiety of the noble Earl in reference to the difficulty which he anticipates under that clause. As I understand, it will not affect the rate very much as matters now stand in those small districts. All those districts are liable up to the full rate of 2s. 6d., but the object of this clause is to enable the Local Authority of the district, by resolution, to do away with special water districts.

*THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: Altogether.

*THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: The effect of that would be, as I understand, that those within the district who make use of the water would have to pay the domestic rate, and those who do not make use of the water would only have to pay the rate of 3d. Therefore, so far it would be a gain to those who derive no benefit from the water supplied. Those, I think, are the main points which have been touched upon by the noble Lords who have spoken, but I think they are really beside the great point, which is that it is a matter of urgency. The noble Lord who introduced the Bill pointed out that there is literally a water famine in some of these districts in Lanarkshire, and he stated that they had to get water from all sorts of places. In some places, I believe, they have been driven to get it from the privies in the railway stations. In such a state of things it is absolutely necessary to these people that water should be supplied. Those who object to this Bill object to it on the ground that 3d. in the £1 may possibly be imposed on those who do not get the benefit of the water; but I would ask them, can it be said that those around the villages where the people cannot get water are not interested in the condition of these places? Disease appears. It had already appeared. Are those outside not interested in this? These places may become positive plague spots, and those plague spots might affect the whole neighbouring country. If so, the whole country is interested in the introduction of water, which might prevent those possible consequences. It may be in the interest particularly of Lanarkshire that this Bill has been introduced; but there are also other places in Scotland which may at any time be in the same difficulty. If, on the other hand, there is no necessity for this Bill, and no need for it elsewhere, other places may, I think, be trusted not to adopt it. But in the interest of those places where public health is suffering from a scarcity of water, and no means exist for raising the necessary funds for supplying it, I trust your Lordships will give a Second Reading to this Bill.

LORD DENMAN: My Lords, I have been 36 years in this House, and I do not think I have said within that period anything which you can object to. I should be glad if you would allow me to say a few words. It is extremely probable that Parliament may be prorogued for seven months, and then the Bill may come on again, if your Lordships refuse a second reading now. Whichever way it happens I do not regret having trespassed upon the time of the House.

LORD HAMILTON OF DALZELL: I am sorry to put your Lordships to the trouble of a Division, but after what has been said by the Secretary of State for Scotland and myself about the dreadful condition of affairs in Lanarkshire, and the danger to health which may possibly arise, I have no alternative, as the case is so serious. I am perfectly ready to accept all the Amendments which have been suggested, that is that the domestic rate should be exhausted before calling on the public rate, and that it should require an absolute majority in the County Councils before adopting the Bill. I hope that may meet the views of the noble Lords, and will save your Lordships the trouble of dividing.

On Question whether ("now") shall stand part of the Motion? Their Lordships divided: — Contents 71; Not-Contents 23.

Resolved in the affirmative.

Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Tuesday next.

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

Moved that the House do now resolve itself into Committee.

LORD LINGEN: My Lords, in rising to move that this Bill be referred to a Select Committee, my object is to call the attention of this House to the extreme importance of the Bill, and its bearing upon the London County Council, and to signify on the part of the Council their wish that the particulars of the case should be thoroughly and completely inquired into, as they would be if the permanent officers of the council could be called before a Select Committee and give their evidence. I feel the very great disadvantage at which the County Council is placed by the fact that we have no longer, as a representative in this House, our former chairman. Were he here, I am quite sure that the case would be presented to your Lordships in a manner and with a force which

I can have no hope of reaching. I feel also that, to a certain extent, I represent a body which is the object of some unpopularity. I am sure, however, that I may rely upon the impartiality of this House, and that your Lordships will not forget that the County Councils are the children of Parliament, that they are among the youngest of those children, and that they hope to obtain some share of that parental fondness which generally goes to the youngest members of a family. The precise point which I have to put before your Lordships really lies in a very small compass. At present the elections being fixed for November, and the commencement of the financial year of the County Councils being fixed in April, ample time is given for the preparation of the financial and other business of the year. That business is upon such a scale as to require mature preparation and mature deliberation. I will not weary your Lordships with figures, but this will show that the body on behalf of which I am appearing is one that is of great public importance. The county has the power of rating on a value of upwards of £30,000,000, and it has an annual expenditure approaching £2,000,000; it has a debt in gross of £28,000,000, which it has to manage, together with its sinking fund, and a net debt which represents £17,000,000 or £18,000,000. Besides that, the Council is authorised to borrow, from time to time, for the purpose of re-lending to other metropolitan authorities, by which most beneficial scheme the metropolitan credit is put at the service and disposal of each of those authorities. A body which has to operate upon this scale I think is entitled to ask your Lordships to consider the reasons which seem to them to make the inclusion of London in this Bill inexpedient. If this Bill were confined to County Councils, properly so-called, I should not have one single word to say against it; but what I contend for is this: the County of London is not properly a County Council. It is not, except in a metaphorical sense, a County Council at all. London is urban, and it is under circumstances which are altogether, as I hold, external to the merits of the case, that London has been placed among the counties instead of with the other municipalities. The preparation of the estimates, a part of the business which falls to my lot, follows very much the course of the preparation of the Estimates in the Public Departments. By the Local Government Act, a committee is constituted, called the Finance Committee, of which I am chairman; and the functions of this committee are defined to be to regulate and control the finance of the Council. That committee may be said to be a sort of Treasury, and its duties are very much like those which belong to its prototype. The various committees of the London County Council are requested in November, just as the various Spending Departments of Government are requested, to prepare their estimates. Their chairmen, with the assistance of the principal officers of the Council, are instructed during the month of November to prepare, and, in fact, for a very considerable time afterwards, are occupied in preparing and settling those estimates. The time from November to April, which the statute makes the commencement of the financial year, when it has been subjected to the deduction of the Christmas Vacation, and in some years the Easter Vacation also, is not too long for the process. When the estimates have been roughly cast in this form, they go before the Finance Committee, and the Finance Committee, being established for this very purpose, thoroughly discusses, and either adopts or modifies them; and if it does not like any particular estimates—though, I ought to say, this power is exercised with anything like the stringency which the Treasury exercises over the public Departments—rejects them. Many of your Lordships have been members of Departments of the Government, and you know that the process of getting the Estimates into form by the joint action of the Spending Departments and the Treasury is neither a brief nor a speedy one; and if I may without impropriety compare small things with great, that argument applies in its degree to the estimates of the County Council. We do feel, and we desire most earnestly to press upon your Lordships, that if the election is put off until March, the year having to begin in April, sufficient time will not be granted; and I appeal to your Lordships, as many of you are chairmen of County Councils and men of business on a great scale, to consider what may be the effect of an outgoing council preparing the estimates which must be laid before a new council for confirmation. The result, I venture to say, will be this: that, from November until the time of election, the estimates will be bandied forwards and backwards between the different parties in the Council, in an electioneering sense, and will not be determined, as they ought to be, on their merits and on municipal grounds only. I represent in the County Council no political party at all; indeed, I stated, as my condition of taking office, that I would belong to no political party, and give no assistance as far as manoeuvres go. In that respect I may call myself sanctas simplicitas; I know nothing of them, and have had nothing to do with them. I maintain that, although the business of the County Council of London will be injuriously affected by taking the elections in March instead of November, it will not make the slightest difference to those who are thought to be politically interested. Then, besides our financial business, there is another part of the business, which is most important. Your Lordships must know that representatives of the County Councils constantly have to go before Committees of this House in connection with Bills of various kinds. Those Bills have to be prepared before the Session; and under this Election Bill, every third Session will be cut in two by the election at Easter. One Council will have been preparing Bills, and another Council after Easter, who may have a totally different policy, will come into office. It seems to me a most extraordinary state of things to contemplate. I have put the matter before your Lordships at no greater length than I could help, but I would press upon you, if I could do so effectually, the extreme importance of this Bill to the government of London. What we ask for is that being really a new municipality and being in no proper sense of the word a county, we may be excepted from this Bill; and I ask for a Select Committee only as an opportunity of proving in greater detail than I have been able to state to your Lordships why we ought to be excepted.

Lord Lingen

Amendment moved to leave out all the words after ("that") and to insert ("the Bill be referred to a Select Committee").—(The Lord Lingen.)

LORD HOBHOUSE: My Lords, as a humble colleague of my noble Friend, I beg to add my voice to his in asking your Lordships for a favourable consideration to this Motion. It is true the object of the Motion is only to lay a ground for treating the County of London in a different manner from the other counties which are the subject of the Bill, and I ask, Why not? But rather I ought to ask, What is the advantage gained by grouping London with a number of other communities whose circumstances are totally different, under the supposition, the fiction, that it is a county such as the county of Somerset, instead of being a town such as the town of Manchester or Birmingham? There were good temporary reasons of expediency for including the London County Council in the Local Government Act, but except for the fact that it is within the Act, and except for the fact that it is called a county instead of being called a city or a town, I know of no reason why Parliament should persist in applying to London provisions which may be very suitable for municipalities which are called counties, but which are not suitable to London. Now the present provisions of the Bill before your Lordships' are provisions for changing the autumn election from November to March. I assume that for, say Somersetshire again, they are very convenient; but for London they are not convenient. It is true that the inconvenience was not perceived at first. At first the County Council accepted the change; but then came the most experienced and the weightiest members of the Council, the men by whose advice they are most wont to be guided, and they told us that it would be a matter of great inconvenience. Our Chancellor of Exchequer, Lord Lingen, says it will disarrange his Budget; the chairmen of our committees, who are conversant with all the details of the various legislative measures with which the County Council is obliged to concern itself every year, tell us that they will be hampered and impeded by the change; the men through whose hands pass most of the general affairs of the County, who hold most of the threads of the general business in their hands, our Chairman, our Deputy-Chairman, our Vice-Chairman, the Chairman of the General Purposes Committee, all came forward, and each from his own point of view showed how inconvenient the change would be. It was upon those weighty counsels that the County Council has changed its course, and it now asks that the present arrangement may be kept in force. Surely, my Lords, you will not force a change upon the Council if it is inconvenient. Surely you will not turn a wholly deaf ear to those persons who, being the most competent of all to speak upon the matter, tell you it is inconvenient. The object of this Motion is to make a case; to lay before this House in greater detail, by the mouths of the persons who know the details, and in a quieter manner than can be done by assertions across this Table, the facts and circumstances that create the inconvenience which is alleged. It may be proved before the Committee that we have exaggerated the amount of inconvenience, though I do not think it is the case; it may be shown that there are other considerations, which we have never yet heard, on which you would decide, that although there might be inconvenience to the County Council, yet the convenience of grouping it with the other countries is so great that you will still insist upon it. If that should turn out to be the case, your Lordships will pass this Bill with a clear conscience. But as matters now stand, you can only pass it subject to the protest and warning of those who know the matter best, that by so doing you will worry and harass a municipal body, which, of all municipal bodies in England, is already the most heavily weighted with public business. For these reasons, unless your Lordships would be prepared to accept another Amendment, which is on the Paper in the name of my noble Friend, and exclude the London County Council from this Bill, I trust you will accept this Motion, and give time for further inquiries into the matter.

LORD MONKS WELL: My Lords, I wish to be allowed to say one word in support of the remarks which have fallen from my noble Friends Lord Lingen and Lord Hobhouse. I speak not as an Alderman, but as an elected member of the Council, and I do most earnestly hope your Lordships will not turn a deaf ear to the wishes of the Council in this matter. As an elected member who will have to go to election either in November or March, I wish to say that the members naturally supposed in the first instance, before they knew the important bearing of this matter, that they might decide for themselves whether the month of November or March was or was not a more convenient time for electioneering purposes. Naturally the members of the London County Council did not wish at the first blush, unless they found it necessary to do so, to go to election during the dark and foggy days of November; they felt that the month of March was a preferable time in which, for their own convenience, to make the electioneering campaign. But when it was shown that all the great authorities on the Council and the chairmen of the two committees principally interested were of opinion that terrible inconvenience would result from the proposed change, they turned their back upon themselves, and decided that they must, at whatever discomfort, electioneer rather in November than March. Then there is one other reason which I should like to lay before your Lordships as well, which is very important. Surely it is exceedingly desirable to get the best men possible to volunteer their services for the local County Council. If the Legislature shows that on every occasion it is thoroughly determined not to listen to anything the London County Council may say, either in this House, or in the House of Commons, what sort of men can you expect to volunteer for service on the London County Council? I do look upon it as being a matter of the utmost importance that the good work which your Lordships do not hear of, and which the public do not hear of, which is not advertised in the newspapers, but which, as my noble Friends know, is done in Committees of the London County Council efficiently and unobtrusively, should be recognised, and that the inhabitants of London should feel that a seat on the Council is an honour to them, and that if they discharge their duties properly upon it, their merits will be properly recognised, and that it ought to be an object of great ambition to obtain a seat on the Council. I do hope, therefore, your Lordships will not turn a deaf ear to our wishes.

*LORD HENNIKER: My Lords, in giving a reply to the noble Lords opposite, I must remind your Lordships that this question of altering the elections of the London County Council was discussed most fully in the House of Commons, particularly by an Amendment brought forward in Committee. It was decided there by a very large majority—68 in a House of 276 Members. I think my right hon. Friend, Mr. Ritchie, very properly defended his proposal that the County Council of London should not be excepted from the provisions of the Bill, on the ground, first, that the County Council itself had varied very much in their opinion. At one time they passed a resolution in favour of holding the elections in January; on a second occasion, by a large majority, they passed a resolution to hold the elections in March, and then on a third occasion they passed a resolution to hold the elections in November, and not to hold the elections in November on the day that is usual for Municipal Councils to be elected, but on some day later in November. It is all very well for the noble Lords opposite to say that certain prominent members of the Council afterwards came down and persuaded the Council to change their opinions; but the whole question—and I think the noble Lords will not contradict me—was most thoroughly put before them just as it has been put before your Lordships to-night, as it was put in the House of Commons on the occasion when they voted for March, and on that occasion there was a large majority in favour of March. So I think that argument falls to the ground. Then besides this, the Government had to consider the opinions of the Members of the Metropolitan constituencies; and they are, I think, as much representatives of the ratepayers as the members of the County Council. The noble Lords opposite have said something about the estimates, and as to the making of a rate. The Government are unable to satisfy themselves that there will be any practical difficulty in this respect by holding the election in March. The new Council can make any revision they think necessary in the estimates of their predecessors. Those estimates, as noble Lords are aware—I think the noble Lord opposite said so the other night—take several months to prepare usually, before the County Council can determine what rate should be made. I must remind your Lordships of this, that any rate that is made is only made for half a year, and last year the rate was only made on the 21st of April. The Local Government Act expressly provides that if an estimate is considered by any Council to be excessive or insufficient, at the end of the half-year the County Council may revise the estimate and make the rate accordingly. Then another contention has been raised as to the inconvenience with regard to the County Council Money Bill. With respect to the question whether the new County Council have time to consider the proposals of their predecessors I must remind your Lordships that the Money Bill that is brought in only gives the County Council certain powers of borrowing, and if the Bill passes through the Houses of Parliament with, as sometimes happens, a good many alterations, it does not oblige the County Council to spend the money up to their borrowing powers, they may spend what they think proper. Then with regard to what the noble Lord mentioned just now, the Private Bills promoted by the County Council. The County Council if they think proper, the new Council or the old one, would have no difficulty whatever in withdrawing a Private Bill if they wished not to proceed with it. Then, again, as to the opposition to such Bills, and other incidental arrangements connected with the opposition to any Bill. The Local Government Board have considered the matter, and they do not think that any practical inconvenience could arise to make it necessary to vary the election for the County Council of London. It must not be forgotten that those difficulties which have been spoken of to-night, can only possibly arise once in three years, at the time of the election; and then I must mention to your Lordships again as to the alteration in time. November in London has some great disadvantages for the County Council elections for this reason, that the School Board elections take place in that month, and the School Board election is entirely carried on upon a different basis, so that that might cause confusion, and it might cause inconvenience to voters. I do not think I need trouble your Lordships any further, but in regard to the Motion of my noble Friend, Lord Lingen, of course, if evidence is taken, and that can be the only object of asking for a Select Committee, the progress of the Bill might be delayed very much. I told your Lordships the other night that it is extremely necessary the Bill should be passed, and if we sent it to a Select Committee we might jeopardise the passing of the measure. On the other hand, I think, and the President of the Local Government Board thinks, that no sufficient grounds have been shown, after the way the question has been discussed in the other House, and put before your Lordships' House, for referring the question to a Select Committee. Under those circumstances I must ask your Lordships to reject the Motion.

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, I must confirm my noble Friend in saying that I think the Motion for a Select Committee would not be the most convenient mode of dealing with this Bill so late in the Session. An inquiry on this subject would certainly cause considerable delay in passing the Bill, and after all it is a matter in which we can form our own judgment. At the same time, I am entirely with the noble Lord upon the principle of his Amendment, and I would certainly vote in favour of it in Committee. In the first place, I do not understand why we are to put the London County Council in a different position from other Urban Councils.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: After what the noble Earl has said, would it not be more convenient that we should at once go into Committee?

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: The discussion having taken place, I think it would be better to state the reasons rather than start a new discussion, and if the House will allow me I will proceed to do so. I cannot see why the urban constituency should not be in this one instance placed in the same position. London is an urban constituency, and what reason has the noble Lord given why the wishes of the London County Council should not be attended to? We have it from them, and surely they are the best judges, that the greatest inconvenience would arise from the Estimates being proposed by the Council going out of office, and placed before the Council which succeeds to them. The House may not perhaps be aware that the requirements of the County Council of London must be embodied in a money Bill which is laid before the House of Commons, and that money Bill must be brought before the House of Commons before the 14th of April. Now, looking to the various notices which have to be given, the requirements of the Standing Orders of the House of Commons, the shortness of the time which will elapse between the election and the date which is absolutely necessary for the production of the money Bill, the noble Lord is, I think, in error when he says that the new Council will be able to revise the Estimates of the old one. It will be with the greatest difficulty that the new Council can hurry the Estimates through with the greatest speed possible, taking no time at all to consider them, in order to embody them in the money Bill, which must be laid before the House of Commons before the 14th of April. Surely that is not what we ought, as men of business, to sanction. I can quite conceive that if there had been time to consider there might have been no inconvenience found in the elections taking place in March, so as to save having them in the fogs of November; but if there is any practical inconvenience, and if the business will not really be transacted by the County Council in a manner which is satisfactory to the constituency, because time will not allow, then I say there surely cannot be any sound or good reason, and I cannot see why we should insist upon placing the County Council of London in a position of great inconvenience for the sake, it appears, of an opinion which has been expressed on the part of some members for London. I do not like to impute to any of the members for London that they have any political reason, but there have been some people who have suggested that there may be some reason behind this, and I am almost led to believe that there must be some reason behind, because otherwise I cannot understand why this Amendment should be refused.

The Earl of Kimberley

*LORD LINGEN: I do not propose to prevent the Bill going into Committee.

Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

Original Motion agreed to: House in Committee accordingly.

Clauses 1 to 4 agreed to, with verbal Amendments.

Clause 5.

*THE MARQUESS OF RIPON: My Lords, I have a small Amendment to propose here. Under the present system the members of the County Council, whether aldermen or councillors, have to make certain declarations, and they have to make them within a fixed time, and they can also only be made before two other members of the County Councils, or before the Clerks of the Councils. With respect to the limit of time, it is somewhat extended by Clause 5 as it stands, but I am inclined to think it should be more extended. With regard to the other matter, practical difficulties often arise. It is exceedingly difficult sometimes in a large county to get two councillors together for the purpose of making these declarations, or the county councillor or alderman has to go sometimes great distances—it may be 40 or 50 miles in some counties—for the purpose of appearing before the Clerk of the Council, and I propose that some other persons more easily accessible shall have the power of receiving these declarations. If the noble Lord in charge of the Bill will accept the principle of my Amendment I shall readily agree to any alteration of its form.

Amendment moved,

In page 2, line 39, to leave out from ("made") to the end of the clause, and insert ("at any time before such person acts in the office to which he is so elected, and such declaration may be made either in the manner prescribed by the Local Government Act, 1888, or before any justice of the peace or commissioner to administer oaths in the Supreme Court of Judicature.")—(The Marquess of Ripon.)

*LORD HENNIKER: My Lords, I have no objection to this Amendment, if the noble Marquess will only change the wording a little, so that the clause would then read, "At any time within three months after the notice of application." If not, any county councillor, chairman, or alderman, might be two years before he made his declaration.

*THE MARQUESS OF RIPON: Will you then accept the rest of it?

*LORD HENNIKER: Yes, if the noble Marquess will make the alteration I suggest.

*THE MARQUESS OF RIPON: I quite agree to that.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 5, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 6 and 7 agreed to.

*LORD LINGEN: I beg leave to propose an additional clause to this effect: that nothing in this Act shall alter the date as now fixed by law for the elections of the London County Council. If your Lordships will be pleased to adopt that clause it entirely answers the object which I had in moving the reference of this Bill to a Select Committee, and, in fact, I should be very glad if this clause were adopted, instead of such reference, as being a more expeditious and equally satisfactory course so far as the London County Council are concerned.

Amendment moved, in page 3, after Clause 7, to insert the following clause:—

“Nothing in this Act shall alter the date as now fixed by law for electing the council of the administrative County of London.”—(The Lord Lingen.)

*LORD HENNIKER: My Lords, I have only to say this: Your Lordships have decided against the Select Committee, and so to the acceptance of a clause carrying out the wishes of the London County Council. I must say I have a still greater objection to the insertion of a clause which would entirely reverse your former decision.

On Question, their Lordships divided:—Contents 19; Not-Contents 54.

Amendment disagreed to.

Bill re-committed to the Standing Committee, and to be re-printed as amended. (No. 241.)

ATTENDANCES IN THE HOUSE.

LORD DENMAN having placed on the paper the following notice:—

“To move for a Return of the number of days on which the Earl Granville attended in this House from 1846 to 1891 inclusive; and also the number of days on which the Lord Denman attended during the same period,”

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I rise to make a Motion with respect to the order of the House. A Motion has been placed upon the Paper which I can only describe as unseemly. I might use a stronger word; but I prefer not to discuss it. I move that Lord Denman be not heard during the remainder of the sitting.

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, I wish to say in a single sentence that I concur entirely with what the noble Marquess has said upon his Motion.

Moved, “That the Lord Denman be not further heard during the present sitting.”—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

On question, agreed to.

COMMISSIONERS FOR OATHS ACT (1889) AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 123.)

Amendment reported (according to order), and Bill to be read 3^a on Monday next.

SLANDER OF WOMEN BILL.—(No. 111.)

Amendment reported (according to order); a further Amendment made, and Bill to be read 3^a on Monday next.

MUNICIPAL REGISTRATION (DUBLIN AND BELFAST BILL.—(No. 200.)

Read 3^a (according to order), and passed.

STAMP DUTIES BILL.—(No. 217.) STAMP DUTIES MANAGEMENT BILL. (No. 218.)

CONSULAR SALARIES AND FEES BILL (No. 221.)

Read 3^a (according to order), and passed.

HIGHWAYS AND BRIDGES BILL. (No. 234.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*LORD BASING: I hope your Lordships may be disposed to give a Second Reading to this Bill, which is for the purpose of conferring further powers on County Councils and other authorities with respect to main roads and other highways and bridges, and thereby enabling them to conduct more easily what is at once the most expensive and most difficult portion of their administration, namely, keeping the roads and bridges in repair. It is hoped that this measure will enable them to make many improvements which, without it, might not be within their power. Under it they will have power to contract with other persons having authority over bridges for their repair. That is the purpose of the main clause. There are two other clauses, one getting rid of certain restrictions with regard to main roads, so that the necessity of obtaining Provisional Orders in certain cases which we think quite unnecessary may be dispensed with. There is another clause with regard to the disqualification of gentlemen from serving as County Councillors on account of having any share or interest in contracts for the supply of road materials, gravel, and other things, which are now subjects of disqualification if they make sales for that purpose. Those are the provisions of the Bill, and I hope your Lordships will read it a second time.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Basing.)

*LORD HENNIKER: My Lords, the Local Government Board have assented to this Bill in the House of Commons, and on their behalf in this House I have only to say that they have no objection to offer to the Bill.

On Question, agreed to.

Bill read 2^a (according to order), and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

House adjourned at twenty minutes

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

QUESTIONS.

DECCAN AGRICULTURAL RELIEF ACT.

MR. S. SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether, with reference to the proceedings of the fourth Provincial Conference of the Bombay Presidency, which sat at Poona on the 11th of May last, the attention of the Secretary of State for India has been drawn to Resolution No. 6 on the subject of the Deccan Agriculturists Relief Act, which states that the Conference viewed with alarm the proposal to abolish the conciliation system under the Act, and whether, as desired by the Conference, the Secretary of State will direct that the most recent Reports of the special officers connected with the working of the Act be published, with a view to enable the public to submit their representations to Government in the matter?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): The Secretary of State has seen in the newspapers the statement referred to in the first paragraph of the question. The subject of the Deccan Agricultural Relief Act of 1879 is now under the consideration of the Government of India, and until an expected Despatch is received from them, no action will be taken by the Secretary of State in Council.

POSTAL ARRANGEMENTS FOR THE LINCOLN DISTRICT.

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby): I beg to ask the Postmaster General when the new postal arrangements for the Lincoln district will come into operation; and if he can now name the parishes in the Wragby, Rasen, and Louth sub-districts which will be transferred to the Lincoln Post Office under the new scheme?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): The new arrangements will be carried into effect on the 10th proximo. The following places will be transferred to the Lincoln Postal District, namely:—Now served from Wragby: East Barkwith, Hainton, South Willingham, Benniworth, Ranby, Wickenby, Lissington, Bleasley, Barlings. Now served from Louth: Burgh on Bain, Donnington on Bain, Gayton le Wold, Grimblethorpe. Now served from Market Rasen: Claxby, Usselby, Saxby, Ormsby, Normanton by Spital, Glentham.

RIGHTS OF QUEEN'S SHIPS IN CAPE TOWN.

SIR J. COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether Her Majesty's ships are accorded in peace prior rights to dock accommodation at Cape Town, and, if so, whether such rights are secured by statutory authority, and under what Act; whether Her Majesty's ships would in war be secured prior rights to such dock accommodation, and, if so, what is the precise nature of the authority under which such prior rights are secured to Her Majesty's ships in war; and whether the authority and control of the Admiral (commanding Her Majesty's ships) over the ports of Cape Town and in Simon's Bay will depend in war, as well as in peace, upon the Colonial Government, and, if not, under what Statutory Authority, or by what method of procedure, can the Imperial Government confer upon the Admiral full and complete authority and control over these ports in war?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The Admiralty have no statutory prior rights to the use of the dock at Table Bay, whether in time of peace or war. They did not subsidise it, and it is private property. It is understood, however, that the dock company will give all facilities for docking Her Majesty's ships. As the security of the colony from attack in time of war would largely depend upon the efficiency and mobility of our squadron in Cape waters, it is scarcely necessary to consider whether statutory powers would be required to insure the prompt docking of Her Majesty's ships when necessary under such circumstances. The Colonial Government have announced themselves prepared at all times to give prior rights of anchorage in Simon's Bay to Her Majesty's ships, and to afford them all possible facilities, and this is the existing arrangement. In time of war I can hardly believe that there would be any unwillingness on the part of the Colonial Authorities to give the Admiral all necessary jurisdiction over the ports of Simon's Bay and Cape Town, even although that jurisdiction might not be based on a local statute.

CYPRUS.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been called to the Report of the Chief Collector of Customs in Cyprus, published in the Parliamentary Papers, 1889 (p. 41, Session 1887-8), in which he states that and, whether, in view of the fact that the imports from the United Kingdom were, in 1883, £107,281, in 1890, £78,277, and that the British shipping entered and cleared was, in 1883, 108,038 tons, and in 1890, 40,480 tons, the Government will reconsider their refusal to re-establish a weekly mail service between Cyprus and Alexandria?

"A marked feature of the import trade has been the decline of imports from Great Britain since the discontinuance of the weekly mail service from Alexandria;"

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): The remarks quoted from the Report of the Chief Collector of Customs in Cyprus appear to have misled my hon. Friend, as there has been, in fact, no decrease of trade between Cyprus and England. The import and export trade has risen since the mail subsidy was discontinued from an average of £100,000 a year to an average of £132,000 a year. As to the decrease of British tonnage, it does not represent a decreased amount of shipping intercourse between Cyprus and England so much as the less frequent visits of the British-owned steamers passing between Egypt and Cyprus, since they ceased to be subsidised for running. The general tonnage entered and cleared has risen since the subsidy ceased. The question whether the mail subsidy should be renewed is a separate one, and it is not at present proposed to re-open it.

UNDERGROUND WORK-ROOMS.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if it is the intention of the Government to deal with the question of underground work-rooms commented on by Major Rae, Inspector of Factories in Birmingham; and whether, having regard to the women and girls stated to be employed, the difficulty of ventilation, the necessity for the use of artificial light all day long, and the very defective sanitary arrangements, some steps will be taken at an early opportunity to remedy what is stated to be "an increasing evil"?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.); The Factories Bill now before Parliament does not prohibit the use of underground work-rooms, but the existing law provides for their proper sanitation under the supervision of the Local Authorities, and it is proposed by the Bill of this Session to give power to the Secretary of State, if a Local Authority is in default, to direct the Inspector of Factories to remedy the default at the cost of the Local Authority. I hope that this power may be effective in remedying such insanitary conditions of work as are referred to in the Report of the Inspector.

MALTA.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies in view of the fact that the new Constitution for Malta of 12th December, 1887, contained a provision for the appointment of three unofficial members of the Executive Council, to be selected from the 14 unofficial members of the Council of Government, so that the Executive Council should not consist exclusively of the seven official non-elected members of the Council, and that, in a Despatch to the Governor of Malta, dated 20th March, 1890, the Secretary to the Colonies stated that, in the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown, the Executive Council of the Government of Malta can lawfully meet and transact business, notwithstanding that for the time being there may be no unofficial members of the Council, whether he will submit to the House the Despatch of General Wilkie (No. 23, of 23rd February, 1890), to which the Despatch of the 20th March, 1890, was a reply; can he explain why the Despatch of 20th March, 1890, was only published in Malta on 21st April, 1891; whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that, at the general election held in Malta in June last, 13 out of the 14 members were elected either without opposition or by enormous majorities to represent the views of those who desire that the Constitution of the 12th December, 1887, may be so amended that the Executive Council shall be unable to transact business unless it consist of the full number of official and non-official members; and whether, taking into consideration this practically unanimous desire of the electorate of Malta, and the views of the Law Officers of the Crown embodied in the Despatch of 20th March, 1890, the Secretary of State for the Colonies will recommend that the Constitution of 12th December, 1887, shall be so amended as to carry out what was understood at the time of its promulgation to be one of its most important provisions?

BARON H. DE WORMS: It hardly seems worth while to present a copy of General Wilkie's Despatch, but the hon. Member shall be furnished with a copy if he desires it. The Secretary of State has received no explanation from the Governor on the subject of the publication of the Despatch referred to in the second paragraph of the question. Twelve out of the 14 Members returned at the late election have, in their electoral addresses or otherwise, expressed themselves in favour of an amendment of the Constitution in the sense indicated in the third paragraph. The Secretary of State does not intend to recommend such an amendment, the effect of which would be to enable the elected Members by refusing to accept seats in the Executive Council (a course which they have already more than once adopted) to paralyse the administration of the Government.

AMERICAN DUTIES ON TIN PLATES.

SIR J. BAIN (Whitehaven): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the fact that nearly 25,000 men have been, or will be, thrown out of employment owing to the increased duties now levied on tin plates by the United States of America; and whether the Government will consider if any steps can be taken to alleviate the widespread misery which must ensue?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I am aware that there is a temporary stoppage of tin plate works in Wales, involving it is said about 20,000 men. It appears, however, that the exports of tin plates to United States have been nearly double their usual amount during the first six months of this year, namely 260,000 tons compared with 139,000 tons in 1890, so that this over-production was likely to cause a decrease of work for a time. It seems uncertain what course may be adopted at the works when the month has elapsed, but there is nothing at present to justify the apprehension that any distress will result beyond what can be dealt with by the ordinary channels.

TENURE OF FISHERMEN'S HOUSES IN SCOTLAND.

MR. DUFF (Banffshire): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate if his attention has been called to a case recently tried in the Sheriff Court at Banff, at the instance of the widow of John Innes, of Portknockie, bearing on the tenure of fishermen's houses; if he has noticed Sheriff Gatherie Smith's remarks in a note to his interlocutor in the case, describing it as "a type of a large class of cases existing all along the North-East seaboard, illustrative of the miserable condition under which the fishing community live, and for which the Fishery Board has urgently asked that a remedy should be found, but hitherto in vain;"

and if the Government contemplate any legislation to remove the grievance to which the Sheriff refers?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): The hon. Gentleman was good enough to draw my attention to this case some days ago, and I have therefore been able to inform myself about it. The litigation was not between the proprietor and the fisherman, but was a domestic dispute between the son and heir of the fisherman and the fisherman's widow, the former of whom seems to have for the most part paid for rent and repairs. The learned Sheriff seems to have assumed that the widow would have gained her case if there had been a written title to the house: but, as the son was his father's heir, this cannot be said to be obvious, for I fail to gather in what way the possession by a fisherman of a written title would of itself alter the succession to his house. The case, therefore, seems to have been the occasion rather than the cause of expressions of opinion by the learned Sheriff on the general question of title, in which he takes a good deal of interest. On the estate in question, as the hon. Member is aware, the proprietrix is willing to give a lease to any of the fishermen who wishes it, and it is, therefore, difficult to find in this condition of things, or in this particular case, a cause for statutory interference.

GREAT YARMOUTH BOARD OF GUARDIANS.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether, in view of the recent disclosures made at the Great Yarmouth Police Court with reference to the late election of guardians, it is his intention to hold an inquiry into that matter; and whether he will bring in a Bill next Session to provide for the election of guardians by ballot?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): At Yarmouth proceedings were instituted against several persons for offences in connection with the voting papers in the election of guardians and convictions have been obtained. The charges were of a criminal character, and the persons charged have been tried by the proper judicial authority. There is not, therefore, any ground for an inquiry by the Local Government Board. I cannot undertake to bring in a Bill next Session providing for the election of guardians by ballot.

GUNGUNHAMA ENVOYS.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been called to a statement from Lisbon, that three Ambassadors from Gungunhama signed a declaration at Lourenço Marques on 21st May, which was witnessed by (amongst others) Her Majesty's Consul and the Consuls or six other Powers, in which it is asserted that Gungunhama denies ever having sent Envoys to this country; whether Hulululu and Umfette, who are now in this country, and who allege that they are Envoys to Her Majesty from Gungunhama, have produced any credentials in confirmation of these allegations; and whether he knows who pays for the maintenance of these two Zulus whilst residing in this country?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): I am aware that such a statement has been made; but so far as our knowledge goes no such declaration has been made on behalf of Gungunhama. The two natives now in England have not informed Her Majesty's Government that they are on an official mission from Gungunhama, and have consequently not been asked whether they have credentials. We have no knowledge as to the payment of the expenses for their maintenance.

SUGAR BOUNTIES.

MR. PROVAND (Glasgow, Blackfriars, &c.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the French Government has recently altered the Sugar Laws in such manner that the bounties are now less than they were formerly; also if there has been a new German Law passed which will come into force next year which reduces the bounties for the three following years, and further reduces them for two years thereafter, from which date they are to cease entirely; and if he will obtain and lay upon the Table of the House a statement of the recent legislation and regulations made by Germany and France which affect the Sugar Bounties?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: The facts are as stated by the hon. Member. As regards France, a Bill lately passed reduces the bounty paid to the manufacturer to about 1s. 10d. per cwt. This rate is about one-third of the bounty paid at the time of the Sugar Conference. In Germany a Bill has passed the Reichstag which reduces the bounty from August 1, 1892, to July 1, 1895, when it will be further reduced, and on July 1, 1897, it is to cease altogether. After July next the duty will be from 6d. to 1s. per cwt. There is no objection to laying on the Table the two laws referred to.

SEVERE SENTENCE—CASE OF HENRY EDWARDS.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon, &c.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been drawn to the imprisonment for three months of a man named Henry Edwards, at the last Carnarvon Quarter Sessions, for common assault; whether, if the prisoner had been dealt with summarily, he could have been convicted for a larger term than two months for that offence; whether, in delivering sentence, the Chairman is correctly reported to have referred to previous convictions which had not been proved against the prisoner; and whether the Home Secretary will take any steps to inquire whether, under the circumstances, the sentence ought to be reduced?

Mr. Labouchere

MR. MATTHEWS: Henry Edwards was charged with the offence of unlawfully wounding, for which he could not have been summarily tried. The jury found him guilty of a common assault. In passing sentence, the Chairman followed a practice very common at Assizes and Quarter Sessions, and referred to the previous character of the prisoner as disclosed by the Calendar, which contained nine previous summary convictions. These could not have been the subject of counts in the indictment or of evidence at the trial. The sentence appears to me to have been proper and lenient.

VIENNA POSTAL UNION CONVENTION.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is now in a position to give a brief statement of the results of the Postal Union Convention held at Vienna?

*MR. RAIKES: The main work of the Congress, which has dealt with some 200 proposals, has been that of completing and consolidating the Postal Union and its system. It has arranged for the accession of Australia and New Zealand to the Union on October 1 next, and has signed a new Convention, under which Her Majesty's Government will be free in important particulars relative to foreign and colonial postage. As regards the most important questions arising under this head, I am already in communication with the Treasury. The Congress has adopted extended limits of size (1ft. by 8in. by 4in.) for sample packets sent all over the Union; has facilitated the adoption of a higher limit of weight than the present where desired; has relaxed somewhat the rules as to printed matter, circulars, visiting cards, &c.; has extended the facilities of the public in regard to postcards; generalised the system of reply-paid postcards, and arranged that unpaid postcards shall be delivered as letters instead of being stopped and destroyed. It has made provision for carrying out all over the Union the system of collecting trade charges, arranged for the exchange of closed mail bags with ships of war on foreign stations—a matter of much interest to seamen and officers of the Navy and their friends; has made rules for the prepayment of letters posted on board mail packets at sea or in port, and has laid down a uniform practice as regards charges on returned unpaid letters, and the time during which undelivered letters shall be kept before return to the writers. It has instituted a central clearing-house for adjusting postal balances, and so saving labour and charges for remittance; agreed upon means to be reciprocally adopted for repressing throughout the Union attempts to defraud the revenue by using forged or cleaned stamps, and has so simplified the complex accounts relative to transit correspondence for places outside the Union as to allow considerable amelioration of the relations of such British colonies as the Cape with the outer world. There have been numerous alterations of internal order and régime, with which I need not trouble the House.

ST. KATHARINE'S CHAPEL, REGENT'S PARK.

MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): I beg to ask the hon. Member for Penrith (Mr. J. W. Lowther) whether he can state what is the sum devoted to religious services at St. Katharine's Chapel, Regent's Park, out of the funds of the charity; whether three chaplains are employed, and for what period each has to be in residence; what are their duties, and whether they hold other offices; and whether any change has been made in the use of the charitable income?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith): The sum devoted to religious services at St. Katharine's Chapel is, according to the last accounts received, £368. No chaplains are employed. The brothers of the hospital are required by the rules of the hospital to perform the service, two of whom must be in Holy Orders, and must reside during three-quarters of the year. One of the present brothers appointed before 1878 appears from the Clergy List to hold a benefice. The Commissioners are not aware of any change in the use of the charitable income.

REGULATION OF STREET TRAFFIC.

MR. FELL PEASE (York, N.R., Cleveland): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will consider the best means of regulating street traffic so as to prevent the great inconvenience and danger caused to the public from large covered vans and drays passing along crowded thoroughfares at all hours of the day; and whether the drivers of such vehicles are required in any way to prove their ability to drive safely before they are entrusted with the care of these vans and drays?

MR. MATTHEWS: The police of the Metropolis have no power, under existing statutes, to prohibit or divert the passage of covered vans and drays through crowded thoroughfares. The employers are responsible for selecting competent drivers, and the law does not require that their competence shall be proved to any public authority.

REGISTERED LETTERS.

MR. FELL PEASE: I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he will consider the desirability of altering the regulation by which any one sending a telegram to a person at a registered address must add the letters c.o., thus in most cases doing away with any advantage of the registered address?

*MR. RAIKES: The subject has already been under my consideration, but I regret that I do not see my way to alter the regulation to which the hon. Member refers. In practice it has been found that if the words "care of" or the letters co. are not used, it is difficult to distinguish the registered portion of the address, and that the public suffer from the confusion which arises.

WARWICK MUNICIPAL CHARITIES.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the hon. Member for Penrith whether a draft scheme has recently been issued by the Charity Commissioners relating to the Warwick Municipal Charities; whether he is aware that, at the meeting of the Warwick Town Council, on 14th July, one of the Council gave notice of an important resolution relating to the proportion of the representative to the Co-optative Trustees, which he will move at the next meeting of the Council on 11th August; and whether the Commissioners will postpone any final decision as to the scheme until after they have had an opportunity of learning what takes place at such Council meeting?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: The answer to the first question is in the affirmative. The Commissioners are not aware of any notice to the effect stated having been given at a meeting of the Warwick Town Council held on the 14th inst. On June 18 the Commissioners directed a print of the scheme to be forwarded to the Town Clerk, the receipt of which was acknowledged by him with an intimation that it would be submitted to the Town Council. The Commissioners are anxious to learn the views entertained by the Town Council with regard to the scheme before its establishment, but they do not understand why those views cannot be communicated to them at an earlier date than that mentioned by the hon. Member.

TINNED SALMON.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been directed to the poisoning of six persons, resulting in the death of one, in consequence of having eaten tinned salmon; whether it is a fact that many cases of acute gastric irritation and tin poisoning have been reported from time to time consequent upon the consumption of tinned fish and shell fish (lobster); and whether, having regard to the evidence given in the case referred to by Dr. Arthur P. Luff, an expert, before Dr. Danford Thomas, steps will be taken to inquire into the subject for the protection of the public and the safeguarding of legitimate trade?

*MR. RITCHIE: I must ask the hon. Member to postpone this question. I have not yet received the information that will enable me to answer it.

Mr. Cobb

CHRIST'S HOSPITAL.

MR. FARQUHARSON: (Dorset, W.): I beg to ask the hon. Member for Penrith whether a deputation from the Governors of Christ's Hospital has recently waited upon the Charity Commissioners in the matter of the claims of Naval Officers to have the custom continued by which a certain number of the children of Naval Officers were admitted to the Foundation of the Hospital by special presentation; and whether the Charity Commissioners have come to any decision in the matter; if not, whether, having regard to the anxiety of many parents concerned, the Charity Commissioners will make known their decision at the earliest possible moment?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: The answer to the first paragraph of the question is in the affirmative. The proposal of the Governors, however, could not be carried into effect except by means of a further scheme amending the scheme lately approved by Her Majesty, and involving considerations, partly financial and partly educational, of great importance to the interests of the Hospital as a whole. If any such scheme should be undertaken by the Commissioners (and on this point no decision has yet been arrived at) a draft will be published in the usual way for criticism and objection.

PENCIL MANUFACTURERS.

DR. TANNER: I beg to postpone my question to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if his attention has been called to the alleged fact that several of the English pencil manufacturers who sent in samples of goods to the Stationery Department had the parcels returned to them unopened; and whether it is a fact that several English firms, who had been contractors, before preference had been given to Guttnecht, Bavaria, had their parcels of samples returned unopened?

THE CONVICT MUNCH.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has now considered the Petition presented on behalf of the German convict Münch, whose execution has been fixed for the 21st instant, and when he proposes to communicate his decision to the condemned man?

MR. MATTHEWS: The Petition in favour of the German convict Münch only reached me to-day. I wish to give to it the fullest consideration, but I hope to announce my decision either this evening or to-morrow morning.

THE CUSTOMS.

MR. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware of the delay which has taken place in the introduction of the seven-hours system into the Long Room of the Customs; and whether steps will immediately be taken to place the Second Division clerks in that Department upon an equality in such matter with the other clerks of the same rank in Her Majesty's Customs?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): There has been no avoidable delay in the introduction of the seven hours system into the Long Room of the Customs. That system has been authorised, but cannot be fully introduced until the staff has been further reduced.

SOUTH KENSINGTON SCIENCE AND ART DEPARTMENT.

MR. KELLY: I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he is aware that a week's notice to leave has been given to two writers who, some time back, were sent by the Civil Service Commissioners to the Science and Art Department at South Kensington, while that Department purposes to retain several temporary clerical assistants who, though they had passed no examination and had not been certificated by the Civil Service Commissioners, were first employed there about the same time; and whether, having regard to the fact that the giving of such preference to temporary clerical assistants over Civil Service Writers would be not only directly in contradiction to the pledge given by the Vice President of the Council on Education to the House on 4th July, 1890, on the subject, but also be a step towards the revival of the patronage system, he will at once cause instructions to be issued that preference is in no case to be given to such temporary clerks over duly qualified and certificated Civil Service Writers?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): Notice to leave was given to two copyists as stated in the question, and also to eight unregistered writers, in consequence of the work on which they were engaged coming to an end. It is true that other unregistered copyists are being retained, but they are engaged in work of a different nature from that in which the discharged men were employed. The two copyists would have been retained, and transferred to some other work, in place of unregistered writers, if one of them had not been very irregular in his attendance, and in the case of the other, if he had not shown himself unqualified for the new kind of work which would be required of him. Unregistered writers are never engaged by the Science and Art Department, except to meet an emergency when the Civil Service Commissioners inform that Department that they cannot supply copyists, and it would obviously be very inconvenient to constantly transfer the closing portions of temporary work, from men who had been instructed in it, to others who had to be taught. Nothing has been done contrary to the statement which I made in this House on the 4th of July, 1890.

LIVERPOOL POSTMEN.

MR. CROSS (Liverpool, West Derby): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is now able to give an answer to the Memorials recently addressed to him by postmen employed at Liverpool and elsewhere?

MR. RAIKES: In reply to my hon. Friend, I am able now to give a general outline of the new arrangements which, with the assent of the Treasury, I am now prepared to make. In London the two classes of postmen, wherever two classes exist, will be amalgamated into one class, so that the men, instead of waiting for vacancies in the higher class, will be able to progress without interruption from the minimum to the maximum of their scale. The scale moreover, in the case of each of what are called the four suburban divisions will at its maximum be raised by 2s. a week. Thus more than 600 men who now rise on two classes to 30s. a week will henceforth rise on a single class to 32s., and more than 700 men who now rise on two classes to 28s. a week will henceforth rise on a single class to 30s. Similarly 300 men whose maximum is now 24s. will rise to 26s. An increased rate of pay by the hour will also be given to the auxiliary postmen, and some of their number will be granted one week's leave in the course of the year. In the country, as in London, the division into two classes, where two classes exist, will be done away with, and the scales will at their maximum be raised in no case by less than 2s. a week, and in some cases by more. This applies to the town postmen. The rural postmen—that is, the postmen who ply between town and villages—have hitherto received fixed wages. For the future they, like town postmen, will, with few exceptions, be paid on scale, and their wages will rise considerably above what they have hitherto been. In the case of rural postmen, moreover, the period of their annual leave of absence will be extended from one week to a fortnight. Another alteration of great importance, applicable to all country postmen, town and rural alike, is that they will henceforth be paid extra for all work done on Sunday, and this payment will be at the rate of one hour and a quarter's pay for one hour's work. Thus, not only will they for six days' work be paid higher than they have been paid hitherto for seven, but if employed full time on Sunday they will receive pay for a further additional day, and that at a somewhat higher rate than for ordi-days. Yet one more alteration I may mention—an alteration which is applicable to all postmen in London and country alike, both town and rural. Their uniform hitherto has not included boots, and boots will henceforth be supplied, or, rather, an annual allowance in aid of boots. As regards good-conduct stripes, the regulation of which, I am aware, has not given entire satisfaction, I am not yet prepared to announce a decision; but, good-conduct stripes apart, I cannot but think that the concessions already announced, the cost of which will considerably exceed £100,000 a year, will appear to the House as not unhandsome, and will be accepted with satisfaction by the persons concerned. I may further add that I am now in communication with the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to the best mode of recruiting the body of postmen in large towns and the conditions of entry.

THE ALBERT UNIVERSITY.

SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, and, if so, when, the proposed Charter of the Albert University in London will be placed upon the Table prior to its grant, in pursuance of "The College Charter Act, 1871"?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The draft Charter of the Albert University is still under consideration by the Privy Council Office, and has had to be returned to the petitioners for amendment. As soon as it is settled it will be laid before Parliament in accordance with the provisions of the College Charter Act, 1871, and previous to its being submitted to Her Majesty.

RATING OF PUBLIC ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS.

MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, having regard to the great inconveniences and hardships attending the present state of the law relating to the rating of public elementary schools, and the strongly expressed desire for an amendment, Her Majesty's Government are prepared to introduce a Bill early next Session to provide for the exemption of public elementary schools from the payment of rates?

MR. GOSCHEN: Her Majesty's Government propose next Session to deal with the question of the rating of public elementary schools, with a view to mitigating the burden upon them, while at the same time doing justice to all concerned. It is a difficult and complicated question, requiring much consideration as to the shape which legislation should take.

IRISH MAILS.

MR. P. J. POWER (Waterford, E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General seeing that at present the mail leaves Kill, County Waterford, in the morning, and that it is impossible to answer on the same day letters received in the morning without travelling in some cases 10 miles, whether he will direct an inquiry to be held to see if some arrangement cannot be arrived at to obviate the great inconvenience from which people living in the Kill postal district now suffer?

*MR. RAIKES: I had already instituted an inquiry into this matter, and I hope shortly to be in a position to decide whether a later despatch can be afforded to the district of Kill.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.) for Mr. M. HEALY (Cork): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he has received a Memorial from the Cork Incorporated Chamber of Shipping and Commerce with reference to the acceleration of the mails to and from the South of Ireland; whether he is aware that under the present system the English mails are due to arrive in Cork only at 11.45 a.m., and are seldom delivered for an hour afterwards, leaving barely an hour for reply by the 2.10 p.m. mail; whether, under the new arrangements just entered into, the English mail will reach Londonderry (about the same distance from Dublin as Cork, and with a much inferior train service) at 11.10 a.m.; and whether steps will now be taken to so accelerate the morning mail to Cork as to give a reasonable interval for reply by the mid-day mail from that city?

MR. RAIKES: I have just received the Memorial from the Cork Incorporated Chamber of Shipping and Commerce to which the hon. Member refers, and I shall be prepared to consider it as soon as the necessary Reports called for reach me. In the meantime, I may point out that one reason why the communication between Dublin and Cork occupies a longer time than between Dublin and Londonderry is that the distance from Carlisle Pier to Kingsbridge terminus is greater than from Carlisle Pier to Amiens Street. As soon as arrangements, which I believe are in progress for accelerating this transit through Dublin, are accomplished, there will, I hope, be very little difference in the time to Cork and Londonderry.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): May I ask if the right hon. Gentleman cannot take steps to accelerate the mid-day delivery in Cork?

MR. RAIKES: I will make inquiry.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he has received a Memorial, signed by over 126 of the principal inhabitants of the district, including the Roman Catholic clergymen, asking for an improvement in the postal arrangements of Rathcoole and Kilcorney, County Cork, and for a daily delivery of letters; and whether, in view of the facts set forth in the Memorial, he will endeavour to meet the wishes of the people of the locality?

MR. RAIKES: The hon. Member himself sent me the Memorial in question on the 14th instant. It shall receive careful consideration.

HAULBOWLINE.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether the following paragraph, which appeared in the Cork papers of 1st July, is correctly transcribed from his letter on the 24th June—and, if so, whether he will state when and under what circumstances any practical use will be made of the Haulbowline Dockyard?

“In the interests of the Public Service every possible use will be made by the Admiralty of the present establishment at Haulbowline;”

LORD G. HAMILTON: The quotation from the letter in question is correct, and the letter further described the conditions under which the dockyard at Haulbowline would be used. I cannot, however, inform the hon. Gentleman exactly under what circumstances we shall make use of the establishment at Haulbowline, as the repair of Her Majesty's ships depends upon contingencies which it is impossible for me to forecast. At the present moment the basin is full of torpedo-boats.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the noble Lord whether all the torpedo boats of the Blue Squadron, now assembled in the Cove of Cork, are located in the floating basin in Haulbowline Dockyard, and were taken there for the purpose of getting a thorough overhauling; and whether, on its being found necessary to supplement the dockyard staff now or during the coming Naval Manœuvres, preference in employment will be given to the experienced local dockyard artizans at Passage West and Rushbrook, Cork Harbour?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: Arrangements have been made so as to enable the torpedo-boats taking part in the manœuvres to use temporarily the basin at Haulbowline as a shelter. The torpedo-boats have undergone the usual overhauling before being commissioned, and it is not necessary that they should be again subjected to it. I cannot undertake to promise that local workmen in private yards shall be employed; but I can assure the hon. Gentleman that I am quite as anxious as he can be to utilise an establishment upon which such large sums have been expended. I doubt if it will be necessary to temporarily supplement the existing establishment, but if it is the class of workmen brought in must necessarily be regulated by the nature of the work on which they have to be engaged.

H.M.S. TRIUMPH.

MR. FLYNN: I beg also to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether H.M.S. Triumph, Guardship at Cork Harbour, in addition to taking in stores recently at Devonport, did also undergo the periodical overhauling and repairing in that dockyard, as did also H.M.S. Shannon; and, if so, in view of the letter of the First Lord to the Cork Chamber of Shipping, dated 24th ultimo, will the Admiralty consider the advisability, from an economic point of view, of employing a permanent staff of skilled workmen and of labourers in Haulbowline Dockyard, with a view to repair and refit vessels of Her Majesty's Navy when necessary?

[LORD G. HAMILTON: The Triumph and the Shannon were repaired in Devonport Yard; but, as I stated early in the year, in reply to a question by the hon. Member for Mid Cork, there were other matters requiring attention in addition to simple repairs, which could not be undertaken except in one of the large dockyards. The question of having a complete permanent dockyard staff at Haulbowline has been already fully considered from an economic point of view, and if any economy could be secured by the further development of the establishment I should be only too glad to give effect to any proposals with this object in view; but at present I regret that I cannot sanction any further development of the works at the dockyard beyond what has been already authorised.

Lord G. Hamilton

BURIAL GROUND OF WELLS, CARLOW.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the attention of the Local Government Board of Ireland has been called to the neglected condition of the old burial ground of Wells, in the Barony of Idrone West, County Carlow; is the Board aware that cattle, swine, and other animals travel over and disturb the graves; and whether any steps have been taken by the Carlow Board of Guardians to erect an enclosing wall, after being repeatedly called on to do so by the inhabitants of the neighbourhood?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The Local Government Board are informed that the Board of Guardians instituted steps to have the burial ground referred to enclosed, but have failed to come to an agreement with the occupier of the adjoining land as to the boundary limits. The clerk of the Union states that for some years no Report has been made to the Guardians as to the alleged trespass of animals on the ground.

THE RECOGNISANCES OF MESSRS. DILLON AND O'BRIEN.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state what amounts have been levied, and on whom respectively, on account of the estreated recognisances of Messrs. John Dillon and William O'Brien at Tipperary?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed that in the case of Mr. John Dillon the full amount due by his sureties, Messrs. T. English and W. Hurley, has been recovered from them, namely, £250 each. In the case of Mr. William O'Brien's sureties, the amount so far recovered has been £6 19s. 6d., levied on Mr. John Bourke.

MR. T. M. HEALY: What is the amount actually levied?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: £7.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): Who were the sureties?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Mr. John Bourke and Canon Cahill.

INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): May I ask the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs if he proposes to lay on the Table the Correspondence between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of the United States in reference to International Copyright?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: Yes, Sir; the Correspondence will be presented.

MR. BRYCE: How soon?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: I should say within a week. I believe it is ready for presentation now.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES,
1891-2.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS II.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

*(4.15.) MR. W. PRITCHARD MORGAN (Merthyr Tydvil): I was engaged in moving the reduction of this Vote by the sum of £100 last night when the proceedings were interrupted. In order to give the Committee some idea of the ability displayed by the Office of Woods and Forests for the work they have to discharge, I wish to point out that there are many farms in Wales upon which quit rents amounting, as the case may be, to 1d., 2d., 1s., and 2s. are levied. When these sums are paid to the Woods and Forests a separate receipt is given in every case, no matter how modest the amount may be, and for each receipt a sum of 4d. has to be paid. I only mention this fact to show the Committee how full of red tape and circumlocution the Office of Woods and Forests is, and as an introduction to a more serious indictment. As far back as 1884 I commenced mining operations in North Wales, and for four years the Woods and Forests took no notice of them. They allowed me to spend large sums of money in erecting machinery and in opening up mines, and it was not until the 6th of July, 1888, that they swooped down upon me and stopped the whole of the works. It is only right the Committee should know that this particular locality has long been marked upon the Government maps as containing lead, silver, and gold. Now, it is well known that the Government claim a royalty upon gold and silver, but when I commenced my mining operations in North Wales, I was led to believe that I should not be interfered with. For many years silver had been obtained in considerable quantities in the Principality. No less than £1,500,000 has been realised from silver got from the mines of Great Britain since 1875, and not one single penny of royalty has been paid upon it. I and my friends, therefore, naturally assumed that we should not be interfered with in our efforts to work for the other precious metal—gold. But the Woods and Forests instituted proceedings against us in connection with our workings. The case was in the Court of Chancery for some years, and ultimately a decision was given, to which I wish to refer as showing the disgraceful state of the law in this country with respect to mining. One would think that this Office of Woods and Forests, composed of men of intelligence, would endeavour to make

THE RIVER ILEN, SKIBBEREEN.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether his attention has been directed to a resolution unanimously agreed to by the Skibbereen Town Commissioners, in the County of Cork, protesting against the construction of a three-arch railway bridge across the River Ilen at Skibbereen, and calling attention to the suffering and sickness which have, in the past, been caused by floods in Skibbereen; and whether steps will be taken to provide a one-span bridge for the Light Railway, and thus prevent any obstruction in the river's course?

MR. JACKSON: I have not seen the Memorial to which the hon. Member refers, but I am informed that the bridge over the River Ilen at Skibbereen will be a one-span bridge, and not a three-span bridge as is suggested by his question.

DR. TANNER: Will there be any obstruction to the course of the river?

MR. JACKSON: I cannot give any opinion upon that point at present.

THE CRIMES ACT.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland how many prosecutions of men on strike have been made under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): There has only been one prosecution.

PUBLIC BUSINESS.

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): I wish to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will explain the meaning of the undertaking he gave last night, and, further, whether he will consider the question of opposing after 12 o'clock private Members' Bills of which notice of opposition has been given?

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman to make a definite statement on the subject. I certainly understood that the arrangement come to a fortnight ago was that the time was to be given to Government Business and no other. If we once enter on the question of private Members' Bills there will be no end to it.

MR. GOSCHEN: The point is whether when a small remnant of time remains after Government business has been disposed of, and before 1 o'clock, a Bill which is almost unanimously desired by the House should not be proceeded with if no one objects. I am inclined to think it is rather hard on private Members that they should not get a chance of influencing the objector, the latter being on the spot. However, the matter is one rather for the House than for the Government.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I am afraid the procedure suggested would involve the necessity of a majority of private Members who may oppose a Bill staying until 1 o'clock in order to make their opposition effective.

MR. GOSCHEN: I may point out that no Division could be taken. The moment any hon. Member objected the Bill would fall to the ground. Nobody need stop except one single Member who was opposed to it.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: Why should Members who are opposed to a Bill be compelled to wait till 1 o'clock for the purely formal purpose of opposing it?

MR. FLYNN: The understanding was that none but public business would be taken.

DR. TANNER: There is no necessity for private Members waiting till 1 o'clock, because the House is perfectly able to deal with all these matters. By little arrangements certain Bills are allowed to pass, and others are blocked as the case may be. There need be no hesitation on the part of Members about this matter.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Unless there is an understanding that these Private Bills will not be taken between 12 and 1 o'clock, a good many Members will be put to inconvenience, and will have to remain in attendance.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: Do the Government intend to take up the Infants' Betting Bill on their own responsibility?

MR. GOSCHEN: No, Sir.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I understand that if Supply goes on until 1 o'clock the distinct pledge of the Government will come in?

MR. GOSCHEN: Yes, Sir.

INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): May I ask the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs if he proposes to lay on the Table the Correspondence between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of the United States in reference to International Copyright?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: Yes, Sir; the Correspondence will be presented.

MR. BRYCE: How soon?

But the Woods and Forests instituted proceedings against us in connection with our workings. The case was in the Court of Chancery for some years, and ultimately a decision was given, to which I wish to refer as showing the disgraceful state of the law in this country with respect to mining. One would think that this Office of Woods and Forests, composed of men of intelligence, would endeavour to make some attempt to allow the natural resources of Crown property to be developed. These gentlemen, however, appeared to consider that they were already doing quite sufficient work, and that a further development of the resources of the country might add to their arduous duties in a way that was not desirable. They, therefore, object to the development of this particular industry. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has on many occasions been most profuse in his promises with reference to this matter. No doubt his duties are heavy, and occasionally he has to perform, in addition to his other labours, the duties of Leader of the House, but surely between the beginning of 1888 and now there was sufficient time for the right hon. Gentleman to give the interview which he had promised over and over again, not only to myself but to other Members of the House, sitting on both sides, who are pecuniarily interested in the matter. If the right hon. Gentleman will read the communications which have passed, he will see at once that he has failed to keep his promises. We have had great difficulties to encounter in Wales. We have had to contend with the Crown and with the landlords, and the law upon the question is probably unique. The Crown say that they are entitled to all the gold in Wales, but what have they done to justify their title. I maintain that the conduct of the Woods and Forests has been cowardly in the extreme. If the Crown is entitled to the gold and silver in Wales, why not grant licences to those who are desirous of working for these metals, reserving to the landlords what they are entitled to as owners of the surface land? When we went to the Crown for a licence we were told that we must first go to the landowner, and so difficulties were accumulated. But we have struggled away, and some measure of success has crowned our efforts. I claim that we have solved what we consider to be a great problem—the question whether or not out of large quantities of low grade ore we could produce gold at the rate of a quarter of an ounce per ton. It is a small amount, it is true, but we have demonstrated that it can be done, and have at least achieved something which entitles us to some consideration at the hands of the Government. I think it is a great achievement, and one that has been equalled by very few mines in the world, to prove that lodes with $\frac{1}{4}$ of an ounce of gold per ton can be worked at a profit. We have succeeded in our operations, and we are able to show that there are large bodies of similar ore in the Principality which may also be worked to a profit. Dr. Le Neve Foster, Inspector of Metalliferous Mines, Reports to the Home Secretary upon the condition of these mines; but if the Home Secretary is asked a question respecting them in this House, he says that he has nothing to do with them, and that they are in the Department of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Chancellor of the Exchequer when questioned as to the embargo placed upon gold mining by the law of the land intimates that the Attorney and Solicitor General are responsible, and the Solicitor General, on the other hand, expresses regret that the matter is not in his Department and adds that he has nothing to do with it. In this way we have been sent from pillar to post, and have been unable to obtain the slightest satisfaction. There is one matter in regard to which the Attorney General is greatly to blame. He has admitted that the gold and silver in the Australasian Possessions belong to Her Majesty, just the same as the gold and silver in this part of the Queen's Dominions. That being so, why have the Government observed a different rule in the two cases?

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The rights of the Colonial Governments are not under the notice of the House. It has been settled long ago that the rights of the colonies have been conceded to the colonies themselves.

*MR. W. PRITCHARD MORGAN: I submit with great respect that under the constitution of the colonies they have the control of the gold and silver in the mines just the same as this country have control.

THE CHAIRMAN: That being so we have no power to interfere with it. The Attorney General has nothing to say to it, and it is outside the scope of the discussion which can be raised upon this Vote.

*MR. W. PRITCHARD MORGAN: I bow to your decision, Mr. Courtney.

and will not pursue the subject; but I think, and many lawyers in this country also think, that the 'gold and silver in Wales are no more the property of the Crown than they are in the colonies. The Report of Dr. Le Neve Foster shows that until there is an alteration of the law, all hope of profitable gold mining in this country must be given up. I wish the Committee thoroughly to understand the amount of encouragement we have received in North Wales. The late Sir Warrington Smythe said that from six to eight ounces of gold per ton in Wales would, with economical management, pay for working; but the new adviser to the Crown calculates his royalty on 5 dwts. of gold and silver. According to the sliding scale, out of 20 ounces of silver to the ton you would take something like two ounces, and that two ounces would very often be the profit obtained. Before submitting the sliding scale, surely the right hon. Gentleman might have granted me an interview on the subject.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.); I invited the hon. Member.

*MR. W. PRITCHARD MORGAN: I had an opportunity of seeing the hon. Member for five minutes, but he was so busy that I could not lay the matter before him. But to continue. There is a point at which you arrive when the cost of production exactly equals the value of the produce, and I think at that point we ought to receive encouragement in the hope of something better. The cost of removing a low grade ore is 5s. We will estimate that the ore contains 7s. 6d. worth of gold; the cost of obtaining that from the ore is 5s., making a total cost of 10s. Either we must lose the first 5s. or work the ore, in order to reduce the loss to 2s. 6d. instead of 10s., because the net product is 7s. 6d. But we have one who is known in Wales as Job Bowen, who in levying the royalty has not even got a pair of scales, and he does not understand troy weight. I believe he weighs the gold in an ironmonger's shop. He does not afford the Government the slightest protection, and if we were so disposed we might remove large quantities of gold from the Principality. So far back as last August I sent the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer a memorial signed by 73 Members of this House, asking him whether he would be good and kind enough to consider the question of accepting a fair proportion of the profits, instead of taking from us a sum regardless of whether we make a profit or loss. The right hon. Gentleman did not reply except by a private letter.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I directed a letter to be forwarded acknowledging the memorial and stating that I did not accept the allegations in it as proved. If the hon. Gentleman did not receive the letter I will make inquiry.

*MR. W. PRITCHARD MORGAN: It was acknowledged by a private letter to which I do not propose to refer, and it made a promise which has never been carried out. I was promised an interview if a certain event happened in this House. That event has long since passed, and I have had no interview. I want the right hon. Gentleman to remember that in no country but this are any restrictions placed upon the production of the precious metals. Many years before my advent in Wales, lead and copper ores were sent to Swansea where certain gentlemen, whose names are well known in this House, made enormous sums of money out of the gold they found in these ores. Will the right hon. Gentleman remember that, and will he also remember that the gold contained in the ore we are working to-day is of no value without expensive machinery to treat it in the immediate locality where it exists. The making of gold a marketable commodity is accomplished by a process subsequent to the obtaining of the ore. The right hon. Gentleman will probably say that the State is receiving a small amount, but I may say that the dividend which we have made on this particular property which we are working is £10,500.

MR. GOSCHEN: On what capital?

*MR. W. PRITCHARD MORGAN: On a capital of £210,000. The amount of money paid to the Government has been £1,707, and to the landowner by way of royalty £1,750; so that we have had to pay in royalty about 30 per cent. of the amount we have been able to pay in dividends. That is, of course, irrespective of the Income Tax. It may be said that we have over-capitalised the mine. [Mr. JACKSON: Hear, hear!] The right hon. Gentleman says "Hear, hear!" but I can state that so rich was the ore when the mine was placed upon the market that an offer of £50,000 was made to me for a fourth share. And the right hon. Gentleman has had before him a complete financial statement of the position of the mine, and he knows pretty well that at this moment I am £50,000 out of pocket by my connection with Welsh gold mining. But I have an ambition higher than mere "filthy lucre"; I have the desire to be the progenitor of a profitable industry in the Principality, and even though it is my fad, I will pursue it despite the jeers and sneers from the Treasury Bench. Now, the Woods and Forests Office, before my advent in Wales, had collected 11s. 9d. a year out of this industry. If they think there is no gold in Wales why do they insist on these exorbitant royalties? It is not long since they used to charge 1-10th; we got that reduced to 1-15th, and now it is 1-30th. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, a great financier, announced to the world that we require greater gold reserves in the banks of this country, and he told us that if we had not on a recent occasion got some money from France the result would have been disastrous. Now, we have produced half a ton of gold out of one small mine, which goes to show that we could increase the amount of gold in this country. The salaries and cost of the Office of Woods and Forests is something like 25 per cent. of the whole cost of administering Her Majesty's Woods and Forests. The solicitor, who has a handsome salary besides fees, charges £20 for a licence to search for gold. That is before you can search on your own land, you must pay £20. Besides, if you find gold, the Government do not merely take their proportion, but they require you to treat the ore for gold, and then pay the carriage of the gold to London, together with the insurance. I do think the time has arrived when the Chancellor of the Exchequer, so anxious, apparently, to increase the gold reserve in the banks in England, should encourage this industry and permit us to take out the gold from the mountains in Wales. Will it be believed that the Office of Woods and Forests act under a law passed in the reign of Elizabeth? Surely such an unsatisfactory state of things should be remedied.

THE CHAIRMAN: It is not within the cognisance of this Committee to discuss alterations of the law. The hon. Member must take the law and start from that basis.

*MR. W. PRITCHARD MORGAN. The condition of the law is such that a man having a lead mine is protected to the extent of £22 of gold, and if he has a copper mine, to the extent of £15 of gold.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is criticising the law. That is not within the province of the Committee. The hon. Member has power to criticise the acts of the Administration.

*MR. W. PRITCHARD MORGAN: I complain of the action of the Commissioners of Wood and Forests in not having interested themselves in this work, and I want the law to be altered so that this industry may be developed, and in order to do that, I wished to show the Committee the true condition of the Law. I say this, that the Woods and Forests Office, if they are desirous of developing the industry, are neglecting their duty by allowing the law to be in its present condition.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

*MR. W. PRITCHARD MORGAN: I will not pursue the point, but if the Commissioners of Woods and Forests allow things to remain in such a condition that they cannot collect the revenue, and the Government approve of their conduct, I have nothing more to say. Mr. Courtney, there are certain zinc mines in North Wales, and it has only lately been discovered that there is gold in this zinc, and the Commissioners of Woods and Forests are interfering. If gold is found in small quantities in antimony, manganese, or any other metal or mineral beside copper, tin, iron, or lead, the Crown can claim to be entitled to it, because it does not come within the exemption. In the one mine which is working under such great difficulties at the present time, there are 190 men at work. The Government have granted 447 licences, or leases. It is only fair to assume that, at any rate, a proportion of these 447 mines could have been at work. If 50 or 100 were at work a very much larger number of men would be employed. If the Government would take 100th instead of 1-30th, and if there were ten mines at work the Government would receive three or four times the amount of revenue which they obtain now. I cannot help thinking that the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, who have fisheries to look after in Scotland, who receive handsome salaries and expenses, are naturally, as I should be, perhaps, if I were in their positions, disinclined to add to the amount of their work. They do absolutely nothing to encourage the industry, and they will insist upon taking their proportion of our product without regard to our profit or loss. The Government have declined over and over again to take a proportion of our profit, yet nothing would be easier than for the revenue officers to levy such a tax on our profit as their consciences would allow. The Chancellor of the Exchequer wants a larger revenue of gold. Yet he keeps gold locked up in the mountains of Wales. Does he want the reserves for future generations? Will the right hon. Gentleman, if he has any desire to see this industry developed, issue a Treasury Minute that for five or seven years there shall be nothing more than a nominal charge upon gold and silver produced? At the end of that time, I promise the Chancellor of the Exchequer that a great number of mines would be opened in Wales, and that he will get a reasonable revenue from this industry? If the right hon. Gentleman will not do what I suggest, then I can assure him that it will be my duty to bring the matter before the House in a more formal manner, and I will probably take up time that might with the view of the Government have been more profitably employed.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item A, Salaries, be reduced by £100, part of the salary of the Chief Commissioner."—(Mr. Pritchard Morgan.)

*MR. F. T. BARRY (Windsor): The Government levy a royalty not upon gold, but upon the process which makes that gold marketable, I, myself, believe that if gold mining is to become profitable in this country, it will be necessary to carry it out on a large scale and with every possible economy. I fear that if the Government continue to levy a royalty on the gold produced, it will do much to stifle this industry in its infancy, whereas if they levy it on the profit which results from producing the gold, much will be done to encourage the industry, which would probably in the future afford employment to a vast number of people, and the Crown would receive their share should the mining prove successful. These are considerations which will, I think, be acceptable to the Chancellor of the Exchequer or to any right hon. Gentleman who succeeds him. There are several grounds that might be brought forward in favour of this proposal if this were the proper time for doing so. There is one certainly that might have some weight with the Government. At present there is a mining section of the London Chamber of Commerce being formed. When the Royal Commission make their report I ask the Government not to take any action upon it until the Members of this section have had an opportunity of expressing their views to the Government. I do not think it necessary for my hon. Friend to proceed to a Division.

(5.2.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): Everybody will have listened with interest to the remarks of the hon. Member who has just sat down, and who speaks with such authority on this question. I wish to support the appeal that has been made for the levying of a very moderate sum indeed—at all events, at the beginning—on these gold-mining undertakings. As a Member of the Commission of Woods and Forests I must say that there was no blame attaching to that Department, which has merely performed its duty. I believe that there is no other country in the world, however, where these rights over the precious metals exist. They do not exist in America or Australia. I was much struck with the fact mentioned by my hon. Friend that if copper or lead ore is brought into Swansea from abroad, and gold and silver is afterwards extracted from it, no royalty is charged, whilst gold extracted from Welsh ore has to pay a royalty. It may be said it is not a very heavy royalty, but at the same time these duties are a great discouragement to young enterprises. It is to the interest of every one to get gold, and especially in Wales, which is such a poor country, is it desirable to foster any such industry. I think the Commissioners of Woods and Forests are a little too technical and high in their charges for leases of this description. They very often insist upon doing by means of a deed costing £8 or £10, that which any gentleman on his own estate would do for half-a-crown on a stamped piece of paper. I would urge that the charges upon the mining of gold and silver might be revised in a liberal spirit. We all know that in poor countries, where the landlord has land out of cultivation, he will let it for next to nothing to any man who will reclaim it, and then, after a certain number of years, when a profit has been derived from the land he will take a rent which may be a fair rent to take under those circumstances. Surely some system of that kind might be devised with reference to mining in Wales. I am not sure that it would be possible to raise a duty on the profits, because it is extremely difficult to discover what are the profits of a mining concern, and a statement of profits would be open to every species of fraud. I would much rather let at a very low rent or royalty for a certain number of years, and then raise the royalty. I think that an industry of this kind should be relieved from every possible discouragement.

(5.8.) MR. JACKSON: With everything that has been said by the right hon. Gentleman who has just spoken as regards the desirability of encouraging and stimulating not only the industry of gold-seeking in Wales but industries generally we all agree. The Government are just as anxious as anybody can be to develop to the largest extent this industry on fair terms. I think, however, that I have a little reason to complain of the tone of the hon. Member for Glamorgan (Mr. Pritchard Morgan). I must say that, having listened very carefully, I came to the conclusion that whenever the hon. Member attempted to make out any case of maladministration against the Commissioners of Woods and Forests he failed altogether, being met with the difficulty that it was the duty of the Commissioners to administer the law as it stands. As far as I could make out, he made no complaint against the administration by the Commissioners of Woods and Forests of the law as it stands.

*MR. W. PRITCHARD MORGAN: I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon. The Commissioners of Woods and Forests have the power, subject to the approval of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to reduce the royalties to the lowest possible amount, but the royalties charged have amounted to 30 per cent. of the profits. I say the Commissioners have no right to insist on royalties which have practically taken from us one-third of the profits we make.

MR. JACKSON: Yes; I am aware the hon. Member said that, but I am not quite sure how he calculates his profits. I suppose he is making some allowance for interest on the large amount of capital employed.

*MR. W. PRITCHARD MORGAN: None whatever.

MR. JACKSON: It appears to me that there is a point below which a reduction of royalty would merely tend to swell the amount which the public has to pay for the mines with which the hon. Member is connected, and would not tend to increase the profits of the shareholders. It will be in the recollection of the hon. Member that there sat, for more than a year, a Commission to inquire into the administration of woods and forests. The hon. Member had every opportunity of laying his case before that Commission.

*MR. W. PRITCHARD MORGAN: I was not asked.

MR. JACKSON: The hon. Member knew that the Commission was sitting. The Government, aware of the importance of the question of mining royalties, appointed a Royal Commission to examine into the whole question. The hon. Member had the opportunity of giving his evidence before that Commission; and, as the matter under discussion is at this moment before the Commission, I think the hon. Member will agree that it would not be seemly on the part of the Government to make any changes before the Commission reports.

*MR. W. PRITCHARD MORGAN: The Commission has reference to mining royalties generally, and not particularly to those connected with gold and silver. That is a mere incident in their inquiry.

MR. JACKSON: The hon. Gentleman, at all events, gave very full evidence before the Commission on this very question. I think I have a right to complain that the hon. Member has hardly done justice to the Commissioners of Woods and Forests in their desire to make a scale such as would meet the requirements laid down by the right hon. Member for Derby. The result of their careful consideration of the matter has been communicated to the company with which the hon. Member's name is associated, and that result is represented by a scale of charges which no one would say is anything but extremely liberal. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby said it would be desirable in the first instance to charge a low royalty. I think the right hon. Gentleman will agree that that should be to some extent conditional upon the value of the material which is being got. If a mine is being worked on the low grade ores there should be a small royalty, so as not to hamper the industry to any unreasonable extent. The first part of the scale imposed by the Woods and Forests is as follows:—

"When the ore or veinstuff crushed or otherwise treated for the extract of gold and silver during any half-year of the term produces (on an average) per ton of ore or veinstuff not exceeding 5dwts. of gold and silver, a royalty of one one-hundredth part in value of the gold and silver obtained."

I contend that 1 per cent. of the profit is an extremely reasonable rate of royalty to charge. Indeed, I challenge the hon. Member himself to say whether it would unreasonably handicap or hamper this industry.

*MR. W. PRITCHARD MORGAN: I am prepared to say that if the Woods and Forests would accept 1 per cent. all round it would not be unreasonable. But when they insist upon taking 1 per cent. of the product and take from the mine what may be required to make good a loss, I say that is an unreasonable thing. If they said 1 per cent. all round that would be a proposal which I have made to the Government over and over again.

MR. JACKSON: The hon. Member does not quite meet the point, but I think I may take it that the hon. Member does not really deny that a royalty of 1 per cent. under the conditions I have mentioned is a reasonable thing.

VOL. CCCLV. [THIRD SERIES.]

*MR. W. PRITCHARD MORGAN: Most unreasonable, with the condition imposed.

MR. JACKSON: That certainly is very strange, because the hon. Member in his evidence before the Mining Royalties Commission expressed his opinion that 1 per cent. would not be an unreasonable royalty to charge. In fact, the hon. Member went further, and said he did not think the gold mining industry of Wales could carry more than a handicap of 2 per cent. on the gross product.

*MR. W. PRITCHARD MORGAN: The right hon. Gentleman must read the whole of that evidence in order to get my opinion. I said that the industry could not possibly be handicapped by more than 2 per cent., and I suggested that if the Government would not adopt the principle of having a portion of the profit, they should have 1 per cent. on private lands and should receive 2 per cent. on Crown lands.

MR. JACKSON: That opens up another question, as to the desirability of raising revenue on the profits. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby that it would be extremely difficult to fix upon a satisfactory scale or method of levying this royalty if it were to be done on profits. The hon. Member (Mr. Pritchard Morgan), when giving evidence before the Commission, was asked whether he thought a royalty on profits would be preferable to a royalty on products, and his answer was—

"I certainly think it would be if there were no difficulties in the way. I urged the Government to take the royalty in the profits, but I pointed out that difficulties would arise. I said that five or six unprincipled men having property which was valuable might change it into a limited company, and charge £5,000 or £6,000 in fees, and so absorb all the profits."

I hope I have shown the Committee that the Commissioners of Woods and Forests have endeavoured to meet the case in a fair manner. They have framed a scale which I think no one can say errs on the side of severity in the case of working low grade ore; and there is every disposition on the part of the Commissioners to do everything they can to develop this industry in Wales and in other parts of the country. I am speaking, of course, of the royalty to be charged on low grade ores.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Will the right hon. Gentleman say what the rest of the scale is.

MR. JACKSON: Yes; I ought perhaps to have read it before. It is as follows:—

"When the ore or veinstuff crushed or otherwise treated for the extraction of gold and silver during any half-year of the term produces (on an average) per ton of ore or veinstuff exceeding 5dwts. but not exceeding 7½dwts., a royalty of 1-75th part in value of the gold and silver obtained; exceeding 7½dwts. but not exceeding 10dwts., 1-50th; exceeding 10dwts. but not exceeding 15dwts., 1-35th; exceeding 15dwts. but not exceeding 20dwts., 1-25th; exceeding 20dwts. but not exceeding 30dwts., 1-20th; exceeding 30dwts. 1-15th."

I ought to say that the proposal was that these results should be taken upon the half year's work. I certainly thought this scale would have met the hon. Member's approbation. At all events, I think the Committee will agree that in view of the fact that the whole subject is at present before a Commission it would be premature on the part of the Government to announce any decision upon the subject. We await the Report of that Commission, which I feel sure will endeavour to stimulate this industry in every possible way.

(5.27.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): Some years ago I expressed the opinion that if the Government were to develop the gold industry in Wales they must cease to levy the royalty on the gross production. We have had three years' experience since, and the result is that we have only one gold mine working in Wales, although 400 or 500 licences to work have been granted. At that time the mine of my hon. Friend (Mr. Pritchard Morgan) was producing 5oz. of gold to the ton, but now I doubt whether they will get 5dwt. to the ton. In Wales there are great bodies of low grade ore with only occasional pouches of better ore. Very much the same state of things is to be found in Sutherlandshire, and my hon. Friend is fighting in Wales the battle which we are prepared to fight in Scotland. The cost of mining alone is so much. My hon. Friend does not mine; he tunnels in the hill, and he has a water mill for crushing, and under the circumstances it is possible for the Morgan Mine to pay on 5dwts., but only under such circumstances. Then we have heard of the overloaded Stock of this gold mine. £210,000 is the nominal capital, and what is the price per share to-day? Three shillings. So that for £35,000 you can buy the mine—less than the cost of erecting the crushing machinery. It is not a question of giving bloated capitalists high dividends. What I wish particularly to urge is that if the Government are anxious to develop the gold-mining industry in Wales and in other parts of the country two conditions are necessary: The first is that the royalty should be charged on the net results. We are told that it would be possible for unprincipled owners to absorb too large amounts in fees and salaries, but 99 out of 100 of these undertakings are Joint Stock Companies, because the capital required is so large, and the shareholders will see that their dividends are not prejudiced by the high fees drawn by their Directors. A royalty on the net results will permit the poorer lodes to be worked. After three years of inquiry and discussion the Government are still going on charging royalties on the gross. A royalty of 1 per cent. upon 5dwts. of gold and silver per ton of ore or veinstuff is preposterous. With a 15ft. lode mining 3dwts. to the ton, the cost of milling would not allow of the working. Here and there you come upon a richer lode, and, by combining the two, milling is possible. But into the technical part of the question I do not wish to enter. Our position is simply this—we hold that if the royalty is charged upon the gross production it hinders and prevents the development of the industry, as has been proved by experience. The second point to which I wish to refer is the fact of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests granting licences—upwards of 400 have been granted—without laying down any conditions whatever as to working. The Commissioners ought to lay down the condition, as is done in the colonies and in every gold-producing country, that a certain amount of work must be done or the licence will be forfeited. I do not wish to take up time, but I could point out how the application of similar prejudicial conditions to those we now object to almost crushed the gold-mining industry in the Transvaal during the time that country was under the control of the Colonial Office, whereas under present and more reasonable conditions the mines have since greatly flourished. I am confident that if in this case the Government would be content with a reasonable royalty on the net results the industry would rapidly develop in Wales and other parts of Great Britain, and add very largely to gold production.

(5.37.) MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon, &c.): I do not think the right hon. Gentleman has given a sufficient answer to the claim of my hon. Friend. The scale, which might be fair as applied to one set of circumstances, would not be so in another set of circumstances.

MR. JACKSON: It is based on the particular circumstances of this mine.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: Well, I must accept the statement of my hon. Friend, for the simple reason that he knows the mine very well, having had charge of it for six or seven years. It is no question of overstocked capital, and we find a third of the profits going in royalties. The principle upon which the royalties are charged has not, I think, been adequately considered by the Commissioners of Woods and Forests. When a mine is situated in the heart of the mountains, 10 or 15 miles distant from railway communication, there is an increased cost in carrying on operations, beginning with the cost of conveying and erecting machinery, and this I do not think has been adequately considered. Then, also, I find that local agents are consulted in the imposition of these rates, getting a percentage on the royalties charged. I do not know whether this applies to this particular mine, and I do not suggest any sort of corrupt motive; but if a man has a pecuniary interest in the royalty on a mine being high or low, necessarily this will influence him. The system is a bad one, and I believe that as long as the local agents have a direct personal interest in the royalties charged we shall never have a fair or reasonable system established.

MR. NORRIS (Tower Hamlets, Limehouse): I only wish to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will agree to leave the matter open until the minerals section of the London Chamber of Commerce, which is about to be appointed, can place their views before him?

(5.41.) MR. GOSCHEN: I would prefer that the minerals section of the London Chamber of Commerce should put their views before the Royal Commission now sitting. I cannot, of course, say that the views they express before the Commission will be carried into effect, but their views would be embodied in the Report of the Commission, and I can promise, at all events, that the recommendations that are made upon them shall be attended to without delay. I would remind hon. Members on both sides that in regard to this question the Government are only waiting for the Report of the Royal Commission to decide on what course to take, and it would be premature, if not unseemly, for us to give any pledge at the present time as to taking any particular course of action before considering the Report and evidence to which so much attention is given.

*MR. W. PRITCHARD MORGAN: But the Royal Commission may sit two or three years longer yet, and what is to be done in the meantime? Unless I get a satisfactory assurance that the Government will take some action at once, I must press the matter to a Division. The scale which has been proposed by the right hon. Gentleman is an absurdity, and I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer, having already had so many statements and facts laid before him, would do well to adopt the suggestion that the Government should charge a mere nominal royalty for the next four or five years—or even three years, so that a chance may be given to push forward this as yet undeveloped and untried industry. If the right hon. Gentleman will agree that for three years a nominal royalty shall be imposed I will at once withdraw my Motion.

(5.55.) MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: There is another matter in relation to the administration of the Department in Wales to which I wish to draw attention. The Crown lands in Wales extend over 273,939 acres rich in mineral wealth, and in the administration of this property the people are deeply interested. I have to call attention to what I must condemn as the bad administration of the Office of Woods and Forests in connection with the Gwylwyr Sett Quarry in North Wales. The quarry, which used to employ some 200 or 300 men and was a valuable industry to the locality, has been closed by the lessee, and the general belief is that he has simply desired to obtain possession of the quarry, not to work it, but to prevent its being worked by anybody else in competition with another quarry on the other side of the mountain in which the lessee is interested. I have asked the Secretary to the Treasury many questions in reference to this subject, and I urged, as I wish to urge now, that there should be a clause in these leases requiring the lessee to work a quarry. I wrote a letter to the right hon. Gentleman giving him my reasons for this, and the receipt of that letter he acknowledged, and I also told the right hon. Gentleman that there were neighbouring owners quite prepared to undertake the working of the quarry. The right hon. Gentleman told me, in one of the answers he gave, that it was usual to insert in these leases a proviso that a minimum number of men should be employed in the quarry, and that if they were not employed the Crown should resume possession. He did not say, however, what the minimum was. This quarry had been keeping 200 men in constant employment, and I think Mr. Parry ought to have been compelled to keep at work a number of men proportionate to the size of the quarry. The right hon. Gentleman assured me that a provision would be inserted in the lease for the purpose of compelling the lessee to work the quarry. It is certainly rather remarkable that the lessee of the quarry was a Unionist candidate for this particular locality at the last election. I think it is most important that the properties which are in the hands of the Crown in Wales to the extent of 210,000 acres should be conducted for the benefit of the people of the locality. The right hon. Gentleman said that a minimum number of men should be employed. I am informed that Mr. Parry keeps four men at work in a quarry where 200 men were formerly employed. The right hon. Gentleman will no doubt say that if the quarry is not worked it will be a loss to the lessee; but it is really to the advantage of Mr. Parry to pay a rent of £200 a year merely to prevent anyone else working the quarry and competing with his other quarry. He might lose £10,000 a year by having it worked by someone else. Unless the right hon. Gentleman can present the case in a different aspect from that in which it now appears to me, I must press the matter to a Division. I beg to move the reduction of the Vote by £300.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item A, Salaries, be reduced by £300, part of the Salary of the Chief Commissioner."—(Mr. Lloyd-George.)

*(6.7.) MR. W. PRITCHARD MORGAN: The case to which my hon. Friend refers is one of which I have some little knowledge. It appears that this quarry is to be shut up because a gentleman on the other side of the mountain has a quarry of his own with the trade of which he does not want to have any interference. The idea of employing only two men in a quarry is too monstrously absurd to need any comment. It must be evident that it was the intention of the Office of Woods and Forests to shut up this quarry and keep it from working. This is in keeping with the whole conduct of the Department. I have in my hand some most amusing correspondence in the shape of a letter from an Under Sheriff to the Office of Woods and Forests. He writes acknowledging the receipt of two warrants of execution for Crown rents, amounting to 2s. 2d. each, and he says—

"I do not see that I can seize, as the warrants are addressed to no one. No name has been filled in after the word 'To' at the top of the warrants."

The letter is dated the 10th of March, 1891, and there is the following postscript:—

"Your warrants are dated the 19th of February, 1890. Is this correct? The present Sheriff was not in office at that time. Does this matter?"

The fact is, that the whole administration of the office is of the most disgraceful character, and is quite in keeping with the manner in which the Commissioners have treated the gold industry. They have not been near us to look after the interests of the Crown. The Commissioners get the same amount of money, whether they do much or little, and the interests of the Crown and of the public are totally disregarded by them.

(6.12.) MR. JACKSON: The hon. Member has fairly stated what has taken place with regard to these quarries, and I do not think I can add very much to what he has said. I understand that the fact of the quarry not being worked is owing, not to any desire not to work it, but to the condition of trade. This is only one quarry out of six or seven in the district equally well situated that are not being worked at present. The Woods and Forests Department accepted the best tenant they could get and on the best terms.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: The right hon. Gentleman states that there are half a dozen other quarries equally well situated that are not open at this moment. He wrote me a letter stating that he would be glad to have one of them worked by the people of the locality. I am very much obliged to him for his letter, but I may say that when I looked into the matter I found it was a quarry which had never produced good setts. It is half a mile further from the sea than one with which it would have to compete, and this would involve the construction of half a mile more of railway. I sent the right hon. Gentleman's letter down to the district, and was told that it would be impossible to compete for a moment with the other quarry. With regard to the quarry with which I have been dealing, I say the Department ought to have handed it over on the express condition that the lessee must work it. There was no reason whatever for handing it over to Mr. Parry, unless it was the desire to indulge in a bit of favouritism. I am afraid the matter cannot be remedied now. I can only ask the Woods and Forests Commissioners to enforce such conditions as there are in the lease, although those conditions are really not worth the paper they are written on. I cannot help thinking that the right hon. Gentleman is of the same impression as myself, namely, that the Woods and Forests Commissioners have not acted properly in this matter.

*(6.20.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): I do not know this particular quarry, but I know enough of slate quarries in general in Wales to know that the "condition of the trade" is a very common excuse for gentlemen in the position of Mr. Parry not working their quarries at all. It is with a view to meet cases of this kind that it is usual to insert in leases of quarries a covenant requiring the employment of a certain number of men. I should like the right hon. Gentleman to tell me what the number of men employed in this quarry is. If there are, as I hear, four, it is a mere colourable working. We perfectly understand the meaning of this dog-in-the-manger policy. It is adopted simply for the purpose of staving off competition. If the Amendment be pressed to a Division, I shall certainly vote for it.

MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS (Glamorgan, S.): I do not know anything about the merits of this particular case, and, therefore, I cannot form any better judgment upon it than those Members who have taken the trouble to listen to my hon. Friend, but it is quite certain, from what my hon. Friend has said, that in dealing with the Crown lands in the Principality a good deal of natural dissatisfaction has arisen. Crown property in Wales is of a very peculiar character. I am a Member of a Select Committee which during the last two Sessions has been considering the question of Crown property. The case my hon. Friend has brought forward only confirms the view I formed and ventured to express when the Committee were considering their Report, namely, that a Central Department cannot possibly deal with property of this kind so satisfactorily as it can be dealt with locally. I am not for a moment suggesting that the central administration of the Commissioners is not, under the circumstances, as good as could be expected. I think the result of our careful inquiries conclusively proves that the property of the public is administered by the Commissioners efficiently and economically and, under the circumstances, as well as could be expected—better and more cheaply, in fact, than ordinary great estates are managed. I wish to add also that the administration is honest. The Crown property in Wales consists of 84,000 acres of waste land. The Crown has all the manorial rights over that land, and, of course, owns the minerals under it. It also owns the mines under 189,000 acres of waste land, of which it had formerly the manorial rights. What has become of the surface ownership? Somehow or other there does not seem to have remained any part of the surface which belongs to the Crown. The total receipts of this enormous tract of country are only £14,000 a year. It is clear from the evidence given before the Committee that there exists in Wales a deep-seated feeling that the administration of this great area of land ought to be in the hands of the representatives of the people in Wales itself. I suggested to the Committee that it was in every way desirable that the Crown lands should be locally managed by the County Councils, and the proceeds applied for the benefit of the people. That seems to me to be a conclusion to which we are also irresistibly drawn by this discussion.

*(6.28.) MR. SAMUELSON (Gloucester, Forest of Dean): I wish to ask what are the intentions of the Government with regard to carrying out the recommendations of the Committee on Woods and Forests? That is a matter in which my constituents are very much interested. One of the points on which the Committee made a recommendation related to the contribution by the Office of Woods and Forests to religious and educational purposes. At present they are only allowed to give to Church of England schools. Another recommendation was as to the enclosure of land for public purposes, such as gardens and allotments. The other principal point relates to the amalgamation of gales in Dean Forest; and the avoidance in cases of amalgamation of way-leaves and tolls.

MR. JACKSON: I may inform the hon. Member that it is the intention of the Government to give effect to the recommendation of the Committee to which he has referred, and steps would have been taken to do so this year if time could have been found for the introduction of the Bill. I rather think that the legislation required was of that kind which appertains to Private Bill legislation, and therefore notice would have had to be given before the Bill was lodged. In order to comply with those requirements the matter has necessarily been postponed; but I hope it will be possible to give the requisite notice so as to bring on the Bill next Session.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I desire briefly to call attention to a matter in connection with this subject. It is well known that the Commissioners of Woods and Forests are the owners of a large property, of which the ground rents alone amount to upwards of £237,000. The Committee to which reference has been made recommended in their Report that the management of certain property appeared to be in the hands of Mr. A. Tate, and they added that they were of opinion that one of the Commissioners should take a more active part in the management of the property. The question I desire to ask is, whether anything has been done to give effect to that recommendation; and, if so, who is the Commissioner to whom that duty has been assigned?

MR. JACKSON was inaudible in the Gallery.

(6.37.) The Committee divided:—
Ayes 89; Noes 136.—(Div. List, No. 361.)

Original Question again proposed.

(6.47.) MR. LLOYD - GEORGE: I should like to call the attention of the Committee to the administration of the Woods and Forests Department in regard to the slate quarries in North Wales, and the extortionate charges that are made in the shape of royalties in those quarries. I am informed by competent judges that there is a large amount of undeveloped property of this kind in North Wales that would otherwise be worked if it were not that the industry is so crippled by those exorbitant charges. I am assured by quarry proprietors in this slate district that not one of them has been enabled to make more than 2 per cent. profit during the last 10 years; in fact, some of them have not made a single penny profit during the whole of the time they have been working in the quarries. They have repeatedly made representations to the Commissioners of Woods and Forests with a view of securing the reduction of those royalties, and in consequence some slight reductions have been made, but they have been so slight that they have not been enough to enable the proprietors to work the quarries properly. I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman before I move the reduction of the Vote whether he does not think the complaints made by the quarry proprietors are well founded?

MR. JACKSON: This is the first time I have heard of the complaint made by the hon. Member, and I shall be very glad if he will lay before me the necessary facts, in order that I may inquire into the matter. With regard to the fixing of the rents, I would remind the hon. Member that the Commissioners of Woods and Forests are advised by experts, and there is a universal approval of the competency and fitness of Mr. Foster-Browne, who has succeeded to the post of adviser.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I do not deny the fitness of Mr. Forster-Browne, to advise in connection with matters relating to collieries, but I doubt whether he has had the necessary practical experience to qualify him as an adviser on matters relating to slate quarries.

*(6.50.) MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): Before the Vote is taken, may I ask what are the hours of the clerks in the Office of Woods and Forests?

*MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I would also ask the right hon. Gentleman another question, namely, whether the Solicitor to the Department, who receives a salary of £1,500 a year, gives the whole of his time to the work of the office?

MR. JACKSON: In reply to the hon. Member for Shoreditch, I believe the junior clerks in the office of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests are employed for six hours in the day.

*MR. CREMER: Does that include the time for refreshment?

MR. JACKSON: I suppose they take refreshment. But, at any rate, their hours of attendance are what I have already stated. The Solicitor gives the whole of his time to the office, and nothing is paid to him for allowances for the clerks except in the case of money actually expended. In reply to the hon. Member for Carnarvon, I should not like to say that I had so little confidence in Mr. Foster-Browne that I should prefer to take the opinion of someone else, but I will undertake to give consideration to the matter brought under my notice by the hon. Member.

DR. CLARK: I wish to call the right hon. Gentleman's attention to a grievance existing in the western part of my county. That grievance is that a large number of farms are held by one person, and the result is that there is a great deal of agricultural sweating going on. We should like the representatives of the Crown to consider this question when the existing leases expire.

Question put, and agreed to.

2. £35,174, to complete the sum for the Works and Public Buildings Office.

(6.55.) MR. CREMER: I wish on this Vote to call attention to the item for the Superintendent of Furniture. The right hon. Gentleman last year or the year before that informed us that the contract would be thrown open to such firms as might desire to tender for the supply of furniture for the Government Offices. Up to the time we began to heckle the right hon. Gentleman on the subject some two or three persons appeared to have had a monopoly in supplying this furniture, and there seemed to be a very comfortable arrangement among the furniture dealers with regard to this subject; but the right hon. Gentleman, in that spirit of fairness and honesty which always characterises his conduct in this House, assured us that he would do his best to have that contract thrown open. The workmen in the trade were, however, unable to obtain a list of the firms supplying furniture, and they asked me to obtain the particulars. I applied at the office, and a promise was made to supply the conditions, but so far they have never reached me or the workmen. I should be glad to know from the right hon. Gentleman the reason why. I should also like to know, too, what are the duties performed by the Superintendent of Contracts for Coals? I drew attention to this item some years ago, when the salary of the official was only £200; it is now £350. It seems to me a very extravagant sum, and one, therefore, which calls for explanation. The Superintendent of Contracts for Candles and Oil gets a salary of £250 a year. What does he do for that? I may perhaps be permitted to conclude by asking the right hon. Gentleman for information as to the hours worked by the clerks in the Works Office.

(7.3.) THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, Dublin University): In the Office of Works the employés are engaged for seven hours a day, and they get their refreshments in the office. The Superintendent of Coals, &c., has to take into consideration contracts to the amount of from £28,000 to £30,000 a year. He also has to inspect the quality of the articles received, and to see that we get value for our money. He is a very hard-worked official indeed. He is not so much a superintendent as an adviser of the Board, and his title, therefore, is rather misleading. The other official to whom allusion has been made has his time fully employed, and, no doubt, he has saved the country a large amount of money, both with regard to making contracts and seeing that they are properly carried out. With regard to what the hon. Member has said as to the furniture, I will look into the matter without delay.

*(7.7.) MR. MORTON: I am glad to find that in the right hon. Gentleman's Department there is no Purveyor of Luncheons. I suppose the Department is not quite aristocratic enough for that. I wish, however to call attention to the management of Epping Forest. I find that by the Act of 1878 the name of the First Commissioner of Works is mentioned in connection with the bye-laws, and it no doubt has been inserted in the Act with a view to protecting the rights of the people of London. The bye-laws are to be under his supervision, and are not legal without his consent. Now, one bye-law which is being enforced has not been approved by him.

MR. PLUNKET: I may save the time of the Committee if I tell the hon. Member that I have nothing to do with this matter. Under the Act power is given to the Conservators to make bye-laws, and I admit that they have no force unless allowed by the Ranger on the advice of the Office of Works countersigned by the First Commissioner of Works. But the regulation to which the hon. Member refers is not a bye-law.

*MR. MORTON: I desire to point out that one bye-law now being enforced has not been approved by the First Commissioner, and, that being so, I contend that the right hon. Gentleman should take steps to stop its enforcement and to end the proceedings which have been instituted against a number of poor people. When I put a question on the subject to the right hon. Gentleman he suggested that I should take legal advice. I have done so. I have consulted the highest legal authority—the Attorney General. He says he cannot assist me. Now, I say it is the duty of the First Commissioner to interfere in this matter. It is one of the things for which he gets his salary, and I shall propose a reduction of his salary if he refuses to protect the rights of the people of London against the enforcement of an illegal bye-law.

MR. PLUNKET: It is not a bye-law at all. I cannot get that into the hon. Member's head.

*MR. MORTON: I say it is a most important bye-law that has ever been made. I have here a list of the bye-laws sanctioned by the right hon. Gentleman and his predecessor, and it does not appear among them. Here are bye-laws about donkeys, and so on, but this is a question of common rights, and one which affects about half the voters. I hope small commoners will not continue to be interfered with by the enforcement of an illegal bye-law.

MR. PLUNKET: I rise to a point of order. I have already explained to the hon. Member that my office has nothing to do with this subject. There is no bye-law affecting it.

*MR. MORTON: I wish the right hon. Gentleman to give the Conservators notice that they have no business to enforce this illegal bye-law.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

*MR. MORTON: The right hon. Gentleman is not only generally courteous, but he is always fair, and I am sure he wishes to do the best he can for the people. I therefore trust he will interfere, and—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

*MR. MORTON: I will not press the subject further, but there is another matter to which I wish to draw attention. I hope that something will be done to improve the condition of the fountains in Trafalgar Square. The right hon. Gentleman the other day, in answer to a question, said the fountains were cleaned out once in three months. These complaints as to the condition of the water have been raised for years, and it surely is now time that something was done to do away permanently with what is undoubtedly a nuisance to the neighbourhood. I am told that the water is pumped up from a well in close proximity to old St. Martin's Churchyard, and that, consequently, its purity is very doubtful. I am also informed that it is pumped into a tank and used over and over again for three months until it becomes very much like thick soup. I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the water could not be obtained as cheaply from the Water Companies, so as to discontinue using water from a well near an old churchyard, and also whether he will give orders for the fountains to be more frequently cleaned out during the summer months than at present?

(7.17.) MR. PLUNKET: It is quite true that the water is supplied to the fountains from a well at the back of the National Gallery. It is excellent water, superior even to that of the companies, though that is good, and it is also supplied to some of the public offices—among them mine, and I myself drink it. It is true that the water from the fountains occasionally goes back, but that is not done so often as to render it unfit for use. Of course, the water at the fountains is not fit for drinking, and that is not the purpose for which it is used. As to the more frequent renewal of the water, and cleaning out the fountains oftener than at present during the summer months, I will look into the matter and see whether the suggestion of the hon. Member cannot be carried out.

MR. NORRIS (Tower Hamlets, Limehouse): With regard to the assistant surveyors of the first and second class I should like to know whether under any circumstances they get anything beyond their salaries. Are they allowed to receive fees?

MR. PLUNKET: No, Sir.

DR. CLARK: I see you have reduced the number of surveyors from 28 to 22, and yet the charge for the 22 is larger than that for the 28 last year. How is that to be explained?

MR. PLUNKET: I have not the particulars here. I will inquire into the matter and let the hon. Member know.

(7.22.) MR. PICKERSGILL: I wish to raise a question as to a certain number of labourers, for the treatment of whom the right hon. Gentleman is responsible. A little while ago I pointed out that the wages paid to certain labourers were less than those paid for similar labour by other employers in the same locality, and the right hon. Gentleman then told me that, in instituting a comparison, I ought to take into account the fact that the men had certain pension rights which, presumably, men in other employments did not possess. My object in rising is to point out that the statement with regard to pensions is almost, if not entirely, illusory. I have been supplied with a number of cases which, I think, will substantiate that assertion.

MR. PLUNKET: Will the hon. Member tell me what particular class of labour he is alluding to?

MR. PICKERSGILL: Yes, the labourers in Kew and Hampton Court Gardens. A working foreman named Hollands was discharged after 33 years service and received no pension. Joseph Jacobs, after working in Kew Gardens for 25 years, was discharged as being worn out. This man is now 72 years of age; he has been in the public service for 40 years, having been in the Police Force before being engaged by the Office of Works; and I am informed that he is absolutely starving. Surely a pension ought to have been granted in a case like that. A third man laboured in Kew Gardens for 15 years, and was personally incapacitated by being jammed by some machinery in the gardens. He has received a gratuity of £15, and a sum of £16 odd in respect of his injury. He is totally disabled for work and has nothing to live upon. My next case is that of a labourer who served 18 years, and had one of his eyes knocked out while in the performance of his duty. Yet this man, who is believed to be entitled to a pension for life, has received only a gratuity of £14. Again, there is the case of a woman who worked in Kew Gardens for 25 years. She became blind, was discharged, and is now in a state verging on starvation. My last case is that of a labourer who served for 23 years and then became dumb and paralysed. He, too, was discharged without either pension or gratuity. This man never received more than 10s. per week. Either these persons are entitled to a pension or they are not. If they are, then there is reason to complain that the right hon. Gentleman has not adequately investigated the circumstances; and if they are not, then there is very little in the argument which the right hon. Gentleman put before the House with a view to showing that the conditions of service under the Board of Works are better than those of outside employment.

MR. PLUNKET: Some of these cases have been mentioned for the first time to-day, and I have not, therefore, had an opportunity of acquainting myself with the details. But in reply to the general argument of the hon. Member, I may say that some of the labourers employed are entitled to pension and others not, and the very fact that some persons in the cases alluded to by the hon. Member have received gratuities, proves that they are not entitled to pension.

(7.30.) MR. PICKERSGILL: I am obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for courteously promising to make enquires into the cases I have mentioned; but I desire to call particular attention to the actual language he used, as reported in Hansard. I had called attention to the difference between the rate of wages paid to the labourers employed in Kew Gardens and similar labourers employed in the neighbourhood, and the right hon. Gentleman replied—

“Having regard to the exceptional advantages which labourers in Kew Gardens enjoy in many ways as regards sick pay, attendance of medical officer gratis, pension, and other matters, so far from being illused, or badly paid, they receive wages really above the average given to others in the neighbourhood.” Upon that I wish to ask whether there are any labourers in Kew Gardens who are entitled to pension, and if so, what work do they do, and after how many years' service do they become entitled to pension?

MR. PLUNKET: I think there must have been some slip on the part of the reporter. As far as my recollection serves me— [The explanation was inaudible in the Gallery.]

MR. PICKERSGILL: I should like to point out that the Hansard Report is headed with an asterisk, which is usually understood to indicate that the Member has revised the Report.

MR. PLUNKET: I regret I had not observed that.

Mr. Pickersgill

MR. PICKERSGILL: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for his promise. Would he desire me to hand him a list of these cases?

MR. PLUNKET: I should be extremely obliged to the hon. Gentleman.

*(7.35.) MR. MORTON: I have to ask the right hon. Gentleman a question relating to a matter of account. The question really arises on all the Votes. We have here shown what are the minimum and maximum salaries in the Department, but I see that in many cases the maximum salaries are exceeded in the shape of “personal allowance.” Two chief clerks get £100 more than the maximum. Is there any favouritism in the “personal allowance,” or is it a way of getting over the fixed maximum salary?

MR. PLUNKET: I notice that in almost every speech in Supply the hon. Member makes some charge of want of straightforwardness, some want of honesty in the Public Departments. The tone of the hon. Member is such that I am not sure he ought to have any answer at all, but I will explain at once that the maximum is only exceeded when changes are made in the office, and public servants are asked to undertake new work which is not originally a part of their bargain. In such cases it is only fair that additional personal allowance should be given. But in every case in which a personal allowance is given it is carefully scrutinised beforehand by the Treasury. In the case of the two clerks referred to, let me say that formerly there were three principal clerks. Great economy was effected by reducing the number to two. It was felt to be only reasonable to give each of the two an additional allowance.

*MR. MORTON: I never intended to make any charge against anybody, and least of all against the right hon. Gentleman, but I must say it is a shocking system that the maximum salaries are so often exceeded, especially when the clerks are already well paid.

Vote agreed to.

3. Motion made, and Question proposed,

*(7.40.) MR. MORTON: I do not propose to move a reduction of this Vote, because I object to the Vote as a whole. We were told the other day that there is £300 now put on the Accounts for the management of a portion of this fund. I wish to know whether any one else in any other Department receives anything for the management of the fund. Surely the charges for management might very properly appear in the Votes for the respective Departments. We are told that a great deal of the money is used in secret service payments on the Continent, that it is used for the purpose of getting information that cannot be obtained in any other way. That means bribing and corrupting public servants in other countries. Not only is it an inducement to those servants to act illegally and immorally, but it is also an inducement to Foreign Governments to do exactly the same thing in regard to the Public Departments in this country. I have never yet heard that information got in this way is at all necessary for this country, or even for the integrity of the British Empire. I cannot understand why a Christian country like this, with an Established Church, Bishops, and all the rest of it, cannot get on without doing what we admit to be wrong—corrupting public servants in other countries—and therefore I shall take a Vote against this Secret Service Fund altogether.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): It is evident the hon. Member for Peterborough has a great deal more information on this subject than myself. I do not know where he gets his information about the corrupting of public servants abroad, but I presume he has such information; perhaps it would be desirable he should produce it. I am one of those who never have opposed the Secret Service Vote. I think it is necessary there should be a certain amount of Secret Service money at the disposal of the Government. No doubt there is a great deal spent under this Vote which might as well be brought upon the Estimates, because it is not spent in Secret Service in the true sense. There ought to be an assurance given that there will be nothing of this kind in future.

(7.45.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I am not astonished at the remarks of the right hon. Member for Kirkcaldy, but I do not think there is any one on the Government Bench at the present moment who has anything to do with Secret Service. It is only the principal Secretaries of State who can give any assurance on the subject, and none of them are on the Government Bench at the present time. I believe neither the Prime Minister nor the Chancellor of the Exchequer knows anything about the spending of the Secret Service money. There ought to be someone responsible for the whole of the Secret Service money. I believe the Treasury is bound to give an Order whenever requested by a Secretary of State. I do not see how a country can get on without the expenditure of some Secret Service money, but at present there is no satisfactory assurance that the money is properly spent. I think there ought to be a Committee of the House appointed to inquire into the matter.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: My impression is that the Treasury do assume the responsibility.

MR. JACKSON: I should like to throw light on the subject, but I am not able to do so. The Public Accounts Committee, about three years ago, recommended that a declaration should be made by each Secretary of State on the subject, and a form of declaration was agreed to and submitted to the Controller and Auditor General, who accepted it as sufficient.

COLONEL NOLAN: I do not for a moment say that the Secretaries of State are not as fit as anybody else to make the declaration, but still I do not think the system is a very satisfactory one. I should like to know whether the Secretary of the Treasury possesses any knowledge of the items.

MR. JACKSON: No, I do not.

*MR. MORTON: We were told that £300 was given to a gentleman in the Foreign Office for managing that portion of the fund spent by the Foreign Office. Does any other gentleman get money for the management of this fund?

MR. JACKSON: I cannot give any details, because I do not possess any knowledge of them.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: A uniform sum is taken each year. How much of this is spent?

MR. JACKSON: I have a Return for the last three years, from which it appears that there was surrendered to the Exchequer in 1887-88, £20,535 15s. 11d.; in 1888-89, £10,896 15s. 8d.; and in 1889-90, £6,178 12s. Of course in the last year the total sum taken was £35,000, and in the first year I have cited £50,000.

*MR. MORTON: I am sorry we have not been able to get any satisfactory answer from the right hon. Gentleman as to how the money is spent. I take it for granted that what I say as to the money being used in bribing and corrupting public officials in foreign countries is correct, and therefore I shall divide the Committee against the Vote in its entirety.

(7.50.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I think the Chief Secretary for Ireland will acknowledge that the time has come when a question may fairly be addressed to him as to the expenditure of secret service money in Ireland. I admit there are times when a Minister is prevented from giving any explicit information as to the use of secret service money; but according to the avowal of the right hon. Gentleman in a recent speech, the present condition of Ireland is such that it is scarcely conceivable it is necessary to apply any secret service money to that country. Last month, by proclamation in the Dublin Gazette, the right hon. Gentleman withdrew the operation of the Coercion Act from a considerable part of Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman, in fact, confessed, by his own official act, that there is no longer in Ireland either criminal conspiracy or any resort to violence and intimidation, and an examination of the criminal Returns will show that the offences involved in the sending of threatening letters and other forms of intimidation have almost disappeared. Again, it will be admitted that in Ireland there is no grave crime as it is ordinarily understood, and in such circumstances I think I am entitled to ask whether any of the £35,000 is set apart in the present year for secret service in Ireland, and, if so, what is the amount?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It would not be in accordance with usage to give particulars as to the expenditure of the £35,000. I may say, however, that a sum is allocated to Irish purposes, and is placed in the charge of the Irish Secretary, just as the sum allocated to England is placed in the charge of the Home Secretary. Though the condition of Ireland does not call for the expenditure of the money, I do not think it would be right to make any alteration in the amount of money which for many years past has been allocated to Ireland.

MR. SEXTON: I quite admit that, considering the magnitude of the British Empire, the sum is not large; but Ireland is only 1-300th part of the British Empire; and what I should like to know is whether Ireland receives more than her fair share—1-300th part of the whole. It is upon the public declaration of the right hon. Gentleman that Ireland is in a thoroughly satisfactory condition that I put the question. I cannot stand here and assent to the principle that in the present state of Ireland the information I seek should be refused, and, therefore, I beg to move the reduction of the Vote by £5,000.

Motion made, and Question put, "That a sum, not exceeding £14,000, be granted for the said Service."—(Mr. Sexton.)

(8.0.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 34; Noes 90.—(Div. List, No. 362.)

Original Question again proposed.

*(8.6.) MR. MORTON: The Chancellor of the Exchequer has now returned to the House, and as he, no doubt, has something to do with the administration of this fund, perhaps I may apply to him for some information as to the purposes for which this money is used. Can the right hon. Gentleman tell us whether any of it is used towards providing those rewards sometimes offered for the capture, dead or alive, of so-called rebels; in short, can he give us any information at all about the fund?

MR. GOSCHEN: This Vote is for the Secret Service Fund, and, that being so, I am afraid I cannot gratify the hon. Member's curiosity.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): May I suggest that £500 of it might be used to pay off the Duke of Fife's debt to the Department of Woods and Forests.

(8.10.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 88; Noes 33.—(Div. List, No. 363.)

Motion made, and Question proposed,

(8.15.) MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire) : I rise to move the reduction of the Vote for the salary of the Secretary for Scotland by the sum of £500. In taking this course, I desire at the outset to disavow any intention of making a personal attack upon the Secretary for Scotland or the right hon. and learned Gentleman who so ably acts as the representative of the Scotch Office in this House. I most gladly recognise in Lord Lothian's administration of Scotch affairs that keen sense of nationality we Scotchmen feel so strongly. He is one of the first to repudiate that abominable heresy that Scotland is merely an appendage to England, to be regarded in the light of a county, and that not a very large or important one. With regard to the Scotch Office also, I entirely recognise the endeavour to assert Scottish interests, and I am sure if they had a free hand we should have a much better result in Scotch legislation than this Parliament can show. It is a different matter, however, when I come to consider the way in which Scotch affairs have been treated by her Majesty's Government. By introducing certain measures this Session relating to Scotland her Majesty's Government have admitted that some legislation for that country is necessary, and yet, notwithstanding that fact, they have not persevered with those measures, but having taken them a certain distance have withdrawn them. This I know is an old, a longstanding grievance, but I do not think it ever assumed such proportions as during the present Parliament. Let me recall what has been done for Scotland in recent Sessions. I do not allude to small measures passed sub silentio, I refer to really important legislation. In the sessions of 1887 and 1888 we had nothing, and during these two Sessions we were soothed by the promise that 1889 should be a Scotch Session. Well, 1889 came, and what was the Scottish result of the Session? We got a Local Government Bill for Scotland. But that Local Government Bill was not given to us out of any particular desire to give Scotland Local Government, but because in the previous year improved Local Government had been given to England of which the Act of 1889 was the natural complement. It will be said, "But in your Local Government Act you got something England did not get, you managed to squeeze into the measure a provision which practically gave free education to Scotland." Yes, but we owe no thanks for that to Her Majesty's Government. How did they receive the proposal? Why, exactly in the same spirit as was evinced in the speech of the Duke of Argyll in another place yesterday, and no less than 56 Members of the Tory Party voted against Scotland having what she wished for in this matter. I would rather take the description of the manner in which Scotland got free education from the words of the First Lord of the Admiralty. The noble Lord said, speaking two or three weeks ago—

"If there is one part of the community where self-reliance is strongly developed, where a national system of primary education is supreme, and where the general population are in a higher condition of comfort than elsewhere, it is in Scotland. Yet in that country the Members of Parliament on both sides of the House positively extorted from the Government at the point of the bayonet a free education scheme."

Well, I think Scotch Members have very little reason to be grateful for free education thus extorted from the Government. Then we had the Scotch Universities Bill, and I think with the exception of the question of the theological chairs, there was very little difference of opinion on either side of the House upon that Bill. That measure was passed, and we have yet to see the result; we have to see the spirit in which the Government will meet the demands of the Commission. We shall expect them in regard to the rehabilitation of these Universities not to take the money out of the funds belonging to Scotland, but from general taxation. So much for the Scotch Session. The energy of the Government in regard to Scotland then died away, and in 1890 and 1891 we have had nothing. The answer, no doubt, will be very much on the lines of what was said by a Member of the Government a few days ago, that after all, the failure of Scotch legislation has been due to the action of the Scotch Gladstonian Members. Here is one of the points of our complaint, that when Scotch measures are introduced they are thrown upon this Table, and we are told to take them as they are, under penalty of their being dropped altogether.

THE CHAIRMAN: I do not quite see that the speech of the right hon. Gentleman is addressed to the Vote before the Committee.

MR. MARJORIBANKS: This is a Vote to meet the expenses of the Scotch Office, and the Scotch Secretary of State is responsible for Scotch business during the last six years, and what I am doing is reviewing the way in which Scotch legislation has been conducted during the present Parliament.

THE CHAIRMAN: It is going beyond the limits of the discussion of a Vote in Supply.

MR. MARJORIBANKS: I will only say that the practice in past Sessions has been for the Government to tell Scotch Members to open their mouths, shut their eyes, and see what would be given them. But that is not the way in which we are prepared to deal with Scotch measures. We shall come to the consideration of these measures with mouths, eyes, and ears open. We have great reason to complain of the action of the Scotch Office, from the establishment of which we hoped such great things. Measures, as I have said, have been introduced, carried a certain distance, and then dropped. What has taken place in reference to the Private Bill Procedure Bill this year? That Bill was no new proposal. In the first place it was brought forward by a private Member, and twice has it been introduced by the Government. It was one of the measures mentioned in the Queen's Speech this year, it passed through the other House, it passed a Second Reading here, and was referred to a Committee and, changed somewhat; it came back to the House, and then, simply because a considerable number of Amendments were put upon the Notice Paper, the Bill was dropped. It was not a very bold course for the Government to take. Having, by the introduction of the Bill, acknowledged there was need for such legislation, they should have proceeded with it, and should have overcome obstacles placed in its way. If the Bill was so important, then the blame is the greater to them for not having passed it. If, on the other hand—as I maintain, was the case—the Bill was one which the Scottish people, as a whole, had no enthusiasm about, and which only created enthusiasm in the minds of a certain section in Edinburgh, who thought they were going to get some benefit out of it, then I say the Government were equally to blame for having introduced it with such provisions as not to secure the general support of the people of Scotland. It is true we think these matters ought to be dealt with in Scotland, but we had a great deal of criticism to offer to that Bill both with respect to the constitution of the Commission, and as to the fact that the cost of Private Bill legislation was not practically cheapened in the matter of fees. Be that as it may the fact that this Bill was dropped in such an extraordinary way is a matter which we have every reason to complain of, and which is another proof of the manner in which Scottish business is conducted. Then there was the very bulky Bill, the Burgh Police Bill, which contained no particularly contentious matter, but which was dropped against the wishes of the Scottish Members. Then there was a whole series of measures connected with fishing matters, in which I take a personal interest. These measures were brought forward and dropped in the same manner. At the very outset of this Parliament, in 1887, the Government brought in in the other House the Salmon Fishery Bill, thereby acknowledging that there was a necessity for dealing with that matter. But no more has been heard of the measure. Then, let us come to the year 1888. In that year a Bill was passed which established Local District Fishery Committees for England. At this moment there are no less than 16 of these Committees established all round the coasts of England. The other day the Local Government Board was overwhelmed with congratulations at the good work these District Fishery Committees have done, and the great advantage they have been to the fishermen. Well, Sir, no similar measure has been passed for Scotland. The necessity of establishing similar Committees for Scotland has been recognised by the Government, but no measure has been passed. Then, as to the tribunal. Again and again they have admitted that the representative element should be introduced upon the Fishery Board of Scotland; they have introduced a measure containing certain provisions dealing with the matter, they have pushed that measure in a certain distance, and then dropped it. Again, the improvement of mussel fisheries in Scotland is of the greatest importance, as Lord Lothian himself has acknowledged in the clearest and most decided manner. He appointed a Committee of Inquiry on the subject, and in consequence of the Report of that Committee certain provisions—which I maintain were very inadequate—were introduced into a Bill dealing with the mussel fishery question. I would point out how important this is to the fishery interests of Scotland, and how important it is that the Scotch Members should insist upon the question being dealt with without delay. There are some 50,000 fishermen, and for six months in the year they fish with lines, using mussels for bait. In the single fishing village of Eyemouth, in 1885-6-7, the total amount of fish caught amounted to 4,665 tons, and in order to catch this fish 4,022 tons of mussel bait was used, or only 600 tons less mussels than fish caught. The total value of the fish caught was £58,940, and the value of the mussels was £7,664, an amount equal to one-eighth of the value of the fish. That shows how important this question is to the Scotch fishermen. The supply of mussels has decreased in an extraordinary way in recent years, and it is very necessary that steps should be taken to increase it. The Government have been very lax in connection with this question; they have instituted an inquiry, but they have not legislated. In spite of the inquiry and the Bills I have mentioned, we are going back again this Autumn without one thing being done for the benefit of the fishermen. Take the case of the Scottish Fishery Board. So far back as 1889 the Board recommended that an increase should be made in the salaries of their officers, from whom so much more head work and labour has been required during the past few years. I was told in that year that the matter was being favourably considered, and that the only reason it was not dealt with then, was because it was too late to include any increase in the Estimate for the year. During the following years—1890 and 1891—I have had similar answers. I have been assured of the value which the Government attach to this proposition, and yet year after year has passed without one thing being done to meet, what I consider, and what I think the Government consider, a most just demand on the part of these men. Now, I should like to ask what are the reasons for this laxity in the conduct of Scottish business, and what is the remedy for it? I know that some of my hon. Friends will say the reason is that we have not got a legislative assembly of our own in Scotland, and that the remedy is to establish such a body in Scotland. [Dr. CLARK: Hear, hear!] Well, I do not go quite so far as some of my hon. Friends in this matter, but I will say this, that the way the Government, under present conditions, have dealt with Scottish business is the very way to bring about the establishment of such an assembly as I have spoken of. I myself—and I daresay many of my hon. Friends agree with me—am of opinion that desirable as such a change may be, it has hardly yet come within the limits of practical policy, and that it would be more profitable to suggest to the Government some means of dealing with the matter in a manner which they, perhaps, would be inclined to accept. One of the main reasons why the Scottish Office has not been so great a success as we expected, is because the gentlemen who have been connected with the Office have not had a chance, and have been kept out of the inner circle of the Government, where we ought to find them. At this moment what is the fact? There is a large Cabinet of 15 or 16 Members, and not a single Scottish Member in it.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! That cannot be gone into on this Vote. It is not the fault of the Scottish Secretary that he is not a Cabinet Minister. This is not a part of the administration of the Scottish Office. The right hon. Gentleman has exceeded in all directions the limits permissible on such a Vote.

MR. MARJORIBANKS: Then, I will only observe this, that what we ought to do is to increase the importance of the Scottish Office in every possible way. To it should be entrusted many of those subjects which were kept out of it when the Office was instituted. The Minister who has charge of the Office should have a seat in this House, and be as important a Member of the Government as it is possible to make him. Nothing short of this will satisfy the Scottish Members, and as a protest against the treatment that not only Scottish business receives, but that the Scottish Office has received at the hands of English Ministers and English Conservatives, I beg to move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £500.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That item A, Salaries, be reduced by £500, part of the Salary of the Secretary for Scotland."—(Mr. Marjoribanks). (8.48.)

(9.12.) MR. M. J. STEWART (Kirkcudbright): I will not attempt to follow my right hon. Friend in the very discursive speech to which we have just listened, because I think that were I to adopt his mode of dealing with this subject, I should be setting a bad example to hon. Members on this side of the House. Indeed, I am surprised that the right hon. Gentleman should have chosen to lead his Party into so wide and difficult a field, while at the same time he refrained from dealing with the point he ventured to put before the House, namely, the reduction of the salary of the Secretary for Scotland. The right hon. Gentleman has referred to many Acts of Parliament that have been passed, and has also instanced many important measures which have not become law, a fact which he has invariably put down to the fault of the Government; but the Committee will recollect that oftentimes, even when there has been a burning feeling in the country that certain measures ought to become law, that feeling has gradually died away as the measures themselves have become better known and understood. My right hon. Friend adduced the measure as to Private Bill Legislation as an evidence of the great neglect of Scottish opinion on the part of Her Majesty's Government, because they did not push that measure forward in this House as he considered they ought to have done. But the right hon. Gentleman and his Party declared they would have none of the Bill, and this being so, I put it to the Committee, are the Government to be blamed for not keeping the House sitting some three or four weeks longer in order that that measure might be passed into law? I think it will be generally felt that the Government were justified in dropping that measure because they had reason to believe hon. Members would not be inclined to wait some weeks longer to pass a Bill of which many of them did not approve. It must be remembered that many measures become law, which though not strictly Scotch, nevertheless deeply affect the welfare of Scotland, and any measure seriously believed to be really wanted or desired by the Scotch people, always receives the attention of Parliament, and is passed into law. The fact is that the Scotch get what they want, and by a process best known to the Scotch Members the questions involved are in the first instance quietly talked over outside this Chamber, and in the main the agreement of both sides is secured. But why should this Committee be asked to reduce the salary of the Secretary for Scotland? Lord Lothian, who is at the head of the Scottish Executive, is accessible to all, and although I do not stand here as his panegyrist, I think it will not be disputed that he gives a great deal of attention and devotes much of his time to Scotch affairs. The business of his office is always conducted in a business-like manner, and to the general satisfaction of the Scotch people. I would further say as to the other occupants of office in Dover House, that the staff of officials is in every way well qualified for the duties discharged. On one point I am at one with my right hon. Friend. I should be glad to see Lord Lothian a Member of the Cabinet. He could then exercise more weight in the administration, and bring Scotch affairs more directly under the notice of his Colleagues. There is one other subject I should like to touch upon for a moment, and as to which I should like to obtain the assurance of the Lord Advocate that something will be definitely decided—as to the white fisheries and the salmon interests in the Solway. Difficulties have arisen as to the modes of fishing carried on there, and a promise has been given that this subject shall receive the best consideration of the authorities. I should be glad if I could now obtain a definite promise that a Commission shall be appointed without delay in order that no further vexatious proceedings need be taken, that the fishing rights shall be defined, and that each man shall know where and how he can fish. I will only repeat that my opinion is that when the voice of Scotland is clearly expressed as to the necessity of certain legislation, that legislation, in spite of the 50 Tories who have been said by my right hon. Friend to be against free education, will be carried out as long as there are 10 or 12 Tories sitting on this side of the House.

(9.25.) MR. R. T. REID (Dumfries, &c.): There is one topic on which I should like to say a word, and that is the subject of the Solway fisheries. The hon. Member opposite and I were both present at a great meeting held at Dumfries, at which a unanimous opinion was expressed by persons of all views on other matters that a Commission should be appointed with reference to a specific case, in which it was alleged that great injustice had been done—I allude to the Town Fort case, and I hope the Lord Advocate may see his way to the appointment of a Commission to inquire into that matter; although the experience of Commissions in recent years in connection with the Solway has been that they have resulted in aggrandising the rights of the owners and diminishing those of the fishermen. With regard to the general question of the administration of Scotch affairs, I contend that we are placed in a position of great injustice as regards the introduction and pressing forward in this House of Bills promoted in the interests of Scotland. I wish to endorse what the hon. Member said as to how we suffer by reason of the Secretary for Scotland not being a Member of the Cabinet. It is perfectly obvious that the lack of representation in the Cabinet renders more or less fruitless the strenuous exertions which no doubt are made by the Lord Advocate in putting forward Scotch reforms. It is impossible to doubt that those Members of the Cabinet who are more particularly identified with English interests push aside claims put forward by a subordinate on behalf of Scotland. Indeed, according to the arrangement of the business of this House, there is not sufficient time to enable adequate attention to be paid to the legislative needs of our country. My right hon. Friend the Member for Berwickshire has cited numerous instances to prove that. We have had this very year the question of Scotch Private Bill procedure, but it has had to be shelved for want of time. The Member for the Stewartry of Kirkcudbright says it is not worth while for this House to sit two or three weeks longer for the purpose of passing that Bill. I think it might have been passed in two or three nights, but even that short period of time could not be spared for this important Bill, although it is almost the only one relating to Scotland brought forward this year.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Member must see that that is not relevant to the Vote.

MR. R. T. REID: I am endeavouring to comply with the rules of the House in this matter, but obviously it is difficult to discuss the duties of the Secretary for Scotland and the way in which they are discharged without referring to these legislative matters. The fact is that the failure to transact Scotch business in this House is causing a real and a growing dissatisfaction among Scotch Members. If we cannot get our business done in this House we must get it done elsewhere. We cannot approve of this constant introduction and postponement of Bills relating to Scotland, and the constant, though probably involuntary, omission of the Government to provide for matters which are admitted on all sides to require the attention of Parliament.

*(9.35.) MR. SHIRESS WILL (Montrose, &c.): I desire to say a few words with regard to an important matter which is within the jurisdiction of the Department of the Secretary for Scotland, and that is the subject of mussel and bait fisheries, which are so important for the line fishermen of Scotland. Two or three years ago the Secretary for Scotland took action in this matter. He appointed a Committee, which was presided over by the Member for Berwickshire. That Committee went over the whole of Scotland; it visited places at which fishermen could conveniently attend and state their grievances in respect of the scarcity and dearness of bait; it examined over 100 witnesses; and it reported how easy it would be to establish mussel beds on various parts of the Coast of Scotland. The Committee also drew attention to the mismanagement of existing beds, showed how they might be protected in the interests of the fishermen themselves; they stated that some of these beds were claimed by people who had not a shadow of title to them, and advised that legislative steps should be taken to deal with those claims. The Committee made a variety of recommendations, but what has been the result? What action has been taken upon the Report? This is a vital matter for line fishermen, although to the Government it may appear to be one of small importance. My right hon. Friend to-day gave some instances of the disproportionate cost of bait to the value of the fish. Last year he and other private Members brought in a Bill based on the recommendations of the Committee, but through the influence of the Government and of the Department of which the Secretary for Scotland is at the head, it was blocked. The Government themselves introduced a Bill only to withdraw it again, and the same thing has occurred this year. I trust that some explanation will be given of the neglect of the Government to prosecute this important matter.

*(9.38.) MR. H. T. ANSTRUTHER (St. Andrews, &c.): I should like, if it be in order, to comment on the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Berwickshire relative to the treatment of Scotch matters by the Government this Session. The two grounds upon which the right hon. Gentleman claimed to be justified in moving the reduction of the salary of the Secretary for Scotland were the failure to proceed with the Private Bill Procedure (Scotland) Bill, and the action of the Government in connection with the Fishery Board Bill. But I am bound to say I do not think it lies in the mouth of my right hon. Friend to complain that the Fishery Board Bill was not proceeded with, for, if I recollect right, the failure to proceed with it was due mainly, if not entirely, to his instrumentality. With regard to the Private Bill Procedure question, it is only fair to state that that Bill was dealt with by the Government in the Select Committee in a most conciliatory spirit, but when it came back to this House in its amended form, so large a number and variety of Amendments were set down on the Paper that the Government felt compelled not to proceed any further with it this Session. I heard the announcement of that decision with great disappointment, but I must confess that the blame for throwing up the Bill lies at the door, not of the Government, but of hon. Members on this side of the House, who by their action made it practically impossible to proceed with it.

(9.41.) MR. ANGUS SUTHERLAND (Sutherland): I can perfectly understand the satisfaction of the hon. Member for the Stewartry of Kirkcudbright, for although he and his friends are in a minority as far as Scotland is concerned, they are, as supporters of the Government, in a position to have their wishes carried out, even if they are adverse to the views of the Members for Scotland on this side of the House. The hon. Member in his speech introduced the personality of Lord Lothian, and made a great deal of that. I have nothing whatever to complain of with regard to the intercourse I have had with Lord Lothian. But this is not a question of giving Lord Lothian his due. It is a far wider question we have to deal with. We have to look at the policy of the Government with regard to the administration of the affairs of Scotland. As to what has fallen from the hon. Gentleman the Member for St. Andrews, in laying the blame on the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Berwickshire for the failure of the Government to pass the Fishery Boards Bill, I must say I think the suggestion is neither fair nor generous. There is no man in this House who has greater knowledge of, or is better qualified to give an opinion on matters relating to fishing; and to suggest that a Bill framed by the Government is not to have Amendments proposed or to meet with any opposition is, to say the least, unreasonable. I know from experience in my own constituency that there is a great desire among the fishermen to have a Bill passed, which if it does not entirely supersede the Fishery Board will materially re-construct it. The right hon. Member for Berwickshire held that the measure of the Government did not go sufficiently far, so he himself introduced a Bill, but the Government refused him an opportunity discussing it. Yet Ministers, who had the whole control of the time of the House, never put their own Bill down at an hour at which we could express an opinion upon it. I repeat I think the position taken up by the hon. Member for St. Andrews is not a generous one, neither is it reasonable to suggest that there ought to be on our part no supervision and no discussion of Government measures in which our constituents are deeply interested.

Mr. Shiress Will

*(9.45.) DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I rise to point out to the very few English Members who are present that they must not run away with the idea that the grievances of Scotland are confined to salmon and mussels. There are a number of other burning questions that Scotland desires to have dealt with. I confess I should deem it to be a rather strong step to take to move a reduction of the Vote merely on the ground that the Private Bill Procedure measure had not been pushed forward, for, as to that Bill, I do not think the Lord Advocate himself is satisfied with Amendments which have been imported into it by his own friends, and those who have promoted it in Scotland have denounced it unsparingly on account of the changes that have been made in it. It is complained that the quorum which has been fixed on for the newly-constituted Board has been made so large as to render the Board practically useless, while objection is also taken to the exemption of certain classes of measures from the operation of the Bill. Both these changes were introduced on the initiative of supporters of the Government. The ground on which I shall support the Motion for the reduction of the salary is that the Secretary for Scotland does not carry out the functions for which the office was constituted. Whether the Secretary of Scotland is a Member of the Cabinet or not, it appears to me to be infinitely more important that he should be a Member of the House of Commons. Before the office was created the feeling was that Scotch business was administered too exclusively by the Parliament House clique, as it is called. It was felt that the administration by the Lord Advocate and the Solicitor General for Scotland was what the administration of England would be if it were in the hands of the Attorney General and the Solicitor General. What Scotland wants in a Secretary is the analogy of the Home Secretary or the Chief Secretary for Ireland in the House of Commons. Both those Ministers are directly responsible to Parliament for the work of their respective Departments, but in the case of the Scotch Office everything has to be referred to the Secretary for Scotland, who, being in the other House, is not accessible to Scotch Members in the sense that he would be across the floor of the House. I do not mean to dispute what was said by other speakers as to his accessibility to the representations of Scotch constituencies, but accessibility in an office is very different from accessibility across the floor of the House. Another drawback of the present constitution of the office is that it has not concentrated in its hands all the powers it should have. It shares with the Home Office certain functions connected with the Government of Scotland. The Factory Acts are administered in Scotland, as in England, from the Home Office. That may be to a certain extent necessary, although I do not see why, when the Scotch Office is allowed to administer the Alkali and similar Acts, the Factory Acts in Scotland should not be administered in the same fashion. And, again, when we come to purely local institutions, such as industrial schools, the Secretary for Scotland has no jurisdiction; and, further, the Office of Woods and Forests and the First Commissioner of Works have jurisdiction in Scotland. I contend that if we are to have an efficient Scotch Office it should have all the threads of all this business in its own hands. The real source of discontent are, first, that the Minister for Scotland is not in the House of Commons; and, secondly, that he has not in his hands the various ramifications of Scotch business. There is no such reason for this division of functions as there is in the case of the Post Office. I can see no reason for the severance of any of these matters I have mentioned from the Scotch Office; it appears to me to have been an accidental omission; and that these matters were forgotten by the Ministers who drafted the Bill for the creation of the Scotch Office. I do not think the censures passed upon the Department for not pushing forward the Burghs, Health, and Police Bill were justified. That Bill, with its many hundred clauses, was offered to us as an unopposed measure to be allowed to go through after midnight; but that would have been a dangerous course in the case of a Bill bristling with penalties. Among the subjects on which legislation is demanded are the incidence of local taxation, the completion of the system of free education, temperance legislation, and the reform of Parochial Boards.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Member is following what I think to be the very pernicious lead of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Berwickshire. These matters are altogether beside the Vote.

*DR. CAMERON: I only wished to protest against hon. Members imagining that the mussel and salmon fishery questions were the only ones interesting to the people of Scotland. I shall, on the grounds I have stated, vote for the reduction of the salary, and I hope the right hon. Gentleman will press his Motion to a Division.

(9.58.) MR. A. ELLIOT (Roxburgh): Though the Motion is in form one for the reduction of his salary, I should think the Secretary for Scotland will not be dissatisfied with the Debate which has taken place, or with the suggestion that his Department has not sufficiently strong powers. My right hon. Friend the Member for Berwickshire complained that Lord Lothian was not a Member of the Cabinet, and was therefore not able to give effect to his views, while the Member for the College Division of Glasgow seemed to think the Secretary for Scotland should not be a peer, and should have a seat in the House of Commons, so as to have a stronger control over Bills affecting Scotland. These criticisms appear to me to be to some extent antagonistic. If the Secretary for Scotland is to be necessarily in the House of Commons, and also in the Cabinet, the present Government will be restricted in its choice to some half-dozen Members. Such a position of affairs would be absurd. The Government have not only introduced the Scotch Universities Bill, but they have passed it. The right hon. Gentleman below me said that the conduct of the Government with regard to the Private Bill Procedure (Scotland) Bill was weak, but I hold that the Government were justified in refusing to listen to the unpractical and impossible proposals which were put forward with regard to that measure by the right hon. Gentleman below me. It has been asserted by the right hon. Gentleman that Scotch business has been greatly neglected, and that the interests of Scotland have been disregarded. The right hon. Gentleman is not only a Scotchman, but a Scotch Member, but I am afraid he has other qualifications which almost destroy these admirable qualifications: he speaks as an ex-Liberal Whip. He has contrasted the way in which Scotch business has been neglected with the manner in which it has been treated on previous occasions. He went through one measure after another, and I do not think the remark of my hon. Friend the Member for St. Andrews was altogether inappropriate. The right hon. Gentleman asks why the Scottish Fisheries Bill was dropped. I think he himself ought to assume the responsibility for the rejection of the Second Reading of that measure. Perhaps Scotch business has been neglected; but the point is, whether there has been neglect as compared with the interests of England and Scotland—whether the neglect has been comparative as compared with other portions of the Kingdom? It has been pointed out that the one or two important Bills affecting Scotland have come to nothing. Have no Bills introduced for England come to nothing? What is the use of pressing forward the failure of occasional Scottish legislation unless you press forward some of the failures in reference to other portions of the Kingdom? We ought never to forget that Scotland shares in the general legislation like England. My right hon. Friend has not produced any evidence in support of his contention that the Government have neglected Scottish business. The case of my right hon. Friend has entirely broken down. The present Government have passed a Universities Bill for Scotland; and with regard to the Private Bill Procedure Bill this Session, the measure was changed in Committee in order to meet what I consider the astounding views of my right hon. Friend. The Bill was changed until its own parents would hardly have known it. I do not so much blame the Government for ultimately dropping the Bill as for having listened to the impracticable and impossible views of my right hon. Friend. A more gross misrepresentation of what took place with reference to the Private Bill legislation cannot be imagined. Again, take the case of free education. In Scotland we have had free education for a year and a half, but they have not got it yet in England. How can my right hon. Friend get up and say that Scotland is neglected when, in the greatest domestic legislation of the last few years, Scotland is a year and a half ahead of England and Ireland? With regard to the question of temperance, we have had Sunday closing in Scotland for 30 years or more.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is travelling beyond the Vote.

MR. A. ELLIOT: I bow at once to your decision, Sir, and will go back to the main question, the administration of the Scotch Department. I maintain that when the Scotch Department put forward their Bills, they do fairly invite the consideration of all parts of the House, and their action during the present Session shows that in a very marked degree. The Scottish legislation is not brought forward as Scotchmen would like to see it. I say that comparatively Scotland stands well up to the mark arrived at by England and Ireland. My right hon. Friend has entirely failed to prove his strong indictment; and when the Scottish people have time to look into the matter, they will see they have got more beneficial legislation in domestic matters from the present Government than they have got from any Government during the last 10 years.

(10.10.) MR. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith, &c.): My hon. Friend the Member for Roxburghshire has based his argument to a considerable extent upon comparative estimates between Scotland and other parts of the Kingdom. He seems to think that as long as he can prove Scotland to be 18 months ahead of England in legislative matters a good case is thereby made out for the Government. In the first place, the standards of comparison can hardly be taken as opposite. What is required for Scotland may not be required for England, and vice versa. The speech of my hon. Friend shows that he has no proper conception of public feeling in Scotland upon many vital questions which affect the country. Whether the Scotch Office has shown weakness from within, or from causes operating upon it from without, there can be no doubt that the work it has been able to accomplish has not been received very well in Scotland. I do not attach much importance to the fact that the Scotch Secretary is not in the Cabinet. I think far more depends upon how the business is done within the Department, and what my right hon. Friend wants is that the Scotch Department should have control of all the threads of Scotch business, and that it should set to work to carry out the wishes and objects of Scotland. It has been pointed out that we have waited a long time for several measures. There is the Scotch Fisheries Bill, and my constituents are strongly in favour of the Burgh Police and Health Bill. Then there is the question of the extension of Local Government in counties.

THE CHAIRMAN: I have pointed out several times that this is going beyond the limits of the Vote.

MR. MUNRO FERGUSON: The administration of the Scottish Office, Mr. Courtney, has not, in the opinion of the constituencies of Scotland, overtaken the work that is expected of it by the country, and I hope that before long we shall be able to secure such reforms as will make it an effective instrument of Scottish public opinion.

(10.15.) MR. DUFF (Banffshire): I must take exception to the views expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Roxburghshire as to what has taken place with regard to the Private Bill Procedure Bill. The concessions to which he referred were made to the Committee.

MR. A. ELLIOT: The concession I object to was made in this House by the leader of the House in deference to the wishes of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Berwickshire.

MR. DUFF: The Bill was discussed by an impartial Committee, and I believe the reason why the Bill was dropped was that the Government did not approve of the Amendments adopted by that Committee. I have been a Member of the House many years, and I never remember before a Chairman of a Committee getting up and saying the Government would not accept the Amendments of the Committee. There is a great need for a Private Bill Procedure Bill, but the people do not want such a Bill as the Government proposed. With regard to the Fisheries Bill, it is true that the Government introduced a Bill re-constituting the Scotch Fishery Board; but my right hon. Friend the Member for Berwickshire had introduced a Bill on the same subject, and he made a fair offer that both Bills should be referred to a Select Committee. If that had been done, I think the Bill might have become law. There is one question on which I put a question to the Lord Advocate earlier in the day. It has reference to suggested alterations in the tenure of fishermen's houses in Scotland. A number of fishermen build houses on other people's land. They have no right to do it; but it is the custom, and they go on doing it. A case occurred in my own constituency the other day. A fisherman died, and the widow took possession of the house, and paid the Feu Duty of 16s. a year. She had a son, who insisted on living in the house. She brought an action to have him turned out; and when she went to the Sheriff Court, it was decided that she could not take any steps, because she had no legal title to her own house. Sheriff Guthrie Smith, reviewing the decision, made use of very strong language in regard to such cases, and went into minute details as to how the grievance could be remedied. In these circumstances, as the Sheriff has shown how it can be done, I really think the Government should deal with the matter, even although the Lord Advocate has said that there is nothing requiring legislative interference. The present tenure is perfectly discreditable to any civilised country.

(10.20.) THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): My official duty and the Chairman's ruling constrain me to confine my observations within a much more limited scope than was aspired to, and no doubt filled, by the Member for Berwickshire. I believe, however, I may make one general remark with universal assent. I have not heard one word of adverse criticism of the administration of my noble Friend in his office of Secretary for Scotland—and it is remarkable that only one administrative question has been raised in this Debate, and that not a criticism of the past, but having relation to the future, namely, the suggested inquiry into the state of fishing matters on the Solway. On that subject two views have been presented—one by my hon. Friend the Member for the Stewartry, suggesting a general inquiry; the other by the Member for the Dumfries Burghs, who suggested that the inquiry should be more limited. I have no doubt my noble Friend, who has the subject now under his anxious attention, will give due consideration to the observations from both these quarters. The Member for Berwickshire has given expression to many opinions which will, no doubt, be largely appreciated at Eyemouth; but it is my duty to confine myself to the subject in hand, and that is whether the Secretary for Scotland's salary shall be abated by £500? On that I am happy to collect, from all the speeches that have been made, nothing but a chorus of praise of the official performance of his duties by my noble Friend, and only an extreme anxiety that the powers he has displayed should be extended to other Departments of administration. That occurs to me to be not a reason for diminishing, but rather for increasing, the Secretary for Scotland's salary. As to the legislation of the Session, the Member for Berwickshire ought to have mentioned that he declared with regard to the Government measure dealing with the fisheries that unless they agreed to send his Bill to the same Select Committee the Government Bill would meet with his inexorable opposition from day to day; and note should be taken of the fact that I indicated on behalf of the Government that in these circumstances there would be no chance of debate; and that if the Government assented to his imperious and exacting requirements, the Government Bill would have no chance of success. The Government have been accused of being lukewarm with regard to the Burgh Police Bill. The hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) has addressed some sort of admonition to the Government as to the wide scope of the requirements of the country in the direction of legislation, but he has given one specific piece of information which I am certain those interested in Scotland will take special note of. The Burgh Police Bill was received in the House with that exuberant welcome from Scotch Members we were led to expect, and the hon. Member for the College Division of Glasgow warned us that it could not be touched with any hope of success, for he would account for sufficient opposition to prevent its passing.

*DR. CAMERON: I said there was no prospect of it being passed sub silentio—that it absolutely required a reasonable amount of discussion.

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: A Bill which had been thoroughly discussed in Committee of both Houses! The responsibility for the failure of this Bill does not lie with my noble Friend.

MR. R. T. REID: The Bill did not apply to Glasgow.

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: No; it was a purely general and philosophic interest shown in the measure in its application to small burghs. I will not dwell upon the achievements of the right hon. Gentleman himself, as to which he has been too reticent. I pass on to refer to the Private Bill Procedure Bill. That Bill has not been proceeded with, and the right hon. Gentleman was most anxious to say—and it is a point worthy of note—that the fault of the Government has been that they have proposed such good things that it is unpardonable that they have not been pressed. The right hon. Gentleman, I presume, represents the opinion of his next neighbours on the Bench opposite, when he says we ought to have brushed aside all those Amendments which appeared in clouds upon the Paper; but I ask any shrewd practical observer whether the Government could be expected to proceed with the measure in the condition in which it stood when it emerged from the Committee stage? I hope, Sir, I have not deserved your censure—at all events, I have been fortunate enough so far to escape it—in these observations upon subjects somewhat difficult to avoid, after they have been so freely handled in various parts of the House. There remains for me only to say a word in reference to points raised in reference to fishery matters. I am afraid I should be out of order were I to enter into matters to which the right hon. Gentleman has referred, and which are not pertinent to this Vote. The hon. Member for Banff considers he has a fair case to question the action of my noble Friend, because of the result of some lawsuit between the widow and son of a fisherman in relation to the tenure of a house on the north-east coast. I have given the hon. Gentleman a painstaking answer to his question on the subject, which I was the better able to do as he gave me full notice, and I was able to inform myself of the circumstances. I gave, I think, an adequate answer, and I do not find in the circumstances of this domestic dispute a strong case in support of coercive legislation. I am not out of sympathy with the general subject and the wish that every fisherman had a title to his house, which the hon. Gentleman opposite has copiously expressed; but I can only say, as I said at question time, when we look at the circumstances of this individual case, and also to the fact that on the estate in question, which is known to be well administered, any fisherman can get a title to his house if he chooses to ask for it, I do not think that that is a hopeful starting point for an agitation on the subject.

MR. DUFF: I called attention to the words used by the Sheriff in giving his decision. It is not what I think or what I would like to have.

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: It is not permissible to criticise the judgment of the Sheriff in free terms; but if the hon. Gentleman will turn to my answer, he will see that in condensed and careful language I gave an indication of the line I should be inclined to take on the subject. I leave this point, for it only arises incidentally; but it is a case in which I think the general good sense of the parties and liberality on the part of the proprietor will afford a remedy without legislative interference. I trust that there is no necessity for a long discussion now. I think that the Debate we have had has given evidence that there is no ground which would warrant the right hon. Gentleman in going to a Division on this question, since he has himself furnished most adequate arguments against the proposal, which, merely, no doubt, for the sake of form, he has placed upon the Paper.

(10.37.) MR. MARJORIBANKS: I quite recognise the spirit in which the right hon. Gentleman has answered my criticisms on the administration of the Scotch Office, and the representation of the Scotch Office in Parliament. The right hon. Gentleman is quite right in saying I do not find fault with the intentions of Lord Lothian in regard to Scotch business. But intention is not performance, and for reasons I have referred to the Secretary for Scotland has not been able to carry his good intentions into effect. It seems to me we pay for the performance not for the intention, and if the performance does not come up to the level of the intention we are justified in moving a reduction of the Vote. Our contention is that the Minister for Scotland should be directly responsible to Parliament, and that unless he is responsible to Parliament and the elected Representatives of Scotland it is of very little use having a Scotch Minister. There have been various references to the Fishery Bills introduced, and I do say it is a most audacious statement to say that I am responsible for the non-passing of the Government Fishery Boards Bill. I should like to recall to the Committee how matters stand in regard to the Bill. I introduced a Bill for the third time, and the Government introduced a Bill, presenting in many points a great similarity to mine, and I have always said in regard to that Bill that I had no intention or desire to meet that Bill with any improper opposition or more than fair criticism. All I said was, that if the Government took this particular Bill and said it should pass its Second Reading without discussion after 12 o'clock, then they should extend the same treatment to my Bill, which in many respects was preferable to the Government Bill. My Bill had the recommendation of the Commission, which was kept well in order by the representatives of the Scotch Office, and my proposals could not be very alarming if they passed those lynx-eyed officials. I said, and I say still, that I should not object if both Bills were brought forward before 12 o'clock, when they could be discussed. My hon. Friend the Member for the College Division (Dr. Cameron) has complained that I have only paid attention to Scotch fishery matters, but, as a matter of fact, I did bring forward several instances of failure to deal with Scotch matters, though I own I did not give an exhaustive account of all the points upon which we felt grievance. Then my hon. Friend the Member for Roxburgh (Mr. A. Elliot) has found fault with me because I did not give a long comparative statement of what has been done in legislation for Scotland and England during the last four or five years, but I think if I had attempted that I should justly have incurred your censure, Sir. Then, in regard to what has been said as to the limitation of choice in finding a Minister for Scotland from among Members of this House, I may observe that the appointment need not be limited to Representatives of Scotch constituencies; for instance, the present Chief Secretary for Ireland filled the office of Secretary for Scotland, sitting for an English constituency. I intend to press my Motion to a Division, and I claim for it the support of all Scotch Members. This is not the final stage of Supply, and it is the only mode the Rules of the House permit me to adopt to elicit an expression of opinion. I can only move a reduction of the Vote, and should I be fortunate enough to carry it, my own voice would be among the first to cry "Aye" to a proposal to replace the £500 on the Report stage.

(10.44.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: I shall support the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman, but upon limited grounds: first, that the Secretary for Scotland has not a seat in this House; and, secondly, that he has not enough to do. The arguments in favour of the Secretary having a seat here, and showing that it is impossible that he can properly discharge the functions of his office unless he has a closer contact with Scotch Representatives, are so convincing that I need not repeat them, and, on the other ground, I have on previous occasions expressed my view that we should give the Scotch Office more work to do by the amalgamation with it of the Board of Supervision, creating a Department similar to the Home Office for England. I wish to support the appeal of the hon. Member for Banff in reference to the tenure of fishermen's houses on the north-east coast, and I must express my great disappointment that the Lord Advocate has held out no hopes of legislation in that matter. The situation is precisely similar to that in Ireland before the legislation of 1881. These evils have grown out of the custom of the country. You have found a remedy for them in other parts of Scotland, but you have left this deserving class of fishermen on the north-east coast without a remedy. The Lord Advocate says we must trust to the liberality of the proprietor, and that he has offered leases; but just as this was not found a satisfactory solution of the difficulty in Ireland so it will not be in Scotland. All depends upon the terms the landlord offers, and there is no security that justice will be done. As to the Private Bill Procedure Bill I always thought it was a bad Bill, a lawyer's Bill, a speculator's Bill, and I am glad it has been dropped, and I hope in another Session we shall have a more thorough Bill in the nature of delegation, entrusting to local bodies a good deal of the business this House is called upon to transact. I do not regret the loss of the Bill, and I hope to see it re-introduced in an amended form.

*(10.48.) MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): I labour under the disadvantage of not having heard the speech of my right hon. Friend (Mr. Marjoribanks) or the earlier part of the Debate, but I have gathered from inquiry that the principal feature in what has taken place is that you, Sir, no doubt rightly and properly, called to order every speaker who began to touch upon those questions which are really of most importance in regard to the subject with which we are dealing. One of the most important points, in my opinion, raised in this question is the position of the Secretary for Scotland himself. I desire to join in all that has been said in approval of the general administration of Lord Lothian, and in admiration of the character and abilities of Lord Lothian himself. I also think that no one could be long in this House without coming to the conclusion that it would be impossible to find any one more competent to represent any Department in this House than the Lord Advocate. At the same time, what we complain of—and every year makes the complaint stronger—is that the Secretary for Scotland, who is mainly responsible for the administration of Scotch affairs, is not in this House, and is not, therefore, in close relation with Scotch Members, and not closely amenable to Scotch opinion. That is no fault of Lord Lothian or of the Lord Advocate, but it is a fact that becomes plainer every year. I will not touch on the more theoretical question whether the Secretary for Scotland should have a seat in the Cabinet. I have an opinion of my own on the subject that no rule should be laid down as to whether one office more than another should carry with it a seat in the Cabinet, but I have not the slightest doubt whatever that it is essential for the proper administration of Scotch affairs under the modern system that the principal Minister for Scotland should be in the House of Commons. What is it we have to complain of? We do not complain, at least not in any large sense, of the administration of Scotch affairs, but we do complain that Scotch legislation has been scanty in quantity, and not in accordance with the predominant wishes and feelings of the Scotch people as represented in this House. To give concrete instances I may mention the Burgh Police Bill and the Private Procedure Bill. As to the Burgh Police Bill—

THE CHAIRMAN: The question before the Committee is the administration of the Scotch Office. No doubt this can be brought into connection with particular Bills introduced this Session, but to go back upon the Burgh Police Bill would be altogether outside this Vote.

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: What we complain of is the absence of the Burgh Police Bill, but I presume I may not refer to it even in that negative sense. Well, I regret it was not introduced, and will not further refer to it. As to the Private Bill Procedure Bill to which I can refer—I am not going to discuss the merits of the Bill—its main object had the hearty approval of nearly all the Scotch Members, that is to say, they approved of its object of having local inquiries in Scotland. But what we complained of was that the tribunal to be established under the Bill was not such as the bulk of Scottish opinion approved. The Lord Advocate has referred to the alteration which was made in the Bill as a concession to this side of the House, but I pointed out at the time that an addition was made to that concession which completely neutralised the effect of it, and for that reason Scotch Members were obliged to continue their opposition. Then, we are told that Scotch Members are responsible for preventing the Bill becoming law through the cloud of Amendments they brought forward to it. But those Amendments were placed on the Paper because the points raised in the Select Committee were only decided in favour of the Government by the casting vote of the Chairman, or a majority of one, and in such circumstances it was only natural that the Scotch Members should again raise those points in the House upon which we were unsuccessful upstairs. On that ground I do not think much fault can be found. The truth is, there was no momentum in the Bill, because its final condition was satisfactory neither to the one side or the other; it was one of those weak compromises having that distinguishing characteristic. The lesson to be learnt from the fate of that Bill, and of others I might mention, is that Scotch legislation passing through this House in order to be successful must be in accord with the predominant wishes and opinions of the Scotch people, and this strengthens our contention that the Secretary for Scotland ought to be in the House of Commons, in order that he may become fully and directly cognizant of those wishes and opinions. I know there is an anomaly in voting to reduce the salary of a Minister of whose administration we have no reason to complain, but this course is the only means open to us of expressing our sense of the evils against which we protest.

(10.57.) DR. CLARK: We are asked to vote £11,000, and the right hon. Gentleman has moved to reduce the Vote by £500, but the logical conclusion to the speech we have just listened to would be to reject the entire Vote, on the ground that the money is wasted so far as the conduct of Scotch business is concerned. I quite agree that the present system is most unsatisfactory, and the old condition of things, which cost less, was in many respects better than the present. We had the Home Secretary as Minister for Scotland, and we also had a Member of the Cabinet, responsible for Scotch affairs in this House; we had the Lord Advocate as representing the legal side of Scotch affairs, and we had a Scottish Lord of the Treasury. Under the present condition of things, with a Scottish Secretary of State, an Under Secretary and an Assistant Under Secretary, we are as badly off as ever, if not worse; so I say the logical conclusion would be to reject the Vote and go back to the old condition of affairs. Under the old condition of things charges of neglect of Scotch measures were made, just as they have been made to-night, and that Bills for Scotland were passed not in accordance with the wishes of Scotch Members. Now we have a change in the position. We are criticising technically the administration of the Scotch Secretary. Not one word has been said against the mode of administration—I mean against the ability and courtesy of the Secretary for Scotland. The highest compliments have been passed on Lord Lothian. But still, though we have a Secretary for Scotland and a Scotch Office, the old condition of things exists, and no matter what is done, we shall still have Scotch objects competing with those of England, Ireland, and Wales, and crushed out by them. Hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House are equally to blame with the Government opposite. They appointed Lord Dalhousie to the Scotch Office: and though I believe they are coming round to our way of thinking, it still will be impossible to get our views carried out. In this congested House it will be impossible to get Scotch objects carried out, and if we want to pass Scotch legislation we shall require to go to Scotland for the purpose. An hon. Member pointed out a condition of things which prevailed here at one time, and which may prevail again. I mean when we had six Members of the House representing one Party in Scotland and 66 representing the other. There might be here in England, as we have now, a great majority of English Conservatives, and there might be only six Scotch Conservatives, yet the principles of those six Scotch Conservatives would be carried out in opposition to the wishes of the 66. This is only another object lesson in the matter of Scotch Home Rule, and will bring home clearly to the mind of the Scotch people that the only way to satisfy the demands of Scotch business will be by giving us Scotch Home Rule. There is one point in which the Secretary for Scotland has, as I think, acted wrongly, and that is in connection with the appointment of certain Commissions. As a rule in appointing Commissions, Governments, whether Tory or Liberal, have sought to give fair representation on them to both sides in politics. On the Crofter Commission, although there were, perhaps, too many of one side, yet both parties were represented. But what is even more important, you had men appointed who were thoroughly well acquainted with the subject dealt with. The Secretary for Scotland has appointed three Commissions during the last two years, and I have to complain that he has not followed the usual method in their appointment. He has appointed persons who do not know much about Scotland, who have been got at, tampered with, and deceived, instead of appointing persons familiar with the wants and conditions of the people. In future, I hope that when Commissions to the Highlands are appointed, men will be selected who know something about the subject, and who cannot be tampered with and deceived. I am glad we have had this Debate, because it proves to me if anything were wanted to show it, the absolute necessity of a much larger measure of devolution than any yet proposed, and that the only way of getting Scotch business transacted is to have it done in Scotland by Scotch Members, and not under the conditions which exist in this House.

(11.5.) MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): This is an opportunity which we cannot allow to pass without renewing our protest against the manner in which the Government have most successfully defeated, and wholly frustrated the object which Scotch Members sought to obtain by the appointment of the Secretary for Scotland, by selecting for that office a gentleman who is not a Member of this House—a person whom we never see or hear, and with whom it is almost impossible to have any communication. The Government have effectually deprived the Secretary for Scotland of that knowledge of the feelings of Scotch Members, and of Scotch opinion, which is absolutely necessary for one in his position, if he is to guide his office in accordance with the opinions of Scotland. Every year that passes emphasises, to my mind, the lessons of the year that has gone before. It is five years since Lord Lothian became Secretary for Scotland. During the whole of that time I have had the honour of seeing him twice. It is obvious to any man of common sense that if Scotch business is to be done, it must be done in that place where Scotch Members are, and although it is somewhat late in the tenure of the present Government to press the question upon them at great length, because, no doubt, their days are numbered, still I trust that their successors will take a lesson from the experience they have had during the past five years, and that the mistake will not again be repeated. I listened to a very singular argument by the hon. Member for Roxburghshire, who said we must not adopt a rule that the Secretary for Scotland shall sit in this House, because it may happen that at the General Election only six Tories will be returned for Scotland, and he asked how out of the six are we to fill three such offices as the Secretary for Scotland, Lord Advocate, and Solicitor General. I admit there is a difficulty in these circumstances, but what a light does it throw upon the relations of the two Kingdoms, that a Party so small as not to be able to furnish a single gentleman fit to occupy the office of Secretary for Scotland shall have the power, through the votes of English Members, of entirely controlling and disregarding the opinions of the people of Scotland. But we have not yet come to the six Members, and I am surprised that that argument should be put forward in a House containing 25 or 26 supporters of the Government. If I had suggested that the illustrious Unionist Party is not capable of furnishing a single person fit to hold the office of Secretary for Scotland, I should almost have considered myself to be perpetrating a libel.

MR. A. ELLIOT: My point was as to the difficulty of selecting a Cabinet Minister out of half a dozen Members.

MR. HUNTER: I object very strongly to one act of Lord Lothian's administration, and that is, that on the 11th June, without notice to the Scotch Members, he, by a stroke of the pen, altered the conditions under which the grant is made to Scotland in lieu of school fees.

THE CHAIRMAN: The proper time to discuss that is when the Scotch Education Vote comes on.

MR. HUNTER: I will raise the question on that Vote. I wish to call attention to the delay which has occurred in presenting to the House the Government plan of distributing the sum of £190,000 which fell to Scotland during the present year. That is an instance of the manner in which Scotch business is conducted. With regard to the Private Bill Procedure Bill, I do not think it is a matter of complaint that the Government withdrew the Bill. The real blame attached to them for having introduced and having occupied time with a measure, and then having admitted its unsuitability. I cannot join in the chorus which seems to have come from some hon. Members with regard to Lord Lothian. I am not going to say a word against his Lordship, but it seems to me that these smooth speeches rather suggests the idea that these hon. Members are imitating the habits of a well known snake, which before proceeding to swallow its victim first beslavers him.

Original Question again proposed.

(11.25.) MR. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): Before this Vote is passed, I should like to call attention to one or two points in the Reports of the Inspectors of Constabulary in Scotland. These Reports contain very valuable suggestions, and without attaching too much blame to any Government, I think there is always considerable risk of these suggestions being buried in Blue Books, however important they may be. They are not supported by the Government, consequently no attention is ultimately given to them. As an example of that I may refer to a subject brought forward by the Inspector of Constabulary and his predecessors for many years, namely, the important subject of the superannuation of police. It was only last Session that that subject seriously engaged the attention of Parliament, and that an Act was passed dealing with it. There are three points contained in the Report of the Inspector of Constabulary that I desire to refer to—though, as they are far from being exciting topics, it would be intolerable in me to detain the House long in dealing with them. The first point the Inspector calls attention to is the interruption of prosecutions in criminal cases by being undertaken by Sheriffs' officers after they have been begun by police officers. I do not say whether the Inspector of Constabulary on that point is right or wrong. Sometimes the Police Authorities rather try to amplify their jurisdiction and draw to themselves too large a share of authority, but I think the Lord Advocate will agree with me that the view of the Inspector is at all events justified; that whether the prosecutions are undertaken by the Sheriff or the police, it seems right that they should be carried on from end to end either by the one or the other.

Mr. Hunter

I should like to know what is the right hon. Gentleman's views on that point. The second point is a minor one, as to the men who perform duties at the Government buildings, and are paid by the Treasury. They should be part of the local police force, under the authority within whose jurisdiction the buildings are situated. It is inconvenient, and causes obstruction, that separate men, old and worn out, as the Inspector says, should be employed by way of makeshift. The third point is the most important of the three, and it is as to the police stations and the police cells, which are in many districts in a very insanitary condition. This is a matter that was inquired into lately by a Committee. Certain recommendations were made by the Committee, but, apparently, they cannot have been fully or satisfactorily carried out, because the Inspector complains that several of the cells, and also the stations, are in a very unwholesome and unsatisfactory condition. He also says that it is complained that in order to save trouble two prisoners are sometimes put into one cell when there is plenty of room for accommodating them in single cells. In the case of untried prisoners, it is obvious that that practice might lead to great abuses, for men against whom trifling charges are made, might before trial have to share their cells with a hardened criminal merely to save the turnkey a little trouble. I am sure the Lord Advocate will agree with me that this is an improper thing. I may add to that something which is not in the Inspector's Report, but which has been told to me by an experienced Magistrate of very moderate views, and that is that very often there is no female warder to look after the female prisoners, who are consequently left in the charge of policemen. While I have sincere confidence in the character of the Force as a whole, I must say that that is not an agreeable or fair position in which to place a woman, and I have been informed on high authority that serious abuses have sometimes resulted. These are the three points I wished to bring forward. I have done so with a view of strengthening the hands of the Inspector, who is a most capable and efficient officer. I have a fear that Reports of this nature are too often pigeon-holed unless public attention is drawn to them. I invite the Lord Advocate to give the weight of his authority, and the authority of the Government, to these recommendations, and if that is done I have no doubt that Local Authorities will pay greater attention and respect to the Report.

MR. ANGUS SUTHERLAND: I wish to ask a question which perhaps is not altogether germane to the Vote. I understand that the Secretary for Scotland has the power of determining the sittings of the Crofter Commission. Some crofters applied to the Commission as far back as 1886, and they have not been visited, nor have their cases been heard and adjudicated upon. In the case of landlords, however, the Commissioners have sat and adjudicated upon the applications so quickly after the applications have been lodged that the tenants have not had sufficient opportunity to prepare their cases. I wish to ask the Lord Advocate if he has any explanation to offer on this matter.

(11.35.) MR. MUNRO FERGUSON: I desire to call attention to the question of smaller police establishments, and to the recommendation that they shall be reduced and merged into larger forces, a point which I hope will receive the attention of the Government.

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: With reference to the first point raised by the hon Member for North-East Lanarkshire, I may point out that this is a question in which it is necessary to harmonise the efficiency and continuity of police duty with the aspect of the question as considered by the criminal authorities. The observations of the hon. Member will be noted. The second point raised by the hon. Member is a question of mixed authority, and as to the police stations and police cells it must be borne in mind that we have to carry the Local Authorities with us. The observations of the hon. Member, however, will not be lost, inasmuch as close attention will be given to the decency and ordinary requirements of such places. As to the consolidation of the police forces, the Committee had an opportunity of considering the question on the Local Government Bill, and 7,000 was the number adopted as the minimum. We must endeavour to harmonise local feeling and the interest of the Local Governing Bodies with the requirements and efficiency of the police force; but no doubt the tendency is in favour of consolidation rather than isolation. In the case of the Crofter Commission it is extremely difficult for the Secretary for Scotland and the Crofters Commission to make a programme which will meet all urgent cases, but the Commissioners have shown a disposition to meet the convenience of all parties concerned.

DR. CAMERON: As the right hon. Gentleman has promised attention to the matters referred to by my hon. Friend, I should like to call his attention to a passage in the Report of the Inspector of Constabulary as to the "more general peace and order" which has accompanied the early closing of public houses. I trust the right hon. Gentleman will call the attention of the Secretary of Scotland to the results of the measure.

(11.40.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: Certainly.

DR. CLARK: I find that the senior clerk in the Scotch Office begins with a salary of £450, which rises £20 annually to £600 a year. But the senior clerk in the Home Office begins at £700 and goes up to £800, while the senior clerk in the Chief Secretary's Office at Dublin begins at £700 and rises to £900. I want to know how it is that the pay in the Scotch Office is so low?

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: As far as I am concerned, I cannot go into a comparison, but I do not understand that the hon. Member objects to the amount.

DR. CLARK: I want a reason for the difference of treatment. Of course, I shall not divide the Committee on the matter.

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: No doubt my right hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury will explain the matter on Report.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: My view is that we already have too many highly-paid officers in the Scotch Office.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): The explanation is that the senior clerk in the Home Office has a position equivalent in rank to the Assistant Secretary for Scotland.

DR. CLARK: I think my right hon. Friend is confounding the principal clerk with the senior clerk. The Assistant Secretary for Scotland gets £1,000 a year, the same officer in Ireland £1,200, and the like officer in England £1,500.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: The Assistant Secretary for Scotland is not equivalent to the Assistant Under Secretary at the Home Office.

DR. CLARK: There are three principal clerks in the Home Office who begin at £900 and go up to £1,000. Three senior clerks begin at £700 and go up to £800. I cannot understand why the clerks in the Scottish Office should be treated differently. I do not care what is the amount of salary. I only plead that they shall be all on the same footing.

*MR. HOZIER (Lanarkshire, S.): Are we to understand that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton is responsible for this scale of pay?

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: No; I know all about it.

*MR. HOZIER: It was a Liberal Government that fixed it, then?

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: No, Sir.

Question put, and agreed to.

5. Motion made, and Question proposed,

(11.47.) DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, N.): I should like to point out that to-day we are in the same position as we were last year when we came to discuss this Vote. We have not before us the annual Report of the Board. I know with what satisfaction I have perused past Reports, and with what admiration I have followed the intricate inquiries and excellent work of the eminent men composing the Board. I hope we shall have an assurance from the Lord Advocate that next year the Report will be distributed before we are asked to discuss the Vote.

MR. DUFF: I sympathise with the remarks of my hon. Friend, and with him regret the absence of the Report, as we particularly wish to know what has been the effect of recent legislation. We know that in the interest of the fishermen on both sides of the Moray Firth, it is essentially necessary to keep the trawlers from fishing near the shore, but the Board have no adequate means of enforcing its bye-laws. In the Firth there are about 10,000 fishermen, on whose labour 70,000 people are dependent, whereas the trawlers which come from Aberdeen, and do the mischief complained of, only employ about 480 men. The great difficulty arises from the fact that the Board only has one small steamer at its command for the whole of Scotland, and it is quite useless to control the trawlers, some of which can go 16 knots. When we were discussing the Naval Vote the other day I pointed out how vessels, too small for ordinary naval purposes, might well be employed for marine police work. I also have to complain of a very large amount which is taken out of the "brand money" for purposes other than those of harbour construction, to which it was originally intended it should be applied. Finally, I should like to know what has been done in the matter of increasing the salaries of the fishery officers. No doubt fresh duties are constantly imposed on these officers. Increased pay has long been promised them, and I hope we shall now have a satisfactory statement.

*(11.57.) MR. BARCLAY (Forfarshire): I regret that the Bill for the reconstruction of the Fishery Board was not proceeded with this Session. The question of bait for the fishermen is one of very great importance and urgency on the east coast of Scotland, for the mussel beds there are very nearly exhausted, and last season considerable quantities of mussels had to be imported from Holland. I believe that a small expenditure of money under proper regulations would secure in a few years an abundance of mussel beds round the coasts of Scotland. But before this can be done the Fishery Board must be re-constructed with larger powers, and it should have allotted to it by the Government a certain amount of money for the cultivation of the mussel. I think that if the Government bring in a Bill next Session to establish the Fishery Board on a wider basis and with more extended powers it will pass without difficulty, and will confer a real and substantial benefit on the fishermen of Scotland. The existence of a strong and responsible Board in Edinburgh would also have the effect of relieving the House of Commons from a great deal of discussion which now takes place. Another recommendation which I would make is that a larger amount of money should be placed at the disposal of the Fishery Board for the purpose of harbours. In connection with the scientific portion of the Board's work, there are complaints that the vessel placed at their disposal for carrying on experiments is not suitable for the purpose, and I hope that the Government will consider this matter.

(12.4.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The Report to which the hon. Member for West Aberdeen has referred will soon be ready. I regret that it was not in the hands of hon. Members in time for this discussion. With regard to the question of trawling, I may remind the Committee that the legislation on the subject has established a very liberal line of prohibition. As to the question of enforcing the bye-laws, I quite agree that that is a somewhat important matter; I can only say that it is under the present consideration of the Government, by which I mean not only the Scotch Office, but also the Government Departments concerned. The salaries of the fishery officers, I am glad to be able to say, are to be increased. The salary of the General Inspector will be £300, rising in five years to £350; of the Assistant Inspector's £250, rising to £280; of the next grade of officials £200 to £230; and of the last grade £90 to £120. These alterations will come in force at the end of the current year. Complaint has been made that money which comes from the branding fees has been devoted to telegraphs, but for my own part I am not prepared to join in the suggestion that telegraphs are something extraneous to the interests of the fishing class. There are few things in which the fishermen themselves are more interested than the improvement of telegraphic communication.

(12.10.) MR. MARJORIBANKS: I am glad to hear the announcement of the right hon. Gentleman as to the increase of the salaries of the fishery staff.

DR. CLARK: I must object to the whole Vote. Four years since the Lord Advocate announced that he was going to bring in a Bill re-organising the Fishery Board. He has not done so, and I think the only remedy we have is to refuse to grant this money. I see that in this Vote there is a sum of £3,000 a year set apart for repairing harbours. Bearing in mind the source from which this grant was originally obtained, the sum should be £9,000 instead of £3,000. I certainly think the Government, in its dealings with the brand fees, are acting towards us in a very contemptible manner. You whittle the amount down as much as you possibly can, because you know the surplus will go to Scotland, and you will not let us have more than you can help.

MR. DUFF: I think that although the telegraphs are of great importance to fishermen, a greater proportion of the expense should be borne by the Imperial Revenue, instead of being deducted from the surplus brand fees. We know that during the Naval Manœuvres Her Majesty's ships made good use of the telegraph stations.

MR. FINLAY (Inverness, &c.): I think a strong case exists for increasing the grant for harbours, and I hope the Government will take the matter into its consideration.

Question put, and agreed to.

6. £3,034, to complete the sum for Lunacy Commission, Scotland.

7. £14,222, to complete the sum for the Registrar General's Office, Scotland.

(12.16.) MR. HUNTER: How soon will it be possible for the Registrar General to give Provisional Returns showing the number of persons who are employed (as distinguished from employers) in Scotland?

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I quite appreciate the importance of the question raised by the hon. and learned Member, but fear that it will not be one of the first subjects the Department will deal with. It involves going a great deal into detail, and must necessarily take some considerable amount of time to prepare. The Census work is, I believe, in a forward state, and I will endeavour to get the information the hon. Member requires.

Vote agreed to.

8. £6,746, to complete the sum for the Board of Supervision for Relief of the Poor, and for Public Health, Scotland.

(12.18.) MR. MARJORIBANKS: I wish to ask on this Vote a question with respect to the appointment of medical officers by the County Councils in Scotland. If the legislation on the subject is examined it will be seen that the Government evidently contemplated that in some cases the officer appointed should not be compelled to give the whole of his time to the duties of his office. But the Board of Supervision has strongly urged County Councils to appoint officers who will give the whole of their time to the work, and I wish to know if the Scotch Office sanction the attitude it has taken up.

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I am bound to say the view of Parliament was that, wherever possible, having regard to the affluence and importance of the county, the county should procure a medical man who would give his whole time to the supervision of sanitary affairs. The latitude is given only in view of the fact that there are counties with so small a population that to insist on that requirement might defeat the object aimed at. The Board have not refused that grant to such counties, but in regard to the larger counties I think the Scottish Office would not be well advised if they discountenanced the action of the Board of Supervision in endeavouring to get medical officers who will give their whole time to their public duties.

TRAINING COLLEGES (IRELAND)

BILL.—(No. 391.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

(12.27.) MR. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I object.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Has not the Chief Secretary for Ireland something to say on this?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I very much regret that the hon. Member should object.

SIR J. COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.): I hope my hon. Friend will withdraw his objection.

MR. KELLY: I object, because the Bill is an attempt to endow Roman Mr. Marjoribanks Catholics out of the funds of the Protestant Church of Ireland.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: So far from that being the case, the friends of the Protestant Church of Ireland are those who have most strongly urged this Bill on me.

MR. SEXTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman take any step to secure the passing of this Bill by putting it down first on the Orders for Monday or any other day?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I will consult with the Leader of the House on the matter.

Committee deferred till Monday next.

SUPPLY—REPORT.

Resolutions [16th July] reported.

Resolution 1 (see page 1444) agreed to.

(12.30.) MR. CRAIG (Newcastle upon-Tyne): I should like to ask the President of the Board of Trade when we may expect the Report of the Departmental Committee on Lighthouses, and which he promised some years ago?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I did not promise a Departmental Committee.

MR. CRAIG: I beg pardon; I was present and heard you.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The hon. Gentleman is mistaken; it was a Departmental Committee on the relations between the Mercantile Marine Fund and the Treasury.

Resolution agreed to.

Resolutions 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7 (see pages 1452-1459) agreed to.

*SIR J. COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.): I voted in Committee last night with the Government because I thought it unreasonable to reduce a permanent official's salary who was merely acting in conformity with precedent, but I trust the Government will turn their attention to the question whether it is not possible to get just as good pencils in England as in Germany? I believe that in Cumberland and elsewhere quite as good and as cheap pencils can be obtained if the Government show their readiness to reasonably support British manufacture.

MR. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith): I desire, on behalf of my constituents, a great number of whom are engaged in the manufacture of pencils, to enter my protest. [Laughter.] I do not see that there is anything to laugh at. It is well known that in and around Keswick pencils are manufactured in large quantities. These pencils are good enough for the London School Board, for the London and North-Western Railway Company, and for many other large Public Bodies, and I do not see why the Government should not go to Cumberland and other parts of England for pencils instead of going to Bavaria.

*SIR J. GOLDSMID (St. Pancras, S.): There are matches made in England, but those supplied to the House of Commons are made in Sweden.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I have called the attention of the Stationery Office to the question of the supply of pencils. There seems to be a misapprehension in the matter. A very large quantity of pencils used in the Public Service are made in the constituency of my hon. Friend (Mr. J. W. Lowther.)

MR. MARJORIBANKS: The pencils used in the Division Lobbies of this House are German pencils.

Resolution agreed to.

POST OFFICE ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 366.)

CONSIDERATION.

(12.40.) Order for Consideration, as amended, read, and discharged.

Bill re-committed in respect of Amendments to Clause 7 and of a New Clause (Power to Rural Authorities to undertake to pay loss occasioned by extra postal facilities), considered in Committee, and reported; as amended, considered—

VOL CCCLV. [THIRD SERIES.]

New Clause—

(Criminal diverting of letters from the addressee.)

“Any person not in the employment of the Postmaster General who wilfully and maliciously, with intent to injure or annoy any other person, either opens any letter which ought to have been delivered to such other person, or does any act or thing whereby the due delivery of such letter to such other person is prevented or impeded, shall be guilty of a misdemeanour, and be liable to a fine not exceeding fifty pounds, or to imprisonment not exceeding six months.

Nothing in this section shall apply to a person who does any act to which this section applies where he is parent or guardian of the person to whom the letter is addressed.

A prosecution shall not be instituted in pursuance of this section except by direction of the Postmaster General.

A letter in the section means a post letter within the meaning of ‘The Post Office Protection Act, 1884,’ and any other letter which has been delivered by post.”—(Mr Raikes), —brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Clause be read a second time.”—(Mr. Raikes.)

MR. S. T. EVANS (Glamorganshire Mid): It appears to me that this clause is of a very sweeping character.

MR. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I think the words “or annoy” will lead to great difficulty and trouble, and that it would be well to leave them out.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): Subject to the opinion of the Postmaster General, I think the words “or annoy” are unnecessary, because the substantial offence desired to be met will be secured by the words “intent to injure.”

MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin): I should be glad if the words “or annoy” were omitted, as they do not seem to be necessary to attain the object desired. I am jealous of the prosecution being instituted only at the discretion of the principal official of the Government. I cannot understand why that principle should be admitted. Any one seriously injured ought to have the common right of any subject to redress.

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): If it is the general wish of the House, I have no objection to allowing the words “or annoy” to be struck out. At the same time, I think the clause will not be quite so effective without them. As to the discretion of the Postmaster General in regard to prosecutions, I should certainly prefer that the Public Prosecutor should be substituted for the Postmaster General, but I do not feel warranted in striking out the provision.

SIR H. DAVEY (Stockton) was inaudible in the Gallery.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I have a strong objection to the clause as a whole, and it was only because of the fact that prosecutions are not to be instituted except on the direction of the Postmaster General that I give my sanction to it. Without that provision the clause might be used as an engine of oppression, especially in Ireland.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I took objection in Committee to the clause, and I am bound to say the Postmaster General has done his best to meet the views of those who objected to the clause. But if the opinion of the Chairman of Ways and Means is to prevail I should be compelled to oppose the clause altogether, for the clause might be used as an engine of mischief if not of malice. I hope the Postmaster General will stand firm in the matter.

SIR R. WEBSTER was inaudible in the Gallery.

Question put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in line 2, to leave out the words "or annoy."—(Mr. Raikes.)

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause," put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in line 3, to leave out the word "either."—(Mr. Hunter.)

Question proposed, "That the word either' stand part of the Clause."

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): Supposing a letter is delivered to a wrong person. Will that person fall within the punishment provided by this section if he takes no steps in the matter?

SIR R. WEBSTER: It seems to me that a person to whom a letter is wrongly delivered does not come within the clause. The intention is that a person must do something to prevent the delivery of a letter.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in line 3, after "opens," to insert "or causes to be opened."—(Mr. Raikes.)

Mr. Raikes

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in line 9, after "parent," to insert "or person in the position of the parent, or husband or wife."—(Mr. S. T. Evans.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*MR. RAIKES: I hope the hon. and learned Gentleman will not press this Amendment. I think "guardian" will cover the case. I should be sorry to introduce the question of husband and wife in the Bill. We always deliver letters to the person to whom they are addressed.

MR. HUNTER: But the Bill does introduce the question, for by the Bill it is made a criminal offence for the husband to intercept his wife's letters.

MR. KELLY: May I suggest that it would be better to leave out the paragraph altogether?

SIR R. WEBSTER: I am bound to say I do not think the words are actually necessary, but the better course would be, rather than tinker with the subsection, to leave it out altogether.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Another Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "months," in line 7, to the word "A," in line 11.—(Mr. Raikes.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

SIR H. DAVEY: Some of us cannot assent to this proposition. I think the words are not by any means useless as a guide to a person who proposes to institute a prosecution.

*MR. RAIKES: If the hon. and learned Member presses his objection it will be necessary to adjourn the Debate.

SIR H. DAVEY: The Debate will have to be adjourned, as we have not got through the Amendments.

It being One of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till Monday next; and Mr. Speaker adjourned the House without Question put.

House adjourned at One o'clock till Monday next

HOUSE OF LORDS,

REPRESENTATIVE PEERS FOR IRELAND.

Lord Trimlestown—Petition of Christopher Patrick Mary Barnewall claiming a right to vote as Baron Trimlestown for Representative Peers for Ireland (presented on the 20th day of February last), referred to the Committee for Privileges.

Lord Trimlestown — Christopher Patrick Mary Barnewall's claim to vote as Lord Trimlestown at the election of Representative Peers for Ireland: Committee for Privileges to meet on Friday, the 31st instant.

SAT FIRST.

The Lord De Saumarez, after the death of his father.

CONDUCT OF BUSINESS.

OBSERVATIONS.

LORD DENMAN, in rising to call attention to the influence of Resolutions on Sessional Orders, Standing Orders, and on Bills, said: My Lords, I conceive you are not quite aware of the very great power of Resolutions over Sessional Orders, Standing Orders, and upon Bills. In 1855 there was a Sessional Order that no Bill should be read a second time after a time which had then expired. On the Motion of Lord Stanley of Alderley that Resolution was done away with. The consequence of that was that Bills passed in a very great hurry without such alterations as Lord Campbell and Lord Grey had suggested to your Lordships. If we have these Sessional Orders they surely ought to be attended to. Your Lordships know how difficult it is to keep a House together at the end of the Session. There is no Standing Order now, which is, that unless there be 30 Peers in the House a Bill is to be postponed until the next day. If I had had a Teller on the last occasion last Session several Bills must have been put off for a day; and I tried to prevent that disagreeable state of things by moving a Resolution that the Standing Orders should be suspended. I did it with the best intentions, and not by any means to embarrass the Government. The quorum of this House is three, and any attempt to alter it is inexpedient. Noble Lords are always trying to make it five. That has occurred in Committee of Privileges. There was an attempt to make the majority of Lord Brougham control the Committee of Privileges. Lord Redesdale was very much put about, and opposed it. Lord Redesdale sometimes gave way to innovation. For instance, it comes from him that it is absolutely necessary that three Law Lords should be sitting in appeal in this House. There has consequently been at least one occasion on which parties have come wishing their causes to be tried, and they have been postponed in consequence of the absence of Law Lords. I have always held that this House is the Committee of Privileges. In the time of Edward III. there was a Committee of five, including the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Chancellor, who was, of course, at that time always a Roman Catholic, and it was required that they must always report to the House. That condition seems to be rather forgotten, and the Law Lords overrule other Courts without consulting your Lordships. There is this remedy: that if there is anything wrong the privilege of reading Bills for the first time, giving the opportunity of bringing forward anything we think objectionable, is sufficient to counteract it. With regard to the other occasions on which Resolutions have altered the whole course of legislation, I must go back first to 1832, when General Gascoigne's Resolution caused a dissolution of Parliament, which was very unfortunate, and my lamented father strongly remonstrated with this interference with the future freedom of legislation in Parliament. The other matter to which I wish to allude is a Resolution passed on the 14th August, 1879, by which the Standing Orders were suspended and Limited Liability was conceded to banks. I do not mean to be personal at all in my allusion to that; but, at the same time, that has had a most important effect in relation to property. I may mention a relation of mine having to pay £5,000 upon five shares as a shareholder. If that Resolution had been passed before the failure of the Glasgow Bank, my relation would only have had to pay £500 instead of £5,000. Your Lordships must remember what an enormous power that gives to creditors of banks in having all the shareholders responsible to the full amount of their fortunes. I believe the Lord Chancellor has seen some of the inconveniences of the very strait-laced rules of the banks. Lord Overstone desired that all the capital should be paid up, and he blamed your humble servant in the matter. I repudiated the imputation cast upon me. I by no means desire to cast reflections upon useful public servants who do their duty in an admirable manner, but I must remind you that Resolutions have still the same power, and if anything objectional occurs it is our duty to make a Resolution. It is not the sole privilege of Governments to make Resolutions. That may be done by any Member of the House; and really I have not forfeited the confidence of the House by anything I have ever said or done. I find that very often things upon which I lay great stress are omitted by the Press, sometimes by Hansard, and always by the newspapers. In regard to that I would say that they are liable not only to lose their circulation, but may suffer if they state anything contrary to the truth. I think the sooner these things are understood the better will be the conduct of business. I have particularly desired to call your Lordships' attention to this subject. For my own part, I can only say I have always stayed to the end of the Sitting. Vigilantibus non dormientibus leges subservunt.

SHERIFFS (ASSIZES EXPENSES) BILL.

[H.L.].—(No. 23.)

Bill (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

MARKETS AND FAIRS (WEIGHING OF CATTLE) BILL.—(No. 185.)

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee.

Clauses 1 and 2 agreed to.

Clause 3.

THE LORD PRIVY SEAL (Earl CADOGAN): My Lords, I propose to withdraw two Amendments, of which I have given notice, after Clause 3, in consequence of the Amendment which has been placed on the Paper by the noble Lord opposite.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: My Lords, I propose to insert a sentence at the end of sub-section 1, which provides that the market authority may, for the purpose of making the prescribed return, cause any cattle which have been sold at the market to be weighed without fee. The object of the Amendment is to enable the market authority to obey any orders which they may receive from the Board of Agriculture. That may very easily be done; but if no cattle have been sold by weight in the market, the market authority would be unable to make the return. They would be unable to do so unless they had the power of weighing cattle for that purpose. Of course, in that case it would not be just that the market authority should charge any fees.

Amendment moved, In clause 3, page 1 line 30, at end of clause, to add, ("such market authority may, for the purpose of making a prescribed return, cause any cattle which have been sold at the market to be weighed without fee.")—(The Earl of Camperdown.)

EARL CADOGAN: The Amendment appears to meet the views of noble Lords on both sides of the House, and I entirely agree.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Will that make it compulsory?

EARL CADOGAN: I think so.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I should like that to be understood, whether it would cause them to be compulsorily weighed.

EARL CADOGAN: I read it so. It provides, first, that the market authority should send the returns to the Board of Agriculture, and then that for the purpose of making the prescribed return, they shall cause any cattle which have been sold at the market to be weighed without fee. The word "cause" means that they should be compulsorily weighed.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: But might it not give rise to great inconvenience and annoyance if they select particular cattle and compulsorily weigh them? I think that might cause great discontent.

EARL CADOGAN: The fact is, that this will practically result in a general compulsory weighing. The chief object of the clause is to obtain statistics which will be of value, and it is very obvious that if there were no provision rendering weighing to a large extent obligatory, the statistics obtained would be of very slight value.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: This provision would introduce compulsory weighing. It is a very great change in the law, and I should be glad to know whether it has been ascertained that it will be acceptable throughout the country. I am not saying anything against the weighing of cattle, but I know there is the greatest objection on the part of farmers to have their cattle weighed, and I am afraid if you introduce this clause it will cause an amount of discontent which perhaps we do not foresee.

*EARL SPENCER: As far as I understand, the object of this clause is not to introduce compulsory weighing; but in some markets they are obliged to make a statement founded on the weighing of cattle, and it is in order to enable the authorities in those local markets to obtain the necessary particulars to enable them to make the returns. I should think it would lead to little difficulty as a matter of fact, because in every market there will always be a considerable number of cattle weighed, and, therefore, practically there will be no difficulty in obtaining the information.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: I think I can make it quite plain. If your Lordships will look at Clause 3, that states that the market authority is to send to the Board of Agriculture returns, at such intervals and in such form as the Board of Agriculture may prescribe. Now, if it so happened that there were no cattle sold by weight in that market, so as to enable the return to be made, the market authority would not be able to comply with the orders so received from the Board of Agriculture, and in such cases one or two beasts might be weighed under the clause for the purpose of making the prescribed return, and for that purpose only. If your Lordships look at the Amendment, you will see this power of weighing is simply for the purpose of making the prescribed return. It does not give them a general power of weighing the cattle whenever they wish, in every market.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I am very pertinacious, I am afraid, but I am not at all satisfied about this. I do not think my noble Friend has rightly interpreted the clause in the Bill. That clause enables them to make a return; it does not compel them to make a return of cattle weighed if none have been weighed. If there are no cattle weighed, of course there will be no return.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: The words are "and the price of the cattle sold thereat"; that is, whether weighed or not.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: If you are going to give a general power of weighing it will lead to compulsion, and I think we are introducing an Amendment without sufficient consideration, and the result of which we do not foresee.

Amendment agreed to.

EARL CADOGAN: I have an Amendment, to leave out Sub-section 3 of Clause 3, and to insert the following words:—

"(3.) If a market authority makes default in complying with the requirements of this section, it shall, for each offence, be liable on summary conviction, to a fine not exceeding twenty pounds, or in case of a continuing offence, to a fine not exceeding ten pounds for every day during which the offence continues." (The Earl Cadogan.)

Really this provides for a fine not exceeding £20, instead of the power which previously existed, taking away the power of exacting tolls from the Market Authority. That, it is considered, would be too high a penalty, and I move this Amendment to insert instead a fine not exceeding £20.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 3, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 4.

EARL CADOGAN: Then in line 19, after the word "who," I move to insert certain words, the object of which is to make it clear that returns are asked for from auctioneers in the scheduled towns.

Amendment moved, in page 2, line 19, after ("who") to insert ("in any place from which returns are required to be made under this Act").—(The Earl Cadogan.)

Amendment agreed to.

EARL CADOGAN: The next Amendment, in line 26, is for the purpose of extending to a company or persons who employ a market clerk as auctioneer, the liability to comply with the requirements of the Act.

Amendment moved, in line 26, leave out ("he") and insert ("the auctioneer, or if he is in the employment of any person, the person by whom he is employed"). (The Earl Cadogan.)

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 4 as amended, and Clause 5 agreed to.

Clause 6, and schedule, agreed to, with verbal Amendments.

Bill recommitted to the Standing Committee; and to be printed as amended. (No. 243.)

AGRICULTURE (IRELAND.)

*THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD, in putting the question on the Notice Paper in his name, "Whether Her Majesty's Government have considered the immense benefit that might be derived by organised assistance to agriculture in Ireland; and whether, for that purpose, they propose to establish an agricultural department for that country," said: My Lords, before I ask Her Majesty's Government the question which stands in my name, I should like to say a very few words with regard to the reason why I put this question. Your Lordships are aware that in Ireland, as the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) stated the other night, large numbers of landlords will certainly from time to time leave the country, in consequence of the fact that their properties will have been sold, and there will be no great inducement for them to remain. I hope sincerely, however, that a very large number will remain, but there is no doubt that many will leave Ireland. Then there is another thing which I will point out to your Lordships; that is, that the landlords have had no inducement to try and improve the agriculture of the country since the Act of 1881 was passed. That which has been called the "unearned increment" has been taken away from the landlords. I believe that since the Act of 1881 was passed, hardly any money has been laid out in improvements in the way of buildings or otherwise, whereas large sums were laid out before that time. A great deal was done in Ireland by the landlords to encourage the breeding of stock, and to improve every class of agriculture. All inducements to do anything of that sort has been swept away, and now that many of the landlords are likely to leave the country, there is no possibility that anything of that sort will be resuscitated. At one time in Ireland, I can remember it well, every small locality had its Agricultural Show, as is the case in England; but now nothing of the kind takes place. We have to depend upon the Dublin Royal Agricultural Society, which has no doubt done excellent work, but it is not sufficient for the purpose, and, therefore, I propose to ask Her Majesty's Government whether they are prepared to give assistance to agriculture now by establishing a Department for that purpose. There is a Bill which has just been dealt with by your Lordships at the instance of my noble Friend below me (Earl Cadogan)—the Markets and Fairs (Weighing of Cattle) Bill. In that Bill the Land Commission is named as the market authority. Several noble Lords asked me, when the Bill was read a second time, why the Land Commission was named, and I informed them that the Land Commission was named because, under the Act of 1887, the Land Commission was empowered to find out prices throughout Ireland for the purpose of working that Bill. This had the effect of establishing an unpaid Agricultural Department in Ireland, and, of course, an unpaid Department not authorised by the State cannot do all that is required. I am, therefore, anxious that Her Majesty's Government should make a Parliamentary Grant to establish the Land Commission for this purpose, and should recognise it as an Agricultural Department. I dare say your Lordships are aware of some of the work which the Land Commission has done with regard to agriculture. I would draw your Lordships' attention to a thing which is going on throughout the country weekly, that is the publication of prices. That is done by the Land Commission, and it has been very useful work. I believe there is nothing that can be more useful to the farmer than the weighing of cattle, and I think that a thorough knowledge of the subject is necessary to be given to tenants in Ireland. The Land Commission has published a number of pamphlets and leaflets, and the inspectors have induced the farmers, as far as they can, to take up this admirable system, which prevents them from being cheated by the butchers, who have every opportunity of knowing the weight of cattle better than themselves. That is one thing the Land Commission has done. It has also published Reports as to the state of crops and the prices of all classes of corn and produce in the different districts. Well, that is the work of an Agricultural Department; but it has been done by the Land Commission. In addition to that, Her Majesty's Government, when they wanted to know what was going on in the distressed districts last year with regard to the potato famine, called upon the Land Commission to find out and report, and the Land Commission sent down Inspectors to ascertain the state of affairs in those distressed districts. The Land Commission have circulated one of the cleverest leaflets upon the potato disease that has been issued as yet. All that work is most useful for agriculture in Ireland, and I am sure it will well repay any Government who takes it up. There are some other things which this department has done. It has, by its officers, also inspected the seed potatoes given in distressed localities, and it has looked over the supply of seed potatoes under the Act of 1890. Of course, all that is proper work for a Government Agricultural Department. That is all I want to obtain. I want such a Department to be established under Government, for, believe me, there is necessity for it, for there are no people who require teaching and encouragement to improve so much as the farmers of Ireland. I would point out to your Lordships that under the Bill which has lately passed your Lordships' House—the Land Purchase and Congested Districts Bill—the working of that Bill is thrown upon the Land Commission. Now, what will the Land Commission have to do? It will have to provide sires of all classes of stock in those districts; it will have to instruct the farmers as to dairying, as to the produce of poultry, and as to every form of agriculture. In addition, there is a particular clause in the Bill for supplying seed potatoes to the different localities, and in fact it has to do everything in those districts for the promotion of agriculture and cultivation. I think, therefore, this is distinctly pointed out as the proper Department to be named as the Agricultural Department in Ireland. Some noble Lords have asked me whether I wished to establish an Agricultural Department as opposed to the Dublin Society. Nothing of the sort ever came into my mind. I wish the Agricultural Department in Ireland to act with the Royal Dublin Society. You have a Royal Agricultural Society in England, and the Department presided over by my right hon. Friend Mr. Chaplin does not run counter to the Royal Agricultural Society. Then why should this Department run in any way counter to the Dublin Society? There is a great deal of other work that may be done. There is a great deal of work in the future, and if your Lordships wish any good to be done in the way of agriculture in Ireland, it is absolutely necessary that some Government Department should come forward to take the place of the landlords who have been driven out by the Act of 1881. They have been rendered useless as to the improvement of agriculture by that Act, and it is necessary, as Parliament has passed such an Act, that the Government should come forward and constitute some body to take their place. I think the farmers in Ireland would be most anxious to take advantage of such opportunities, which would be of the greatest benefit to them, and I am sure that in another place any proposal which would tend to teach agriculture in Ireland by a Parliamentary grant, and to improve the most important industry in the country, would be most welcome, and I therefore hope my noble Friend below me will be able to give a satisfactory answer to my question.

EARL CADOGAN: My Lords, nobody can be surprised that my noble Friend, who is so interested in everything connected with agriculture in Ireland, should have asked the question of which he has given notice. I am afraid I am hardly able to go as far as he would wish in my reply, and that therefore perhaps he will not consider my answer entirely satisfactory; but I can only say Her Majesty's Government do fully recognise the necessity of organising assistance to agriculture in Ireland; and they are at this moment considering what measures they can adopt in that direction. But I am afraid that I cannot at present announce that the Government are prepared to establish, as the noble Marquess suggests, an Agricultural Department in that country. As the noble Marquess has said, the Government have, in connection with the Irish Land Commission, organised already a Land Department, which has so far done good work, and which, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, appears to be fitted to perform the functions, or, at all events, some of the functions, in connection with agriculture. I may, perhaps, inform my noble Friend that some correspondence has taken place on this subject, and if he desires it, and will move for it, there is no objection to laying the whole of the correspondence on the Table of the House.

*THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: Then, my Lords, I beg to move for that correspondence.

Motion agreed to,

"Any correspondence which may have taken place on the subject of the development of agriculture in Ireland: Ordered to be laid before the House."—(The Lord Tyrone [M. Waterford].)

WIMBLEDON REVIEW.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

EARL WEMYSS, in rising to call attention to the absence of Volunteer artillery at the recent Wimbledon Review, and to ask the reason why, said: I know your Lordships are naturally anxious to get into Committee on the Education Bill, but I pray your Lordships for a few moments while I refer to this question of the Volunteer Artillery, as so much of the national safety depends on the existence and prosperity of that branch of the Volunteer Force. It may appear to some captious and uncalled-for to allude to what I think a very great omission on the occasion of the Review before the German Emperor at Wimbledon last Saturday week, but unquestionably there was then a very marked omission. At that composite Review, composed of a portion of the Regular Army and also of the Volunteer Force, the Regular Army marched past in full panoply—horse, foot, and artillery; the Volunteers marched past in battalions, without any artillery at all. Now, let me ask, what was the object of this Review? I believe it was held at the anxious desire of the Emperor, to enable him to judge, with his critical eye, and to enable his military staff, with their critical eyes, to judge of the efficiency of our Volunteer Force. I believe he was perfectly satisfied as regards the efficiency of the battalions that passed before him, as regards the physique, discipline, and general conduct. That he was pleased with the general character of the troops which passed before him, I believe there can be no doubt, for he has so expressed himself on more than one occasion, both publicly and privately. But there was, I maintain—and so it appears to many who are interested in the force—a very grave omission in not showing the Emperor that this Volunteer force was something more than a mere body of infantry, and that they have at their back a considerable force of artillery. We all know in these days that an army without artillery is comparatively helpless; and, mark this, the Emperor and his staff knew as well as anybody in this country knows, who may be consulted about it, that you cannot look to the regular army and artillery to supply the wants of the Volunteers and Militia as regards artillery. There is hardly enough of artillery at the present time, in case of war, for the army and the army reserve. Now, I want to know why this omission took place at the late Review. The present Government cannot have wished to hide them, for they have been, much to their credit, cultivating this force of artillery, and I can conceive no other than two possible grounds for the omission: one was the cost, and the other was want of space. I will put the question of cost aside, for it is impossible that it would have cost any great expense to bring up these batteries, or some of them. It is impossible that can have been the reason. It would have been better if there had been present even one battery of a force which, I believe, is unique in the world—heavy guns, 40-pounders, drawn by farm horses, driven by teamsters on foot, in their smock-frocks. I venture to say that if such a battery, or even one gun, could have been brought up as a sample, it could not have failed to impress the Emperor and his staff with the great capabilities which exist in this country of bringing an effective artillery into the field, an artillery which would crush, from the comparative range and power of the 40-pounders, any fire that could be brought to bear against them. Now I come to the question of space. I cannot but believe that if the whole force had been there, by a little arrangement, space could have been found. I will except the space which was enclosed, and suppose that no flat ground further than that was available there, and that there was not space within the enclosure, in addition to the troops there massed, cavalry, infantry, and royal artillery, for Volunteer Artillery. But there was the whole county of Surrey outside. There is that long triangular common outside Wimbledon where those guns could have been massed, at any rate a battery of them or more, and they could have been brought forward at the proper moment to have marched past the Emperor at the rear of the force. I have said I am surprised that Her Majesty's Government did not somehow or other insist upon its being done. Upon their objections and the use of the word "impossible," which ought not to exist in the case of any great public department, I would point out that the present Secretary of State for War, speaking in Lincolnshire in April last, I think, talked of the revival of the Volunteer Artillery "field and light guns," and of those being, as he expressed it, "a tremendous experiment." It is no experiment at all. It is very strange the treatment which from the first the Volunteer Artillery has received from the military authorities. I hold here a few short extracts which I have made from a general statement made to me as to the force of Volunteer Artillery that existed in the year 1862, and for a few years afterwards. As regards light artillery, there were three 6-pounders at the review of 1862, under Lord Clyde, besides 12 guns of position, 40-pounders; but in 1863 there were 30 guns in the force, of which Lord William Paulett had the command, 10 heavy and 20 light, and he said they surpassed his expectations. A Royal Commission had recommended in the previous year the extension of that force. In 1865 Sir Robert Walpole, who commanded at the Easter Review, where there were 46 guns, 26 light and 20 heavy, praised the working of the light guns. In 1866 the Duke of Cambridge at a review said the guns which were on the ground were all in good order. In the same year Sir Richard Garrett spoke in high terms of the manœuvring of the artillery over ground which was difficult for artillery to work on. But in 1866 a dead set was made in the papers against this Volunteer Artillery. In the Army and Navy Gazette articles were written against it, and the military critic of the Times, Sir Chas. Brackenbury, made assaults upon it. Notwithstanding that, they continued till 1871. That is the last record we have of the appearance of Volunteer Artillery at the Easter Review, both light and heavy. At that review there were 52 guns, and of those 32 were light field-pieces, the remainder being heavy guns. Sir Hope Grant commanded, and he reported that notwithstanding their condition the Volunteer Field Artillery should be solely confined to garrison duty. On the strength of that report I suppose, and on the strength of the dead-set which had been made against the Volunteer Artillery, about two or three years afterwards it was abolished. There was no question of its existence or its fitness; it had proved its ability to do its work, and I venture to question the soundness of the view taken by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War, when he says that in doing this which is of great public service to the nation, the Government are undertaking "a tremendous experiment." I have shown you that from 1862 down to 1873 this experiment has been tried and carried out with signal success. We have now revived this great force, and I think the omission to which I call your Lordships' attention is very unfortunate. I regret it for the two causes I have named. One is that by their not being present the Emperor has only half an idea of what the character of this defensive force is. Again,

I regret that this force was not shown on that occasion, as it would have tended to show the public also what that force could do, and what has been the result of the action of the Government in the establishment of this very effective artillery force for home defence. It was not for want of pressure, for I know my noble Friend on my right who commands the oldest corps in the country, the Hon. Artillery Company, pressed the Government to find room for the few guns they have, and he received the answer which I expect I shall receive, that there was no space; but, as I say, a little arrangement might have made that space, and rendered this Review more complete than it was, successful though it might have been.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Earl BROWNLOW): My Lords, I should like to point out in the first place that the question put by the noble Earl on the cross-benches is not quite on all fours with the speech he has made. His question is to call attention to the absence of Volunteer Artillery at the Wimbledon review. His speech asks really why the Volunteer Artillery had not their guns present at the review; that is not quite the same thing. I should like to inform the House so far from there having been no artillery present, as a matter of fact 1,219 Volunteer Artillerymen were on the ground, and marched past the Emperor.

EARL WEMYSS: I meant guns.

EARL BROWNLOW: I do not wish to take refuge behind a verbal criticism. I merely mention that to show that there was no wish on the part of the authorities to pass over the artillery as a branch of the Service. I now come to the question which the noble Lord really puts, which is, Why the guns were not present on that occasion. The noble Lord is quite right in supposing that the question of cost had nothing to do with the matter. It would not have been very serious; and on an occasion when the desire was to show the Emperor all that he could see, of course, that small question of expense was not for one moment to be considered. The noble Earl is perfectly right in supposing that the real reason why it was considered by the military authorities not advisable to have guns present on that occasion was the question of space. It having been decided (whether rightly or wrongly is merely a matter of opinion) to hold the review at Wimbledon, that made it necessary the review should be held in a somewhat restricted area. It was impossible to know beforehand for certain the exact number of men there would be on the ground, and some small margin had to be left in case more should come than the numbers that were sent in; and, in fact, that was the case. There were more present than the numbers which had been sent in, and I am informed there was very little spare space anywhere, and that in some cases the troops were somewhat crowded. The noble Earl says there was a whole county behind in which the artillery might have been placed, and then brought up and marched past, as I understand him, after the infantry had gone by. I cannot think this would have been advisable. In the first place the artillery have their own position, which they are proud of, and I do not think they would have liked to be placed in a position which does not belong to them. There is another thing of which your Lordships are aware; a great review of this sort is a question of measurement. The size of the ground has to be measured, the position of the troops has to be allocated, and the time for marching past carefully calculated. If the artillery had been placed somewhere at a distance, the chances are, after the infantry had marched past the Emperor, he would have had to be informed that some artillery were coming from some other place in the county of Surrey, and that if he would be good enough to wait they also would march past. I venture to think that is not a state of things which would have impressed the Emperor of Germany on this occasion, nor do I think the artillery would have been willing to have brought up the rear of a review which was otherwise in every way successful. This is the real reason why it was thought desirable not to have Volunteer artillery present. But I must say, with regard to the old and distinguished corps which my noble Friend has mentioned, commanded by my noble Friend opposite, the Hon. Artillery Company, they, properly speaking, are not technically Volunteers; they have their own place in the Army List; they derive their position from an ancient charter, a position of which they are exceedingly proud, and although they have met the wishes of the authorities in every way possible by conforming to the requirements in nearly every respect with regard to discipline and all other matters, and are as nearly as possible in conformity with the Volunteers, still they are not technically Volunteers. On this occasion the Honourable Artillery Company wished to appear on the ground with their guns, and I can only say it was out of no disrespect to them whatever it was considered desirable they should not appear. The only reason was, it having been absolutely decided that no guns should appear on the ground, it would have been invidious to allow the Honourable Artillery Company to appear and not the others. I am perfectly aware it is impossible to please everybody in a matter of this sort. This review was a military display intended to meet the wishes of His Imperial Majesty. Your Lordships are aware that during His Majesty's visit to England his time was very much taken up. On that very afternoon, he had other engagements directly after the review, and the time occupied, if artillery had been on the ground, would have been somewhat lengthened. I do not press this as the real point; it is only an additional reason for not having artillery on the ground. As far as the military part of the review went, I have every reason to believe it was successful; at any rate, the Emperor, for whose benefit it was held, has expressed his complete satisfaction with the appearance and efficiency of the Volunteer troops he saw that day. There is one more word I should like to say before I sit down about the Honourable Artillery Company. The Honourable Artillery Company have made great efforts lately to improve their military position; they have made great changes, and they have met the authorities in every possible way. I merely say this because I trust that the noble Lord who commands them will not suppose for one moment they were left out from any disrespect or any want of feeling for them.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION BILL.

(No. 224.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

Moved, "That the House do now resolve itself into Committee."

LORD NORTON: My Lords, if I may be allowed a very few minutes before we go into Committee, I think I can point out to your Lordships what will be worth your consideration. The Bill was discussed beside its main feature during the Debate on the Second Reading. Only one speaker, that was the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll), laid any stress at all upon what is the main distinctive feature of this Bill, namely, that it introduces for the first time free, or rather I should say State, education in the great majority of our national schools. The Bill was discussed upon other points, chiefly upon the cost of the schools, or upon the interests of voluntary schools, or upon a very important point—the interests of religious education. The noble Viscount (the Lord President of the Council) called it a continuation of the Act of 1870. It is anything but that. I saw it stated in a leading paper the other day that the great distinction between this Bill and the Act of 1870 was that this Bill introduced no new principle, whereas the Act of 1870 introduced a new principle. The exact reverse is the truth. The Act of 1870 introduced no new principle, but merely supplemented that which had gone before. This Bill introduces a totally new principle, which must have a very considerable effect upon our system of national education. What is the new principle? Why, simply this: the compulsory extinction of all parental contribution to the education of their children in the greatest number of our national schools. After this Bill becomes an Act, no school which has hitherto charged fees of 3d. a week, or less, can charge any fee whatsoever upon any parents. There are tradesmen and farmers among those parents, and a great number of them are men who are perfectly able and perfectly willing to contribute to their children's education, and who consider it rather a disgrace that they should not contribute anything. But under this Bill, all those schools which have hitherto charged 3d. a week and less, which are the largest number of schools throughout the kingdom, will be what are called free schools. The word "free" in connection with education has a very peculiar meaning. It means what is paid for by all alike, whether they make use of the school or not, whether they be parents who have children to send to school, or whether they are without children, and, therefore, do not make use of the schools at all, all are to pay alike in general taxation for the schools. But the essential point is that that is a payment indirect and unconscious, and, therefore, it does not in the slightest degree enlist the independent action of the parent in the bringing up of his child, or any individual sense of interest in the parent's mind for the child's education. Now that will have a very material effect not only upon education, but upon the spirit and character of the country. It was said by the noble Viscount, and, I think also, by the right reverend Prelate, the Bishop of London, that, after all, the schools would not be free, because the parents would be contributing practically the lost earnings of their children. This argument for free education is that the education would not be free. That kind of contribution is certainly not calculated to enlist the parent's interest in the education of his child. But, besides that, no parent of the working class ought to keep his child at school after the time when he ought to be going out to his apprenticeship to work, and within that period, so far from a loss of the child's earnings, it is a mere postponement of the child's earnings, which will be much higher in consequence of the education which he gets in the elementary schools. Therefore, the argument falls entirely to the ground. Then it was said also that the State pays already a great part of the cost of education, and therefore it is a mere question of degree if they determine to pay the whole. There can hardly be a greater mistake. In the first place, the cost to the State and the part the parents pay towards it, are not payments ejusdem generis. It is the fee, however small, that has the effect of independent action in the parent's education of his child, and also enlisting his interest in it. I observed that Dr. Lyon Playfair, in the debate in the other House, actually made use of this argument for representation in the management of the voluntary schools, to restore the interest of parents in their children which State education must necessarily destroy. I believe myself he was perfectly right, that it will be extremely difficult to compel the attendance of these children when nothing is charged for their education. What nothing is charged for is thought to be worth nothing. I know that from colonising experience. When land was offered in the Colonies for nothing, nobody came forward to take it, but if a mere shilling an acre was asked, the office was crowded with applicants the next day. These fees of 1d. or 2d. a week are necessary for giving to the parent an independent interest in the education of his child. The last and lowest argument of all is that what the State compels to be done the State must pay for. Only compare that with the old sentiment which we have so long been accustomed to, that "England expects every man to do his duty." That is not to pay for it; but to fine him for neglect. We should not only not pay the parents' fee, but fine him for neglecting his child's education. The very poor only should be paid for. People look upon money which comes from the Treasury as if it came from heaven. I heard it said in the County Councils, when the Government threw broadcast half a million of money among them last year, there were a great many who did not know what to do with it, but they said, "It is a gift: do not let us drop it." Anything coming from the Treasury is looked upon as a gift. I believe that is a symptom of national decay, this continual looking to the public purse, and I think that this is another step towards Socialism, that the people should look upon the State as a sort of educator general. This is called a Bill for "free education," and it was talked of as a boon to the people. It is not a measure of free education unless completely carried out, and then it will be no boon to workmen to pay for higher education. But that it will be carried out to the fullest extent we know perfectly well, for it has not been concealed that that is the eager intention on all sides. The London School Board has already met and discussed the question, and by a majority carried a resolution that when this Bill is passed all their schools will be thrown open perfectly free from the 1st of September, when this Bill comes into operation. The Government themselves played into that feeling when they so easily adopted the extension of the age from 14 to 15, including in the provisions of State education secondary as well as elementary education. The real gist of the Bill is, therefore, State education throughout the country, sooner or later—it may take a year or two to carry it out, but it must come—State education, without limit of age or standard, throughout the whole of this country. Points of detail in this Bill—the 17s. 6d. limit, and things of that sort—are very minor considerations to this very large change which is introduced in the education of this country. State education in Germany has not produced the kind of people that our national education in England does. The habit in that country to look to the Government, and the habit in this country to look to ourselves, make all the difference. One more word: it is said that after this Bill is passed, these free schools will only be used by the poorer classes; that the better class of artisans, for sake of exclusiveness, will educate their children at fee-paid, or some kind of private school, and that that has been the result in America. But is that a satisfactory state of things, that we should in the first place have unlimited taxation, in order to induce the working classes to give secondary education to their children, and to keep them away from the work which is really their secondary education, and that the better class of artisans shall not only be taxed for that, but should, besides, have to provide secondary education for their own children, at their own expense? I only wish to point out the gist of the Bill, which I think has not been discussed yet. As to attempting to check the Bill, I have not the least intention of attempting anything so hopeless. The Bill is equally supported upon opposite principles by both sides. I think the noble Viscount said it was “curiously opposed” by both sides. I say it is curiously supported by both sides—upon one side to avert something further and worse, and by the other side, to rush into the opening so given for the purpose of the other’s destruction. I think myself that complete State education—both on the ground of what it will be compelled to adopt as education, and still more from what it will be compelled to omit as education—in this country is not desirable.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY: My Lords, I only desire to say that I think the speech with which the Lord President introduced this measure will do much to conciliate those who have an objection to this Bill, on account of its absence of principle; and the plea of political necessity which has been put forward by and on behalf of the Government received, I think, a complete justification in the speech of the noble Earl which followed. No one will doubt the sincerity of the Lord President, when he stated to the deputation which waited on him a short time ago that he would not have brought up this Bill if he had thought it would do anything to injure the voluntary schools. But that is a matter of conjecture, the result of which time will show. But there is another matter which is conjectural too, and that is the amount of loss or gain of support which it will bring to Her Majesty’s Government. Those who most object to this Bill may, however, be driven to continue their support by the successful administration of foreign affairs by the noble Marquess at the head of the Government. There is one other question which I should desire to call your Lordships’ attention to, and that is that in a public manner the noble Marquess has spoken of this, not as free, but as assisted education. I think the recent vote of the London School Board to abolish all fees in their schools, is a slap in the face to the Bill, and also it may be said, to Her Majesty’s Government. But this is a point which will, I imagine, be put right by the proposal of the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of London); but should it not be so, if the London School Board continue unchecked, Her Majesty’s Government will, I think, find themselves obliged to bring in a Bill for its suppression, and to conduct the management of their schools by a department of the Education Office.

*THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Viscount CRANBROOK): My Lords, the two speeches which have been made do not seem to me to vary the principle which was stated in the second reading. I knew that the noble Lord near me entertained objections to this Bill, and I supposed that he would presage all kinds of calamities from its operation. But I will only ask your Lordships, in going into Committee, to remember that the Session is wearing late, and that there are a number of Amendments put down which are really meant, I think, to a great extent to polish the form of the Bill. I only hope that Amendments merely for that purpose will not be pressed, because the Bill has been drafted with great care by a skilful Parliamentary draftsman, and though some of those Amendments, if adopted, might probably alter the language expressed in the Bill for the better, I hope they will not be pressed in such a way as to render it dubious whether the other House would accept them.

On Question agreed to.

House in Committee accordingly.

Clause 1.

LORD EGERTON OF TATTON: My Lords, I have proposed an Amendment in Clause 1 in order to provide that the payment should be made quarterly. There is a very strong feeling in the North of England that the payment should be made quarterly, and not only that, but in another place a promise was made that that intention should be carried out by the insertion of a provision in the Bill. I do not know whether this is the proper place, or whether it should come in later down in the clause as moved by the right rev. Prelate, the Bishop of London; but I would urge upon Her Majesty's Government, if possible, to comply with this feeling, which is one, I think, with which they can comply without in any way altering the character of the Bill. As the Lord President said, it was impossible for this House to discuss the point when he received the deputation which I had the honour to introduce; but there is a feeling in the North of England, in many towns, that this Bill would create some difficulty without the maintenance of the denominational schools in competition with these new free schools. I trust Her Majesty's Government will consider this matter, and that in any Amendments which follow they will endeavour to meet the views of the supporters of the denominational schools in the north of England, who feel that, in some portions of this Bill which your Lordships cannot discuss, they may be somewhat hardly treated, looking at the management and treatment of the denominational schools in the South of England. I hope Her Majesty's Government will give this matter their consideration, and if necessary, deal with it on report.

Amendment moved, in Clause 1, page 1, line 5, after "paid" to insert "quarterly."—(The Lord Egerton of Tatton.)

*VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: I am quite willing that each school should be paid what it earns, and I am desirous that attention should be given to the circumstances of each case. It is very natural that the noble Lord and the right rev. Prelate should think it desirable to provide for the quarterly payment in the Bill; and I would point out that, if they put that in, it will be to the detriment of the very schools they wish to benefit. Suppose that in October a school has been open only for a month; the result would be that it would get no payment until the next quarter, which would be two months afterwards. Under the Bill it will get its first payment after inspection, and from that time they will be paid quarterly. The years do not run in the same way for all schools, but from the time of inspection each school gets paid according to its means. I can give the noble Lord and the right rev. Prelate a distinct pledge upon that subject, that though they will only be paid as mentioned, they will afterwards be regularly paid as they desire. It cannot be paid as the right rev. Prelate in his Amendment suggests, in advance, for it is impossible to foresee what number of scholars will be in average attendance, but at the end of the year there will, if necessary, be an adjustment of the payments, so that too much or too little may not be paid in the year. I assure my noble Friend that such an Amendment would injure instead of benefiting these schools, and that we are quite ready to pay in the first instance when the money is earned, going on with the payments afterwards quarterly.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

*THE BISHOP OF LONDON: My Lords, I am much obliged to the Lord President for his explanation. It was not quite clear when it was promised that the grant should be paid quarterly, what was meant by its being paid quarterly. I supposed, as the Act was to commence on the 1st of September, the first quarterly payment would be made three months after that date, and that then it would go on three months after that date again, and so on; but, as I understand from the Lord President now, it is not intended to pay it in that way, but to make arrangements by which it will be paid quarterly in the school year of each school. That is a much more intelligible plan, and I quite agree if that is to be the arrangement for all the schools, it will be, as far as it goes, satisfactory. But still it is not perfectly clear; and I would suggest that the Lord President should add to his explanation some words to show what is really meant, and what will be the case when the Act begins on the 1st of September, if it happens that the school year begins on the 1st of October. Will the fee grant be paid for the month and thenceforward quarterly, or will it wait until four months have elapsed and then be paid quarterly?

Amendment moved,

In Clause 1, Sub-section 1, line 10, after ("10s. a year") to insert ("payable quarterly in advance.")—(The Lord Bishop of London.).

*VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: I have stated what would take place if there was an inspection of the school in October. If there was an inspection in November, two months would be paid for. That, I think, answers the question which the right rev. Prelate asks.

*THE BISHOP OF LONDON: Then with regard to the payment in advance, I put this Amendment down in order to ask the attention of the Government to what is a matter of justice. The case of these schools is this: At the beginning of the school year they have a fair balance to go on with. They get their subscriptions tolerably early in the course of the year; and they get their school-pence certainly in advance all through the year. The Government grant does not come until the close of the year, amounting, as it does in most cases, to half the income of the school. The consequence is that the normal condition of those schools is one of some difficulty; for the first eight months they go on tolerably well, but for the last four months they are in a chronic state of debt; and the only thing that keeps them going is the school-pence of the children. If you are to be strictly just, and to make the fee-grant a substitute for the school-pence, the fee grant ought to be paid in advance as much as the school-pence; otherwise you add to the difficulty. Again, the difficulty is increased by this fact, that when the schools borrow money for the last four months of the school year, as many of them are obliged to do, they are not allowed to charge, as part of the expenditure of the school, the interest they have to pay upon that money. There are, of course, some bankers who are willing to let them have the money without charging interest, but there are a considerable number, of course, who are not willing to do so; and I know cases where schools have been considerably embarrassed because of the difficulty in borrowing this money. It is certainly rather hard upon them, I submit to your Lordships, though I will not argue the question of principle now, that this expenditure which must be borne by them when they borrow money, namely, the payment of interest upon it, they are not allowed to charge. If the Government could so arrange their payments as to meet this difficulty I must say they would be doing no more than justice to those schools. I put down this Amendment for the purpose of obtaining a clear explanation of how this will work, and I do not at all desire to press it to the embarrassment of the Government, or in any way whatever to the detriment of the Bill. I venture to think, however, that paying people in advance is not likely to hurt them.

*VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: That is not the point, as I think the right rev. Prelate will see. The point is that they are only to be paid for the last three months. They are paid upon the average attendance, and there must be time for that purpose. It seems unavoidable, and there must always be that difficulty. I hope the right rev. Prelate will not press the Amendment.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

*LORD LINGEN: My Lords, I will do my utmost to observe the advice which the noble Lord—the Lord President of the Council—has given, that unnecessary and verbal Amendments, as far as any may be down in my name, should not be pressed. I venture to think, however, that the substitution of the words “average number in attendance” for “average attendance” is somewhat more than a verbal Amendment, for when in 1860 a considerable change was made in the former Minutes of the Council, and the grants came to depend upon the number of children attending and upon the length of attendance of particular children, we had to go rather minutely into this question, and to lay down rules how those numbers should be ascertained. I venture to think, for the purpose of calculating this 10s. grant, the average number of children in attendance is the basis which it is necessary to take. It is 22 years since I was at the Education Department, but certainly in my day we should have understood by the “average attendance” the number of days which each child had attended if he attended at all during the year. Having stated that I think this is a point which it is desirable to clear up, I am quite content to leave the matter in the hands of the Lord President, if he prefers the words in the clause as it now stands.

*VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: The words have been considered. It is thoroughly understood what is meant by “the children in average attendance,” and there will be found a statement in the interpretation clause which gives the meaning of the phrase under the Code.

*LORD LINGEN: I do not desire to press the Amendment.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

*LORD SANDFORD: My Lords, the object of my first Amendment is to secure as far as possible that the new grants given by this Bill should neither be taken advantage of for the purpose of further interference with the organisation and course of instruction of our elementary schools, which has already made too great progress under the ambitious Codes of late years, nor so used as to delay the coming reform of our system of secondary education to which the noble Viscount (the Lord President), when moving the Second Reading, referred as impending. I am afraid that the extension, as proposed by the Bill, of the system of fee grants to children up to the age of 15 years will have the mischievous effect which I point out. It is now 25 years since a very strong Educational Commission, the Schools Inquiry Commission, laid down what I may call certain educational canons. One of those canons referred to the differentiation of the various grades of schools—elementary, secondary, and higher—according to the ages of the children attending. The Commissioners defined elementary schools in respect of the age of scholars as those which children were to attend up to the age of 14; secondary schools as schools which they were to attend up to the age of 16; and the higher schools as for scholars up to 18 or 19. They did not mean, as many have supposed, that a boy was to remain at an elementary school until the age of 14, and then pass on to the secondary school, where he was to continue his education to 16, and then pass up to the higher school; but as your Lordships are aware that boys are admitted to Harrow or Rugby at 14 or 15, so the proper age of migration from the elementary to the secondary schools was fixed by them at 11 or 12. According to that rule, the work of the revision of many hundreds of secondary schools by the Endowed Schools Commissioners during the last 21 years has been carried on. Now, what does this Bill do by continuing the payment of fees for scholars in elementary schools up to the age of 15? According to the Code at present a boy may remain and be paid for under the Code until he is 14 and has also passed the 7th

Standard. If he has not passed the 7th Standard he may remain in the school, and grants may be paid for him until he is even 16 or 17. He ought properly to pass the 7th Standard by the age of 13. The Code therefore allows him an extra year to complete his curriculum. Then comes in this Bill which carries on his instruction under that Standard of the Code for three years; that is, it gives the scholar the 3 years, from 12 to 15, in which to complete the course which he ought to finish at 13. I should like to refer to the class of children who are found in elementary schools upwards of 14 years of age. They are either dullards, who have not been able to pass their proper standard with two years' instruction instead of one; or they are children of well-to-do parents who wish their children to remain at the schools, and are very well able to pay for them; or, in the third place, they are scholars who are enabled to attend school by means of exhibitions. Now, if these last boys are clever boys I think they ought not to be encouraged to remain at elementary schools, but should pass on to secondary schools at 12 with the aid of exhibitions. If they are the children of parents who can well afford to pay for them, I think the parents ought to do so without a fee grant. If they are dullards, instead of remaining two years longer at school the sooner they get to work the better. I have been asked, "Why do you grudge the £16,000 or £17,000 which will be required to carry out the 15 age clause, when you accept so gratefully the £160,000 required to give free education to children between three and five." The education of children between three and five is sound in principle, I think, because these little blessings, as they are called, who attend infant schools at that age often do receive in them a considerable amount of valuable instruction. They learn a little, indeed a good deal, under the modern system of infant inspection; while good manners, good habits, and obedience are inculcated in them. Beyond that, the fact that they are enabled to be kept at school and paid for there frees their elder brothers and sisters from the necessity of having to stay at home to look after them in case the bread winner, who goes to work, is either a widow or widower. As I have just said, I think the proposal to give £16,000 or £17,000 to retain the elder class of scholars at school is fallacious, because if they are clever they ought to be advanced to a secondary school at 12, and if they are stupid the sooner they go to work the better after they are 14. It is very curious how, in the course of the Debates on this Bill—not only in this House, but in the other House of Parliament—reference has been made to free education in France, America, Victoria, and other parts of the world; but no one seems to have remembered that we have had for the last two years a system of free education going on in this country under the superintendence of two noble Peers whom I see sitting in this House, one being the Lord President of the Council himself. Not a single fact has been told you, not a single lesson has been drawn from the results of this free education in Scotland; but something rather singular, and bearing upon the question now before this House, has just happened there. When this Bill was altered in the House of Commons, by the extension of the age for fee-grants from 14 to 15, several Scotch Members moved that a Minute recently issued by the Scotch Education Department should be altered so as to raise from 14 to 15 the age to which free education should be given in Scotland. The Minute had fixed the limit of age at 14 when this Bill was introduced into the House of Commons, with the age of 14 as the maximum. Within the last few days representations have been made to the Department by several large School Boards in Scotland entreating the Department to stick to the age of 14, and not to raise it to 15; and why? because, my Lords, secondary education is in the air in Scotland; and the advocates of it are numerous. I believe they are even now knocking at the Treasury door, and that a measure on this subject is not merely receiving Government attention or consideration, but that it is under serious consideration, and we all know what that means. The reason for retaining 14 as the maximum limit of fee grants is this: the Educational authorities in Scotland do not wish that the re-organisation of the system of secondary education in that country should be delayed by the introduction of, what I may call, a bastard system of secondary education by the prolongation of the attendance of scholars in elementary schools up to 15. I hope, after what the noble Viscount the Lord President said, in moving the Second Reading of the Bill, as to the reform of our secondary system, and in view of the feeling existing with regard to it in this country, he will not object to this Amendment.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: My Lords, I am very glad to hear the voice of the noble Lord for the first time in this House, especially on a subject upon which he is so very well qualified to speak. With regard to the Amendment he has proposed, I must adhere to what I said upon the Second Reading, that this limit was fixed after a long discussion, when it was proposed to carry the extension of the age very much further. This age was accepted as a compromise by my colleagues in the other House, and I should not feel myself justified in any way to depart from the engagement which they then made. No doubt the age of 14 is not at present a bar to receiving grants under the Education Code, if the child over 14 has not passed the Seventh Standard. But now the peculiar circumstance will exist that a child over 14 may be receiving fee-grants, having passed the Seventh Standard, but will not receive the other grants. That being so, I think the harm which might be done by it will be much minimised, and on that ground I think there is no reason why I should withdraw from the position that has been taken.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON: I cannot quite see how the mischief will be minimised in the way the noble Viscount the Lord President suggests, because the result will be that the particular school will have to bear the burden of the education of these children without getting any of the grants; and the boys themselves will get this education for nothing. It does not seem to me that is very likely to work well for the schools, though it may work very well, possibly, for the boys. I do not know whether the noble Lord means to go to a Division upon the point, but for myself I feel very strongly indeed that the importance of this matter with regard to secondary education is so great that if we do go to a Division I must vote for the Amendment, because I do believe that we are actually suffering very much from the want of real organisation of our secondary instruction; and I believe all such changes as are proposed here are in the direction of postponing the organisation of secondary education, putting it further off, and hampering it when the time for it arrives. It will be exceedingly difficult to make a good system of secondary education if before that time you have already broken into it by all sorts of systems of providing for the boys in all sorts of elementary schools. There is urgent necessity, as I hold, for the Government to undertake the organisation of secondary education without delay, and this clause will be a real difficulty in their way. It was a little before 1870 that the School Inquiry Committee reported upon the matter; but there has been nothing done, because there has been no one high in office who has found it to his political interest to take it up. But the national interest has required it for a considerable time; and all this time whatever we have done in the higher class of education as regards the elementary schools, has been distinctly in the opposite direction, and the question has been postponed—and wrongly, as I think, postponed—and it will seriously hinder that organisation which is absolutely necessary to complete that educational system. I would recall what was said by Mr. Matthew Arnold, one of our greatest educational authorities. He said, not long before his death, again and again, "Organise your secondary education." He felt that this was what was wanted to make the elementary education itself perfect, and it is quite certain that your elementary education is now suffering, because, instead of giving an opportunity to boys of real ability to have a better kind of education, it is now given in the elementary schools, which are intended for a different purpose, and this makes the elementary schools necessarily more costly, and meanwhile the boys who ought to have this advantage do not get it.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: I would only observe on that point that, much as

I should like to see intermediate and secondary education introduced, schools ought at all events to be provided, but the first difficulty is that there is no provision for other schools for these boys to go to. I quite agree it is desirable that there should be the graded schools; but at present they do not exist, and there is a very limited amount of education allowed by the additional year. Though, as I said before, I do not think myself this is absolutely necessary, being there I am prepared to support it.

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE: I presume there is no obligation on the managers of the elementary schools who do not wish to retain boys beyond 14 to do so.

*VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: If they have passed the Seventh Standard there is no reason for still keeping them, but up to the Seventh Standard they can stay there.

A noble LORD: I should like to ask the Lord President whether, if a boy has passed the Seventh Standard, he will still receive the Government grant?

*VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: He will receive the fee-grant under this Bill, but not the grants under the Code.

A noble LORD: They will not receive the double grant?

*VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: No.

*LORD COLCHESTER: If the noble Lord goes to a Division upon this matter I shall certainly support him. I have a strong feeling with regard to the mischief which is done by these schools doing that which it was intended they should not do—that is to say, endeavouring to give an education higher than elementary. I admit the importance of enabling some of the cleverer boys among the elementary scholars to rise to higher education; but I say, if you intend to do that with public money, you should do it in a totally different manner to this. The way to do that is to provide exhibitions for scholars in elementary schools which will take them on to schools of a higher character. That has been already done in the case of endowed schools; and if you are going to do it by rates and taxes, I contend the way to do it is by establishing scholarships and exhibitions for those boys who have shown cleverness, who may pass on to a higher class of school, whose business it would be to give that higher class of education. I do not think the Lord President is quite correct in saying such schools do not exist; as wherever school endowments have been dealt with under the Endowed Schools Act there has been this provision made. I think this Amendment is a very important one, and if there is any Division upon it I shall certainly support it.

*EARL SPENCER: I do not wish to detain the House by speaking at any length on this matter, but I wish to raise my voice in support of the views which have been put forward by the Lord President on this subject. I think it would be an extremely regrettable matter if we went back from what is really a compromise on this subject of age. Some do not wish to put any limit at all; others wish to put the limit of 16 years, and this, as the noble Viscount, the Lord President has said, is a compromise. Your Lordships are aware there is a wide feeling in the country among school managers and others to try and induce scholars to remain longer at school, and we are giving direct encouragement to that object by enabling them to remain so long at school free. My noble Friend divided the children at schools into two classes: the clever children and the dullards. He said the clever boys ought to go to a secondary school, and not remain at these schools. The Lord President answered that very completely by pointing out that at present there is no opportunity of sending them to such schools, for in many places no such schools exist. Then we come to the other class, the dullards, and I hope your Lordships will not reproach me if I take the dullards' part. I should regret if they were always sent out merely because they had not advanced quite fast enough for their masters. There are some who are dullards, not on account of their own fault, but who have not been able to go to school, perhaps on account of illness, and it would be hard if they could not get the benefit of the Bill. I think it is desirable that they should remain in the schools. I have heard it urged that the same thing should be done in the case of other classes, such as the blind, and deaf and dumb, who ought to be allowed to remain longer at the schools. I do not wish to detain your Lordships further. I only wish to urge strongly on the House that they should not alter the age proposed in the Bill.

EARL FORTESCUE: There is one point on which the alteration of this provision should be considered, if it raises largely the number of boys in the 7th Standard in schools. In the small rural districts, or in schools in towns with a small number, an utterly disproportionate amount of toil and trouble and care will have to be bestowed by the teachers upon a very limited number under instruction. Those under instruction in such very small classes will not have the advantage of the emulation, and the company and fellowship in the same studies, which would be afforded if the scholars were in reasonable number. There will be two or three carrying on studies in classes, and, as I say, taking a disproportionate amount of the teachers' time and trouble, while at the same time obtaining far less advantage in the way of instruction themselves than they would if they were, as I hold they ought to be, in the case of promising boys and girls, removed by scholarships to a secondary school, where they would work in classes reasonably numerous, with the immense advantage of carrying on their studies, not isolated or in the company of a very small number indeed, but with a reasonable number, and in a school where the studies form part of the average and regular curriculum.

Amendment negatived.

*THE BISHOP OF LONDON: The Amendment which I had next to move was intended, as your Lordships will see, as consequential on the one which is withdrawn; but perhaps I may be allowed to ask a question about this Amendment, because my purpose was to secure that it should be distinctly stated in the Act that supposing the managers of the school did not wish to receive the fee grant at the commencement of the Act, they should be at liberty to come in afterwards and receive it at a later date. Supposing, for instance, that the managers of a school decided that they would remain as they were at present, would that prevent them from coming two or three months afterwards and saying, "We now desire to receive the fee-grant and to come under the action of this Bill?" I have proposed that they should be allowed to do so at definite intervals, on the occasion of every quarterly payment; but if the noble Viscount the Lord President is willing to assure me this will be allowed, I am quite content.

Moved, in Clause 1, Sub-section 1, line 13, after "The managers of which are willing," to insert "either at the commencement of this Act or at the time of any future quarterly payment."—(The Bishop of London.)

*VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: There can be no doubt about the meaning of this provision. There is nothing to prevent the schools coming in if they are willing to receive the fee-grant. Any public elementary schools can come under the grant, as far as I can see, at any time.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

*LORD LINGEN: The Amendment which I have to bring under your Lordships' consideration upon the 2nd subsection of the 1st clause struck me, at first sight, as being one that went to the merits of the clause, and not to the mere drafting. If you read the clause down to the word "failure" it is rather wide. The section provides—

"If in any case there is a failure to comply with any of the conditions in this Act, and the Education Department are satisfied that there was a reasonable excuse for the failure."

Your Lordships will see those are extremely wide words, and would go to any failure whatever in regard to the conditions under which the grants are made. It was not until after considerable study of this provision that I found that very general condition was limited by a particular application, namely, that the Department may pay the fee-grant. I think it would have been made clearer by a different arrangement—if the subsection had been made to read differently. The meaning of the clause is apparently this: A calculation is made of 10s. on the average number of children in attendance for the year preceding a certain date, and the result of that calculation is to be the measure of the fee-grant. If the fees that are received under that calculation fall short of 10s. per scholar, the school is to get the 10s. per scholar, and not to exceed that amount. Otherwise, the schools may only charge fees which are equal to the excess. I

I should like to see intermediate and secondary education introduced, schools ought at all events to be provided, but the first difficulty is that there is no provision for other schools for these boys to go to. I quite agree it is desirable that there should be the graded schools; but at present they do not exist, and there is a very limited amount of education allowed by the additional year. Though, as I said before, I do not think myself this is absolutely necessary, being there I am prepared to support it.

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE: I presume there is no obligation on the managers of the elementary schools who do not wish to retain boys beyond 14 to do so.

*VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: If they have passed the Seventh Standard there is no reason for still keeping them, but up to the Seventh Standard they can stay there.

A noble LORD: I should like to ask the Lord President whether, if a boy has passed the Seventh Standard, he will still receive the Government grant?

I do not wish to detain your Lordships further. I only wish to urge difference would be £30. As the clause now stands the managers of the school would be able to charge the fees so as to raise the £30, whereas, if the change were made as suggested, they would only be able to raise £20, and that would be unjust. It is clear it would not be fair, when their school had risen, to keep them down to that sum which was to be raised when their school attendances were low.

LORD LINGEN: I think a clause framed on this principle has a precedent in many other Acts of Parliament where grants have to be fixed. The last year, under which a different system has prevailed, is taken as the standard by which the future is measured. I may have read it wrongly, but, as I read this section, the fees received in the year preceding the 1st January were to be the standard by which the 10s. grant was to be measured, and all I contend for is, that if there is only one year, and if that is the principle adopted in fixing what the fee-grant should be, then the total amount of fees, and not the average, should be inserted in the Bill; but I am quite content to leave it in the hands of the Lord President on the terms that he is good enough to offer.

LORD HERSCHELL: I think it does need consideration, because I confess it appears to me the words at present would meet the case which the right rev. Prelate mentions.

THE EARL OF SELBORNE: It would perhaps be made more clear, if the noble Viscount could explain what it is that is to be averaged.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: The rate of fees is based on the average of fees received in that year. As the noble Lord has said, the average attendance of the children may differ materially; therefore, you must not bind yourself to the total amount that year, but look to what is earned by the average attendances of the children in the subsequent year.

LORD HERSCHELL: It is only the average rate in one year.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee), withdrawn.

Verbal Amendments made.

Clause 2, as amended, agreed to.
The Bishop of London

EARL SPENCER: My Lords, the next Amendment is one which stands in my name, and I confess I attach considerable importance to the principle involved in it. I believe that this Bill is not intended primarily to relieve rates or voluntary subscriptions, and when we are giving this large sum, it is to ensure the free education of the children of the poor in this country. When we are giving an enormous amount by an increased grant, we should get improved education or accommodation where it is bad, for what we give. Now, I will not weary your Lordships by quoting at length any Inspectors' Reports, but I think I could show by Inspectors' Reports that in both these particulars there is great deficiency at this moment in England. If you take any of the Inspectors' Reports, you will find they say that the education is deficient in one respect or another; you will find the sanitary conditions, the ventilation, or the size of the school is deficient. I need not therefore go into that, as it can be amply proved without my troubling your Lordships with any quotations on the subject. Then, with regard to the profits that will be made under the Bill, I can show your Lordships conclusively by one or two cases that in some cases there will be very large profits. There are some cases, indeed, in which I hardly know how they will be dealt with at all where there is good teaching and good accommodation in the school, and the school has a large endowment, and does not depend on subscriptions. What is to be done in a case of that sort? I only refer to that in passing, because I think that is a case which will be difficult to deal with; but my Amendment does not touch that kind of case, but only cases where there will be considerable profit and where either the education is deficient or the accommodation bad in the school. With regard to profits I will take as examples two schools in Wales. One in Carnarvon. There there are 16 in average attendance, fees £32, subscriptions £40 odd; they will receive under the fee grant £81, and there will therefore, be a direct gain there of £3 and they will be able to go on without any subscriptions at all. Then, another case of a school in Denbigh: the average attendance is 259, fees £66, subscriptions £21, total £88, the fee-grant will £129, and as their subscriptions are only £21 they will get a gain of over £20. I think those are cases where it is right that the Department should demand improved education or improved accommodation if possible. But my proposition does not touch only voluntary schools. It touches equally Board schools. I have a case in Monmouthshire, where I have taken out the results in 20 schools. The average attendances are 5,663, the fee-grants £2,831, the amount now received £1,499; that is a clear gain of £1,332 to those 20 schools. The rates amount to £14,100, or 14s. per head, which shows that the rate is not excessive. I do not understand that it is desirable in all these cases either that the subscribers or the school rates should benefit. There are, no doubt, some cases where the standard of education has been kept up very high and where the contribution is good. My Amendment would not deal with cases of that sort, and I think it cannot be doubted that in such cases relief should be given. I shall be probably assured by the noble Viscount that the Government had wished that there shall be improved education and improved accommodation in schools, and that they will do all that by means of the Code. That, no doubt, may be so, but I think Parliament ought to have some guarantee that this will be done, and I think it would strengthen the hands of the Department in insisting upon improved education and improved accommodation if such a clause somewhat like that which I have put down is inserted. In another place this was moved in various forms, and this very Amendment which I have put down was proposed and received very large support from all sides of the House. I, therefore, sincerely hope Her Majesty's Government will favourably consider my proposal, and I think it would be very right when we are making this enormous additional grant to public elementary schools, and putting this profit in the hands of managers of schools, that we should get some guarantee that education and accommodation shall be improved.

 "In the case of any school where the fee-grant exceeds the amount received in fees during the school year ended last before the first day of January one thousand eight hundred and ninety-one, an annual sum equal to such excess shall (unless the Education Department certify that such expenditure is not necessary or expedient), be expended by the school board or managers of such school in one or more of the ways following (that is to say): on rebuilding, enlargement, or improvement of the school buildings, the provision of school books, plant, and apparatus, the payment of additional staff or of special teachers for drawing, cookery, laundry work, science, drill, or manual instruction, or for any other proper educational purpose from time to time sanctioned by the Education Department."—

(The Earl Spencer.)

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: My Lords, I am quite as anxious for the improvement of education as the noble Earl opposite, but I cannot think it would be either just or right to agree to the clause he has proposed. With regard to the cases he has cited it is perfectly true where you take the average throughout the country, it is of necessity that some will gain and some will lose. I do not know how you can deal with it in any other way. It would be difficult in any statute of this description for any such term to be imposed upon schools as is proposed by the clause or resolution—it is in the nature of an instruction to the Education Department to take certain steps. I cannot help remarking that the noble Earl on the previous occasion was not in favour of a central system. I would remind those who heard the noble Earl make his speech on the Second Reading that he urged that nothing could be so bad as to keep this central system in the Department, and to put the burdens on it which were proposed, and yet he suggests that there should be an additional burden cast upon them for this purpose, and for that reason to stereotype for ever the sum of money obtained in the last year as an average fee. Nothing could be more unjust. The school may, for some reason or another, not have been in its average state, certainly not in its best state, or it may have been rapidly improving, and adding to the numbers of scholars which frequent it, and in that case, by the mere addition to the numbers, and getting the fee-grant, it would improve the school as it went on. Under the Code the Education Department has power to deprive the school of the annual grant unless it is efficient. Look at what the Education Department is called on by this Amendment to undertake. They are to see whether the school shall employ the money in re-building or making necessary improvements in the building, in providing school books or appurtenances, in the payment of its staff of teachers, in teaching cookery, drill, or in any other way which may be sanctioned by the Educational Department. If you want a centralising system you have got it there. There is the centralising system which is to go on for ever, and which is to impose these conditions which do not exist under the Code. I ought to remind your Lordships that by the Code, as at present constituted, if the Inspectors find the schools efficient without entering into the question whether they have money or not—it is not a contingency—upon their Report the grant is given; if not, warning is given, and if they do not put things in order and improve the education, the grant is taken away. Nothing can be done in the way in which my noble Friend has suggested. My noble Friend has spoken of these schools in Wales, and says that 14s. is not a high rate. If you look at the School Boards throughout the country I think your Lordships will see it is extremely high. In Manchester I believe it is only 7s., that is to say, half the amount; and in those cases in order to keep the fees low the rates have been extremely high. The noble Lord did not tell us how high those fees were, or how they were distributed over the schools. It seems to me a very unreasonable thing if, by an excessive expenditure of rates, many boroughs and municipalities, and others, have been keeping up their schools in a very high condition, that when they get this additional grant for fees, having kept them at a low rate, they get more than those who had kept them at a high rate. Take the case of Birmingham. The Birmingham fees are about 5s. 9d. in the Board Schools. The rates are 18s. 8d.; they get 10s., and they will have 4s. 3d. over the average of what those fees have hitherto been. If they have got their schools to perfection, are they to do nothing in the way of lowering the rates? Take another instance: How are you to go on? How can you be sure that subscriptions will go on? I have known cases where people have been good subscribers, but they have died, or they have been succeeded by others of a different religious persuasion, or who for other reasons may entirely withdraw their subscriptions from the school. The managers have no power to interfere with that. The subscriptions will not go on, and they must get something over in order to keep the schools efficient. With the best intentions you would by this be burdening the Education Department in a way which no Department could bear. It would be in perpetual collision with all the schools which got more than hitherto; and instead of a happy and easy working of the system, you will bring yourselves into trouble continually with schools throughout every part of the country.

Amendment negatived.

Clause 3.

THE BISHOP OF MANCHESTER: Before the right rev. Prelate moves the next Amendment, I should like the noble Viscount the Lord President to give some explanation of this clause, the construction of which causes difficulty in the minds of a great many people. The clause provides that in any school receiving these grants where the average rate charged in respect of fees and books "and for other purposes." I wish to ask does that mean charged and received from the parents? Then it goes on to provide that where the average during the last year before the 1st January 1891, is "Not in excess of 10s. a year for each child that the number of children in average attendance at the school,"

no charge shall be made to the parents I presume that means the total number of children of all ages in average attendance, and I should like to know whether this point is intended.

*VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: It means within the ages under this Act, that would be within the ages of 3 and 15.

THE BISHOP OF MANCHESTER: It does not say so. It says, "The number of children in average attendance at the school," which I understand to mean the total number of children, and I may say this was the understanding of many others with whom I have been in communication.

*VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: No.

THE BISHOP OF MANCHESTER: Then it goes on to provide that in such a case no charge shall be made upon any parent in respect of any scholar. I think the Lord President is going to move an Amendment upon this section.

*VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: Oh, yes; at the end.

THE BISHOP OF MANCHESTER: Then I would ask what is meant by the definition in Clause 3 between these words "the average rate charged and received." Does it mean in respect of fees, books, and all other purposes whatever, for this to free the schools and children of all ages—to make the schools completely free?

*VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: It means within this Act from the ages of 3 to 15.

THE BISHOP OF MANCHESTER: Surely, then, that ought to be expressed.

LORD HERSCHELL: I would call attention to this. I understood the Lord President to say that the average attendance refers to the Code. I quite see that there is an interpretation of "average attendance." It would be quite intelligible, but as I gather, attendance can only be reckoned in the case of children between 3 and 14. Under this Act it goes further. Would not there need to be some alteration made?

*VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: I think not; because it is between 3 and 15. It is so provided. You have already got it that a grant is to be made between the ages of 3 and 15, so that the "child" mentioned in this B third Clause, is the same kind of child as is spoken of in the former section. In that way the noble Lord will see that if we allowed the charge to be made for books, and so on, you would be in that way putting a penalty on the children, where the whole of the expense for books, and everything else has been heretofore borne by the school.

*THE BISHOP OF LONDON: I propose in line 16 to insert the words "or remitted" after "received." It applies to many schools. Of course, schools very often have children who pay no fees at all, because the Guardians pay the fees for them; but it is a very unpleasant thing for parents to have to go to the Guardians to get these fees paid for them, and they very much dislike it. It is rather hard, I think, that in such a matter as this they should have been rendered quasi paupers. This is felt to be so, and in a good many cases the managers, in order to spare them this necessity, have themselves remitted the fees without requiring the parents to go to the Guardians at all; and they have, therefore, neither received those fees from the parents nor from the Guardians. It is very hard, I think, that in consequence of their desire to do what was best for the children and parents too, they should be eventually fined, and heavily fined, as they will be under this Bill; because their generosity will be taken to mean that the rate of fees is so much lower than they would have been in accordance with the rules of the school. They have given these children their money, and they are to be called upon to persist in giving it at a time when all the other children are receiving it from the State. I think that is exceedingly hard upon managers who have been obviously endeavouring to do what they considered their duty to the children in the school. If your Lordships will insert the words "or remitted," the result would be that in all such cases where children have been in the school, and have not paid the fees because the managers have given them up, the managers would not now suffer from their generosity.

Amendment moved, in Clause 3, line 16, after "and receive," to insert "or remitted."—(The Lord Bishop of London.)

*VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: Upon consultation with my Colleagues and others, though I have endeavoured in every way possible to see whether this could be done, I am afraid we should not be able to provide for remission. What does remission mean? I find that some fees have been remitted from 1d. up to 6d. If 6d. be the high fee of the school, is it a remission to charge that? It is a very serious question, and it is one which we cannot solve. I am afraid, therefore, with the greatest desire to meet this, we have found it absolutely impossible to do so.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I sympathise with the feelings of the right rev. Prelate upon this matter, but I feel that it is quite impossible for the Department to accede to his wish. I cannot help thinking that when we deal with the question of low grants, we must consider that giving back a thing will not show that you have not received it. Foregoing that which, if you had pressed for it, you would have received, is in constant commercial practice treated as actually receiving it, and I think, when you come to test it, in a great majority of cases it will turn out that it is treated under the Statutes as having been received.

*THE BISHOP OF LONDON: I am glad to hear that statement from the noble Marquess the Prime Minister; it is certainly new to me. I should have thought the decision would rest with the Department itself, and that they would say, "You return this as a part of your expenditure, and we will stand upon that;" but if the schools are at liberty to say to the Department we have received so much more which we have given back, I think the difficulty would be greatly diminished.

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE: I should not like to encourage the right rev. Prelate to rely too much on the suggestion which has been thrown out by the noble Marquess. The words are "charged and received," that is to say, they must have been "received" as well as "charged."

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Verbal Amendment made.

*THE BISHOP OF LONDON: The last Amendment which I propose upon this clause, after line 21, to add "over three and under fifteen years of age," has already practically been dealt with upon a question which has been asked on the opposite side of the House. It does not appear to me that the children under this clause are children between the age of 3 and 15. And I merely propose this in order to make that quite clear; but if the noble Viscount the Lord President is satisfied that it is perfectly clear, I have nothing further to say.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause 3, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 4.

*LORD SANDFORD: My Lords, I beg to move the omission of the words "and suitable" at the commencement of the clause, where it provides that the Education Department are to be satisfied that sufficient and suitable public school accommodation is given. Those words in the Bill are unnecessary, and unnecessary words in an Act of Parliament are apt to be mischievous. I do not know whether the Lord President will assent to that.

The Marquess of Salisbury

Amendment moved, to omit, in Clause 4, page 20, line 23 ("and suitable.")—(The Lord Sandford.)

*VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: There is no importance in the words as far as I see. "Sufficient" is quite enough.

*EARL SPENCER: I should like the noble Viscount to explain that. I have always attached considerable importance to the word "suitable" when a deficiency has to be made up. The word "suitable" is always used in regard to religious difficulty in this matter. If a Wesleyan school as a free school were established in a district, and there were no other schools in the district, would that be a suitable school for a Roman Catholic parent to send his children to; or, on the other hand, if a Roman Catholic school were the only one established in a district, would that be "sufficient and suitable" for Wesleyan children? I doubt whether the word "sufficient" without "suitable" covers that.

*VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: Under the existing law a public elementary school which provides the proper education has sufficient accommodation, and is within the required distance, is a "suitable" school. As far as I know, we have not in this country what they have in Scotland, the use of the word "suitable" in connection with religion. In this matter "suitable" has always been supposed to mean that which comes within the requirements of elementary education.

*THE MARQUESS OF RIPON: I cannot quite agree with the interpretation given by the noble Lord of the word "suitable." I quite concur in thinking that the wording of the Scotch Act is better than that of the English Act. That was my opinion when the Act was passed. The point was discussed between Mr. Forster and myself at that time. But, at the same time, I may say that we always did attach a meaning to the word "suitable" in the English Act, which pointed in the direction of its being the duty of the Education Department to consider, in the matter of suitability, whether the school was suitable to meet the religious views of parents.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I think the definition of the word "suitable" by the Department, given by the noble Marquess just now, does not err on the side of distinctness. If suitability is to point in the direction of allusion to possible religious differences, I am afraid it might possibly cause great perplexity to the Department, and great hardship occasionally to the masters of schools affected by that interpretation. Of course, as long as it is merely a geographical word, its meaning is easily understood; but I think we should give endless trouble to the Department if they are to inquire in every district whether the schools are suitable to the religious convictions of the people. I think if that is required they would have to deal with such broad questions as whether Protestant children can be educated in Roman Catholic schools, or whether the children of people who insist on religious teaching are adequately taught in Board schools. I do not believe that, practically, any such interpretation has ever been given to the Act of 1870, or, if so, it has certainly not attracted public attention.

LORD HERSCHELL: I was under the impression that this word was used in ordinary language. I thoroughly agree with the noble Lord opposite that if two words are used in an Act of Parliament, and one is sufficient, there is a danger in using both, but here there is a danger of this word causing difficulty.

*LORD SANDFORD: I should like to remind the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Ripon) that this was the very first question which arose under the Act of 1870, and that the first Circular issued by himself and Mr. Forster dealt with this question. In that Circular it was laid down that a "suitable school" meant a school within reasonable distance of the children's homes, to which they could be admitted on payment of a fee within the means of their parents, and where education was given without offence to their religious convictions. In this Bill you provide that every school which receives a fee grant must be a public elementary school, and, therefore, under the protection of the Conscience Clause. The fees are done away with by this measure; and with regard to the reasonable distance, that has been defined in every district in England by the bye-laws. The insertion of the word "suitable" seems to me for these reasons to be unnecessary.

*VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: The only instance in which I can find the word "suitable" used is in the 8th section of the first Act of 1870, and there the word "suitable," no doubt, stands alone. It says that in deciding they shall take into consideration—that is, in ascertaining the deficiency, certified efficient schools were counted—

"Every school, whether public elementary or not, and whether actually situated in the district or not, which will give efficient elementary education, and which will be suitable for the education of the children in the district."

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Is not that rather a strong argument for not departing from a word the meaning of which is fixed and well known? I understood the noble Viscount to say that he would agree to the Amendment, because it would not alter the existing law; but surely when you alter what has been already done, someone will start the notion that you have altered the requirements with regard to already existing schools. If this word "suitable" has been defined absolutely by the Education Department, no doubt it would be safe to retain the word "suitable." It was assented to in the other House after considerable discussion by the Government on the ground that it would be well to retain it, and I think we had better accept the existing phraseology.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I am not quite certain whether it was inserted at this point. I think it was inserted in the other House at a later stage without debate, and without any regard to its meaning. I think that noble Lords will see the state of things was different then—in 1870. When the Act of 1870 was passed, one of the points of suitability was suitability in the matter of fees, and that ex hypothesi has all been swept away. When you use a word which is no longer applicable to a former state of circumstances it will be supposed that you mean a great deal more than you do mean, if by the nature of things the conditions which it formerly satisfied have disappeared.

Amendment agreed to.

*THE BISHOP OF LONDON: Then in Sub-section (1) come words providing that the fee of any child shall not exceed 6d. a week. This appears not to be quite in accordance with the wording of the rest of the Bill. The highest fee at present allowed in the average is a fee of 9d. a week; and this sub-section, as it is now worded, seems to imply that the highest fee for any individual child shall not exceed 6d. a week. Therefore, I want to put in the word "average" here, which will keep the wording of the clause in accordance, as I understand it, with the present regulations as to fees.

*VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: I propose, with the assent of the right rev. Prelate, to put in, instead of "average," the word "ordinary." That would enable the requirements to be met; that is to say, the ordinary fee would be dispensed with as it was formerly, and in that way it would enable 33 per cent. to be charged, so as to bring it equal to the ordinary fee at 9d. If the right rev. Prelate will accept the word "ordinary," I think that would be better.

*THE BISHOP OF LONDON: I will accept that alteration of my Amendment.

Amendment moved, in Clause 4, Sub-section 1, line 31, after the words ("provided that the,") to insert ("ordinary").—(The Lord Bishop of London.)

*EARL SPENCER: I should like to ask the noble Viscount one question. If I understand the alteration made by the right rev. Prelate's Amendment, it is this: It will allow differential fees in the same school. I think that before the Commission over which Lord Cross presided, there was some evidence given that masters who had the control of fees in their schools raised fees merely in order to drive one particular child, who may have been a dullard, out of the school. As I understand, the noble Viscount wants to prevent that.

*VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: The word "ordinary" has been submitted to legal advisers more than once, and it is quite understood. You will not in future be able to charge a higher fee than 6d.

Amendment agreed to.

Verbal Amendments made.

*LORD LINGEN: On the next subsection upon the important question of the Report to Parliament by the Education Department of the imposition or augmentation of fees, I think the Report to Parliament would be made more valuable if not only the result of their action, but the reasons for it, were stated; and I hope the Lord President will see no objection to insert these words.

Amendment moved, in line 36, before ("amount") to insert ("the reasons for and the").—(The Lord Lingen.)

*LORD SANDFORD: I should have thought it would have been better to put in "the refusal to sanction the imposition of fees." It is this that will be, or ought to be, exceptional.

*VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: I could not quite hear the noble Lord, but I understand he asked me a question.

*EARL SPENCER: My noble Friend desires that the reasons should be stated to Parliament for doing this.

*VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: I think it is rather a difficult matter to impose upon any Department the necessity of laying reasons upon the Table. The reasons will be given in debate and discussion, in Parliament if necessary. It is not usual to put all your arguments upon paper, and, no doubt, those who have to take such a course as is indicated here will be able to defend it.

*THE MARQUESS OF RIPON: I would point out that Section 98 of the Act of 1870, when the Education Department refuses to make a grant for a new school it is required to state its reasons, and that is done every year in the Returns which are laid before Parliament. It does seem reasonable that, as the noble Lord asks, the same thing should be done in this case which is done every year in the other case.

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE: The clause states what reasons shall justify such a course; which are two, and two only. They must under this clause have gone upon one or other of the reasons there stated, and I cannot see any necessity for giving any other reason.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: You will not know, unless the reasons are given, why it has been done. You will know nothing about the reasons which actuated the Department. For example, a change of population is an entirely different thing from the other reason given, and unless the reason is stated the words in the clause are so vague that it does seem difficult to know how it is to be worked. I do not think it is necessary to give a wide discretion to the Department; but the words are so wide that it is very difficult to say how they would be interpreted, and I think it is necessary we should know something more about it.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: There is nothing more illusory than a statement of reasons; that is to say, in Parliamentary matters. I wonder if the noble Earl has ever had to give reasons for differing from the other House. If anyone could get an impression as to the real state of those reasons on such occasions I think he would be very clever.

Amendment negatived.

LORD SANDFORD: My Lords, the reason I move the next Amendment is that I want to hasten the time at which this measure will come into operation. I desire to substitute "six months" for "one year." I think if we consider that before the end of 1891 every school in England and Wales which accepts the fee-grant will have made a Return to the Education Department showing what the managers intend to do, and probably the number of free places they intend to reserve, and that they will all have had notice in the matter, it is of great importance they should not go on during so long a period as a year without making up their minds. Many are crying out that they are ruined and destroyed, and do not know what they will have to do. I think it will be really better for them that they should be pressed to make up their minds, and for that purpose I think six months ought to be sufficient.

Amendment moved, in Clause 4 (4), page 3, line 1, to leave out ("one year") and insert ("six months.")—(The Lord Sandford.)

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: I am surprised that my noble Friend should have moved this Amendment. I have already pointed out that a great deal of the difficulty in this matter has arisen from the feeling in regard to it. I believe that a lapse of a year will have caused a great difference in the feeling of the country and in the original views held upon the whole of these matters.

Amendment negatived.

LORD SANDFORD: The next Amendment is to insert the word "not" in line 3, so that it will read "that after a year, if it is represented to the Education Department that there is 'not' in any school or district a sufficient amount of public school accommodation," and so on, the deficiency is to be supplied. I go on in the next Amendment to alter the word "insufficient" to "sufficient," and to leave out "or in any part of a district."

Amendment moved, in line 3, after ("is,") to insert ("not.")—(The Lord Sandford.)

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: This is a question really of altering the clause so as to exclude part of a district without sufficient reason. The clause, I think, expresses sufficiently what the noble Lord wants. It is only a different way of expressing it.

Amendment negatived.

LORD SANDFORD: Then comes the omission of "or any part of a district." That, I think, may well be left out if you adopt a proviso that free school accommodation is to be found for those who want it within the reasonable distance prescribed in the bye-laws of each district in regard to the compulsory attendance of children at school.

Amendment moved, in lines 3 and 4, to leave out ("or any part of a district.")—(The Lord Sandford.)

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: I do not quite understand. Take the case of a school district in London. You must have separation there. You could not say to people in Marylebone there is a school up at Islington, or another school somewhere within two miles of you. There must be separation.

Amendment negatived.

LORD LINGEN: I have several Amendments in Clause 4, beginning with one on page 3, line 4, to leave out

"public school," but, with the permission of the House, I would withdraw those Amendments in my name, which are only verbal ones on that section.

LORD SANDFORD: My next Amendment, at line 6, was to leave out—

("or that such accommodation is unsuitable for the wants of the population") and to insert—

("within the distance from their homes prescribed by the bye-laws for the compulsory attendance of children at school.")

That, I understand, is objected to by the Lord President.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: Yes.

*LORD SANDFORD: Then I withdraw the Amendment

LORD EGERTON OF TATTON: My Lords, the object of the next Amendment in my name is to ensure public inquiry. I do not know what is meant by the inquiry mentioned in the clause, whether it is to be by the Department in the interest of the ratepayers, or of the parents, or of the children. Within the last few days I have made inquiry in the borough of Salford. I have sent circulars round and have had answers from 500 parents—59 only were in favour of these schools, 358 were in favour of a 1d. fee, and 99 in favour of 2d. a week. I presume that that is the sort of inquiry which is desired, and that the Department are going to make such inquiries as were made before adopting the Act of 1870. I think it is necessary that such inquiry should be made as would prevent the possibility of a few individuals representing their own opinions without consulting the public. Therefore, my Lords, I propose to insert "public" before the word "inquiry."

Amendment moved, in Clause 4 page 3, sub-section 4, line 8, at end of line, to insert ("public.")—(The Lord Egerton of Tatton.)

*VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: I think my noble Friend has not seen this: where there is no School Board there is provision for a public inquiry if applied for. Why should we force inquiries throughout the country? I quite agree within the School Board districts there are totally different views as to supplying accommodation, and that it would be desirable that the power of having a public inquiry should be extended to School Board districts if any persons should desire it, as they may do where there is not a School Board. I do not think that would be objectionable; but putting it in this way would lead, I think, to no good result, because under Section 9 of the Education Act it would be found that the means are provided by which such inquiry shall be called for and conducted. Therefore, I think there is no occasion for the Amendment which the noble Lord proposes. It is only to be if it is asked for. If there is an admission on the part of those within the district who are managers of schools that they are satisfied. If they are content with what the Education Department has done, why should there be an inquiry? But if they are not, then I think in other cases there should be. My noble Friend Lord Sandford has an Amendment upon the Paper upon that, but I should be glad if he would postpone it until the Report stage. I will show him a plan that I have in writing, which I hope he will adopt instead of his own, and, in the meantime, I hope he will let this question stand over.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Verbal Amendments made.

*LORD SANDFORD: I move to insert, in line 10, after ("provided by,") these words ("Sections 9 and 10 of the Elementary Education Act.") They are meant to secure due notice of inquiry in every case of dispute.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: I assent to that. It is exactly what was meant. I have no objection to the sections being put in, nor to the word "direct," because it is the word used in the former Act.

Amendment agreed to.

Verbal Amendments made.

*LORD LINGEN: I have an Amendment to leave out ("include,") and to insert ("shall under such circumstances mean.") I prefer those words to the words which are in the clause now, but I admit they are not material, and I do not wish to press them.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

*LORD SANDFORD: The proviso which I wish to insert at the end of this clause is to the effect that if any bona fide steps have been taken and are actually in progress in any district for the supply of public school accommodation, no requisition or order shall be issued to the School Board if one exists which would supersede these efforts on the part of volunteers. A great many cases have arisen in which School Boards have stood upon what they considered their right to supply public accommodation even to the exclusion of schools already erected or nearly completed.

Amendment moved, at the end of Clause 4, to add the following proviso:—

("Provided that whenever and so long as any deficiency in public school accommodation in any district is in course of being supplied with due despatch, no requisition or order shall be issued in that behalf by the Education Department.")—(The Lord Sandford.)

*VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: I do not object to this, because, as the noble Lord opposite, and those who are acquainted with the work of the Education Department will know, that is very much the course which has always been taken.

Amendment agreed to.

*THE BISHOP OF LONDON: Before this Clause 4 is put I want to draw the attention of Lord Sandford to the Amendment which he withdrew, in line 6, which comprises three important words. It is to leave out—

("That such accommodation is unsuitable for the wants of the population,") and in line 8 to insert—

("Within the distance from their homes prescribed by the bye-laws for the compulsory attendance of children at schools.")

I do not know quite what he proposed in substitution in withdrawing his Amendment, because there is the same word "suitable" which is likely to cause difficulty.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: That is the Amendment which I spoke of before, when an Amendment was introduced upon it in the other House, almost without debate—at least, there was no Debate reported.

*THE BISHOP OF LONDON: I should be glad if the noble Lord would consider that, because it may give rise to controversy and very mischievous controversy.

*LORD LINGEN: I would venture to appeal to the Lord President on that point, for I had intended to put an Amendment down myself. I hope, therefore, on the Report the noble Lord at the head of the Council will consider that Amendment.

*VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: The noble Lord will see how I was misled by the Amendment of my noble Friend behind me. He had an Amendment to alter words which I objected to, and that Amendment he withdrew without thinking of the words he had here. Of course, the same remark would apply to the word "suitable" in this place. However, if the matter is brought up on Report, that would be sufficient.

*LORD LINGEN: Before we part with this clause, I will point out that the 1st sub-section of the clause provides for the Department in certain cases approving increase of fees; and, secondly, that they shall report such approval to Parliament. Then there is another matter referred to, which would be in setting up a school; that is the provision in regard to accommodation to be provided if it is deficient. I would suggest to the Lord President whether that should not be made a separate clause.

*VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: That is a point which has struck many of us, but the clause has already undergone so many transformations in the other House that it has not been easy to deal with it here. I should, however, be quite content that this should become a separate clause of itself as proposed.

A noble LORD: I would suggest that your Lordships should strike out the whole proviso in this place. That would meet the difficulty of the presence of this dangerous word "unsuitable."

*VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: This is the very clause which I have just spoken of. These words referring to "unsuitable accommodation" can be brought up on Report. I should be willing to agree to their omission at that point.

A noble LORD: It is the whole line.

Clause 4, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 5.

Amendment moved, in line 15, after ("more,") to insert ("public elementary.")—(The Lord Lingen.)

*VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: The proposal I have to make will, I think, meet some of the objections to it. The words are "agree together to"— it does not say when they shall pay. I propose to leave out the first words, and then make it "may pay." That, I think, will dispose of the difficulty.

*THE BISHOP OF LONDON: There would be an advantage if the Act provided that the managers might be the persons to hold the amount, not that they should pay for each separate school and then pass it on.

*VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: There would be a real disadvantage in the way. We should have to calculate the earnings of each school. The school must be in a proper position in order to get the grant. If it was put into a common fund which did not go direct to the school, it would not be a payment to them. Therefore it is necessary that the grant should, in the first instance, be made to the school, and then paid over if necessary. I think these words with regard to its being paid would meet all that is required.

*THE BISHOP OF LONDON: I do not think the Lord President has quite considered the effect of these Amendments. I propose afterwards to insert that for the purposes of this Act such schools shall, if the managers desire, be deemed to be one school. In that way it would be no disadvantage to anybody, and would be a great advantage to the schools. As regards the 17s. 6d. and the grants, they could be applied to the whole group of schools, instead of to each school separately. I do not see that there can be any objection to that.

*VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: I think it would be an impossibility to bring that in under this Bill. It would cause enormous difficulty to have to deal with each school separately, involving correspondence with the managers of each of them with regard to their own school. The difficulty would be enormous. Then another point which I would put to the right rev. Prelate is, how is he going to provide that the subscriptions for one of these schools shall not be transferred to the other?—so that it is not a question for the managers alone. It would affect all the ratepayers upon the question whether or not the School Board should join in this rate. In the case of voluntary schools, we should be dealing with questions which are not before us, and if we were to put this in we should be dealing with the Government grant.

Viscount Cranbrook

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I have always thought it would be a great improvement in our educational system if we could invent some scheme by which the smaller schools could be grouped together; but I think the noble Viscount has given the reason why it cannot be done in this Bill. If you were to attempt to do it without the elaborate machinery necessary for the purpose, I think you would get into great difficulty, but I should be very much in favour of some system of grouping if it could be devised.

Amendment negatived.

*THE BISHOP OF LONDON: I propose to withdraw the Amendment which I suggested in line 17 to leave out ("agree together to pay,") and insert ("may appoint a receiver to whom,") and of course my Amendment in line 19 would have to be withdrawn in the same way.

Amendments (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

*THE BISHOP OF LONDON: With regard to line 19, I confess I am very unwilling to part with it, and I would suggest whether the Lord President will allow me to consider whether I cannot in some way or other satisfy him when we come to Report. I do not very well see why there should be such great difficulty. I do not think that the groups of schools will be enormously large, and, of course, if it is pronounced to be impracticable, this Committee will not accept it. I do not propose to move it after what has been said.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

*LORD LINGEN: The Amendment which I have in line 19 is one to which I should be glad if the House would allow me to call their attention, because I think the section raises a point of very great importance. As far as I can understand it, the idea is, that the more powerful, and more successful, and more efficient schools should establish a sort of supererogatory fund by means of which the grant received shall be distributed to the weaker and less efficient schools in the neighbourhood. Now, that is a principle which is quite new, as far as I am aware, in the Education Department.

For years and years past, Ministers who have been connected with the Department have seen the very great difficulty of having to deal with individual schools in so great a number. Every à priori reason that you can think of almost is in favour of grouping schools and of dealing with some authority which comprises them, but I venture to think that the managers of one voluntary school cannot become a nucleus for grouping other schools with them, and I do not think it would be for the interest of education that the school which earns the first grant should be able to attribute that grant to another school which might not have obtained any grant at all. As the clause was worded, the second school need not even be a public elementary school; but that objection, by the explanation of the President, has been removed, and I do not suppose it ever existed except as a verbal omission. Still, I think where you have a voluntary system, there is no device you can adopt which will enable you in any efficient manner to group schools. I believe, under a voluntary system you must deal with individual schools, unless the managers of those schools are willing to entertain the consideration which, as far as I am aware, they are not willing to entertain, of coming under some conditions or other, implying responsible local management. I have advocated these opinions in the evidence which I had the honour to give before Lord Cross's Commission. I have held the same opinions for many years, and I should be very sorry to see any measure adopted which, entailing many inconveniences, would, at the same time, not issue in any public local administration of schools. It is for this reason that I have moved the Amendment which I have put down so that if this principle is adopted, at any rate it shall not operate so as to convey public assistance to a school which has not earned any part of that assistance by its own merits. For that purpose I have looked at the grants as given under two heads. The fee grant, although it is not to be given to an inefficient school, is, in the main, a grant of means; but the other grants which are dispensed by the Education Department are grants for efficiency, and in all the past days of the Education Department I quite concur with the view stated by Lord Spencer, who said that all grants have hitherto been given with the view to promote efficiency. Therefore, while I will not altogether object to this clause for the sake of giving this measure as good a chance of success as it can have, I think, if the second school is allowed to receive assistance through the first school, it should be required as a condition of that assistance to be in a position to obtain a grant of its own from the Education Department. Those are the reasons why I put the clause down, and upon which I commend it to your Lordships' notice.

Amendment moved, in Clause 5, page 3, line 19, after ("schools") to insert—

"Provided that the grant received from the common fund by any such school in any school year shall not exceed the grant made to that school by the Education Department for the same year other than the fee grant."—(The Lord Lingen.)

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: I confess I have had some difficulty in understanding the clause proposed by my noble Friend opposite. In the first place, he seems to forget that under the new Code the grants are mainly in bulk; that is that no school can receive a grant which is not efficient under the Code. They cannot come under the Code Grant unless they can earn the 12s. 6d., and the 12s. 6d. is very unlikely to be paid in addition to what they would get out of this common fund. Suppose they paid in the whole of their 10s., and that that represents the common fund, they would hardly be likely to divide it out in that proportion to the poorer schools. Those poorer schools must be efficient to come within the Government grant, and under the Code to earn the 12s. 6d. or 14s. Therefore, the noble Lord will understand that the schools which enter into this fund must be efficient, because otherwise they would not come under the Code at all, and they would be driven out into the cold altogether if they were not efficient. In former days the child had to be examined in reading, writing, and arithmetic, and so make up the grant. That depended on the examination of the children individually, and was a different state of things altogether. But now the condition of the school decides whether it can receive the 12s. 6d. or the 14s. Besides that, there are the other grants for other purposes for what are called class and specific subjects, but you have the safeguard in the Code, that none of these schools could combine unless they were efficient schools.

LORD LINGEN: The words which weighed with me were that "The fee grant received by each school in the first instance shall alone count as income of such school for the purposes of this Act, and of Section 19 of the Elementary Education Act, 1876, and a contribution to a school from any such common fund shall not be reckoned as income of such school."

Therefore they might be schools which would, after the amalgamation, have the benefit of more meritorious neighbours' grants. I beg to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON: As regards the sub-section which I propose to add to this clause, which would enable managers who have more than one school under their management to deal with them as one school—I mean such cases as where there are a boys' school, a girls' school, and an infant school under the same management—it would be a great relief to many of those schools if they could be allowed, for the purpose of this Act, to have their schools returned as one.

Amendment moved,

In Clause 5, line 25, add ("where one or more schools are under the same managers, the said schools shall, if the managers so desire, be deemed for the purposes of this Act to be one school.")—(The Bishop of London.)

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: Where they are under the same management, whether they are in the same building or not, although they are different departments, they would be practically one school. I have no objection to that. It seems to me very beneficial that managers should be able to return their schools as one and manage them as they please.

Clause 5 agreed to.

Clause 6.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON: My Lords, I have put down an Amendment upon this clause which gives to the School
Viscount Cranbrook

Boards a kind of power far greater than they now have. According to the section as it stands a School Board which is elected under a different state of conditions formed to do certain things, is now empowered, without any reference to the ratepayers, to do something more. It seems to me this is distinctly unjust to the ratepayers, and unless, with their consent, the School Boards ought not to have such power. That a School Board should be allowed, perhaps in the enthusiasm of a sort of education frenzy, which I think is not unknown at the present time, to put a very heavy burden on the rates such as that, and that they should have no authority from the ratepayers to do it, seems to me a very gross injustice; and remember, also, my Lords, if this is done by a School Board it cannot be undone. You cannot make the schools fee paying which have ceased to be fee paying, and you are giving the School Boards the power of doing this once for all. The ratepayers may turn the School Board out at the next election, and may elect a number of members to the new Board, pledged to the opposite policy, but their new School Board would be entirely powerless. It seems to me we ought not to consent to such a power being given to existing School Boards.

Amendment moved,

In page 3, after Clause 6, to add the following proviso ("Provided that no additional burden be thereby be laid upon the rates without the consent of the ratepayers, to be ascertained by the Education Department in such manner as they shall think fit.")—(The Lord Bishop of London.)

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: My Lords, this seems to me somewhat like the case of the triennial Parliament which voted itself septennial. The School Boards are the only bodies we can deal with, and I would point out that in providing here that School Boards should not be prevented admitting scholars to Board schools without requiring any fee, you will enable every voluntary school to act to-morrow if it pleases. The fact is that the School Boards whose school pence are under the 10s. grant will become at once free. The right rev. Prelate would prevent a school which had, say something more than 10s., taking that sum as an equivalent, when the voluntary school next door to it could do that if it pleased. I think you must put them both on the same footing. If the School Boards go beyond the powers entrusted to them, I think their constituents may be trusted to appoint another Board. But there is the question whether they may not consider it a good thing at some time or other that they should charge fees. That may come hereafter, but it was not a good thing to exclude this power if it should be necessary for educational purposes.

*THE BISHOP OF LONDON: I do not think that is quite a sufficient answer. In the first place it is clear, if the managers have the power, they cannot use it because their subscribers might decline to subscribe. It is quite different with the School Boards. They have power to compel payment of rates; but the managers of voluntary schools cannot at all compel the payment of voluntary subscriptions, and the two do not stand on the same footing. It is true that by a kind of roundabout process the Education Department might allow a School Board to impose fees, but one knows that the thing is not easily done; and it seems to me there is an injustice done in the very beginning. It is quite true the School Board is the representative of the ratepayers, and that other representatives may be elected if they do anything which is thought wrong. It is not parallel to the case of electing representatives to Parliament, because every person when he votes for the election of a Member of Parliament knows perfectly well he is voting for a Member of Parliament who will have very extensive powers. But he knows it, and votes with that knowledge. When the ratepayers vote for members of the School Boards they elect them with the idea that these men are to have such and such powers, and no others; and now it is proposed to give them the power of saddling the ratepayers with a very considerable additional burden. I really cannot see how it is possible to defend it.

*THE BISHOP OF MANCHESTER: My Lords, I am sorry to have to interfere in this matter, but I do represent a large number of persons who will be seriously affected by this Bill. It will affect all the voluntary schools, and particularly those in Lancashire and Yorkshire. I have heard it said, "Oh! it is only Lancashire and Yorkshire;" but in the last Census your Lordships may have observed that the population of Lancashire and Yorkshire is more than 7,000,000, that is to say, a quarter of the population of England, nearly as large a population as Ireland ever had, a much larger population than Ireland has now. Unfortunately for these schools, but fortunately, perhaps, for the peace of Parliament, the inhabitants of Lancashire and Yorkshire are not discontented with the Government of this country. They are not represented by brilliant orators, who insist upon being heard, and, therefore, if, as a humble Member of your Lordships' House, I venture to speak a word for them, I hope that I shall be excused. I have recently had a Return made of what will be the effect upon voluntary schools of the substitution of fees for the fee grant, and I find that in general we have been in the habit of getting 14s. a head in my diocese, and now we should have a fee grant, of course, in lieu of it. Thus we have 4s. a head to make up in some way; and the question is how we are to make it up. Obviously, we must do all we can to increase our voluntary subscriptions, but we hope to avail ourselves of the clause in this Bill which enables the balance of 4s. to be charged as a low fee. But if all the voluntary schools in Lancashire are made instantly free—and the Salford School Board have let it be known that they intend to make theirs free, and other rumours of a disquieting kind are afloat—I am quite sure we shall not be able long to charge school fees at all. I have lived for a long time in Victoria, and have watched the progress of education there, and I can assure your Lordships as soon as education became free to all who chose to accept it, it was found to be impossible to go on charging fees. We do not object to the freeing of the Board Schools if this be done with the knowledge and consent of those who contribute the money. If, after the ratepayers are consulted, they desire to have their schools made free, we are willing to do our best under the circumstances, but there is a kind of fanatical enthusiasm which one sees occasionally, and School Boards are not always in harmony with the opinions of the ratepayers. Any School Board will be doing an act which will be all but irreparable if it makes these schools free. Power is given under this Bill to the Department to re-impose fees in two cases. The first is when there is a change in the population, the other is when the improvement in the education of the district requires it. But it is nowhere provided that a fee shall be imposed when the ratepayers take a fit of economy. How do we know that the course taken by a School Board now will be in harmony with the opinion of the ratepayers in the future? We do not want anything to be done in a hurry, to be done with precipitancy, and I think the right rev. Prelate's Amendment will have no effect permanently in hindering the making of Board schools free, and will only hinder persons who may be a little too much disposed to extravagant expenditure from carrying out their views until the opinion of their constituency can be ascertained, and then we shall all have to submit.

On Question, their Lordships divided :—Contents 29 ; Not-Contents 36.

Clauses 6 and 7 agreed to.

Clause 8.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK : There is an Amendment upon this clause in the name of Lord Sandford, I have spoken to him about it. He proposes to put in two Articles, 12 and 13, of the Code of 1891. That, I think, is objectionable, but I will put in the words "the minutes at the commencement of the Act."

EARL SPENCER : The noble Viscount charged me earlier in the evening with proposing to stereotype certain things, but I hope he will not stereotype the minutes of this year. It seems to me there ought to be a little latitude allowed to the Department in this case, and that it is not right to stereotype the minutes of a particular year.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK : There is only this, that when you are giving a definition, you must give a definition of something certain, and the events which may happen in future years are of course uncertain. The question is how we fix an average attendance now. That is the important thing.

The Bishop of Manchester

Amendment moved, to insert at the end of Clause 8, the words "in force at the commencement of this Act."—(The Viscount Cranbrook.)

Q U E S T I O N S .

ILLITERATE VOTERS AT CARLOW.

MR. J. POWELL WILLIAMS (Birmingham, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he can state to the House the number of illiterate voters who polled at the recent election at Carlow, and what members of the Roman Catholic clergy acted as personation agents at that election?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): I am informed that, according to the Official Returns furnished, the number of electors who voted at the recent Carlow election was 5,294, of whom 829 voted as illiterates. The number of polling stations open at this election was 17, and at 10 of these there were Roman Catholic clergymen acting as personating agents.

MR. J. POWELL WILLIAMS: I beg to give notice that I will early next Session move for leave to introduce a Bill to further secure the secrecy of the ballot by abolishing the office of personation agent, and by other means.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I wish to know what number of illiterate electors voted at the election at Carlow in 1885; also how many landlords' agents acted as personation agents?

MR. MADDEN: At the previous contested election in 1885, 5,627 electors voted, and of these 1,019 voted as illiterates.

MR. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.): When will the Return as to illiterate voters ordered at the commencement of the Session be issued?

MR. MADDEN: I am afraid I must ask for notice of that question.

TELEGRAPH REGISTERED ADDRESSES.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Postmaster General what is the total number of merchants, firms, and other persons who have registered addresses in the Telegraph Department of the Post Office; and what amount of money was received for registering addresses last year?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): In reply to the hon. Member, I have to say that the total number of registered telegraphic abbreviated addresses is 39,335, and that the sum received during the financial year ended the 31st March last for the registration of such addresses was £41,321.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS AND WORKMEN'S WAGES.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether, when he satisfied himself that a wage at the rate of 7½d. per hour for some of the painters, in connection with the Government contract taken by Messrs. Holland and Hannen, represented a rate of wage generally accepted as current for competent workmen, he took any evidence except that of Messrs. Holland and Hannen themselves; whether he is aware that the usual pay given to painters by other large firms, and by Messrs. Holland and Hannen themselves for most of their work under private contract is at the rate of 8½d. per hour; and what number of painters are engaged in connection with the contract, and at what rate per hour are they being paid?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, Dublin University): Besides the statement of Messrs. Holland and Hannen, I had before me the tenders of the other firms who competed for the Government contract referred to in the question, and these seemed to me to confirm that statement. On further inquiry, I have ascertained that the current rates of wages for painters at present range from 7d. to 8½d., and, therefore, in fixing the minimum rate for our contract at 7½d., we have placed it rather above than below the minimum of what is at present paid in the general market. But 7½d. is the minimum rate at which ordinary painters employed by the Office of Works in day work may be paid; and, as a matter of fact, out of 44 painters so employed during the week before last, 39 were paid at the rate of 8½d., only five being paid at the minimum rate of 7½d., and this proportion may be said to have prevailed during the contract; but, of course, the wages would vary with circumstances within the limits assigned.

THE LICENSING ACTS.

MR. AGG-GARDNER (Cheltenham): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to a circular issued by the Chief Constable of Monmouthshire to the police, in consequence of a Resolution of the Joint Committee urging increased vigilance on the part of the police as regards breaches of the Licensing Acts, the circular informing them that their chances of promotion will be lessened in districts where there have not been sufficient number of convictions against publicans; and whether he has given any sanction to this method of administering the Licensing Laws; and, if not, whether he will take some steps to protect the holders of licences in Monmouthshire from vexatious prosecutions?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): The Chief Constable of Monmouthshire informs me that, in consequence of a Resolution of the Standing Joint Committee of that county urging upon him—

Mr. Sydney Buxton

"The necessity for increased vigilance on the part of the police in order that licence-holders serving intoxicated persons with drink should be vigorously proceeded against."

issued a general order to his force, in which he stated that—

"Officers and constables who never report any irregularity in publichouses in districts where drunkenness is considerable will be considered to be wanting in vigilance and to have neglected an important duty, and that such constables must therefore not be surprised if they do not receive the increase in pay authorised to be granted to efficient officers and constables."

I have written to the chief constable asking him to consider whether this order is not likely to conduce to vexatious and ill-founded charges against publicans rather than to a prudent and well considered administration of the law.

H.M.S. ANSON—THE WRECK OF THE UTOPIA.

MR. WEBSTER: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he is aware that at the time of the wreck of the Utopia 315 lives were saved, in many cases at great risk to the sailors; that the great bulk of these were saved by officers and men of the Channel Squadron, over 100 by those of H.M.S. Anson alone; whether for saving the minority, medals of the Royal Humane Society, Board of Trade, and Albert medals were freely and properly distributed to men of a Swedish man-of-war and others, some of the latter, it is said, incurring very little risk; whether whilst acknowledging that in saving life at sea British sailors simply do their duty, it is intended to let the gallant action of British sailors in this instance remain completely unrecognised by the Authorities; and whether his attention has been called to the report in a Gibraltar paper, which states that a boat from H.M.S. Anson, during the height of the gale, ran up between the masts of the wreck, where, regardless of the terrible danger they ran from capsizing, the crew maintained their position until they had saved the lives of those they went to rescue; this boat was commanded by a Naval Reserve Officer belonging to the Anson?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): I am fully aware of the gallant behaviour of the officers and men of the Channel Squadron on the occasion of the foundering of the Utopia in Gibraltar Roads, and I understand that certain medals have been distributed to the officers and men of a Swedish man-of-war and certain British subjects for their conduct on that occasion. Where a whole squadron show exemplary gallantry it is difficult to single out individuals for special distinction, but the conduct of those officers and men of the Navy whose actions were particularly noticed has been duly recorded in their favour at the Admiralty. The history of the Navy contains numerous examples of similar acts of gallantry, and it is the feeling of the Board of Admiralty that, in simply expressing their warm appreciation of the services performed by the whole squadron on this sad emergency, they were adopting a course fully in accord with the traditions and feelings of the service at large.

ALIENS.

MR. WEBSTER: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether any steps have yet been taken to check the Returns rendered by the masters of vessels under the Alien Act of Will. IV., by systematically counting the number of aliens on board, and comparing them with the master's Return; and, if so, at what ports this systematic counting has taken place?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The Returns of aliens made by masters of vessels under the Alien Act of Will. IV., have been systematically checked by counting at certain intervals the number of aliens on board the ships arriving at each port, and comparing the numbers so obtained with the numbers in the master's Returns. The ports at which the aliens have so far been counted in this manner are Dover, Goole, Grimsby, Harwich, Hull, Leith, Liverpool, London, Newcastle, North and South Shields, Sunderland, and West Hartlepool.

MR. WEBSTER: Will the right hon. Gentleman say when these Returns will be issued?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I believe they are published monthly, and the Return for June has already been given.

EGYPTIAN COTTON CROP.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether any Reports have been received by Her Majesty's Government, through Her Majesty's Agent and Consul General in Egypt, showing approximately to what extent, or in what way, the cotton crop would be increased by the provision of the additional supply of summer water referred to by Her Majesty's Agent and Consul General in his recent Report (Egypt, No. 3, page 14); whether he could furnish the House with a summary of the Reports in question; whether an offer has recently been made by Mr. Cope Whitehouse to defray any expenditure that would be incurred in printing the maps, Reports, and Papers relating to his project, or such portions of them as it might be expedient to publish; and whether this offer has been, or will be, accepted?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): No further information has been received than that given in Egypt, No. 3, 1891. Mr. Whitehouse offered to defray all the cost of putting the facts in an accessible form for those eminent engineers and other experts who are Members of the House of Commons. Mr. Whitehouse was informed on the 2nd inst. that—and his offer was, therefore, not accepted.

*MR. SUMMERS: When will a decision as to Mr. Cope Whitehouse's scheme be given?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I understand that the Egyptian Government propose to take other proceedings, and the decision rests with them.

INSPECTION OF WARLIKE STORES.

SIR H. HAVELOCK-ALLAN (Durham, S.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether any reduction has been made, or is proposed to be made, in the establishment of officers employed under the Director General of Artillery in the inspection of warlike stores; and, if so, on what grounds, the work of that Department being stated not to have decreased either in amount or importance within the last year?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): In consequence of the large orders for warlike stores, it has been necessary for some time past to employ temporarily additional Inspectors. A decrease in the orders for a particular class of guns and ammunition has rendered it possible to dispense for a time with three of these additional officers.

RECRUITING OF THE ARMY AND EMPLOYMENT OF DISCHARGED SOLDIERS.

SIR H. HAVELOCK-ALLAN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the Report of the mixed Committee on the questions of the Recruiting of the Army and the Civil Employment of Reserve and Discharged Soldiers will be presented to the House before the close of the present Session, and in time to allow a discussion on the subject before the House rises; if not, about what time it may be expected to be laid upon the Table of the House; and what steps, if any, he proposes to take in these important matters in the meantime?

MR. E. STANHOPE: I understand that it will not be possible for the Committee on the Terms of Service to report during the present Session. As regards the presentation of the Report to Parliament, I cannot make any promise until I have seen it. In the meantime, the Recruiting Department will make every effort to obtain the necessary recruits under existing regulations.

AN IRREGULAR QUESTION.

MR. ATKINSON (Boston): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will fix a day for the much-needed Coinage Bill? I have to complain that the question as handed in to the Clerk at the Table has been altered.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I rise to a point of order. I beg to submit that the question is irregular. It speaks of "the much-needed Coinage Bill," and is, therefore, controversial.

*MR. SPEAKER: The question, as handed in, must have been full of errors, if the hon. and learned Member has now discovered another.

Sir H. Havelock-Allan

MR. ATKINSON: I beg to say that I shall not ask the question in its present state. As the father of the original question, I will not have that which stands on the Paper affiliated upon me.

MAIL SERVICE AT OBAN.

MR. SOMERVELL (Ayr, &c.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, in view of the increasing importance of Oban, and that meetings of the County Council for Argyllshire are held there, he is now in a position to undertake to continue the present service of mails throughout the year?

*MR. RAIKES: I am sorry to inform the hon. Member that from the inquiry which has been made in this matter, it appears that the Railway Company could not arrange to continue throughout the year the summer working of the night mail train to Oban without a much larger additional payment than the circumstances warrant me in sanctioning.

DR. KLEIN.

MR. W. M'LAREN (Cheshire, Crewe): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether Dr. Klein is a permanent salaried official of the Local Government Board, or whether he merely makes an annual Report regarding his own private experiments; what salary or remuneration Dr. Klein receives; whether any, and if so which, of the inoculation experiments referred to in his last Report were performed with diphtheritic membranes received from the Fulham Fever Hospital, and which of them were made in England; and whether, to prevent future misunderstanding, he will request Dr. Klein to specify in future Reports which of his experiments are made in England and which abroad?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): Dr. Klein is not a permanent salaried officer of the Local Government Board. He makes an annual Report upon researches conducted by him on behalf of the Board and in furtherance of sanitary science. The remuneration which he received during the last financial year was £670. I have communicated with Dr. Klein, whose researches I regard as of great importance, and I learn from him that none of the experiments referred to in his last Report were performed with diphtheritic membranes, all experiments being made with subcultures of the diphtheritic bacillus. All the experiments made on the guinea pigs, and these alone, were made in England. Dr. Klein will in future specify in his Reports to the Board which of his experiments are made in England and which abroad.

*MR. M'LAREN: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the experiments which he says have been made on behalf of the Local Government Board are those on cats' eyes, which are described in Dr. Klein's Report?

*MR. RITCHIE: If the hon. Member means whether any specific instructions have been given to Dr. Klein as to the nature of his experiments and the places where they were to take place, I have only to say that no instructions were given. Dr. Klein has made experiments of great value to sanitary science, but we really do not know when or where they were made.

PORT OF SPAIN.

MR. KING (Hull, Central): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is aware that the existing waterworks at Port of Spain were constructed for a population not exceeding 15,000, and that the population is now between 40,000 and 50,000; that the water is polluted, in the first instance, by the open drainage of the native village of Maraval, and is subsequently conveyed to the inhabitants of Port of Spain without the intervention of any filter beds; whether anything has been done to carry out the recommendations for an improved water supply of Mr. Unsworth, who was sent out to report on this question to Her Majesty's Government 15 years ago, or those of Mr. Tanner, the Director of Public Works; whether he is aware that, after the disastrous fires of February last, the Coroner, at an inquest on 12 bodies, found that and whether, as Mr. Tanner is in England, steps will be immediately taken, in concert with him, to move the Local Authorities to action in this matter?

"The present water supply of Port of Spain is inadequate to cope with any fire of great magnitude";

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): When the existing waterworks at Port of Spain were constructed, the population of the town was probably between 15,000 and 20,000, and it is now over 40,000; but the Assistant Director of Public Works reports that even during the recent severe drought the daily water supply has been about 62 gallons per head. The Maraval River, which is the principal source of the supply, passes through the village of Maraval, and the water is not filtered. Mr. Unsworth's recommendations were not carried out except to a small extent. Those of Mr. Tanner were submitted in December last, and are now under the consideration of the Local Government. No steps have yet been taken to carry them out. The Coroner's verdict, at the inquest on the bodies of the persons who lost their lives in the fires of February last referred to, did contain the words that—

"The present water supply of Port of Spain is inadequate to cope with any fire of great magnitude."

The Secretary of State does not think it necessary to put any special pressure on the Local Authorities. They have shown their sense of the importance of the matter by requiring Mr. Tanner to report, and they will doubtless not fail to give full consideration to his proposals.

WEST INDIAN DEPENDENCIES.

SIR T. ESMONDE (Dublin Co., N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies is it the wish of Her Majesty's Government to effect a confederation of all the West Indian Dependencies of the Crown, and, if so, what steps have been taken to inform the inhabitants thereof; and is he aware that, while the people of the West Indies would welcome any change which enabled them to secure the boon of representative Government, they are decidedly averse to the amalgamation of the existing small Crown Colonies into one large replica of the same, under which the administrative ills they suffer and complain of would become intensified?

BARON H. DE WORMS: Her Majesty's Government have not had under their consideration, and have no present intention of proposing, a confederation of all the West Indian Colonies. They do not know what would be the general feeling of the inhabitants of these colonies towards a proposal to amalgamate the small Crown Colonies into one Crown Colony. Only a small portion of the inhabitants of these colonies is at present sufficiently educated to be fit for responsible Government; but I cannot admit that they suffer or complain of administrative ills under Crown Colony Government.

THE WINDWARD ISLANDS.

SIR T. ESMONDE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, in spite of the protest of the people of Grenada, Colony of the Windward Islands, the Secretary of State for the Colonies has instructed the Governor of the colonies to curtail the power of the local Parochial Boards by reducing them to Municipal Councils, with power to administer, in the majority of cases, townlets with populations not exceeding 400 to 500 inhabitants; would the Secretary of State be disposed to increase the power and responsibility of such Parochial Boards to the extent of converting each within its own sphere into the responsible authority for the maintenance of public roads, second grade schools, and sanitary arrangements, and the distribution of poor relief; is the Secretary of State prepared to extend this system to the islands of St. Lucia and St. Vincent in the same colony; and for what conditions towards a closer federation of these islands would this increase of the powers of the Parochial Boards be granted?

BARON H. DE WORMS: The Secretary of State has given no instructions to the Governor of the Windward Islands to curtail the powers of the Parochial Boards in Grenada. The Secretary of State does not propose to suggest to the Colonial Government any extension of the powers of the Parochial Boards in Grenada or the extension of the system of Parochial Boards to St. Vincent and St. Lucia, either in connection with proposals for a federation of these islands or otherwise. Should he receive any proposals on these subjects from the Governor-in-Chief of the Windward Islands, they will receive due consideration.

MELLING SCHOOL, ORMSKIRK.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether his attention has been called to the management of Melling School, Ormskirk, with regard to which it is alleged that the vicar refuses to consult his committee, tells them they have no power whatever, and will not let them see the school books; and whether he will direct inquiries to be made upon the subject?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): The Department have no information as to the provisions of the deed under which the school is managed; but the Returns appear to have been signed each year by three persons described as managers; if the vicar is acting in excess of his legal rights, it is obvious that those associated with him in the management have a remedy at law; but the Department have no power to interfere in their behalf so long as the requirements of the Code continue to be fulfilled.

THE NAVAL MANŒUVRES.

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether in the manœuvring of the Fleet it will be necessary to coal at Leith Roads; whether the Admiralty intend to take in Scotch coal, or to bring coal from Wales; what is the estimated cost per ton of the Welsh coal delivered at Leith Roads; what is the estimated cost per ton of Scotch coal delivered at the same place; and whether in the manœuvres of the Fleet it is important to test the facilities with which local coal may be obtained, and the comparative value of such local coal when employed in Her Majesty's ships?

LORD G. HAMILTON: The ships of the Northern Fleet will fill up with coal in Leith Roads before the manœuvres begin. The coal will be brought from Wales. As coal will be required at more than one place, either in Scotland or England, the colliers have been taken on a "time charter," so that they can be moved wherever the coal may be wanted.

The estimated cost of the coal required for the manœuvres is 24s. 6d. a ton, including hire of colliers for one month. It could, however, be delivered direct at Leith on a "voyage charter" for about 20s. a ton. The price of Scotch coal delivered to ships in Leith Roads would probably be about 12s. 6d. a ton. A test of the nature suggested is not considered to be important, as the supply of coal to Her Majesty's ships in time of war must be provided in such a manner as to be handy wherever and whenever wanted; and it is one of the objects of the manœuvres to test the arrangements made to meet such wants. The question of the comparative value of Scotch and other coals has been fully tested and considered, and it has been decided not to use such coals to any considerable extent on board Her Majesty's ships.

WOMEN AS FACTORY INSPECTORS.

MR. O. V. MORGAN (Battersea): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware of the fact that the Governor of the State of Massachusetts has recently appointed two women as factory inspectors; and whether he is prepared to follow this example?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have no information as to what has been done by the Governor of the State of Massachusetts, and upon this subject I must refer the hon. Member to previous statements made repeatedly by me in the House. The present system of inspection has worked well and to the satisfaction of all concerned, and I have no evidence before me to induce me to think a change is necessary.

THE BRISTOL POSTMEN.

SIR J. WESTON (Bristol, E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he can state when the Bristol postmen, who applied for an advance of wages more than 12 months ago, are likely to receive such advance; whether they were led to believe that their application would be entertained at the same time as the application of the sorters of the Bristol Post Office; and whether, up to the present time, the Bristol postmen have received no advance whatever, whilst the sorters have been in receipt of an advance of 4s. per week for several months past? I may say that the statement made by the right hon. Gentleman on Friday greatly anticipated my question, and I will only ask now on what date the new scheme will take effect?

*MR. RAIKES: The hon. Gentleman has asked me one question with notice, and he now asks another without notice. I will reply to the question on the Paper. The Treasury have just sanctioned a scheme under which higher wages will be given to postmen throughout the United Kingdom, and the Bristol postmen will share in the benefits of the scheme, which will be carried out without delay. They were not led to believe that their application would be entertained at the same time as the application from the sorters.

THE BURIAL ACT.

MR. J. BRIGHT (Manchester, S.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has received three Memorials from the officers and members of three Nonconformist congregations in the parish of Holy Trinity, Ashton-in-Makerfield, Lancashire, representing that, notwithstanding an intimation to the incumbent from the Home Office that such a notice is not consistent with the object and provisions of the Burial Act of 1880, the accounts of burial payments for the churchyard of that parish continue to state that a "breadth," or grave, "is appropriated on condition that no other than the Church of England Service is ever used," and that new graves have been refused by the rector when the Church of England Service has not been required, and that, as a result, parishioners who would otherwise have availed themselves of the Act of 1880 have, in order to obtain new graves, submitted to have a Church of England Service; whether he will grant an official inquiry into the facts, with a view to obtain the withdrawal of such intimation, and the impartial exercise of the incumbent's discretion in respect of burials, without regard to the burial services which may be performed; and whether any, and what, answer has been given to the memorialists?

MR. MATTHEWS: Yes, Sir; I have received three such memorials. I have more than once made inquiry into this matter, and the results were given in answer to questions in this House on August 13 of last year and March 10 of this year. I stated on both these occasions that the question at issue between the vicar and the complainants was one of law, which I had no jurisdiction to determine; and I have answered the petitioner in that sense.

MOMBA AND NYANZA.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, after the pledge given some time ago that the Government would not introduce or proceed with any new contentious business not already particularly specified, they intend to press on the consideration of the House the proposal, for the first time brought forward in the Supplementary Estimate delivered last Friday, for a Grant in Aid of the cost of surveys for a railway from Mombasa to Lake Victoria Nyanza?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I think the right hon. Gentlemen has amplified the terms of the pledge which has been given by the First Lord of the Treasury with regard to the business of the House. I cannot find that he has said that he would not introduce or proceed with any new "contentious business" not already particularly specified. The questions to which he replied related to Bills only, and his answers were subject to the same limitation. He has used the term "measures," but only in such context as shows clearly that it was synonymous with Bills. However, I am extremely anxious not even to afford colour for the suggestion that we have departed one inch from the spirit of the declaration which we have made to the House as a whole, that we would do our best to bring the Session to a close as near as possible to July 31, and if I gather that the Estimate in question is likely to be considered so contentious as to militate against that early termination of the labours of the House, I will undertake not to proceed with the Vote this Session; but it must be distinctly understood that this course cannot be held to imply any change in the policy which both the part taken by Her Majesty's Government at the Brussels Conference and the broadest considerations connected with the suppression of the Slave Trade have, in our judgment, made it imperative upon us to adopt.

Mr. Matthews

SIR W. HARCOURT: Upon that answer I may say that from a communication I have received this morning from my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian, I may assure the right hon. Gentleman that this measure is regarded as in the highest degree contentious, and therefore I hope I may take it for granted, of course taking note of what the right hon. Gentleman has said, that the measure will not be pressed this Session.

MR. GOSCHEN: If I understand the right hon. Gentleman to speak in the name of his Party in saying that this measure will be regarded as a contentious matter, and likely to militate against the early termination of the Session, then I will undertake not to proceed with it this Session.

Subsequently,

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.) said: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the note to the Supplementary Estimate just issued (Class V., No. 6), proposing that a sum of £20,000 shall be voted for a preliminary survey for a railway from the coast of East Africa to Lake Victoria Nyanza, is correct in stating that

"The course of the projected railway will be entirely within the British Protectorate in East Africa;"

and if the note is not correct in that statement, what, in the view of Her Majesty's Government, is the nature and extent of the authority exercised or claimed by this country in those inland regions of East Africa which lie to the east and south-east of the northern part of Lake Victoria Nyanza, and which the projected railway is intended to traverse?

MR. GOSCHEN: The course of the projected railway will be entirely within the British sphere, though it will extend beyond the limits of the Dominions of the Sultan of Zanzibar, over which a British protectorate has been declared. The authority exercised or claimed by this country in the regions alluded to in the second paragraph is that vested in the Imperial British East Africa Company under the terms of its charter. Most of the tribes through which it is expected that the line will run have already entered into Treaties accepting the protectorate of the Imperial British East Africa Company.

*MR. BRYCE: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, when he said that the tribes through which the railway is to run had accepted the protectorate of the British East Africa Company, it is to be understood that they had accepted the protectorate of this country?

*MR. GOSCHEN: No, Sir; I said that the protectorate of this country goes as far, I understand, as the Dominions of the Sultan of Zanzibar. Beyond that it is a sphere of influence.

*MR. BRYCE: Is it not the case that the Dominions of the Sultan of Zanzibar are only a narrow strip along the east coast?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I must ask my right hon. Friend to give notice of this question. I am not so familiar with the geography of this region as he is.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Does a sphere of influence mean British territory?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: That is a question I have answered a good many times. A sphere of influence defines the area within which this country may enter into Treaties with the tribes; and until the tribes have entered into agreements with us we exercise no power or act of sovereignty.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Will the right hon. Gentleman amplify his answer by saying whether, when a Treaty has been made with a tribe of a country, that country becomes British territory over which the British Government is responsible?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: That depends on the terms of the Treaty.

CAPE TOWN.

SIR J. COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, at the time the construction of a dry dock at Cape Town was in contemplation, the Treasury was asked to afford financial assistance to the undertaking; if he would state what was the nature of financial assistance applied for; whether, in return for such financial aid from the Treasury, any, and if so, what advantages were offered to the Imperial Government as regards securing to Her Majesty's ships docking accommodation at Cape Town; whether the Cape Government were parties to, or approved of, these proposals; what was the date of the application; from what date to what date did the correspondence extend; whether the application was rejected by the Treasury; and, if so, on what grounds; whether any suggestions were made by the then Chancellor of the Exchequer as to an alternative means by which financial assistance might be obtained from other sources; and, if so, of what nature; and whether the dry dock was ultimately constructed at Cape Town independent of financial assistance from the Treasury, and without any arrangement for securing to the Imperial Government priority of use of this dock to Her Majesty's ships in peace or in war?

BARON H. DE WORMS: As far as the Colonial Office was concerned, the correspondence on the original construction of a dock at Cape Town began on October 7, 1865, and ended on January 18, 1876. The correspondence opened with a letter from the Admiralty of 1865, offering to give the Table Bay Harbour Commissioners the benefit of the Colonial Docks Loan Act (28 and 29 Vict., cap. 106) on condition that the dock was made capable of holding vessels of a certain size. The Table Bay Harbour Board hesitated to accept the offer, as the provisions of the Act appeared to be too onerous as regards sinking fund and interest. The Admiralty expressed itself as willing to recommend the introduction of an amending Bill into the Imperial Parliament; but the matter hung fire, and in November, 1870, the Treasury, in a letter to the Admiralty, offered to guarantee the Dock Commissioners a rent of £2,924 for 10 years from the docks, when completed, on certain conditions. In the course of the correspondence on these proposals the Harbour Commissioners made an alternative suggestion that the Imperial Government should contribute half the cost of the dock, not exceeding £30,000. The Admiralty agreed to this proposal on condition that Her Majesty's ships had priority of the use of the docks, on giving ten days' notice, for a period which was finally fixed at 30 years. The agents for the Cape Colony then prepared an agreement to carry out the arrangement. This draft agreement formed the subject of considerable discussion between the legal advisers of the Admiralty, the agents of the colony, the Colonial Government, and the Harbour Commissioners, in the course of which the Colonial Authorities asked to have the Imperial contribution raised from £30,000 to £34,700. On August 5, 1875, the colony broke off the negotiations for reasons which, apparently, were not very clear to the Admiralty. In December, 1875, Lord Carnarvon invited the Board of Admiralty to consider whether the negotiations could not be re-opened, but they declined to do so on the ground that they were not prepared to increase the amount already offered, and there the matter appears to have ended. The Colonial Office never had any correspondence with the Treasury on the question, and has no knowledge of the opinion which the Chancellor of the Exchequer may at that time have had about it. The dock was ultimately constructed independently of Imperial assistance; and as regards the facilities afforded to Her Majesty's ships I must refer my hon. Friend to the answer given on the 17th inst. by the First Lord of the Admiralty.

COMMUNICATION CORDS IN RAILWAY CARRIAGES.

MR. WOOTTON ISAACSON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he will consider the expediency of taking steps to compel Railway Companies to attach communication cords to all children's excursion trains, without regard to distance?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The question of communication cords was carefully considered by the Legislature in 1868, when Parliament decided to limit the obligation of companies to trains travelling more than 20 miles without stopping. I do not propose to introduce further legislation on the subject, and I hardly see how it would be practicable to enact a law which should apply to children's excursion trains, and not to all excursion trains, or why excursion trains should be exceptionally treated in the matter.

MALTA.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign
Baron H. de Worms

Affairs, with reference to the following declaration of policy, contained in the Despatch concerning the affairs of Malta, of the Marquess of Salisbury, in August, 1889, to Sir J. L. Simmons—

"The great power of the principal clerical functionaries in Malta to influence the mass of the people renders it most essential that in their selection the Holy See should keep prominently in view the value of securing the services actuated by a friendly disposition towards this country, and prepared to support in all proper ways the reasonable directions of the Local Government ;"

whether any such persons referred to in the Despatch have yet been appointed to any office in Malta?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: No high ecclesiastical functionaries have been appointed in Malta since January, 1889.

CAST-IRON RAILWAY BRIDGES.

MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he will grant a Return of the number of cast-iron railway bridges now in use in Great Britain and Ireland, with the dates of their construction?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I have already issued a Circular calling upon the Railway Companies to furnish a Return which practically will contain amongst other information the particulars referred to in the hon. Member's question. This Return will be presented to Parliament in due course.

MAIL SERVICE TO STORNOWAY.

DR. M'DONALD (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if the mail steamer from Strome to Stornoway has twice within the last month called at Portree, on her way to the latter place, and so delaying her arrival there for three hours; and whether he will take such steps as to prevent this inconvenience to the people of Stornoway in the future?

*MR. RAIKES: Yes, Sir; special provision was given for the Stornoway Mail Packet to call at Portree on the 8th and 17th instant. I am assured that in neither case did any inconvenience result at Stornoway.

FOOT AND MOUTH DISEASE.

MR. MORRELL (Oxford, Woodstock): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether, having regard to a statement circulated by the Agricultural Gazette, recently published in Berlin by the Royal Technical Council of Veterinary Affairs, to the effect that the great increase in foot and mouth disease in Prussia during the last quarter of 1890 is to be attributed chiefly to infection spread by the separated milk received from creameries and given to swine and calves, he is aware that any such effect is traceable in these Islands to such cause; and, if so, whether "separated" milk, as the harmful medium, is to be distinguished from "skim" milk obtained by other depleting agencies, e.g., the Jersey Creamer; and whether, in view of the further statement that a Decree has been promulgated by the Prussian Minister of Agriculture prohibiting the creameries from sending out separated milk unless it has been previously heated to 100 degrees Centigrade, he will consider the propriety of issuing a Memorandum to allay apprehension, or in support of the Prussian Minister of Agriculture's Decree as the facts may determine?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): I am informed that all milk, whether separated or not, may be a fruitful agent in spreading foot and mouth disease, and the precautions of the Prussian Government would appear to be amply justified by the circumstances of that country. But the United Kingdom is now, and has been since 1885, free from foot and mouth disease, and the question, therefore, happily, does not appear to arise so far as this country is concerned.

THE ALBERT UNIVERSITY.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the proposed Charter of the Albert University in London will abolish the religious tests at present imposed in King's College upon all teachers, with the exception of the Professors of Modern and Oriental Languages?

MR. GOSCHEN: When the Draft Charter has been submitted to the Committee in its amended form it will be laid before Parliament and will be open to discussion, but it is not usual for a Committee of the Privy Council to announce its decision until it has reported to the Queen.

POSTMASTERSHIP OF CAVAN.

MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General how many applications were received in reply to the official intimation of the recent vacancy in the Postmastership of Cavan; how many applicants had 10 to 15 years, and how many 15 to 20 years, and how many more than 20 years, of appointed service; what was the date of the Civil Service certificate of the person appointed; whether the appointment was made on the recommendation of the surveyor of the district, or of the Secretary to the Post Office in Dublin; and, if not, upon whose recommendation was it made; whether the recent vacancies at Enniskillen, Ballymena, and Letterkenny have all been filled by persons on the English establishment; and whether he is aware that a strong feeling of discontent has been caused by such appointments, both among the post officials in Ireland and the people of the districts concerned?

*MR. RAIKES: Altogether, for the Postmastership of Cavan, there were 35 applications. The salary of the office is £120 a year, and, without troubling the House with all the details into which the hon. Member invites me to enter, it may be sufficient to state that for such an appointment I feel myself qualified to make my own selection without his assistance. It is true that the offices to which the hon. Member refers have been filled by transfers from England, just as the offices at Wokingham and Workington have been filled by transfers from Ireland. From this interchange of appointments as between one part of the Kingdom and another I hope for satisfactory results.

*MR. KNOX: Arising out of the right hon. Gentleman's answer, may I ask if it is not the fact that I made no application whatever in the matter of this appointment until after the place was filled? I should scorn to ask for anyone the smallest post under a British Government. May I also ask whether, at a later date, he will be able to give further particulars as to this appointment, which is most unsatisfactory to the district concerned?

*MR. RAIKES: I think it would be wasting the time of the House to give further particulars.

*MR. KNOX: Have I made any application whatever in regard to this appointment?

*MR. RAIKES: No, Sir; the hon. Member has made no application in regard to the appointment, but he has shown a great wish to interfere with it.

IRISH MAIL SERVICE.

MR. KNOX: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he will consider the possibility of organising an improved mail service between Belfast and Cavan, Enniskillen, Armagh, and other towns on the Great Northern Railway, in connection with the proposed improved service between Belfast and the North of England and Scotland, via Larne and Stranraer?

*MR. RAIKES: The mails for Armagh will be accelerated under the new arrangements. No acceleration to Cavan or Enniskillen could be effected without the establishment of a new service of trains on the branch lines connecting those towns with Belfast: and that, too, at an expense which would be quite out of proportion to the amount of correspondence to be benefited.

CONGESTED DISTRICT COUNTIES IN IRELAND.

MR. KNOX: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what counties in Ireland will in part be Congested District Counties, having regard to the approximate results of the Census of 1891, if the Lords' Amendment, proposing to insert £1 10s. instead of £1 6s. 8d. as the limit of average rateable value, be adopted by this House; and whether he will append to the map now placed in the tea room a list of the electoral divisions in which, according to the Census of 1891, the average rateable value is less than £1 10s.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): As a rule, the result of the new Census shows for the western counties of Ireland an even rise in the valuation per head of population to the extent that, for all practical purposes, the valuation of £1 10s. in 1891 covers the same area as the valuation of £1 6s. 8d. in 1881. The counties in Ireland which, under the proposed £1 10s. limit of valuation will in part be congested district counties are Donegal, Galway, Leitrim, Mayo, Sligo, Roscommon, Kerry, and the West Riding of Cork. I am having a fresh map placed in the Tea Room, showing the congested district counties on the £1 10s. basis. There is a slight possibility that Longford might be included when the revised figures are ascertained.

IRISH SUPPLEMENTARY GRANTS.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Is it intended to take any further Supplementary Vote in regard to the Irish Estimates before the close of the Session?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There is a Supplementary Vote already before the House. As far as my recollection serves me, there is no other Supplementary Estimate.

MR. P. SYNAN, OF KILKEE.

MR. JORDAN (Clare, W.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland is he aware that a case, in which Mr. Patrick Synan, of Kilkee, County Clare, late of Her Majesty's 70th Regiment of Foot, and his wife are concerned, has been before the County Court Judge for the past nine years, and still remains unsettled; and, considering the continuous quarterly attendance at Kilrush Sessions, and the expense attendant thereon, he will make inquiry as to the cause why judgment is so long delayed?

MR. MADDEN: The Clerk of the Peace for the County Clare reports that the case of "Synan v. Talty," referred to, was disposed of at Kilrush Sessions in January last. The County Court Judge dismissed the case without prejudice, from which dismiss no appeal was taken.

SCHOOL FEES IN IRELAND.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if the parents of children in Ireland will have to continue paying school fees after the 1st September, and if, on the other hand, English parents will be exempt from that date; and if he can make no provision this Session to mitigate the loss to some Irish parents and to many school teachers which will arise from this difference?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is the fact that the parents of school children in Ireland will be required to pay school fees after September 1, as it has not been found possible, as the hon. and gallant Gentleman is well aware, to pass the legislation necessary to relieve them of that burden. But the hon. and gallant Gentleman must recollect that no loss will occur to the Irish community by that transaction. The whole of the money which has been properly allocated to Ireland for the financial year will go to Ireland, and, it is not improbable, for educational purposes.

SALMON IN IRISH RIVERS.

MR. KING: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, whether any report has been made of a marked decrease of salmon on the upper waters of the Rivers Suir, Barrow, and Nore; whether instructions could be issued to the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries to scrutinise closely the private rights of using seine nets and working fishing weirs at the mouths of the rivers, and take measures by limiting the fishing season and diminishing the dimensions of draft nets in tidal waters to preserve the salmon from danger of extinction; and whether the Inspectors report that there is any reason to believe that the absence of sport in consequence of the interception of fish by nets and weirs has any effect in deterring anglers from protecting the fish in spawning season?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Inspectors of Irish Fisheries report that for the last month advertisements have been inserted by them in the local papers, and otherwise extensively published, calling meetings at various places to enquire into the alleged diminution of salmon in the Suir, Barrow, and Nore, the general state of the salmon fisheries in the district, and the best means to be adopted for their regulation and improvement. The first of these meetings has just been held, and the whole matter is receiving the careful attention of the Inspectors.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I wish to draw the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the Report of the Select Committee of 10 years ago dealing with the whole subject, which deals with the question of men fishing for a livelihood and fishing for sport and pleasure.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I quite agree that in any change in the salmon fishery laws, or any legislation on the subject, regard should be had to the interest of the community at large.

MR. DE COBAIN.

*MR. SPEAKER: I beg to inform the House that I have received certain documents with reference to Mr. de Cobain, and I have thought it right, looking to the fact that the conduct of the hon. Gentleman is to come before the House on Thursday next, not to delay communicating them at once to the House. The first communication I shall read is from Mr. Athol J. Dudgeon, acting as solicitor for Mr. de Cobain. He writes—

“July 18, 1891.

“Sir,—Referring to the Order of the House of Commons, requiring the attendance of Mr. E. S. W. de Cobain, Member of Parliament for East Belfast, in the House on the 23rd July inst., I, as the solicitor for Mr. de Cobain, and at his request, beg to hand you herewith a medical certificate as to the state of his health, and a statutory declaration verifying same. For the reasons stated in the declaration, I respectfully ask that proceedings under the Order of the House may be suspended until Mr. de Cobain has been able to return to the United Kingdom and meet the charges made against him.

“I have the honour to be,

“Your obedient servant,

“ATHOL J. DUDGEON.

With that letter is enclosed the statutory declaration of Mr. Athol J. Dudgeon, as follows:—

“I, Athol Johnson Dudgeon, of Clones, in the County of Monaghan, Ireland, solicitor, do solemnly and sincerely declare as follows:—

“1. I have been consulted by Mr. Edward Samuel Wesley de Cobain, Member of Parliament for East Belfast, in reference to certain charges which have been preferred against him, and in respect of which a warrant has been issued for his arrest.

“2. On the 16th day of July instant I had an interview with the said Edward Samuel Wesley de Cobain, at Boulogne-sur-Mer, France, in reference to the said charges and the Order of the House of Commons directing the said Edward Samuel Wesley de Cobain to be in his place in the House on Thursday, the 23rd day of July instant. He, at such interview, stated that the said charges were wholly without foundation, and were the result of a conspiracy, and that it always had been and still was his intention to return to Ireland to meet the charges, but that ill-health had hitherto and still prevented him doing so, and he assured me that it was his intention, so soon as the state of his health permitted him to do so, to return and take his trial for such charges, and he instructed me to take the necessary steps for his defence to the charges and to retain counsel on his behalf.

"3. On the same 16th day of July instant I was present when the said Edward Samuel Wesley de Cobain was medically examined by Dr. Alfred Carr, who is a physician and surgeon practising in Boulogne aforesaid, and saw him write and sign the certificate now produced to me, and marked D.A., and I beg to refer to such certificate as showing the state of health of the said Edward Samuel Wesley de Cobain. The same certificate was in due course subsequently authenticated by the Deputy Mayor of Boulogne aforesaid, whose signature and seal of office were put thereto in my presence, and such certificate was further duly authenticated at my request at the British Consulate in Boulogne aforesaid, and the signature of the Vice Consul and the seal of the office were put to the document in my presence.

"4. For the reasons stated in the said certificate marked D.A. the said Edward Samuel Wesley de Cobain will be unable to comply with the Order of the House of Commons for his attendance, and I am instructed by him to request that the time for his attendance be extended until he has had an opportunity of taking his trial upon the charges aforesaid.

"5. As solicitor for the said Edward Samuel Wesley de Cobain, I say that if the House of Commons should proceed to pass any Order of expulsion against the said Edward Samuel Wesley de Cobain before he has had an opportunity of taking his trial as aforesaid he will be greatly prejudiced upon such trial, and, in fact, I believe that an Order for expulsion would render it impossible to obtain a fair and impartial trial, as such Order would be regarded as an expression of opinion by the House of Commons that the said Edward Samuel Wesley de Cobain was guilty of the charges preferred against him as aforesaid.

"And I make this solemn declaration, conscientiously believing the same to be true, under and by virtue of the Statutory Declaration Act, 1835.

The only remaining document which I have received is the medical certificate, as follows:—

"69, Rue Faidherbe, Boulogne-sur-Mer,
July 16, 1891.

"I have this day examined Edward S. Wesley de Cobain, M.P. for East Belfast, and find him in the following condition of health:—

"He is suffering from extreme nervous prostration, and it would be very dangerous to incur the risk of any great mental excitement at the present time.

"I should advise a course of medical treatment for the next six weeks, and by that time

Mr. Speaker

I hope he may be sufficiently restored in health to allow him to appear in England to answer the charges which are being brought against him.

"At present I cannot sanction his going to England, as I feel that any extra mental worry might have the effect of rendering him quite unfit to defend himself in the unfortunate position in which he is now placed.

"He certainly will not be well enough to appear in his seat in the House of Commons on the 23rd of July, 1891.

"This is the certificate marked D.A. referred to in the declaration of Athol Johnson Dudgeon, taken before me this 17th day of July, 1891.

"FREDK. J. PENTON, J.P., Middlesex."

This certificate is certified legally by the proper authorities at Boulogne.

MR. GOSCHEN: I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that the House would desire, upon the communication just laid before it, without having had some time to consider the matter, to come to any decision in regard to these documents one way or the other. I therefore abstain from laying any proposal before the House to-day.

MR. T. M. HEALY: When will the right hon. Gentleman be able to inform the House whether he proposes to proceed on Thursday next?

MR. GOSCHEN: Of course, I am aware that the matter is urgent, but I think the hon. and learned Member will feel that it requires to be considered. I should be sorry to give any pledge, but I do not think that any time ought to be lost with regard to it.

SITTINGS OF THE HOUSE.

Resolved, "That this House do meet To-morrow, at Ten of the clock, a.m."—
(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

That they have agreed to,—Stamp Duties Bill, Stamp Duties Management Bill, Consular Salaries and Fees Bill, Municipal Registration (Dublin and Belfast) Bill, without Amendment.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES,
1891-2.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS II.

1. £2,764, to complete the sum for the Household of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) asked whether an attempt had not been made to combine this Vote with that for the Chief Secretary's Office, whether that attempt had not been abandoned; and whether the House might take it that the two Votes would remain separate in future?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.) said, that a proposal had been made last year to combine the two Votes in question; that the proposal was abandoned, in consequence of a Report from the Public Accounts Committee and of opinions expressed in the House; and that the House might take it that the proposal would not be renewed.

Vote agreed to.

2. Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £26,793 (including a Supplementary sum of £322), be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1892, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Offices of the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant in Dublin and London, and Subordinate Departments."

*(4.22.) MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.): I beg to move the reduction of the salary of the Chief Secretary by the sum of £1,000, and in doing so I wish to assure the Committee that I am not actuated by any personal motives; but that I simply desire to criticise the policy of the right hon. Gentleman. Some credit has been given to the right hon. Gentleman for the relief works which he has inaugurated in the distressed districts of Ireland; but while I am willing to join in giving him credit for what he has done in that direction, I am quite sure that nothing the people have derived from that source will reconcile them to the fact that the power of altering the law in that country is left to the arbitrary will of one person. The right hon. Gentleman has recently seen fit to withdraw some of the extreme provisions of the Crimes Act. Many of them were appalling in their severity, and it would be an immense gratification to the Irish people to see them repealed altogether. Merely laying them aside for a time and continuing full power to revive them at any moment is only, to my mind, calculated to keep alive a bitter feeling of hostility to the Government. I had a good opportunity last autumn of seeing a sample of what the policy of the right hon. Gentleman in Ireland really is, and how he chose to exercise the powers entrusted to him. I refer to the proceedings which occurred at Tipperary. I am aware that they have already been brought to the notice of the House, but as I was in Tipperary at the time, and had not an opportunity of taking part in the Debate, I should like to say a few words now. In doing so, it is not necessary to express an opinion regarding the Plan of Campaign. Whether it was right or wrong to put in force the Plan of Campaign has nothing whatever to do with the policy of electing to carry on the government of a country with a high hand and resorting to physical force. I went to Tipperary in September last, with many others, to witness the proceedings at the trial of Mr. William O'Brien and Mr. John Dillon. I think there were some 10 or 11 Members of Parliament present. When we reached the station there was a small crowd assembled to meet us, but there was no disturbance of any kind that could attract attention. Yet we hardly entered the street before we were met by an officer of police, who, although there was nothing but cheering heard, in a very excited manner ordered the constabulary to draw their batons. I believe that, but for the presence of several English Members of Parliament, the Irish Members would have fared badly. We congratulated ourselves that all cause for alarm was at an end, but very soon found ourselves very much mistaken. In the course of an hour or two, when we went to the Court House, a scene took place the like of which I hope will never occur again in Ireland. Extraordinary precautions were taken at the Court House to admit only a few persons, and there was a cordon of troops and police drawn up. When I requested admission, Colonel Caddell asked me who I was, and on telling him that I was a Member of Parliament he allowed me to pass. When I and others reached the gate of the Court House we found a number of police officers, who refused to allow any but selected persons to enter. Mr. O'Brien and Mr. Dillon protested, and a disturbance arose, which resulted in the constabulary batoning the people right and left. I know that some stress has been laid upon the fact whether Mr. Harrison held up his hand or not.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I must point out to the hon. Member that what he is entering into now will be relevant to the Vote for the Magistrates and police, but is not relevant to the present Vote.

*MR. WEBB: What I wish is to show the Committee what the state of things was which subsequently received the approval of the Chief Secretary. The general feeling at first was that the Government would disavow the action of its officers, but instead of doing so the right hon. Gentleman expressed his full approval. If in England the police had endeavoured to prevent the people from entering a public Court, I believe the people would have asserted their right; and if there had been any collision with the police, the latter would have received all the blame for having attempted to keep them out. Of course, if the Court House had been crowded, and there was no room inside, the case would have been different; but there was abundance of room, and when the people once got inside all went on well. I need not dwell more on Tipperary, but will now refer to a strange occurrence in Dublin on the 13th of October—an outrage on the Metropolitan Police. Its sequel shows the estimation in which the police are held in Ireland. The account of what took place was virtually the same in all the Dublin papers. One of them gives the facts as follows:—

Mr. Webb

“The evidence was to the effect that between 1 and 2 o'clock that morning Constable 39 C saw the two prisoners coming out of Lower Tyrone Street into Gardiner Street. They were talking loudly, and using profane and obscene language. He cautioned them, and Waters said they were policemen as well as the constable, upon which 39 C said if they were they would have to conduct themselves. When he said this the two prisoners together struck him with their sticks on the head, knocking off his hat. The constable knocked down Waters as he tried to run away. O'Shea, after striking the complainant, ran away, and 39 C did not see him again till he was arrested by another constable. Waters struck him with his fist in the neck, as well as hitting him on the head with his stick, with which he struck the constable on the side of the head, staggering him. He also struck the constable on the shoulder and then got away. O'Shea was stopped by another constable, 85 C, whom he struck twice with a stick, and in the struggle both fell to the ground. 135 C ran to the assistance of the other constable, and as he was stooping over O'Shea that prisoner again hit him with the stick across the head, and the constable then struck O'Shea on the legs with his staff and knocked the stick out of his hand. O'Shea afterwards walked quickly to the station. The evidence of the constable was corroborated by a carman named Horsman. For disorderly conduct the prisoners were fined 10s. or seven days. For assaulting 139 C Waters was sentenced to one month's imprisonment with hard labour; and O'Shea, for the assault on Constable 39 C, was sentenced to one month; for assault on 135 C another month; for assault on 85 C to a third month's imprisonment with hard labour.”

If ever there was a case in which the law ought to be evenly put in force, it was this one. And yet we hear that after 10 days the prisoners were liberated by the Lord Lieutenant, the order being as follows:—

“His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant, in pursuance of a Memorial of a highly influential character, has had the case of Constables Waters and O'Shea, of the Royal Irish Constabulary, who were sentenced to long terms of imprisonment before Mr. Chief Justice O'Donel, Chief Magistrate, on the 13th inst., on a charge of assaulting a Metropolitan police constable, re-investigated with the result that His Excellency has ordered the release of both constables from custody.”

I do not know whether these men are still in the Service or not, but it appears to be a strange thing that constables should be held to be so far above the law in Ireland that, after acting in this manner, they should be set free before their sentences have nearly expired. I am certain that if any civilian had been guilty of similar conduct he would have been let off a single day's imprisonment. Turning to another matter, I should like to read the notes made by Dr. Moorhead, the Visiting Justice, on the 13th of last September, regarding the treatment of Mr. McEnery in Tullamore Prison. I would ask the Committee to bear in mind that Mr. McEnery was imprisoned for an offence which in this country would not be considered an offence at all. The doctor says—

"Mr. McEnery, who has lost flesh and looks badly, complained generally of the unnecessary barbarity and indecency offered to his person by the officers during the process of searching. He states that he has always afforded every facility to the authorities for searching him within proper limits, but that he has resisted, and will continue to resist, the process of feeling portions of his body which offends alike his modesty and his manhood; and on last Tuesday week, the 2nd inst., having been previously admonished by the chief warder that 'henceforward he would be searched like ordinary criminals, the Governor, the chief warder, Warder M'Cullagh, and another, set on him in his cell, knocked him down, and proceeded to feel his person in an indecent and offensive manner; that there was no rule authorising such treatment, and though willing to afford any reasonable facility that he will resist such treatment to the utmost; and that he as a political prisoner is searched thrice as often as an ordinary prisoner. I think such an indignity as Mr. McEnery complains of to a fellow being, whether in prison or out of prison, is an outrage on our common humanity; and as it is evidently practised on Mr. McEnery out of a cruel piece of red-tapeism, being unauthorised by any prison rule, and wholly unnecessary, calls for immediate interference."

I think there is no justification for treating a gentleman confined for a Press offence in this way. I observed this morning that a Member of this House, in a letter from the Cape, says that white men cannot be hired to work in the diamond mines because searching of the person is necessary; and yet in Ireland a newspaper editor is subjected to the treatment I have described. I have here notes of a great many matters in which people are treated in a very different manner from what they are in Ireland, but I will not trouble the Committee by going through them. I would merely remark that where persuasion could be employed in this country batons would be resorted to in Ireland, and where batons would be used here buckshot would be employed in Ireland. The policy of the Government in Ireland is being continually held up to approbation in this country by Conservative and Unionist speakers. It appears to me that it has been very far from successful. It is impossible for for any thoughtful man to be satisfied with the state of things in Ireland. There is a complete want of sympathy between the Executive and the representative bodies in the country, and the latter have no power. In the military displays and contests that have recently taken place in this country, there have been volunteers from all parts of the world except Ireland, the reason for the exception being that you cannot have a Volunteer Force in Ireland. If the policy of the right hon. Gentleman had met with that complete success which his friends claim for it he would run candidates at elections whenever there were vacancies. In all countries public feeling is shown by the elections, and yet, notwithstanding all the boasts of the Government supporters, we do not see a single sign that the Government could gain one seat at an election. I regret the total gap there is between the Executive and the mass of the people. We feel that as long as that state of things exists in Ireland there can be any really successful administration of the country. At the next election the Government may be able to put in a few members in consequence of the divisions in the national ranks and in consequence of alterations in the domicile of voters, not because of any real change in the feelings of the people. No cause can be dead or weak which in a few weeks can start a daily paper in opposition to the views of the Government, and can gain elections in the way our Party has done. The material improvement in the condition of the people has not been so great as one would wish it to be, and as it would be under a proper state of things. The effect of the right hon. Gentleman's policy has been to suppress public feeling, and I believe the change for the better that has occurred in the country is not due to the policy of the right hon. Gentleman, but to the inevitable effect of the legislation of late years. I believe also that the more the policy of coercion is abandoned the more will the prosperity of the country increase.

Motion made, and Question proposed, 'That Item A, Salaries, be reduced by £1,000, part of the Salary of the Chief Secretary.'

(4.50.) MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I do not suppose the right hon. Gentleman expects to get this Vote with the same absence of discussion as marked its passage 12 months ago, when the Debate came prematurely to a close by what was then the most inexplicable conduct of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell). I believe there is this year an increase of £341 in the Vote, but I suppose we are expected to discuss not so much the details of the Vote as questions of policy and administration. One of the most obvious considerations in connection with the Vote is the success or non-success of the right hon. Gentleman's policy of coercion in Ireland. According to announcements in the Dublin Gazette, certain sections of the Crimes Act have been repealed in certain districts of Ireland; but no one, except one or two trained lawyers in Dublin Castle, exactly knows what sections of the Act are in force and what sections are in abeyance in many parts of the country. An Irish public man is compelled to consult an experienced lawyer before he can ascertain what are his rights as a citizen. In spite of the announcements in the Dublin Gazette, the Crimes Act, in all its clauses, still operates in Ireland for all practical purposes. The repealed sections can be re-imposed at will, and the Lord Lieutenant has the power of making their operation retrospective. To say that the Act is repealed at all is, therefore, a transparent sham and humbug, and it is only intended for the purpose of rounding periods and pointing passages in the Chief Secretary's perorations. If the Chief Secretary thinks he can nobble a political opponent more expeditiously by Section 3, which relates to special juries, all he has to do is to get the Lord Lieutenant to proclaim that Section 3 is in operation in a particular district. The same is to be said about changing the place of trial, by means of which power one of the most horrible parodies of justice ever seen was enacted at Maryborough, when a special jury was packed by a man who has since been rewarded with political office for packing it. If the Government fall foul of their political opponents in Ireland, or if agrarian agitation for fair rents becomes rife, they can bring the Act back upon us by re-imposing various sections. What then becomes of the flourish of trumpets all over the country about the repeal of the Coercion Act? I contend that the Act cannot be said to be repealed if you can not only re-enact it but make it retrospective. Since this Vote was last under consideration punishments of a month's imprisonment with hard labour have been inflicted. The right hon. Gentleman made a certain promise in this House when the Coercion Act was going through, and that promise—although we on this side treated it as an honourable promise—he has failed to keep. Men have had preferred against them charges of boycotting, the evidence on which did not disclose a single act of intimidation. For such conduct as was alleged they could not have been punished by the law of England, yet Magistrates have sent them to gaol in Ireland for a month's hard labour, and have refused to increase the sentence so that an appeal might be lodged. On the question of appeal, when this House was discussing his Bill the right hon. Gentleman said, "We propose to give an appeal in every case." That is recorded on the Journals of this House, and it is one of the least creditable actions of the right hon. Gentleman that he has never had the manliness either to fulfil his undertaking or to explain why an appeal has not been granted in every case. In the Tipperary prosecutions which were directed against some of my friends who are still in prison, it is not very difficult to prove that Mr. Shannon was purposely appointed to conduct the trials. The right hon. Gentleman, as he said in one of his fits of generosity, took the entire responsibility for the appointment. He said there that Mr. Shannon, who had only been appointed a Resident Magistrate in 1888, was sent to Tipperary in order that the executive and the judicial functions might be separated. It came out, however, upon the clearest evidence, that Mr. Shannon had been performing executive functions up to the eve of the trial. He had been in command of police and had ordered the baton my hon. Colleague and his friends he had presided over a Court of secret inquiry arising out of the very occurrences which led up to the prosecutions at Tipperary, and in such circumstances I contend that it was only a travesty of justice to appoint Mr. Shannon to try the prisoners. I think the right hon. Gentleman at Newcastle denied that Mr. Shannon had had anything to do with incidents which had any bearing on the trial. That trial, it will be remembered, was in connection with proceedings arising out of the struggle between Smith-Barry and his tenants. I find that at a meeting held sometime before the trial Mr. Shannon acted as the deputy of Colonel Caddell, for a sergeant of police in his evidence said he was at a meeting at Limerick Junction on the 25th May. There were 1,300 or 1,400 persons present, and the crowd was perfectly peaceable and orderly. While the people were proceeding to Tipperary the wagonette in which Mr. O'Brien and his friends were riding was stopped by Mr. Shannon who was in command of the police, and at whose instance the constables drew their batons. Now, the speeches delivered on that occasion were put in evidence against the defendants in the course of the Tipperary trials. Yet, on the showing of the police themselves—despite the demands of the Chief Secretary—Mr. Shannon was on that occasion acting as an executive officer in charge of the police. Therefore, I say it was a grave and scandalous abuse that he should have been called upon to try the defendants. Again, at a meeting held in the town of Tipperary itself Mr. Shannon was in charge of the police and came into personal collision with one of my hon. Friends. Mr. Dillon complained of having been pursued by a body of 40 policemen headed by Mr. Shannon, who, in his presence, ordered a baton charge against a small crowd of defenceless persons—Mr. Sheehy and Father Humphrey both made a like complaint. There is, in fact, abundant evidence that Mr. Shannon had acted in an executive capacity on matters connected with this trial. We know, too, that throughout the trials the defendants were constantly shadowed by the police. I think, however, that the worst feature of the case was the unfair manner in which the Chief Secretary prejudged the merits of the case in his speech at Newcastle before the trials were heard. If ever there was a clear case of contempt of Court, that was one on the part of the right hon. Gentleman; it was a palpable wink to his subordinates how to act, and, of course, it had the effect of prejudicing the defendants, as might have been expected. But a striking proof of the character of some of these prosecutions and of the police evidence on which they are based, is the fact that when certain trials were abandoned before the Resident Magistrates, and taken before a Judge and a jury, impartially chosen at Cork, all the prisoners were discharged except two, about whom the jury disagreed. It would be impossible for these things to occur in any other country, for they would provoke a torrent of indignation against the executive. The administration of justice in Ireland is a story of juggling, and the Tipperary trials will take an infamous place in the records of the right hon. Gentleman's administration. I desire next to refer to the prosecution and persecution of the press in Ireland. The prosecutions seem to have been dropped to a large extent for a time, although the Nationalist Press has not changed its course of action, and is still doing what it has done during the past four years. The persecution of the press, however, has been pursued with great animosity and with almost incredible meanness. Advertisements have been persistently withheld by the Public Authorities from newspapers of adverse political opinions, and an instance of that very recently occurred in Cork, when a Conservative newspaper had withheld from it advertisements because it had not supported the policy of the right hon. Gentleman. The withholding of the advertisements was vigorously condemned by the leading Nationalists of Cork. This case proves that the Local Government Board in Ireland, though a large and important public body, are not above the meanness of boycotting papers. The Chief Secretary is the President of that Board, and he must share the responsibility of such conduct.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Member must know that a great part of his speech is irrelevant to the Vote under discussion.

MR. FLYNN: I was referring to the Chief Secretary as President of the Local Government Board.

THE CHAIRMAN: Any criticism of the conduct of the President of the Local Government Board must be made on the Vote for the Local Government Board of Ireland.

MR. FLYNN: Very well, Sir, I will defer that portion of my remarks. What I mainly wish to do is to deny the statement which is frequently made by the right hon. Gentleman and his supporters, that the Coercion Act has been a success. Ireland is in an unfortunate position. If outrages cease and the country is peaceable, we are told it is the result of the working of the Coercion Act, while, on the other hand, if the country is disorderly and discontented we are told a Coercion Act is necessary. So that whichever way Ireland turns, the necessity of coercion is obvious to hon. Members opposite. But in cherishing this belief in coercion the Chief Secretary is living in a fool's paradise, and is laying up a store of trouble and difficulty for his successor. What has produced the present pacification of the country is not coercion, but the effects of the agrarian legislation during the last eight or ten years, the rise of prices enabling the farmers to pay their rent with less difficulty than before, and last, but not least, the feeling of hope among the people that the struggle is drawing to a close and that they will soon have the right to govern themselves in a rational manner. These are the things which have produced the pacification of Ireland, and it is not the result of coercion.

(5.30.) MR. P. J. POWER (Waterford, E.): I will not go into the merits of the Tipperary case, as I was not there, and do not exactly understand all the details connected with it. I understand, however, that the subject was brought forward at the Eccles election, and created such a sensation that telegrams were sent Mr. Shannon to ask whether he had used the words attributed to him. Mr. Shannon telegraphed back that he did not use those words, but his statement carried no weight among the independent electors of Eccles, because he did not deny that he used words equivalent to those attributed to him. Not only do our people disapprove of the policy of the right hon. Gentleman, but the independent electors of this country repudiate it. The Government are in the habit of pluming themselves on the material improvement that has taken place in Ireland. It is a strange commentary on the claim that Ireland has so much improved that Her Majesty's Government have to spend such a large amount of money in Ireland. I cannot understand how the Chief Secretary was furnished with some of his statistics respecting Donegal. I understood him to say that unless the priests were brought to a state of semi-starvation he could not believe that much poverty existed in Donegal. I understood the right hon. Gentleman also to say that when the people subscribed a large sum as votive offerings to the priests there was no necessity to give assistance to the people.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I never said anything of the kind. The hon. Member is entirely misrepresenting me.

MR. P. J. POWER: I doubt very much whether I am misrepresenting the right hon. Gentleman; I will look up what he said. I admit that there has been increase in the prosperity of most parts of Ireland, but the Government of the Queen is not in the least responsible for that. Within the last few years, as is evident from the Joint Stock and Savings Banks and Railway Returns, there has been a great increase of trade in Great Britain, and Ireland naturally got a slight backwash of the wave of prosperity. The increased prosperity Ireland has experienced cannot be compared with that which has taken place in Great Britain. The Government is a Government of false pretences so far as Ireland is concerned, because in resisting the policy of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian they laid before the constituencies a policy of even laws for all parts of the United Kingdom, and they pledged themselves on a thousand platforms to simultaneous reforms for Ireland as for Great Britain. But those promises have not been kept. The Government have brought in a Coercion Bill for Ireland which is not to extend to any part of Great Britain, and a Local Government Act for England and Scotland which is not to extend to Ireland. To make the inconsistency of the Government more conspicuous, they not only refuse to keep the pledges they give to the people of this country, but they have by a recent Act hypothecated the taxes of the people of Ireland, without giving them the opportunity of saying aye or nay, respecting the expenditure of those taxes. We maintain that the Coercion Act is not aimed at crimes and criminals in the ordinary acceptation of the phrase, but is aimed at political opponents and political organisations, and that its main object is not to put down crime, but to break up combinations among the Irish peasantry — combinations which the right hon. Gentleman's policy has necessitated. The statistics of any country would, I think, prove that when the Conservative Party abandoned coercion in 1885, there was far more real crime in Ireland than was the case a couple of years afterwards. The Government administers affairs in the interests of the landlords, and their whole policy has been based on a desire to facilitate the collection of impossible rents and to coerce any tenants who enter into combinations to protect their interests. Some most remarkable evidence was given by one of the chief Pachas—one of the resident Magistrates—at Manchester at the trial of O'Brien v. Salisbury. He was one of the chief Government officials in my part of the country—Captain Slack. He was asked about the condition of County Tipperary, and he said it was most peaceful and satisfactory before the foundation of the Land League. He was questioned as to its condition in the 10 years after the foundation of the Land League, and said it was then most turbulent. Pressed by Counsel, he had to admit that in the 10 years following the foundation of the Land League there was not a single agrarian murder in the whole of Tipperary, whilst in the 10 previous years there were 28 murders or attempts to murder. Counsel then asked the witness—

“Do you then consider that 28 murders in 10 years is a satisfactory condition, and that those 10 years compare favourably with the condition of Tipperary 10 years later?”

The reply was—

“Yes, but in the 10 years before the foundation of the Land League there was no general combination among the tenants of Tipperary.”

The meaning was clear—that in his eyes, as well as in the eyes of the right hon. Gentleman, the great sin the people commit is in joining these combinations. If you have murders galore and no combination the condition of things is satisfactory, whereas if you have no murders and much combination it is unsatisfactory. I am bound to say that Captain Slack's replies have been considered so unsatisfactory by the Government that he has been sent up to the Botany Bay of the North of Ireland. If we want to know how the Government have broken their pledges to Ireland we need not go beyond the words delivered by the noble Lord the Member for Paddington in this House. Two years ago when an hon. Friend of mine brought forward a Local Government Bill for Ireland, and the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary said it was not the intention of the Government to extend to Ireland any of the provisions of self-government, the noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord R. Churchill) said the Government had pledged themselves to extend to Ireland at the earliest opportunity the same amount of local liberty as was given to England, and added that this was the only platform on which the repeal of the Union could be resisted. I am not really very much surprised at the conduct of the Government in this matter, because one of their chief characteristics both in Ireland and England has been distrust of the people. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary tries to make it appear by various assertions in his speeches that we have equal laws in Ireland with those in England. That is not so. Some of the laws in Ireland are more honoured in the breach than the observance, and I hope the Irish people will continue to honour them in the breach. This talk about law and order is mere cant. Take the case of the unfortunate man Canover, who was tried some time ago. Four different juries were empanelled. From one of them 42 men were ordered to stand aside and from another 47 were not allowed to serve. It is humiliating to Irish Catholics to be told to stand aside, as if they were unfit to discharge their duty as jurors; but it is adding insult to injury to be told to stand aside by men of the character of George Bolton. I am not going into the career of that man. The first Debate I listened to in this House was the Maamtrasna Debate in 1884, and in the course of it the present Solicitor General (Sir E. Clarke) declared that the word of George Bolton was not much better than the word of the informers whose evidence we were then canvassing. I have no doubt the hon. and learned Gentleman continues to hold the same opinion, but I may remind him that the Government to which he belongs still retains George Bolton in its service. With regard to the revival of trade, I would remind the Chief Secretary that one of his ardent supporters, Mr. Lecky, says with regard to the prosperity of any country that the first condition of prosperity is the harmony of the Government with the character and wishes of the people. My hon. Friend who preceded me alluded to the breach of faith of which the Chief Secretary was guilty in obtaining the sanction of the House to his Coercion Act by promising an appeal from the decisions of his Removable Magistrates. The right hon. Gentleman has departed from that pledge in the most flagrant way. But I think his intimation to his subordinates was an even greater insult to the Irish people. Shortly after the passing of his Coercion Act many of the Resident Magistrates did give sentences from which there was an appeal, and in most of those cases appeals were made. The right hon. Gentleman delivered a speech in Birmingham in which he alluded to the inconvenience of these appeals. He did not tell the Resident Magistrates directly not to give sentences which could be appealed against, but those gentlemen took their cue from the right hon. Gentleman's speech, and gave sentences from which there was no appeal whatever. In Waterford we have a County Court Judge who enjoys the respect of the people. He is not one of those who condone crime, but one who metes out proper punishment to every criminal. Though at times I might think some of his sentences severe, he is respected, and never a word is uttered against his uprightness. It is a notorious fact that in every case that came before Judge Waters, the decisions of the Resident Magistrates were reversed. The Resident Magistrates then adopted the course of sentencing men to two or three short terms of imprisonment for the same offence, or they returned men for trial before special juries, and had the venue changed. Such conduct as that brings the law into disrespect. I alluded last year to the system of shadowing, with which the right hon. Gentleman's name is connected.

THE CHAIRMAN: That comes under the Police Vote.

MR. P. J. POWER: If it is out of order I shall not pursue the subject, although I think the system will not commend itself to the opinion of any upright or honest man. The right hon. Gentleman has stated in previous Debates that his police have not gone round with people in order to get refusals by shopkeepers to serve them.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

MR. P. J. POWER: If you think, Sir, that these matters will be properly discussed on the Police Vote I shall not deal with them now. The right hon. Gentleman has complained of the way in which he says his opponents have left the proper Parliamentary arena, and have descended to hard swearing. I think it comes badly from the right hon. Gentleman to make any such complaint of the Irish people. In former years we have had to contend against different Chief Secretaries and Lord Lieutenants, but I think this is the first time we have had to contend with a gentleman who seems to glory in the sufferings he has caused, and who makes those sufferings the subject of jests and jeers. The right hon. Gentleman says that the verdict of history will be that he has carried out the law fairly in Ireland, but I venture to say that it will be that he has carried out the law in a spirit unfair to the majority of the Irish people. He will have done much to sap the foundations of law and order, and to convince the people that British law as administered by the Government in Ireland is a scandal and a mockery, and is a law which is administered by partisan tribunals against the poor and in favour of the rich.

*(6.3.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): If I may judge from the character of the Debate, I do not think the salary of the Chief Secretary is in much danger. I venture to say that if we had a verbatim report of the speeches which have been made it would be difficult to find anything which should affect the Chief Secretary's salary. We have heard a great deal about coercion, at a time when coercion has actually ceased to exist. It is an extraordinary time, therefore, at which to denounce the Chief Secretary's action in connection with the Coercion Act, which, so far as the greater part of Ireland is concerned, is practically repealed. The hon. Member for Waterford declares that so long as the power remains its effect is most galling. The hon. Member talked about loss of liberty. I know of no loss of liberty during the past year. I know a great deal of liberty which has been protected by the action of the Chief Secretary—action which has been denounced here to-night. If there is one place more than another which I should have thought hon. Members would hesitate in naming, it is Tipperary. If there is one place where the law of liberty has been established, it is there. If hon. Members take the trouble to read the letters of the victims, published in the newspapers, they will see whether real liberty has been found. It is satisfactory to note that every speaker has admitted the enormous improvement in the condition of Ireland. They have admitted that agrarian crime has diminished, that trade has increased, and that emigration has gone down, and pauperism decreased. I do not place all these results to the credit of the Chief Secretary; but surely they are not to be pleaded against him. The worst symptom that has appeared in the condition of Ireland during the past week is that the five great banking corporations of that country have held their meetings, and besides carrying large balances to reserve, have paid dividends of 10 per cent. The country is in a deplorable condition, surely, which can show such a state of affairs as that. I observed also with something like satisfaction that Mr. Smith-Barry held a rent audit the other day, and that the people went to his office to pay their rents, and some of them before the time fixed for payment. I do not say whether or not the enormous improvement in the state of Ireland is due to the Chief Secretary, but, at any rate, it is due to the steady administration of the law; and, at all events, we can honestly and fairly rejoice in it. I should like some information as to one part of his policy, and that is concerning the relief works. I have heard that in certain parts of Ireland these relief works have certainly not been an unmixed benefit, as they have led the people to neglect the Spring work, on which their future depends.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! There is a special Vote for the relief of distress.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): Will we be able to discuss the past administration of the relief works?

MR. T. M. HEALY: I would remind the right hon. Gentleman that he has got £60,000, which I presume is a portion of the road-making fund.

THE CHAIRMAN: The Vote in Class VII. admits of full discussion of past and present action in these matters.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I will withdraw for the present, Sir, and resume the discussion on the other Vote.

(6.15.) MR. JORDAN (Clare, W.): We have heard from the hon. Member for South Tyrone that there is an improvement in the condition of Ireland; but I think the hon. Member may also be congratulated on an improvement in himself, for seldom has he delivered a speech with so little bitterness and so little animus against the Irish people. I hope he will continue the improvement. To the Chief Secretary I personally have no objection, but as Member for West Clare I have to complain of him in his official capacity. For the last five years I have never been able to obtain from him any concession for Clare, but we have obtained from him coercion in sufficiency, and more. He has made Clare the principal sphere of his policy of coercion; he has trampled Clare under foot in every form and fashion. Officially, he has countenanced outrage in the County Clare. A few days ago I asked the Chief Secretary for a sum of money to put up a small pier at Red Gap, which the Lord Lieutenant had promised. I have telegrams and letters this morning to the effect that the project was approved by the Lord Lieutenant, but the Chief Secretary has no money for County Clare. He had no money to clear the Fergus River when he was asked for it, and he had no money for distress in Clare during last winter, not even for this miserable road-making to which the hon. Member for South Tyrone has referred. I know that he had many Memorials from Boards of Guardians and public meetings during the time of distress, in all parts of Clare, but he had no money. But as I have said, he made us a gift of coercion. He had plenty of gifts of that sort for Clare, though at the same time he had plenty of money for other parts of the country. He countenanced evictions—those cruel evictions such as we had on the Vandeleur Estate. The Chief Secretary let loose the full force of his coercion there. He gave us Resident Magistrates—Cecil Roche, for instance, that self-willed, coarse, and tyrannical official. [Laughter.] Hon. Members opposite laugh because they do not know. They laugh at the unknown. The hon. Member for South Tyrone saw me on the Vandeleur Estate, and I think I was about as inoffensive a man as any in the whole place. I am not particularly obnoxious; but when a poor man's roof was pulled down about his head, and he was dragged forth bleeding, I went, as the Member for Clare, and shook hands with him. And Cecil Roche ordered me off the land, and set a policeman—a low policeman—to drag me—me the Member for the county, and who had done nothing—off the land. [Laughter.] You sit there laughing, but I say you are heartless Members of Parliament. The Chief Secretary had no money for Clare, but he had £60,000 for the military police, with whom he flooded County Clare. I heard Colonel Turner say to two policemen that they were to fire from the window if anything more was thrown. The hon. Member for South Tyrone will bear me out, for he said "This is a bad business!" Yet the Chief Secretary, if he did not say I lied, refused to believe what I said. I have attended dozens of meetings, and sometimes I have been scarcely able to restrain myself at the conduct of the police. I do not wonder at the young men of the country rising against coercion. I recollect on the 8th April, 1887, going to the railway station with Mr. Davitt, who was leaving Ennis for Limerick. Of course, the people raised a cheer for Davitt. Captain Walsh was in command of the police, and he ordered them to clear the platform with their batons. Can you expect Irishmen to submit to such conduct? Are they not entitled, as men, to seek redress? While I deplore it, I can hardly blame the people seeking a wild revenge for such injustice. The Chief Secretary has espoused the cause of Hannah Connell and Mrs. Moroney as against respectable people. I do not wish to say anything bitter against the right hon. Gentleman personally, but his policy is a miserable one. He prosecuted 20 respectable shopkeepers in one of the towns of my own constituency because they would not sell whisky to the police, and in one case because a shopkeeper would not sell a shoe-lace to Mrs. Connell's man. It turned out that the man must have been sent for the purpose of establishing a case, because it was ascertained that the man had no money. There were 20 summonses, and I hold them as an heirloom of the right hon. Gentleman's régime. Then the right hon. Gentleman prosecuted and imprisoned the Rev. Father Gilligan for an alleged speech delivered in the middle of the River Shannon. [Laughter.] Yes, he was compelled to speak from a boat, and an eavesdropper of the Government pretended that he heard the rev. Father's word, though it could only possibly be that he heard the voice. If there is goodness anywhere, it will be found in the clergy—I mean the clergy of any Church—and Father Gilligan is one of the most honest of men. Yet for an alleged speech he was imprisoned for months and months. Again, the Chief Secretary will recollect the storm he raised against himself by his attack upon the Rev. Father Dinan when he insulted him, and other priests by the score. If coercion could produce order and affection for the administration of the right hon. Gentleman Clare ought to be the most orderly and affectionate of counties. But I regret to say it is not so. And if there is any benefit felt in Ireland, it is due to general causes—to rain and sun, which fall on all alike—rather than to that rule of the Chief Secretary, which the hon. Member for South Tyrone speaks of as benignant. Clare is still proclaimed! It is the most dissatisfied and troubled of counties in Ireland. And it should be dissatisfied. It is no wonder that it is, after the severity of the right hon. Gentleman's administration; and dissatisfaction will prevail in Clare so long as this course is pursued, and so long as there are irregularities on the part of the Magistrates and the Executive. I ask the Chief Secretary to restrain his severity in the County of Clare, and to try another method of government; I ask him to adopt the policy of conciliation. He has sown the wind and reaped the whirlwind; for five years he has sown coercion, and has reaped crime and outrage. Whatever he does, he cannot have anything worse than crime and outrage. Let him, then, repeal the Crimes Act, and try a kindlier plan of government. I ask him to try a policy of conciliation; I ask him to remove the ban of coercion from the County Clare, and he will then see whether his new policy will not be rewarded. I could almost guarantee that if he adopts the policy of true statesmanship in Clare, if he pursues a new and conciliatory method of government, avoiding everything that is likely to irritate the people, he will find good results following. But if he refuses to adopt that course, then the people of Clare will not be conciliated, and I do not say that they are wrong in not being conciliated.

(6.30.) MR. ATKINSON (Boston): The hon. Member for Clare, in speaking of coercion, is only following the heavy lead of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir W. Harcourt), who, so long as he acts as leader of the Liberal Party, continues to use the word "coercion" at various public meetings. No doubt worthy men like the hon. Member for Clare think that they are doing their duty; but the word "coercion" has no right at all to be applied to anything that has been done in connection with Irish questions during the whole of this Parliament. If there has been coercion it has been coercion such as we have all to submit to, namely, coercion in favour of right against wrong. As regards conciliation, no one has pursued a more conciliatory policy than the Chief Secretary. As I said a short time since, Ireland is pacified at last. [Laughter.] One or two Irish Members rise against the statement, of course. We know it as a fact. The Chief Secretary, at all events, has shown his readiness to do all he can to release districts from disabilities—even though some of us thought him rash, which only evidences that he knew far better than us what ought to be done. I accepted what he proposed, and would do so again. I am glad to find I was wrong, and that he was right. I am sure if my hon. Friends opposite would cease to agitate, and get their friends the priests to cease to agitate, they would not hear coercion spoken of at all. But there is the coercion exercised by agitators in the form of intimidation and boycotting—the coercion of men and women who have been compelled to leave their comfortable holdings to go to a new district, with the loss of their livings and almost their lives. Then they have written to the papers saying that so-and-so was promised them, and it has come out that they have been threatened that if they wrote such letters they would be made to smart for it. That sort of thing, we can all see, is very wrong. I am sorry the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby and hon. Gentlemen opposite continue to fiddle away on the "coercion" string. No doubt it was a useful word in its time, but it is played out. The hon. Member for South Tyrone has done wonderful service in exploding it. He is really a typical Irishman—[laughter—an Irishman of such recognised ability as to be worth double the average Irishman in this House. It has been observed that the hon. Member for South Tyrone has improved lately. There never was any need for much improvement. Of all the men we have reason to be proud of because of their good services the hon. Member for South Tyrone is certainly one. If he makes a speech on the Irish question it is twice as well worth reading as the speech of any hon. Member. It is said that the labourer is worthy of his hire, but all I can say is that you cannot get such a man as the Chief Secretary by payment. What he has done is worthy all the honour that can be conferred upon him. The Chief Secretary is a good deal better than every man on the other side put together. He is a deal too good for you, because you do not know how to treasure him when you have got him. Hundreds of times I have seen him rise with amiability to meet gross insults; in fact, he is twice or three times too good for the island he rules over. But if Ireland does not appreciate him as she ought to do, we will take him for England and make him leader of the House. We shall then have a Chief Secretary good enough for the purpose, though not half as good as our friend, while the leader of the House would deal with Scotch, Irish, English, and Welsh questions. In that way we would have two Chief Secretaries, or at least a Secretary and a half. Under the circumstances, we are joyfully glad to vote the salary of the Chief Secretary, though I hope we will never have to vote it again. I hope that our friend, who is not able to lead us at present, and who has the affection of both sides of the House, will be promoted to another and a better place. [Laughter.] I am not speaking in the sense of our religious friends opposite. I mean by better place, one more suitable to his amiability and calm temperament. I say he has earned it. And I should like to see in his place the Chief Secretary for Ireland; for I know that if any of you put yourselves forward to say that which you ought not to say, he will be able to give a very good account of you, and we shall be delighted to help him. Whereas up to the present time we have all had to be amiable, instead of following the lead of a man like the Chief Secretary, under whose lead we should be less amiable, and, I have no doubt, should find it our duty to say stronger things. All praise is due to the statesman of whom I am now speaking for what he has done in Ireland, and I say we have had no success in the House for many, many years like the success which he has had, and there has been no success in dealing with Ireland like the success which he has achieved.

(6.40.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I am sure we have all enjoyed very much the confession of the Conservative statesman who has just sat down, and we are only sorry on this side of the House that we do not hear more often the Member for Boston. We wish there were more like him on that side of the House. I would suggest myself that when the translation takes place which will make room for the Chief Secretary in a position for which I do not think he is at all unfit, I would suggest that the proper Chief Secretary for Ireland would be the hon. Member for Boston.

MR. ATKINSON: I would not accept any office of the kind.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I can assure the hon. Member for Boston that had I known that is what he was going to say, I would not have given way to him. Sir, we have heard to-night some praise of the Chief Secretary, and I am not at all concerned to deny that, after the five years' liberal education which he has received, he is greatly improved. He is a very different man, indeed, from the officer who first began his raw and prentice hand upon us in the year 1883. And it is a remarkable thing that this fact was noticed last year by one of the gentlemen whom he still ungraciously detains in Galway Gaol until the very last day of his imprisonment—Mr. W. O'Brien, who, speaking on this Vote last year, said—

“I think nobody can have failed to notice a certain change of demeanour on the part of the Chief Secretary towards Irish Members. The right hon. Gentleman seems lately to have developed some spirit of courtesy, and even blandishment, towards some, at least, of the criminal conspirators sitting on these Benches.” So that the Member for Boston is not so very much in advance of the time in what he said. I am not concerned to deny the continuance of that improvement. But, unfortunately, when in the course of human events the Chief Secretary obtains his promotion, we on this side will have to begin again on some “new shaved beggar” as Daniel O'Connell used to say—one as ignorant of his functions, or of Ireland, as the Chief Secretary was in 1887. Then, after some four or five years of him—if the Conservatives should then be in office—the then Chief Secretary will receive the same encomiums from the same Conservative Member for Boston, for the splendid firmness with which he has dealt with Ireland, and for the fact of his having reduced the country to an absolute state of peace. Why, really Mr. Courtney, we should be spared speeches of this kind, if the hon. Gentleman read the back volumes of Hansard. Take the course of every Chief Secretary since the Act of Union, and you will find that there have been addressed to him all sorts of encomiums like that you have heard to-night. But so far as our Irish Members are concerned, all we have to note is that, while you are praising the Chief Secretary in this House, the population is steadily diminishing by about a million a decade. The true test of administration or statesmanship in Ireland is not to be found in the praises of the Chief Secretary, but in the absolute and concrete fact that in each of the five years during which he has been in office, the population of Ireland has decreased by something like 100,000. The people have quitted the country, quitted the rule which we are told brings down so much blessing in its train. Really, I think that in the course of the administration of the right hon. Gentleman there is no more remarkable fact than that while he is boasting of being able to take off the coercive fetters in which Ireland has been bound, he continues to keep in gaol two gentlemen whose presence in this House, it will not be denied, would contribute a large amount of knowledge and experience of Irish affairs, and whose retention in an Irish prison is the greatest stigma that can be cast on the so-called success of the right hon. Gentleman's administration. The sentences of those two gentlemen will expire on the 31st of July, and we have now arrived at the 20th, and yet so much does the right hon. Gentleman distrust the class and character of his own administration that he thinks it necessary to keep these hon. Members in gaol until they have undergone the very last days of their term of imprisonment. But not only has the right hon. Gentleman been wasting in this unparalleled manner the success of his administration, but he has been engaged in a still more small-minded proceeding, namely, by insisting on levying the amount of the recognisances which were forfeited eight or nine months ago, notwithstanding that in the end the defendants frankly rendered themselves up to justice. The hon. Member for South Tyne (Mr. T. W. Russell) has stated that coercion has disappeared in Ireland.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I said "almost."

MR. T. M. HEALY: Let us assume for a moment that it is so, although I deny the statement. What does it prove? It proves simply what the Irish Members have always maintained, namely, that the policy of coercion is hateful and unpalatable to the English people, and that there is a desire on the part of the English people at large to get rid of this coercive system, and that one of the greatest factors in the Conservative programme is the belief that they have abandoned this system. In point of fact, the Conservative Party at the present moment believe that the best card they can play to the masses of the English people is that on which they say they have abandoned coercion. But speaking as one who has had experience in regard to the existing Coercion Act, I assert most unhesitatingly that no change whatever has taken place in the method of its administration by the right hon. Gentleman. There is no difference now, either in the quality or the amount of liberty allowed to the Irish people as compared with what it was 12 months or two years ago. All that is wanted is that the right hon. Gentleman should at any moment insert a notice in the Dublin Gazette in order that he may resort to or revive the powers under which the Irish people have suffered during the past three or four years, so that absolutely nothing has been gained to the liberties of the Irish people. The existence of that Act is a perpetual menace to those liberties. The Act is retrospective, and consequently the tyrannical power still exists and may at any time be exercised. Further, let me ask in what way has the Government reduced its means or power of action? Has any portion of the army been disbanded? Have the Government made the slightest reduction in their legal equipment? What has become of the Resident Magistrates? Have any of them been turned out of office? No. I once asked the right hon. Gentleman why Mr. Cecil Roche had given up a position as Sub-Commissioner under the Land Act, for which he received £1,000 a year, and has accepted re-employment as a Resident Magistrate, for which he only got £650 or £700 a year. "Oh," said the right hon. Gentleman, "it is because, I presume, he prefers a more durable appointment at a smaller salary." Therefore I assume that the extraordinary system administered by the Resident Magistrates is to be permanently continued, although we are told that the need for it has been got rid of. If, as I assert, the Government have found it impossible to dispense with the Resident Magistrates, it is useless and absurd for them to tell us they have abandoned coercion in Ireland. I now come to another question. We were told in former years that the National League was a thing of the past and had ceased to be a national organisation. But what, I ask, has become of the proclamations issued by the Government in the different counties where the League prevailed? In the town of Tipperary it is a fact that the League was disbanded at the moment the organisation was threatened, and yet that town has been placed under the ban of the Government to such an extent that if any hon. Member from this side of the House should walk through the streets of Tipperary he is followed, dogged, and watched by the police just the same as when the League was in existence. What, I ask, is the real source of whatever disorder may exist in Ireland? It is generally admitted that one of the greatest dangers to the peace of Ireland is the existence of a large body of evicted tenants, and the only places where the right hon. Gentleman has not taken off his proclamation are those in which the Plan of Campaign tenants remain in an evicted condition. I certainly did expect that we should have heard from the right hon. Gentleman that something like an effort has been made to restore these evicted tenants to their homes. Many of these people are in a most pitiable condition. Take the case of the Clanricarde estate. No Englishman can have the least conception of the state of things existing on that property. There is more law and order and peace in Mashonaland or any other African colony containing a population of hostile savages than there is on the Clanricarde estate at the present moment. There you have the landlord's agent making raids on the cattle of the people just as if they belonged to a hostile tribe. There you have the people wakened by the sound of trumpets and the tramp of armed soldiers moving about in the interests of a landlord whom the Chief Secretary himself does not attempt to defend. How do the Government propose to remedy such a state of things? It is not for me to say what the Government intend to do. There is the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for South Tyrone, dealing with the evicted tenants. When that Amendment was proposed I expressed my belief that, so far from being in the interests of the evicted tenants, it was all the other way, because it conceded nothing whatever to the evicted tenants that they did not possess before, whilst it enabled the landlord for the first time to make terms with their men before they were reinstated in their holdings, whereas formerly he had first to reinstate them. However, there is the Amendment; what will be its operation? Will it do anything with men like Lord Clanricarde, and to restore peace and harmony on the Clanricarde estate? That particular landlord stands in a different position from almost any other, because he has entirely neglected the first duties of a civilised landlord. It would be treated as absurd in this country for a man to own an estate, say in Armenia, and to allow it to be over-ridden by Kurds, whilst he remained here simply drawing his money from that estate, not caring sixpence what became of the people. It is absurd to say you would contemplate such a state of things with anything like complacency, or that you would do anything but reprobate the conduct of a landlord who divorced his sympathies entirely from his tenants, having no care as to what might become of them. I therefore say the Government have a duty in this matter to discharge altogether irrespective of the origin of the disputes. It is no answer to say to the general body of the Irish people "You brought this upon yourselves." Whether they made mistakes or not is not for me to discuss. They are men of Irish blood, of our own race, and Irishmen cannot but regard with feelings of the deepest anxiety and pain the fact that there are distributed over various counties some 2,000 or 3,000 homeless people with little resources except those they derive from the generosity and benevolence of their countrymen. It is no man's interest that they should be allowed to remain in their present position; on the contrary, the fact that they are told that they no longer have anything to hope from the continuance of agitation—as the hon. Member for South Tyrone probably would tell them—is to fill them with despair, and constitute a distinct menace to the public peace. Therefore, I do hope that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary is in a conciliatory mood, and will see, so far as in him lies, that something is done to amend this unfortunate position of affairs. I am bound to say—to do the right hon. Gentleman justice—that I have noticed in him a change of temper recently with regard to some of the phases of the Irish question. I congratulate him upon his concession to the long leaseholders, which I think was a wise and statesmanlike action on his part, and I am only sorry that he was not disposed to make his Bill a little wider, so as to include other classes of tenants. If, as I think is the case, his tour through the West and South of Ireland for the first time showed him the miserable and unhappy condition of the tenantry, and if he has for the first time begun to have something like an insight into the modes of life and habits of the people, and their necessities, I should hope that he would, in spite of any feeling of pride, and without allowing any feeling that he might be charged with inconsistency, to restrain him, go on a little further and endeavour, by such pressure as he can bring to bear on landlords such as Lord Clanricarde, to do something to restore these tenants to their holdings. I may be told that the right hon. Gentleman does not know what to do. I confess I should know what to do if I were in his position. He will say he must carry out the law. Well, there is law and law, and there are different methods of carrying out the law. We have seen that that is so in Ireland to a considerable extent. I think I should be disposed to say to Lord Clanricarde and men like him, “In Ireland the police are nearly 12,000 in number, and the amount allowed by Parliament for their maintenance is strictly limited by the Estimates.” I should say that if all landlords required the police assistance they did, it would be impossible to police the entire country. I think that the use of arguments of that kind, and the carrying out of such arguments to a logical conclusion, would have the effect of reducing people, even of the mental calibre of Lord Clanricarde, to something like sense. I think that Lord Clanricarde is probably the worst of the entire crop; but with regard to the others, who are not in so bad a position, whose conduct is not nearly so bad as that of Lord Clanricarde, I would use to them an argument which it is not difficult to evolve from the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman himself. He said the other day that it did not enter into the mind of anyone to conceive a more preposterous idea than that the House would ever at any time of its future life advance one fraction more than £33,000,000 to buy out the landlords. I would say to men like Mr. Ponsonby, Lord Massereene, Mr. Smith-Barry, and Lord Lansdowne, “Here is £33,000,000. Are you going to get a share of it? Here are evicted tenants lying out in the cold. It is absurd to suppose that this Parliament will ever again vote money that will enable you to get rid of the undoubted burden that exists at this moment on your estates.” And I would say, “It is the duty of the Government, where large police and military expenditure is thrown upon the State because of evictions and the continuance of boycotted farms, to try and reduce that expenditure by bringing due pressure to bear on the landlords.” I will tell the Committee what I heard the other day in regard to the estate of Coolgraney. It seems that Mr. Brook has taken two or three planters on the estate, and he has put a lot of cattle there. And what are the police doing? Why, I hear they are engaged in preventing Mr. Brook’s planters from stealing his cows. That shows the amount of confidence reposed by Mr. Brook in his planters. The Government absolutely have to protect the estate from them. The Chief Secretary may during the Recess devote his time in the most profitable manner to pressing on these landlords remonstrances or suggestions of the nature I have indicated, and, if so, he will have done something on which he may congratulate himself. I never thought I should live to see the day when, with regard to a man upon whose head so many vials of wrath have been poured out, an Irish Member occupying a responsible position would have been able to go down to the West of Ireland and shower blessings upon his enemy. That is a remarkable advance on which the right hon. Gentleman may congratulate himself. He may also congratulate himself on the fact that at the present moment a considerable fraction of the Irish representation is in absolute harmony with the Orange Party. They have taken up every cry which has made Orangeism odious in the minds of a large section of the Irish people. The right hon. Gentleman may even boast that, as the result of his working of the Coercion Act, an Irish Nationalist editor, who was nine months in Tullamore Gaol, is now, since the Carlow election, so convinced of the unfitness of his countrymen to govern themselves that he declares, not in any qualified way, but in bold set terms, that Home Rule is Rome Rule! Now, I think that is a tremendous fact for the right hon. Gentleman to congratulate himself on. He will be able to point to that as the result purely of his administration. The right hon. Gentleman tried to break the spirit of the Irish Party by coercion, and he failed; he tried to break up the Irish Party by the Special Commission, and that failed; and he must have come to the conclusion now that there are Courts more potent even than Coercion Courts; and, that being so, the right hon. Gentleman is entitled to all the credit. We know very well that the taking off of the proclamation of the Irish counties is entirely due to the firm administration of the right hon. Gentleman. When we have a good harvest in Ireland we know it does not come from the Almighty, but from the Conservative Government. The surplus in the Irish banks, and the like, all come from the Conservative Administration. I do not know what line the right hon. Gentleman intends to take in regard to the future. Last year I asked the right hon. Gentleman whether he intended to bring in a Bill for the Local Government of Ireland. It was promised in the Queen's Speech of that year, and I believe it was also promised in the Speech at the commencement of this Session. I think I am entitled to know whether the excuse that the Irish people have given themselves over to a prelate conspiracy will stand good in 1892. It is now only five years since the noble Lord the present explorer of Mashonaland promised us simultaneity and—I forget all the other words—oh, spontaneity, in connection with the Local Government of Ireland. We have waited—I will not say patiently—for five years, and we see nothing like an approach to the keeping of that promise. On the contrary, we are told we are to have a new Redistribution Bill, and a Bill to deprive illiterates of their votes, and another Bill to prevent priests from being Irishmen, as I understand. The suggestion is that when a gentleman receives Holy Orders he is thereby debarred for all future time from taking any interest in the affairs of his country. Of course, we cannot expect from a Tory Government a satisfactory measure of Local Government. The Chief Secretary may, by means of such a measure, be able to satisfy a fraction of the Irish people. I am far from denying the possibility. But I and my friends will resist, whatever position others may take up, upon as full a measure of local government as England and Scotland have received, and we shall not hesitate, by reason of any junction that may take place between the Orangemen and certain persons on this side of the House, to reject any Bill that is less than was offered to England and Scotland. In conclusion, I will only say that the right hon. Gentleman has now had considerable experience in dealing with Irish affairs; he is a much wiser man than he was when he entered office; he is a somewhat older man, although his wisdom has come largely from the experience of his office, to which he has very closely and patiently devoted himself. I challenge him to declare in the face of Great Britain that he has effected the alteration of one jot or one tittle of the principles of patriotism and Irish nationality which the Irish people have always maintained. So far from weaning the people of Ireland from the paths of nationality and inducing them to accept anything less than they were willing to accept in 1886, as a whole the Irish people stand to-day exactly where they stood then. There may be, perhaps, a little confusion of Parties, owing to the misfortune which has occurred in their ranks, but as a whole, after five years of unparalleled coercion and "firmness of administration," they stand more determined in the assertion of their rights and liberties than at any previous period of their history.

(7.20.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Debate as to the Vote for the Chm'

Secretary has been an interesting one, and very different in tone and temper from those which we have witnessed in past years; and as one of the consequences there are few points with which it is necessary that I should trouble the Committee. It is usual on the occasion of the taking of the Chief Secretary's Vote, that such specific matters should be brought before the attention of the Committee as call for explanation from the Chief Secretary. Few such points have been brought to the notice of the Committee to-night. Hon. Members have rather contented themselves with dealing generally with the past policy of the Government. They have abstained from bringing forward specific and particular accusations which require to be rebutted by the Chief Secretary in defending himself from criticism. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for North Longford, however, has put before me one or two points in regard to which some reply is necessary. The hon. and learned Member has drawn attention to the undoubted fact that it is upon the Plan of Campaign Estates, and upon those estates almost alone, that threatening disorder now exists, and he has suggested that I, acting for the Government, should come forward and give advice to Lord Clanricarde, and possibly others, though he did not name them, which might end in a peaceful and speedy settlement of the disputes which have so long, unhappily, existed on those estates. It is perfectly true that if those who were concerned on either side in the controversy between landlords and tenants in Ireland had been willing to ask my advice, and to take it, there were cases in which much trouble might have been spared, and much suffering might have been prevented. But there is no use in offering advice to those who are unwilling to take it. I would have been very glad to proffer advice to some of the leaders of the Plan of Campaign—local and others—if I had thought such advice would have been of the slightest interest to them. I knew it would not, and I have never wasted my time or theirs by suggesting they should adopt a different course. In the same way, unless I had some ground for believing Lord Clanricarde would thank me for interfering in his private affairs, I did not think any public object would have been attained. The hon. and learned Gentleman has said that if he had been Chief Secretary he would have ceased to protect the persons on Lord Clanricarde's Estate, who are now under police protection. What would have been the result of that policy? That a certain number of persons who now pursue their avocations—I will not say in comfort, but at all events in peace—would be murdered. I have no ground for believing that the assassination of two or three persons would have the slightest influence upon the tactics pursued by Lord Clanricarde, and I therefore do not think it would have been consistent with my duty to become an accomplice in the murder of these persons, especially if it would not have effected the further object the hon. and learned Gentleman desires. Then the hon. and learned Gentleman says, "How can you possibly boast that your policy has met with success when you have to keep up the same number of Resident Magistrates as you have always had?" I believe it was about 1884 that the number of Resident Magistrates reached its maximum, and I think it will be found that in addition to the 72, the normal or permanent number, Lord Spencer had no less than 10 additional Resident Magistrates for the purpose of carrying out the policy of the Administration of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian. During the tenure of office, which has been surveyed by so many speakers, the number of Resident Magistrates has been steadily diminished, and we have now for the first time for some years reduced the number of these Magistrates to the normal number. I think that is a satisfactory result; and in regard to the 72 Magistrates, I say neither do I contemplate diminishing the number, nor do I think any Government will contemplate diminishing it.

MR. T. M. HEALY: When the right hon. Gentleman speaks of the normal number, does he refer to the normal number since 1881?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Resident Magistrates were first appointed in 1824, but the number has varied from time to time. Seventy-two is recognised as the normal number. Then the hon. and learned Gentleman complains that the Lord Lieutenant has not been asked to exercise the prerogative of mercy with regard to Messrs. Dillon and O'Brien by shortening the term of their imprisonment. The hon. and learned Member must see there is no reasonable ground for that action, because those gentlemen would have served their time long ago had they not gone to America. Others associated with them in the trial and in the sentences have served their full term; and, under these circumstances, there does not appear any ground for interfering with the ordinary course of law. The hon. Member who opened the Debate recalled the attention of the Committee to the case in which two Dublin policemen were assaulted by two members of the Royal Irish Constabulary. The offenders were brought before a Dublin Magistrate and sentenced to a term of imprisonment. They petitioned the Lord Lieutenant, and His Excellency, after consultation with the Magistrate, commuted the sentence to a fine. I do not think there is anything in the case which requires me to further notice it, or which need exercise the mind of the hon. Gentleman who brought the question before the Committee. I do not propose to attempt any valuation or estimate of the success of the Irish administration during the term I have been Chief Secretary; but no one can deny that the state of Ireland, whether it is from the point of view of the prevalence of crime or of material prosperity, has very greatly improved in the last four years. It would be quite superfluous if I were to attempt to apportion the credit for that state of things to the various causes which may have, and no doubt have, contributed to it. Certainly I do not think anyone can accuse me of either in or out of the House boasting that the present state of affairs is due to my administration. I have never attempted to exaggerate any change for the better; but when the hon. and learned Gentleman asks what we have to show for our five years' administration, he will admit we have something to show in the way of public works and the relief of distress. While we may not have succeeded in altering the opinion of any man in Ireland with regard to the Local Government of that country, we have shown there are advantages to be derived from the government of Ireland by an Imperial Parliament—advantages it would be difficult to convince the Irish people, or any impartial audience, could be derived in anything like the same degree or the same measure from a Parliament sitting on College Green, and commanding the resources, and those resources alone, which a Parliament in College Green would command. The hon. and learned Gentleman has accused the Government of having played with the question of Local Government. I would remind the hon. and learned Member and others that Ireland, to put it moderately, has had at least her full share of the time of Parliament during the last five years. The hon. and learned Gentleman will no doubt think that the time of Parliament would have been much better occupied in passing a Local Government Bill than in passing the Crimes Act. But, putting that Act out of account, I think that the hon. and learned Gentleman will admit that the Land Act of 1887, the Ashbourne Act of 1888, the Land Bill of this Session, the Light Railways Act, and other measures too numerous to specify, have really employed not only Ireland's fair share, but a great deal more than Ireland's fair share, of the time of Parliament. With regard to the next Session, I certainly hope we shall be able to bring forward a measure for Irish Local Government, though it seems from the remarks of hon. Gentlemen opposite that nothing we can do as to the government of Ireland will satisfy any Irishman. I do not know whether I gathered that if we do bring in a Local Government Bill based, broadly speaking, on the same principles as those which have governed us in framing similar measures for England and Scotland, we are to count on the support of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for North Longford. [Mr. T. M. HEALY: Certainly.] I hope the time will not be too long delayed before the hon. and learned Gentleman is able to practically show us the value of the support he has just now promised.

*(7.40.) MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): In reference to some remarks of the hon. Member for South Tyrone, I desire to say there is no constituency in Ireland so free, on the whole, from crime as my own, and yet in that constituency there have been within the last two months prosecutions without any justifiable ground. As a matter of fact, the Crime Act is still, to all intents and purposes, as much in operation in Ireland now as it ever has been. The withdrawal of the Proclamations was not intended for the benefit of Ireland, but for the benefit of Tory platform orators in England. It is true that active prosecutions under the Coercion Act are fewer than before. We find a reason for that not in the fact that the Coercion Act has been repealed or that the Chief Secretary's policy has been changed, but in the fact that there are circumstances which make the hostility to the right hon. Gentleman's policy less active than formerly. So soon as our internal dissensions are healed—and I trust it will not be long before practical unanimity has been secured—the Coercion Act will be ready to prevent active opposition to the Chief Secretary's rule in Ireland. The hon. Member for South Tyrone talked of the general prosperity in Ireland, which he attributed in a large measure to the Chief Secretary's administration; but, strange to say, he went on to state that though the wages paid on relief works were what he described truly as a miserable pittance—from 7s. to 12s. a week—there had been such a rush of the people to the relief works that the ordinary crops had been neglected. If that was true, it only showed that the people felt that their rents were such that they could not cultivate their farms and reap as their reward so large a sum as 7s. a week. There could not be a stronger commentary upon the remarks of the hon. Member for South Tyrone than such a state of things. If the Chief Secretary had wished to meet the distress in the West of Ireland, these statements show that he had better have reduced the rents in the parts of Ireland affected. These rents are no longer sacred. By the Act of 1887 the Government have reduced rents fixed in the earlier years of the Land Act. But the reductions ended with the spring—with the May gale of 1890. It would have been wiser, instead of spending large sums of Imperial money, to have reduced rents in these cases, to have shown the people there was something for them to earn on their own farms in the usual course of industry in the district. The Chief Secretary has made one omission from his speech. He was asked by my hon. Friend the Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) to give some hint or suggestion to his friends and supporters in Ireland, to the hon. Member for South Hunts, and Lord Clanricarde, that it was his wish — going no further than that—that they should restore their evicted tenants. There is a clause inserted in the Land Purchase Bill which will enable these tenants to be restored, but that clause depends for its efficacy upon the action of the landlords. Against the will of the landlord evicted tenants cannot be restored to their holdings. If anything is to be done under that clause it must be by a change of intention on the part of landlords, and whence is the inspiration of that change to come if not from the Chief Secretary himself? The Chief Secretary says he does not like to give advice that may be declined; and he quoted, as a parallel case, advice to those who promoted the Plan of Campaign; but surely the right hon. Gentleman must admit the distinction between advice given to his political friends and to his political opponents? When my hon. Friends (Mr. Dillon and Mr. W. O'Brien) were being prosecuted and imprisoned under the coercion law they were not amenable to advice from the right hon. Gentleman. But landlords like the hon. Member for South Hunts and Lord Clanricarde occupy a very different position. Without breaking the law, by "pressure within the law," the Chief Secretary could reduce the income of Lord Clanricarde to less than nil. Lord Clanricarde knows that but for the Chief Secretary's support he would have received much less than he has received in recent years in rents from Ireland. Surely that is a slight difference in position? It is not a very extravagant thing when my hon. Friend asks the right hon. Gentleman to express a wish in this House that those who support him in Ireland, those who have been relying on his support, should restore their evicted tenants to their holdings. It is but for the right hon. Gentleman to express that wish; he has almost supreme power to direct the forces of the Crown, and I hope that we may have some expression of opinion in this direction.

(7.50.) MR. WEBB: As I moved the reduction of the Vote, I may be allowed to add a few words before we go to a Division. The speech from the Chief Secretary was of a conciliatory character; but notwithstanding the result to which he points, we still cannot regard his policy in Ireland as having been other than disastrous. The present truce in Ireland is partly due to the fact that the Coercion Act has not been enforced as heretofore; and if the right hon. Gentleman had continued as he began, the opposition to his policy would be as vigorous as ever. Of course, the legislation of the last 10 years, initiated by the last Government and continued by the present Government, has had effect; it would be strange if it had not, and there is also the hope of the advent of another Party to power. The causes that have conducted to the present state of quiet in Ireland lie quite outside the policy of the Government. Just as in France, under the third Napoleon, there was for a time the appearance of prosperity and contentment, so there is in Ireland; but still the causes of discontent exist; they are dormant; but they have not been removed. In a paper read before the Statistical Society, the Registrar General has dealt with the present progress in Ireland; and anyone who looks at the question, and compares the state of things in Ireland as compared with England and Scotland in the last decade, must recognise that there is little real progress. There is a decline in population in Ireland, and, therefore, a distribution of wealth over a smaller number. The remarks of the Registrar General on the decline of the birth-rate give cause for serious reflection. The young people marry and emigrate, and their children are born out of Ireland, and this is anything but a satisfactory state of things to contemplate. There is, happily, a decrease in crime, but this is due to other influences than those of the Coercion Act. It would be a dangerous idea to encourage, that the decrease in crime is due to a decline in the desire of the people for more free and liberal institutions. It is because we still believe that the policy of the right hon. Gentleman has retarded, not assisted, the progress of peace and prosperity in Ireland that we renew our protest by moving the reduction of the Vote.

*(8.0.) MR. KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): The Chief Secretary has congratulated himself to-night, and I think not altogether without reason, on the fact that in this Debate we have not heard any allegation that might affect his conduct personally, apart from his conduct generally, as a Member of the Government. Now, viewing the fact that a great part of the Session was taken up by the right hon. Gentleman in his official and sometimes in his personal capacity in piloting through the House what the Government consider the chief legislative work of the Session, and considering the fact that I reluctantly considered it my duty to take some part in the discussions upon that Bill, I think the right hon. Gentleman will himself expect that I should take the opportunity afforded by this Vote to say something in reference to his action, and to his absenting himself on certain occasions during the Debates upon the Land Purchase Bill.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member would be entirely out of order in taking that course.

*MR. KEAY: I do not quite understand, Sir. Does your ruling preclude me from discussing the conduct of the right hon. Gentleman in the House on the Committee stage of the Land Bill?

THE CHAIRMAN: Yes; certainly.

*MR. KEAY: In that case my remarks will be cut very short. I had trusted to this opportunity presented by the discussion of the Vote for the salary of his office to mention such facts as that the right hon. Gentleman absented himself from the House on important occasions when I had just risen and announced that I was about to controvert his arguments. However, Sir, if your ruling is so stringent as to prevent my doing this on this Vote I do not know with my limited experience if I shall be able to find another opportunity. I will only now in very general terms make one statement. The right hon. Gentleman complained of my making too many speeches, but he himself was the cause, inasmuch as he refused to make a reply—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

*MR. KEAY: I am not going into details; I only wish to say that the right hon. Gentleman has at last discovered that the points which I pressed on the Committee have proved to be points of real importance. Through his colleagues the right hon. Gentleman has admitted the fact, and has introduced in another place, changes which, if he had considered them as I suggested them in this House, would have saved the time of the Committee to a very great degree.

(8.7.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I was not present when this Debate originated, but I understand that my hon. Friend has made a Motion for a reduction of the Vote. We are precluded from dealing with many subjects we could wish to raise in reference to the action of the Chief Secretary; but I think it would have been a great mistake if this Vote had been allowed to pass unchallenged, for that would have amounted to an admission on our part that coercion has to some extent, at any rate, succeeded, whereas we all know that it has not succeeded in one atom, jot, tittle, or iota. It is not due to the action of the Coercion Act that things are not in Ireland exactly where they were when the right hon. Gentleman started in 1886. It has signally failed all along the line. We have had from the hon. Member for South Tyrone a speech not quite in his usual style, and with less of that gall and bitterness he usually contrives to introduce into debate upon Irish questions and at the expense of Irish interests. The hon. Member for Boston (Mr. Atkinson) is mistaken in taking the hon. Member for South Tyrone as a typical Irishman, for, as I thought everybody knew, the hon. Gentleman is half a Manxman. However, as I have said, coercion has signally failed in Ireland. The hon. Member for South Tyrone gave us a statement in reference to Irish banks, and of their deposits having increased in recent years.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: What I said was that in the last fortnight banks had paid dividends of 10 per cent., and I said that was a symptom of prosperity.

DR. TANNER: From time to time the hon. Member favours us with these statements, but they indicate little more than that among certain classes there has been an increase in deposits. I can certainly say, and that on good authority — of medical men among others in Dublin, Cork, and Galway — that there is little money in circulation. Let anybody who knows Ireland, and remembers what Dublin and Cork were 10 years ago, go there to-day and see what a change for the worse has taken place! There is not the amount of money in circulation as of old. You see large shops shut up all over the place, and all in consequence of the Chief Secretary's misgovernment. If the Government want to see the success of their coercion in Ireland, let them go down to the quays at Queenstown in April, May, and the beginning of June, and see the thousands of stalwart young men and young women who are driven away from their country by your beautiful Administration. These are plain facts that you should face and understand, and you should not allow yourselves to be led away by the glamour which the hon. Member for South Tyrone on one side and the hon. Gentleman the Member for Boston on the other throw on the subject. On every hand we hear the same tale. Take every one of the Boards of which the Chief Secretary is an ex officio member. Take the Local Government Board——

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

DR. TANNER: I will not go into the matter, but the Chief Secretary is the head of the Department in Ireland, and is, therefore, responsible for its shortcomings and misdemeanours.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

DR. TANNER: Well, the same thing may be said as to the right hon. Gentleman's tenure of office as the head of the Fishery Board. I will deal with these points in extenso later on. I now only mention them in passing. Not long ago I requested the right hon. Gentleman to carry out some works in a district near Macroom, and he answered that he would consider the matter; but what took place? Some of the right hon. Gentleman's officers went down to the poor district that lies between Ballybourney and Inchageela, where the people live in wretched dwellings and are always, even in the best period of the year, in a miserable condition. I am sure that everybody going amongst these people would agree that something should be done for them. Unless something is done for them they will again suffer this year in the acute way they did last winter. We find that wherever the right hon. Gentleman went in the course of his Irish tour, and wherever the people bowed down to him there money was spent; but the same state of things exists as existed three years ago, when people were taken up again and again, and got a couple of months' imprisonment for saying "Boo for Balfour." I should not have got anything for Inchageela had it not been for the fact that four women waved their aprons and cheered the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman likes to pay in kind. The people cheered, and he paid for the cheer, and I am glad of it, and I hope we shall get more assistance in the same way. But what has the right hon. Gentleman done for Ireland as a whole? He has worked innumerable evils for her, from which she will not be able to recover for many a long day. The spirit of officialism in Ireland to-day is worse than in Russia. [Laughter.] Hon. Members may laugh; but before they do so I invite them to go into some of the districts in Ireland where policemen and other creatures of the right hon. Gentleman are put at the head of affairs, and to all intents and purposes serve the purpose of the Bashi-Bazouks under the Turks or the military police under the Russian Government. I say that during the right hon. Gentleman's administration the Judiciary and the Magistracy have changed. I remember the time when the Resident Magistrates were gentlemen and were looked up to by the people, but now what sort of men have we? Such men as Colonel Caddell, who has been placed over a Registry Office, because he wanted a permanent place, and because he showed himself fitted for it by giving an Irish Member the lie direct. I say that in every way Her Majesty's government in Ireland has borne Dead Sea fruit. The government of Ireland for years to come will not recover from the baneful influence of the present Chief Secretary. The noble relative of the right hon. Gentleman, who in 1886 declared that the Irish people were worse than Hottentots, asserted that if he had sway in Ireland he would reduce it to a perfect state of calm. Well, has he succeeded in obliterating moonlighting in Kerry? I say he has not. But I say, further, that the Government do not try to root out criminal conspiracies, but spend their every effort in the vain attempt to put down legal combinations which would not be interfered with in this or any other civilised country save Ireland. The Chief Secretary, by the present horrible system of coercion, strikes at the freedom and the privileges of the subject, and very frequently shirks the issue when he has to do with criminals. We know that the Irish police have forged calumnies of boycotted persons, and we know that they have been backed up by the Resident Magistrates and the Dublin Castle officials, who want to make hay while the sun shines. While the Conservative Government are in power, they want to make as much money as they can, knowing that when the sunlight of liberty and justice illumines our dear island all these men and their claims will melt away. I think that in a little time we shall be able to see the signs of dawning prosperity in Ireland. The most significant cause of the improved state of things in Ireland at present has been overlooked. It is this. Ireland sees the wane of Toryism and the downfall of officialism, and believes in the promises made by the English democracy. She knows that ere long the present system of Government will be swept away. Her people have been able—and I say, thank God for it!—to put up with the reproaches and insults of the Head of the Government, who calls them Hottentots—although in 1891 he gives them what a Liberal Government was ruined for trying to give in 1885. The Irish people believe in the justice of their cause, and trust to the good faith of the English democracy, and that has had the effect of clearing away many of the clouds that have lowered over our country. Another thing which has done good has been the successful strikes which have lately taken place. I would just refer to one other point. We can all remember how hon. Members opposite who talk so much about law and order used to receive the name of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian whenever it was mentioned in their Tory Clubs and other places of resort. They used to say he ought to be shot and that sort of thing.

in fact, everything in the shape of violent language that can be conceived was considered by Tory gentlemen to be only too good for the right hon. Gentleman. Now, however, most of those gentlemen seem to have learned a little wisdom and to display a little more sense than at the time I refer to. Within the past three years they have materially modified their mode of dealing with the Irish people, and now it is no longer necessary for our Irish aristocracy, or would-be aristocrats, to cultivate an English accent, because it will not do to speak with an Irish brogue. The Irish landlords are beginning to see the necessity of doing something for themselves, instead of trusting, as heretofore, to be bolstered up by Government grants or other kinds of adventitious support. The right hon. Gentleman will see, if he will only look into the matter and will judge for himself, that Irish landlords who in 1886-7 would have thought it a degradation to put their sons to a trade, are now beginning to understand the necessity of cultivating trade, and for once in their lives are putting their sons to work. I am disposed to think that the Chief Secretary at the termination of his fourth or fifth year of office begins to understand that what comes from our side of the House is absolutely true and correct; and I am glad to see the right hon. Gentleman treating the Irish Members with some consideration, and giving them really polite and courteous replies when questions are addressed to him. I am delighted to see the great advance that has been made in the House of Commons in this direction, even although it has taken place at the eleventh hour. I trust that when the twelfth hour comes we shall be able to count among the permanent friends of Ireland the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, who has already come so far on the road to conciliation. I hope that before long he will take a longer and bolder step; and that although he has made mistakes which he will, perhaps, confess in his management of the affairs of Ireland, I nevertheless look forward with hope to the day when there will be a complete and thorough re-organisation of Irish administration—such a re-organisation as even our Tory adversaries are beginning to admit can only take place when

Ireland obtains the right to manage her own affairs. (8.38.)

(9.10.) MR. FLYNN: I do not wish to detain the Committee more than a few moments, but there are a few observations of the right hon. Gentleman that require comment. The Chief Secretary remarked upon a difference between this Debate and Debates in former years in the absence of specific cases of complaint against his action, but there have been some specific instances, such as that referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Waterford, and he failed to reply to a definite and specific charge I brought forward. I stated that in his speech at Newcastle in September last the right hon. Gentleman prejudged and prejudiced the case of certain parties in a case before the Courts then pending. It was a case to be heard before Tipperary Magistrates, in which the police were summoned for assault. The right hon. Gentleman asserted, in effect, the innocence of the police, and, by implication, asserted that the civilians, including some Members of Parliament, were really the persons open to censure. I gave a quotation from the right hon. Gentleman's speech, and I think that is a definite and distinct allegation against his administration, and against himself personally. The right hon. Gentleman has rather jeered at the observation of my hon. Friend, that he has not done what he might have done in influencing landlords towards justice and fair-play to their tenants; that he has not used his influence in restraint of what amounts to a policy of extermination. Without any violation of the law, by the exercise of pressure within the law, he might have checked the policy of extermination pursued by Lord Clanricarde. Upon the Police Vote we shall have an opportunity of calling attention to this more particularly. It was within the power of the Chief Secretary to have represented that large bodies of police could not be withdrawn from their other duties to assist in carrying out evictions. So long as there remain a large body of tenants evicted from their holdings, it is hopeless to expect that social order will be established on a durable basis. I do not say that the right hon. Gentleman has boasted of the success of his coercive policy, but his followers and supporters do proclaim on every possible occasion the success of his courageous, able, and statesmanlike administration. We traverse all these statements, and can show that the diminution of crime and the restoration of order have been due to other and totally different causes than his friends put forward. I do not accuse the right hon. Gentleman of boasting, but his Party boast that his policy has been a success. As a matter of fact, since 1887, where the reign of coercion has been most rigorous, where it has been carried out with the utmost brutality on the part of the police, and the most unscrupulous partiality on the part of Resident Magistrates, there it has most signally failed. For election purposes the policy has been partially repealed, but virtually there has been no repeal. According to a legal fiction, and by notice in the Dublin Gazette you may unproclaim certain districts under certain sections of the Act, but it is merely a legal fiction, for coercion still hangs over the country, and can be re-imposed by a single action of the Lord Lieutenant. The right hon. Gentleman may relieve all Ireland from the Act; but if he only keeps it in operation in a small district such as "Ireland's Eye," then, by the change of venue and special juries, cases from all Ireland may be sent to be tried there. The whole thing is a legal fiction intended to delude, as it has deluded, such as the hon. Member for Boston (Mr. Atkinson). The right hon. Gentleman says the Government are not to be blamed because they have not carried out the promise of Local Government, contained in the Queen's Speech of 1886 and the celebrated speech of the then leader of the House (Lord Randolph Churchill), and he says the time of the House has been occupied with other Irish measures, with light railways and land purchase. That may be so, but the Government took Office pledged to Local Government for Ireland—not to land purchase and light railways, but to Local Government on lines similar to the measures passed for England and Scotland. I join in saying that the Irish Members would welcome a measure for Local Government for Ireland framed on the lines of the measures passed for England and Scotland, but nothing less will satisfy us. We will not be put off with a shadow, and any insufficient or circumscribed measure it will be our duty to resist.

(9.27.) The Committee divided:—
Ayes 56; Noes 96.—(Div. List, No. 365.)

Original Question again proposed.

(9.35.) DR. TANNER: I desire to call attention to one point, which is seldom made the subject of comment in these Debates. I think the Vote of £2,000 for the salary of the Under Secretary ought not to pass without challenge. The gentleman who now occupies this post was very good at first, and was against landlordism, but he has gradually fallen under the deadening influence of Dublin Castle, and has lent himself more and more to nasty ways and methods. If I had any desire to deal with this matter in a strong way I should certainly move to reduce the Estimate by the Vote for the Under Secretary, but I do not think any practical object would be gained by attacking an individual who may have been led astray—as many people, even Members of Parliament, like the hon. Member for South Tyrone, have been led astray under the sway of the Chief Secretary. But in regard to another item, that for the Inspectors of Lunatic Asylums, there is a particular definite point to which I wish to call attention—one accentuated not merely by people of the same persuasion as ours, but by Conservatives, Liberals, and Liberal Unionists. One and all have condemned the present system as administered by Dublin Castle in connection with this matter. In connection with the lunatic asylums of the country, you have a number of Governors chosen directly by the Lord Lieutenant, in certain cases with the assent of the localities. But these gentlemen, being sent to carry on the business of these particular Boards, have no power whatsoever of dealing with the construction of fresh buildings which it may be thought necessary to provide to meet the wants and requirements of these unfortunate people. I remember, not so long ago, when happened to be up in rather a remote part of our island, near Ballina, taking up a Conservative paper. I certainly was convinced by it—and I am not easily convinced by any Tory paper—that this Department is extremely unfairly and very badly administered. This conviction was brought home to my mind in consequence of the remarks I read in this newspaper calling attention to the way they were being treated in County Mayo by the Dublin Castle officials. It appears that they remonstrated, and that what they wanted to get done they could not get done, and that on every occasion when they wanted anything done an official had to travel down from Dublin Castle to do it. That alone would tend to swell the item under sub-head “E” for travelling expenses of the Inspectors, and so forth. It does appear rather ridiculous that when you have a number of gentlemen—I do not say the best you could get, for, as a matter of fact, all these Governors in Ireland are drawn mainly from the landed aristocracy of the various counties by the authorities at Dublin Castle—on these Boards you ought to let them deal with the requirements of the patients. A great friend of my own, Mr. Alderman O’Brien, of Cork, who was selected by the Council of the City of Cork again and again as a proper gentleman to represent the city on the Asylums Board, again and again was rejected simply because he happened to be a Nationalist. He was rejected, and yet members of the Board are gathered from the most obscure points, and against the wish of the city are placed on the Board simply because they happen to have Tory proclivities. That is not fair, and will not tend to the satisfactory working of these institutions. But I would point out that even on a Board so constituted, on which we have no representation, there is no power to deal with buildings, Poor Dr. Nugent, who was recently an Inspector, discussed this very point with me. He said it appeared very absurd that the Government could not trust any Board. As a matter of fact, I think that in most localities properly elected people, who have the best interests of the local population at heart, might very reasonably be trusted to see that these unfortunate lunatics suffer no risk. I ask the Chief Secretary point blank whether something cannot be done to give the Boards of Governors some share in the dealing with local wants and requirements? Again, I ask how it comes to pass that you allow so many of these afflicted people to pass their lives in badly-appointed quarters? There is a vast difference between the treatment of the insane in the workhouses in Ireland and in the properly constituted asylums. In every respect it is better than the insane should be treated in the regular asylums; and in the hope that the Committee will obtain some satisfactory reply upon the question of lunacy administration from the Chief Secretary, I beg to move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £1,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That Item D, Salaries of Inspectors of Lunatic Asylums, &c. be reduced by £1,000.”—(Dr. Tanner.)

*(9.47.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL: There is one point on which I am in agreement with the hon. Member for Mid Cork, and that relates to the necessity of the Boards of Governors having more control. I have just come from the North of Ireland, where I found this question was exciting great interest. One of the Boards of the Northern Asylums wished to purchase land and enlarge their premises, but the whole thing had to be done by the Board of Control in Dublin. The land was acquired; but the people who sold it, finding the Government were the purchasers, put a much higher price on it than they otherwise would have done. I am much more afraid of Public Boards starving the interests of local asylums and workhouses than I am of their extravagance. I should be glad if the Chief Secretary would look into the question of the powers of the Board of Control, on the one hand, and of the Local Governors on the other.

MR. FLYNN: The same kind of grievance exists in my district of Cork. The local Governors are not chosen on any proper franchise, but the Lord Lieutenant has a large power of selection, and surely the gentlemen chosen might be trusted to exercise discrimination in regard to the affairs of the asylum. Things are going from bad to worse, for the local Governors are being generally deprived of their power. In the case of the Cork District Lunatic Asylum, the Board of Control sent down an Inspector, who certified for a large expenditure without the slightest consultation with the Board of Governors. That certainly strikes a blow at the principle of Local Government. I trust the Chief Secretary will give his immediate attention to the subject, and be able to devise some means by which the Local Bodies will have some voice in the management of the asylums.

(9.53.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The matter is one of very great importance, and I think I may claim to have done much to improve the condition of affairs. As to local control, the existing system cannot be modified, or modified permanently, without statutory power; but I have done my best, outside statutory authorisation, to induce localities to suggest to the Lord Lieutenant for appointment persons whom they think may fairly represent the localities. But there is a much more important question than that, namely, lunacy administration from a medical point of view. Ireland is scandalously behind England and Scotland in lunacy administration, and I appointed a Commission to investigate the whole question, and two Reports have been laid on the Table of the House to which I strongly invite the attention of hon. Members. In consequence of the recommendations of that Commission I have done almost all I can in the absence of legislation. Legislation is earnestly required, and I hope to be able to introduce it very soon. The Board of Control has been remodelled; and though it may be that in one or two instances it has exercised its authority in the manner hon. Gentlemen and those locally concerned in lunacy administration may think objectionable, I remind them that lunacy is a subject which must be in the main under the control or under the close supervision of the Central Government which contributes so largely to the support of lunatics. I quite agree that as much discretion as possible should be left to local representatives. This, however, is a large question to go into now, but I assure the Committee it is receiving our serious attention.

MR. FLYNN: I do not at all controvert the position that the Central Body should have a large share in the control of lunacy matters, but my complaint is that they assume all the control.

MR. P. J. POWER: I hope the right hon. Gentleman will consider whether the Boards of Governors cannot be made more representative than they are at present. It is true that the Central Government contribute largely to the support of lunatics, but at the same time a certain amount of the county rate goes to the support of asylums; but notwithstanding this, the ratepayers have no representation whatsoever on the Boards of Governors. Until quite recently we did not know what went on at the meetings of the Governors. Formerly the meetings were held in private, but now the Press is admitted to some of them, and we know, to some extent, what goes on.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

(10.2.) Original Question again proposed.

MR. FLYNN: There is a point I wish to raise in connection with the Irish Fisheries, and that is the threatened destruction or serious injury of the herring, hake, and mackerel fishing in the South of Ireland. I have asked a question on the subject, and the substance of the Chief Secretary's reply was that at present the Government have no power to interfere. The matter is very urgent, and I think there may possibly be some means found by which the Inspector of Fisheries can deal with the grievance of which I complain. The deep sea fishing from Youghal to Baltimore and along the south west coast is roughly divided into seasons; first of all, there is the mackerel, then the hake, and then the herring fishing. Latterly Scotch and Manx boats have come there to fish, and it has been proved beyond all doubt that these boats in fishing before a cer tain date in June catch immense numbers of immature mackerel and hake. Of course, they are destroyed. Experienced fishermen on the south coast, and Sir Thomas Brady, are of opinion that if the practice is pursued for any length of time it will lead to the extinction of the mackerel and hake fishings. I am not acquainted with International Law, but I am convinced that where there is a will there is a way. If the Government will not, or cannot, do anything, I should like to know whether I should be prosecuted under the Criminal Law Procedure Act if I went down to Kinsale and advised the fishermen to boycott and refuse supplies to those men who indulge in this wholesale destruction of fish? It is impossible that the inhabitants can stand tamely by and see strangers destroying with impunity the fishing which is the principal source of their revenue.

(10.10.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The fishing the hon. Gentleman complains of takes place outside the three mile limit; in fact, it occurs about 20 miles from the shore. [Mr. FLYNN: About 12 miles.] The Government, therefore, have no more control over the sea in which the fishing occurs than they have over the seas on the coast of South America or of China. It is part of the ocean highway, which is common to all nations of the earth. We could pass a Municipal Act which would prevent any English or Scotch or Manx boat fishing there, but it would be quite impossible to pass an Act which would prevent any French boat fishing there. The result would be to leave the field entirely open to foreigners. The evil is a grave one, and is receiving attention.

(10.14.) DR. TANNER: I venture to say that if the state of affairs my hon. Friend complains of existed on the French coast there would be a pretty kettle of fish. The French fishermen would not put up with any of that sort of nonsense. Would the right hon. Gentleman in his wisdom advise us to boycott the outsiders who are destroying the Irish fisheries? If the Government have no power, the people must protect themselves. To make a municipal law calling upon the Scotch and Manx fishermen to discontinue this injurious practice would certainly be a step in the right direction. Then we should be able, with the assistance of a little boycotting, to drive off the French fishermen from our coasts, and our fishing interests would be safeguarded. I hope it will not be necessary for us to take a Division. It is really a matter of life and death almost to our Irish fishermen. The takes of fish on the banks from Cork Harbour to Cape Clear are the means of livelihood for a large seaboard population. If the right hon Gentleman will introduce some municipal regulation—it strikes me as a novel phrase as applied to sea pursuits—I am perfectly certain we shall be able to safeguard what ought to be a thriving, improving, prosperous industry.

MR. P. J. POWER: I have been assured that the injury is not done by French or by any foreign fishermen, but by British subjects, who would be amenable to such a municipal rule as the right hon Gentleman has spoken of. There is another matter to which I wish to draw attention——

DR. TANNER: Before we leave this point, and in the hope of obtaining something further from the right hon. Gentleman, I beg to move a reduction of the Vote under this head of £1,000.

(10.20.) Motion made, and Question put, "That Item G, Salaries of Inspectors of Irish Fisheries, be reduced by £1,000." —(Dr. Tanner.)

The Committee divided:—Ayes 72; Noes 117.—(Div. List, No. 366.)

Original Question again proposed.

(10.30.) MR. P. J. POWER: Before we take the Vote there is a matter to which I wish to direct attention in connection with the Fishery Board. As the right hon. Gentleman is aware, two years ago an Act was passed regulating steam trawling on the coast of Ireland, and this is a matter which much concerns the South of Ireland. Three years ago an Act was passed prohibiting steam trawling within the three-mile limit on the coast of Scotland. Steam trawling there had done so much harm to the fishing that Parliament was forced to interfere. But the result is, that the trawlers thus prohibited from pursuing their calling on the Scotch coast have, in some instances, turned their attention to the Irish coasts, and there is reason to suppose they will do so in increasing numbers. Now, if they did harm on the Scotch coast, equally they may be expected to do harm on the Irish coast. The Act introduced for Ireland two years ago allows steam trawling on the Irish coasts, giving the Fishery Board power to prohibit it in districts where they see fit to do so. The view I took at the time was that the Act should be prohibitory, and that the Board should only allow it in exceptional instances. I did not, however, press my opposition, for it might have prevented the passage of the Bill. I remember my dear old friend Mr. Biggar wanted to kill the Bill, for he thought it utterly bad. We thought that inasmuch as the capital and influence were on the side of the proprietors of steam trawlers, it would be more fair to cast on them the onus of proof that steam trawling on any part of the coast would do no injury to the fishing generally. However, the Bill did not pass in that form, and steam trawling is allowed everywhere, unless the Inspectors prohibit it. I would ask the Chief Secretary to call the special attention of the Inspectors to the importance of this matter and to the harm which steam trawling has done on the Scotch coast. In my own constituency I have assisted in calling the attention of Inspectors to this, and after local inquiry they have prohibited steam trawling in certain districts, and I have no doubt they would be willing to take the same course in other districts if cause were shown, but they have much to do, and this may escape attention unless it is specially pressed upon their notice.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not think the hon. Gentleman need be under any apprehension as to any large amount of steam trawling on the Irish coast. If there had been any intention on the part of those interested in steam trawling to transfer their operations to Ireland from Scotland they would be there now, but I understand that there are but five steam trawlers on the whole coast. Whenever complaints are made of steam trawling, the Inspectors give careful attention to the matter, with the result that in almost every case steam trawling has been prohibited within the three-mile limit. On pages 25 and 26 of the Annual Report of the Commissioners the hon. Gentleman will see what has been done in the past year. The attention of the Inspectors is fully drawn to the subject, and I have not the slightest doubt that they will continue to keep a watchful eye upon it.

(10.35.) DR. TANNER: The Report of the Scotch Commissioners shows the great progress made in Scotch fisheries during recent years, and these Reports contain much valuable information. The Chief Secretary, who happens to be a Scotchman, will recognise this, and I hope the same rules and regulations which have been so advantageous to Scotch fishermen may be applied to Ireland.

*SIR J. COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.): It is within my personal knowledge that on certain parts of the west coast the Inspectors pay the greatest attention to this matter. There is steam trawling and steam trawling, and most of the steam trawling is confined to depths local boats cannot reach.

MR. T. M. HEALY: There is a matter to which I desire to refer—the control exercised by the Board over lunatic asylums in County Carlow—

THE CHAIRMAN: That item has been passed by.

DR. TANNER: There is a point in connection with the Veterinary Department which I really think deserves a little attention. There are two Travelling Inspectors, each receiving £30 a year. One of these gentlemen, I find, is retired commander in the Royal Navy as such receiving £350 a year. Now here is a good, or bad, example of the kind of jobbery that is carried on under the ægis of Dublin Castle. I do not think you could find an appointment more calculated to raise ridicule upon the Department, and expose the way in which these appointments are made to various positions. Why should a retired commander of the Royal Navy be appointed to the Veterinary Department? I could understand it if the gentleman had served in the Horse Marines. In order to get some explanation on the subject, I beg to move to reduce the Vote by £300. This ex-nautical Veterinary Inspector draws from the country £650 a year, but I do not think that we are called upon to agree to this pitchforking of Castle favourites into these positions. The other evening we had a long discussion, initiated by the hon. Member for the Partick Division (Mr. J. P. Smith) on the shipment of cattle from Ireland to the Clyde, and the hon. Member made grave complaints of the manner in which the cattle are treated. I think this is pertinent to that subject, and the hon. Member should be interested in the appointment of these Inspectors. I know that in relation to the cattle trade from Cork and Waterford to Bristol and Milford you find that members of the Constabulary are employed as Inspectors, and they are well paid for their duties. When we have such loud encomiums on the loyalty and devotion of the Royal Irish Constabulary we cannot forget they are well paid for their shouting, but I think if these perquisites were withdrawn their enthusiasm would somewhat cool. I suppose such items as these scattered through the Estimates make up an addition of £300,000 or £400,000 to the Constabulary Vote. No wonder there is an anxiety among these supporters of the Government that Her Majesty's present advisers should continue in Office. I admit that some of these men do their work as Inspectors very well, but, on the other hand, I must condemn the system that makes the appointments so largely from the ranks of the Constabulary. But to elicit some information about this distinguished naval veteran, I move the reduction.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item K, Salaries of the Veterinary Department, be reduced by £300."—(Dr. Tanner.)

(10.44) MR. JORDAN: I think we ought to have some explanation why this retired naval officer received the appointment, when I am sure there are many competent men who have qualified themselves for the position by special study. From the ranks of the profession surely a properly qualified Inspector could be found, one who is not in receipt of a pension from the country. If this officer were appointed to inspect rickety vessels and ships which carry horses and cattle I could understand why they should select a naval officer; but even then I do not think the Chief Secretary would find it impossible to get sufficient aid in the Veterinary Department itself to carry out such inspection. It is too bad that, unless special necessity exists for it, a man who has retired from the Navy on a pension, should receive £350 a year from the Veterinary Department, ousting an official of that Department from the position. I think that in these matters the cobbler ought to stick to his last, and that a naval officer should not be appointed when it is possible to get a veterinary officer.

MR. FLYNN: I am not surprised at the observations of my hon. Friends, but I would ask the hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Cork (Dr. Tanner) not to press the matter to a Division. No doubt it is a matter that deserves severe criticism, that for a civil appointment of this kind connected with the Veterinary Department you should select a retired naval officer. Such a person would naturally know more about ships and guns than about horseflesh. To discharge the duties properly we ought to have a man who understands horses and cattle and their diseases, and their condition after long periods of travel; therefore, I think it is a class of appointment that ought not to be given to a naval officer. However, as the point is rather a small one, I think my hon. Friend would do well to withdraw his Amendment.

DR. TANNER: I want to know who this gentleman is? I would explain that my Amendment is intended as a protest against the practice of pitchforking into lucrative positions persons who can bring family influence to bear upon Members of the Government. I protest against a man, simply because he has influential acquaintances—some noble Lord who may directly or indirectly know the Chief Secretary, or his cousin or his aunt, or something of that sort—being pitchforked into a position of this sort. These people always go with the same cry, “You know you have reduced our rents and have given all we had to the terrible Home Rulers. Will you not give us this little trifle—only a travelling inspectorship?” I have spared the Chief Secretary’s blushes on other Votes, but will the Chief Secretary tell the Committee something about this efficient Conservative Horse Marine who has been made Veterinary Inspector?

(10.51.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: All I can say is that I know nothing about the gentleman except that I have reason to believe that he does his work efficiently. The appointment was not mine.

COLONEL NOLAN: I would ask whether this officer has qualified by examination as a veterinary surgeon? It is possible that, although a naval officer, he may have studied in some Veterinary College; and if he has qualified himself, no doubt it would be fair on the part of the Government to appoint him. I should like to know from the right hon. Gentleman whether this gentleman has passed an examination?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There are some Veterinary Inspectors, but this gentleman is a Travelling Inspector.

COLONEL NOLAN: What does he do?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Under the Act of 1878 he has to deal with Orders in Council relating to the transit of animals—to see that the transit is properly carried out, and that the provisions with regard to the export of cattle are duly observed.

COLONEL NOLAN: I think we ought to have a little more information on this matter. It is important that we should know whether this gentleman’s duties lie entirely in connection with the inspection of vessels.

Dr. Tanner

I am under the impression that the duty of the Inspector is to examine pigs and cattle, and so on; and it seems to me that the burden of proof rests on the Chief Secretary. He ought to be able in defending this appointment to show that this gentleman’s duties lie considerably in the direction of the sea. I can quite understand that this gentleman will be better able to inspect the shipping of cattle and horses and the arrangements for their comfort on board ship than a purely veterinary officer, but I certainly think that promotion should go from the Department, and that there are many veterinary officers in Dublin who could fill this post, and who could very easily get up a knowledge of cattle arrangements in ships. If you stick everybody who wants £350 a year into a post of this sort, the policy is open to very serious objection. The right hon. Gentleman has not said one word as to whether this Inspector is qualified for the work.

(10.56.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I would point out that the appointment was made long before the present Government came into Office. Apparently, the sole charge which hon. Members opposite have to bring against this gentleman is that he is a gallant naval officer. There is no pretence that he is incompetent, no ground for supposing that Lord Spencer committed a job in appointing him. In any case, this appointment is a legacy from a previous Administration. Hon. Members opposite would make a Government responsible for every appointment made by preceding Governments. I decline to accept such responsibility. Of all hon. Members in the Committee, I should have thought that the hon. and gallant Member would have been the last to suggest that a gentleman, who has served his country in the combatant forces, is an incompetent official.

COLONEL NOLAN: The right hon. Gentleman has imparted an undue amount of warmth to this discussion. I said nothing about the fact of this gentleman being a naval officer unfitting him for this post. The question I asked was whether he had passed any qualifying examination in a Veterinary College. I specially said, or implied, that a naval man who had passed this examination might be a very good officer for the post. I know nothing about this gentleman, and was laying no trap for the Chief Secretary. I rather thought the Inspector had passed an examination, because I have known men pass such examinations late in life. What I asked of the right hon. Gentleman was that he should show that this gentleman who has spent most of his time amongst shipping qualified himself for the post of Veterinary Inspector. He has not shown that. All he has said is that he was bound to take over the appointment made by his predecessor. No doubt that is so, but I think I have a right to ask for an answer to my question. If the right hon. Gentleman defends this appointment he is bound to show that the qualifications of this gentleman fit him for the post; that he has not been appointed to it simply because he was a naval officer. I think that, seeing the right hon. Gentleman has now been in office five years, he ought to have found out if this was a suitable appointment. The Veterinary Department is one of extreme importance to Ireland, and I have no hesitation in saying that any want of knowledge on the part of its officers might easily cause a loss of £1,000,000 sterling in one year. If an idea crept into the heads of the farmers of England or of the great buyers of Irish cattle that those cattle were peculiarly liable to disease, the price would at once fall at least £2 a head, and the appointment of presumably inefficient Inspectors would certainly give rise to such a suspicion. I believe that in the past the Department has been very successful in stamping out disease. No doubt it has had to adopt very despotic measures, but I should always back them up in that. I believe that it is only in the County of Dublin that there is now any special liability to cattle disease; but as long as the Chief Secretary chooses to keep in office gentlemen who have not passed through the Veterinary Colleges, I cannot say that the Department is wholly free from the imputation brought against it by the hon. Member for Mid Cork. I am sorry to say that the Chief Secretary has treated this matter with extreme levity, seeing that it is one of vital importance to Ireland; for any neglect in the appointment of qualified Inspectors is not only dangerous, but may be fatal to the cattle trade of Ireland. Will the right hon. Gentleman tell us if this naval officer has any special qualifications for the work?

(11.6.) DR. TANNER: The right hon. Gentleman said just now this officer was appointed by Lord Spencer, and immediately afterwards he said he could not be held responsible for appointments made 40 years ago. Surely, when dealing with a matter of this kind he ought to be a little more accurate in his statements. When he rises to defend a Member of the classes—a gentleman who, having served his country for a time and secured a pension, supplements his income by taking one of these appointments—he ought to be careful about his dates. We know very well that Lord Spencer was not responsible for appointments made 40 years ago. I have no intention of dividing the Committee on this matter however; I am content with the discussion which has been raised, but I am surprised that the hon. Member for the Partick Division of Lanarkshire has taken no part in it. The other evening he initiated a Debate on the cruelties of the cattle-carrying trade. Now, surely the duties of Inspectors are closely connected with that subject, and if inefficient men are pitchforked into the office lamentable results may follow. The hon. Member, in a speech of an hour and a half's duration, described the suffering of these poor creatures on board cattle steamers. He has had nothing to say to-day, and I always find in connection with speeches made by celebrated humanitarians that immediately they get a chance of enforcing their views by reducing the salaries of Ministers they promptly shirk the issue.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

3. £1,496, to complete the sum for Charitable Donations and Bequests Office, Ireland.

4. Motion made, and Question proposed,

(11.10.) COLONEL NOLAN: I see in this Vote there is an item of £74,000 for Medical Officers, &c. The custom in Ireland is for dispensary medical officers' salaries to be paid half by the rates and half by the Government. That in itself is a very fair arrangement, but the blot on the system is this: that the rate-payers have to pay the whole of the pension granted on retirement. The result is that, at the present time, the Boards of Guardians will not retire any medical officer so long as he is fit for the work at all, because they have to pay the whole of his pension. I think that some system should be adopted under which the State might contribute a certain portion of these pensions. If the Chief Secretary will take the question into his consideration and introduce some scheme of that sort, he will be effecting a very valuable change. Of course, it would be necessary to give the State a voice in the question of allowing an officer to retire, but I do not think the Guardians would object to it. The position of a dispensary officer in Ireland at the present time is a pretty good one. Only two faults can be found with it. One is that people who can afford to pay often employ the officer under the dispensary system. That, perhaps, is partly his own fault for charging such high fees. The second blot is, of course, that of retiring pensions, which I have already explained. But to return to the fault which arises from the charging of unduly high fees. We know that medical etiquette in Ireland is very strong, but I think the Local Government Board might help to break down the practice of charging £1 fees, and secure the introduction of a system by which medical officers should attend paying patients for fees of 2s. 6d. or 5s. I believe that would be a great advantage to the medical profession of Ireland. I know that in the last four or five years a practice of charging lower fees has been slowly growing up; but I believe that if the Local Government Board took it in hand, the dispensary officers would gladly fall in with it.

(11.20.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I think that the action of the Local Government Board with regard to labourers' cottages in Ireland has been on the whole satisfactory, but, unfortunately, a system has grown up among the authorities of discouraging the Inspectors should they report in favour of supplying such cottages. It must be remembered that these Inspectors are not naturally on the side of the people; and when they report on the necessity for these cottages, they do so because they have investigated the subject on the spot, and have realised what is necessary, in spite of the objections of landlords. I am afraid the mischief is done at the Privy Council, and I think the Board ought to take more active steps in the matter on receiving Reports from their Inspectors. I have endeavoured two or three times on this Vote to put some “stiffening” into the backs of these Inspectors, to let them see that the Nationalist Party will support them in their very moderate action. I think that it is a very hard thing that while they are endeavouring to do their best they should be snubbed by the Lord Chancellor and the Judges. Yet it is often the case; they recommend the building of 100 cottages; the Local Government Board authorities cut the number down to 30, and finally the Privy Council issue an order for the erection of 10. This is not at all creditable to those right hon. Gentlemen who compose the Privy Council. At the same time, I think that the Local Government Board do not proceed on the best lines with regard to Boards of Guardians. In none of the Ulster counties is there a single labourer's cottage, with the exception of Cavan, the only county where the Nationalists are in command. In the County of Antrim, the richest county, there is not a single labourer's cottage, and the same may be said with regard to the Counties of Down, Monaghan, and Derry. This is a most discreditable state of things. I think you could find an appointment more calculated to raise ridicule upon the Department, and expose the way in which these appointments are made to various positions. Why should a retired commander of the Royal Navy be appointed to the Veterinary Department? I could understand it if the gentleman had served in the Horse Marines. In order to get some explanation on the subject, I beg to move to reduce the Vote by £300. This ex-nautical Veterinary Inspector draws from the country £650 a year, but I do not think that we are called upon to agree to this pitchforking of Castle favourites into these positions. The other evening we had a long discussion, initiated by the hon. Member for the Partick Division (Mr. J. P. Smith) on the shipment of cattle from Ireland to the Clyde, and the hon. But to elicit some information about this distinguished naval veteran, I move the reduction.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That Item K, Salaries of the Veterinary Department, be reduced by £300.”—(Dr. Tanner.)

(10.44) MR. JORDAN: I think we ought to have some explanation why this retired naval officer received the appointment, when I am sure there are many competent men who have qualified themselves for the position by special study. From the ranks of the profession surely a properly qualified Inspector could be found, one who is not in receipt of a pension from the country. If this officer were appointed to inspect rickety vessels and ships which carry horses and cattle I could understand why they should select a naval officer; but even then I do not think the Chief Secretary would find it impossible to get sufficient aid in the Veterinary Department itself to carry out such inspection. It is too bad that, unless special necessity exists for it, a man who has retired from the Navy on a pension, should receive £350 a year from the Veterinary Department, ousting an official of that Department from the position. I think that in these matters the cobbler ought to stick to his last, and that a naval officer should not be appointed when it is possible to get a veterinary officer.

MR. FLYNN: I am not surprised at the observations of my hon. Friends, but I would ask the hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Cork (Dr. Tanner) not to press the matter to a Division. No doubt it is a matter that deserves severe criticism, that for a civil appointment of this kind connected with the Veterinary Department you should select a retired naval officer. Such a person would naturally know more about ships and guns than about horseflesh. To discharge the duties properly we ought to have a man who understands horses and cattle and their diseases, and their condition after long periods of travel; therefore, I think it is a class of appointment that ought not to be given to a naval officer. However, as the point is rather a small one, I think my hon. Friend would do well to withdraw his Amendment.

DR. TANNER: I want to know who this gentleman is? I would explain that my Amendment is intended

(11.38.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The question of lunacy has been engaging the attention of the Irish Government, and I appointed, a year or two ago, a strong though small Commission to look into the question. Its investigations disclosed a most scandalous system of administration. I hope to be able to introduce the necessary alterations of the law, which must be carried into effect before a real reform can be made in the Irish administration on this point. One of my first acts, on the Report of the Commission, was to appoint a Board of Control. That was done under existing statutory powers, but the system had somehow fallen into desuetude. Such a Board is necessary, for sometimes an increase of accommodation is necessary in the interests of the lunatics, and then the Board can order it to be provided. I will, however, consider whether it is not possible to provide some appeal in the case in which the Board of Control decides that further accommodation must be provided. The question requires the most careful attention. As to the Labourers' Act, very little money has, no doubt, been used in Ulster for this purpose. It is a very serious matter to deal with the question raised by the hon. Member as to the desirability of lowering the qualification for Guardians. I would point out that to have allocated the licensing grant solely for the erection of labourers' cottages would have been to devote cash contributed by the whole of the community to an object which would benefit only a small section. I will not pronounce an opinion as to the desirability of lowering the guardianship qualification, but I will suggest that it would be bad policy to lower the qualification merely for the purpose of enabling the Guardians to better administer one particular Act with which they have to deal. The Poor Law administration is one of the most important in the country. It goes to the root of the agrarian life of the district, and any change in it should be adopted with extreme caution. I will re-consider the question as to the distribution of the fund allocated last year. Of course, it is easy to raise objections to any system of allocation on the basis of population, expenditure, or valuation. The unused portion of the grant amounts, roughly, to £15,000. This has been placed to the credit of the Local Government Board, and the money will be issued under the powers given by the Statute to those Boards of Guardians entitled to receive it for labourers' cottages.

MR. T. M. HEALY: How about the Boyle Union? I gather that the Local Government Board, seeing the Guardians were not prepared to use that money, have withdrawn it from them. Have they lost it altogether, or can they get it in another year, when they have a scheme ready?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not think the Guardians lose the money by not employing it in a given year. It remains to their account to be used when they have fully matured their schemes. As to the action of the Privy Council with reference to labourers' cottages, I think that the House will not consent to those Acts being left to the administration of the Local Authorities. Land might be taken without the consent of the owner, and there must be some authority of a judicial, if not of a legislative, character which will have the power of giving consent for the compulsory powers to be put in operation. Dealing with the suggested contribution by the State towards the pensions of medical officers, a question as to which was raised by the hon. and gallant Member for Galway, I think that hon. Members must feel that it is a very large change which has been suggested, and it would be necessary, first of all, to obtain the consent of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It is not a change which could be confined to Ireland. The question is a large one, and, if the money is forthcoming, a very good object would be served in carrying out the suggestion, but it would be rash in me to give any pledge in the absence of the direct sanction of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The hon. and gallant Member also suggested that the Local Government Board should interfere with a view to reducing the fees now charged by medical officers to paying patients. No doubt it is very desirable that the high fee of £1 should not be maintained, but for the Local Government Board to lay down any rules affecting the charges of dispensary officers might cause considerable injustice in districts where there are medical practitioners not in the public service. I think, however, the remarks of the hon. and gallant Member may serve a good purpose, and that the force of them will be appreciated by the profession in Ireland.

(11.50.) MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I think it will be generally admitted that the Poor Law administration of Ireland is scandalously behind that which obtains in England. I think there is hardly any portion of the work of the Local Government Board which is properly done. It would be a very good thing if the general Inspectors in Ireland could be sent over to England to learn something of the administration of the Poor Law in England. The unions and infirmaries in Ireland are conducted very laxly, and the officials from top to bottom perform their duties in a very perfunctory manner. Their chief object is to draw their salaries. An intelligent administration would so conduct matters as to endeavour, at any rate, to save the children, but the system in Ireland leads to the multiplication of hereditary paupers. Once inside the poor house, and all hope must be abandoned. I have known cases where the only playground for the children is the quarter inhabited by idiot women. Then, it is evident that classification is not properly attended to. I should like to see some of the English Inspectors visit Ireland and thoroughly overhaul the work of the Irish Inspectors. Another matter of complaint is that the medicines supplied to the poor cannot be of proper quality, because of the prices paid for them by the Guardians, and many of the dispensaries are so affected by damp that the drugs are not fit to use. I have raised this question before, and I should like to know whether any inquiries have been made as to it during the past year?

*(11.56.) MR. KNOX: I believe the Vote includes a sum for the payment of the Special Inspector in connection with the Seed Potatoes Act.

THE CHAIRMAN: That is a special Estimate.

*MR. KNOX: Then, Sir, I will defer my remarks on that point. But I believe that some of the ordinary Inspectors of the Board were employed by the Local Government Board to inquire into the exceptional distress, and I have to complain that their work was done in a very perfunctory manner. The Inspector sent to Cavan did not go to the Guardians or to the ministers of any denomination, at any rate in the town of Cavan; they merely went to the Relieving Officers, who are not in the least qualified to give information with regard to exceptional distress. The man in the occupation of land who was the victim of exceptional distress does not come under the operation of the ordinary Poor Law, and, therefore, the Relieving Officer would know nothing about him. This conduct of applying only to the Relieving Officer or to the police illustrates in a significant way the policy of the Inspectors. They are almost always men who have been jobbed into their places without any regard for their qualifications for the post. They are appointed because they belong to a certain clique, and not having any actual knowledge of Local Government, they get through their work as quickly as they can without regard to efficiency. In some other parts of the Division the Inspectors did not inquire as closely as they ought into the cases of the distress. I may mention that though attention was called to the relief of distress in County Cavan in the month of December, the Chief Secretary did not admit the need for any relief until the end of the month of May, when some relief works were started.

(12.2.) MR. FLYNN: I desire to support the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for North Longford with regard to these Provisional Orders. There exists the greatest possible necessity to strengthen the hands of the Local Government Board Inspectors when they go before the Privy Council. It is a most disheartening thing for a Board of Guardians to go to a great deal of trouble and expense, and then to find that 50 or 60 per cent. of the cottages approved of by the Inspector are absolutely rejected by the Privy Council on grounds the most flimsy. The Inspector may cite the evidence, but he can make no stand against the Privy Council, and tacitly accepts the decision of these men, the bulk of whom are antagonistic to the working of the Act. If the Government mean to carry out the Act it is their duty to see that the Inspector, when he goes before the Privy Council, makes a stand for the rights of these poor and oppressed people. When the Inspectors were going round during the earlier periods of the distress the person they never called upon was the Roman Catholic priest or curate. In a few cases they called on the elected Guardian of the district; they invariably called at the police barracks, and occasionally they visited the Relieving Officer. Government Inspectors engaged in this so-called mission of mercy and relief visited districts in and around Kerry, and few people knew of their presence. The priest knew nothing about the visit, and the Poor Law Guardian knew nothing about it. In certain districts it was almost impossible to find whether the Local Government Board Inspector ever left his hotel door. This shows that there is great need of overhauling the whole system of Local Government Board inspection. Now, upon this Vote I desire to refer to the action taken in regard to certain Nationalist newspapers. The Local Government Board have not been above the practice of boycotting newspapers because of their advocacy of Nationalist opinions. Some time ago I protested against the boycotting of the Tory newspaper in the City of Cork, but what are we to say of a powerful Government Department which pursues a policy of that kind. It was necessary that the Board should issue advertisements concerning a graveyard in the Youghal Union. There were three newspapers there. Two were Nationalist and the third Tory. The latter paper, which had but a small circulation, was singled out for the order for the advertisement. The proprietors of the two Nationalist papers protested by letter to the Local Government Board, but no heed was paid to their protest. The editor of the Carlow Nationalist had complained to the Board that while his paper had five times the circulation of the local Conservative organ, the Board's advertisements had been withheld from him and given to his rival. The Board replied that—"You are under a misapprehension in supposing that the advocacy of particular political opinions is any reason for giving or withholding Government advertisements. If advertisements were withheld from the Nationalist and Leinster Times it was solely because that paper continued to violate the law."

What was the violation of the law? It was the insistence on the part of the proprietor to publish reports of National League meetings. The Government by their action in this matter are setting a very dangerous example to political parties in Ireland and to public and local representative bodies.

(12.15.) MR. JORDAN: I desire to direct the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the mode in which the Medical Department is administered. In the Union to which I belong we have had a considerable amount of difficulty in relation to the medicine contract. I can bear testimony to the dampness of the dispensary destroying the medicines. The medicines are bad originally, but they get worse by being kept in damp dispensaries. We have had a long contention in relation to the medicines. We consulted the county analyst in Dublin, and he reported that the medicines were not sound. In many cases there was a large percentage of adulteration. It is scarcely to be wondered at that the medicines are adulterated, because some of the contractors take the contracts at prices which cannot pay. After all, I consider the Local Government Board are not so much to blame as the Guardians who take the contracts. I believe in coercing the Guardians upon a point so vital to the interests of the poor, the quality of the medicines supplied to them. There should be some standard of quality established, and the Local Government Board ought to insist upon the Guardians purchasing the best possible goods. What are the medical Inspectors for, if they do not see that the best medicines are obtained and kept in proper places?

*(12.20.) SIR J. COLOMB: I have listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the hon. Gentleman concerning the medicines dispensed in the Union dispensaries, but let me point out that the remedy really rests with the people themselves. The medical officers are appointed by the Dispensary Committees, and appointed in conformity with local feeling. I know nothing more lamentable in the modern history of the South of Ireland than the way these appointments are made. It is most painful to see the health and lives of the people of a whole district jeopardised owing to the innate desire to job on the part of Dispensary Committees. It was all very fine for hon. Members to say that Medical Inspectors should be sent down to see that proper medicines are procured and kept in a proper place. As far back as I can remember the medical officer in my own Union reported that medicines could not be properly kept in the dispensary, but it took years and years to get a new dispensary built. Until the ratepayers become more alive to the necessity of exercising impartially the power they have, we shall not get these things remedied.

(12.27.) COLONEL NOLAN: If all the power rests with the Boards of Guardians, what is the use of having a Local Government Board? In respect of Poor Law administration, you want a Local Board to administer details and a Central Body to exercise supreme control. In regard to the quality of medicines, the Central Body can engage an analyst, and a Local Board cannot do it to the same advantage. The hon. and gallant Gentleman says the remedy rests in the hands of the Boards of Guardians. This House settles the number of ex officio members of Boards of Guardians, and the qualifications of the elected Guardians, and then the hon. and gallant Gentleman says the people are at fault in questions such as this under discussion. I venture to suggest to the hon. Gentleman that if he thinks over it he will find that these Local Boards are controlled by regulations laid down by the Central Board. In regard to the question of medicines, I should say the remarks of my hon. Friend are useful, but I would not push them too far. Medicines may be cheap, and they may be good also. In the Union where I have the honour to be chairman we accept the cheapest tender, but we leave it to our medical officer to say if the drugs are good. But, then, it does not follow that every medical man is a good chemist, and I think the Local Government Board might fairly undertake to analyse drugs sent to them, free of charge, and the Reports being circulated among all the Boards of Guardians would greatly tend to check the supply of bad medicines. I do not say that the medicines supplied are bad generally, and I know it cannot be said in the Union where I have had experience. Of course, we know that in the West of Ireland dampness is a condition of the climate, and unless you have specially constructed dispensaries, I do not see how you can prevent the risk of deterioration on this account. The dispensary is often a room in a house, and to have a fire kept going daily means that you must have an attendant, and you cannot keep the room locked up. I do not see the necessity of building new dispensaries, and all that can be done is to select the room most suitable, and if the damp is serious the medical officer should report upon it. On the question of labourers' cottages most of the hon. Members who have spoken have referred to the South of Ireland, but the conditions of life in the West are somewhat different. What we want is the repair rather than the erection of cottages, and expenditure is more useful in this direction. As to the treatment of children in workhouses, I believe they are tolerably healthy but very listless, and there is, I admit, a tendency to return to the workhouse after leaving it. I am afraid if you make the condition of things too comfortable it may tempt parents to desert their children, knowing they will be comfortably provided for in the workhouse. I think the Chief Secretary might consider whether some remedy might be applied whereby children might be sent from the workhouse to an industrial school, the absurd rule about the commission of a crime being a qualification for admission into an industrial school being abolished.

(12.37.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The suggestion that workhouse children should be sent to industrial schools is a useful one to consider in relation to Poor Law administration, but it is not a question we can profitably discuss now. The discussion in regard to medicines has been an interesting one, and I take special note of the suggestion that the Local Government Board should gratuitously analyse medicines sent to them by Guardians for that purpose. Undoubtedly, as my hon. Friend has said, it is the duty of the local bodies to see that they are supplied with good drugs, but I think also, it is the business of the Local Government Board to assist to that end so far as it lies in their power; and, therefore, the suggestion made by the hon. and gallant Gentleman shall be carefully considered. I hope the Committee will not think I am going beyond my duty if I now ask them to take this Vote and the two or three following Votes, which do not excite much interest or call for much discussion.

(12.40.) MR. P. J. POWER: The hon. and gallant Gentleman who has treated the Committee to a lecture on the duties of Guardians does not belong to the class from which the elected Guardians are chosen. It does not lie in the mouth of any ex officio Guardian who merely attends Board Meetings to effect some job to speak of the Guardians neglecting their duties. If there is any neglect of duty on the part of Guardians, should not the censure for that fall heavier upon the ex officio members as belonging to the educated and learned class, and who should, therefore, pay the more attention to the duties of Guardians? As a fact, the ex officios attend the Board meetings seldom, and then only to perpetrate some job, suspending orders for the purpose, and neglecting the ordinary business. As a matter of fact, you find in Ireland that only where the Nationalists are in the majority on the Boards of Guardians are the interests of the poor in the district properly regarded. But the Tory Party seem to have an inherent dislike to elected bodies; see how they sneer at the London County Council. The Report of the Local Government Board is about as sad reading as we can find. There is a decrease in the amount of relief, but, on the other hand, there is a woful decline in the population of Ireland. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman if it is the intention of the Government to continue the Labourers'

Mr. A. J. Balfour

Act, which, I think, expires this year, because some schemes are in progress and they cannot be carried without an assurance on this point?

*(12.45.) SIR J. COLOMB: In reply to the remarks of the hon. Member I may say that the Union I had in mind has a Board consisting of about five ex officio Guardians and 25 elected Guardians. [An hon. MEMBER: It is impossible!] It is the Kenmare Board of Guardians.

DR. TANNER: I have been an elected Guardian of the Cork Union for a considerable time, and I can confirm from my experience what my hon. Friend has said as to the general action of ex officio Guardians—

THE CHAIRMAN: This controversy as between the two classes of Guardians does not in any way arise upon the Vote. The hon. Member will not pursue the subject.

DR. TANNER: Very well, Sir, I will move a reduction instead. It is hard to have to listen to such strictures, and, knowing them unjust, to have no opportunity of replying. However, I will content myself with giving a complete and emphatic denial to the statement of the hon. Gentleman. Then I turn to another point, the advances made for labourers' cottages. I think we have much reason to complain of the red-tapeism of the Local Government Board in this regard, and I hope that in those Unions where labourers' cottages are much required more attention will be paid to this subject. Then, I think, we have reason to complain of the conduct of Local Government Board Inspectors. It is too much their habit to occupy their time at the country houses of landlords of a district. Such is the case which Colonel Speight, who lives among those who are entirely antagonistic to the ideas, wishes, and desires of the great body of the people, and a feeling of distrust of his action is thereby created. I have known Colonel Speight date messages from the Conservative Club, calling attention to the shortcomings of one and another of the officials connected with the Cork Union. It would induce a better state of feeling if these gentlemen avoided the appearance of taking sides, and lived at hotels, instead of at Conservative Clubs and the houses of distinguished Conservative gentlemen. I should like to know also how the Assistant Commissioners are chosen. Some of them are hardly up to the requirements of their position. I am not alluding to the Medical Commissioner, for he is nearly always a distinguished medical man of some standing, perfectly capable of dealing with the matters which come under his consideration; but I very much doubt the qualifications of others for dealing with Poor Law business. They draw good salaries, and a considerable amount for travelling expenses; the amount we are called upon to pass under that head this year was £3,830, and it was rather more last year. Taking all the facts together, I think the Local Government Board in Ireland is most extravagantly administered. In connection with the Labourers' Acts, costs are heaped up to an extravagant extent, and if these Acts are to be continued I hope something will be done to cut down this expenditure. Then, again, I cannot see how £800 a year can be spent in providing vaccine lymph. A very few calves would provide the lymph required in Ireland. Hundreds of children can be vaccinated from one calf, and in very many cases there is a well-founded objection to children being vaccinated direct from the calf, because it has too powerful an effect. I recollect one instance where an aristocratic lady, refusing to allow her child to be vaccinated with plebeian lymph, insisted on the use of calf lymph, and the child died in consequence. As regards medicines, I must say that I have not known many instances of their being supplied of bad quality, and I know that in the Cork and Macroom Unions they are of very good quality. In remote districts it may be that the contractors play tricks with the drugs supplied, and I think that the suggestion of my hon. and gallant Friend that the Local Government Board should supply an analysis is a very useful one. I must take exception to some remarks made about the Irish dispensary doctors. As a class, they are not inferior to any class of medical men you can find, and considering the arduous lives they lead in some of the more remote districts, I think they are much underpaid. As a matter of fact, I am proud of our medical men; they keep up their fees where they attend the wealthier classes, but work for little or gratuitously among the poor, and at considerable risk of infection. I am glad to say that Irish medical men have a high sense of the dignity of their profession; you do not find them going about cadging for work at low fees, as is sometimes the case in England. If it were in order to do so I would move for an increase of the remuneration to Irish dispensary doctors, and I hope that in time their services will meet with the recognition they deserve.

(1.2.) MR. KNOX: There is one question I wish to ask, and that is whether the Local Government Board is to be permitted to continue the policy of withholding public advertisements from Nationalist newspapers whose managers have violated the provisions of the Coercion Act. Is there to be no limit or is this boycotting to go on for ever?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The fact that newspaper managers have once broken the law need not ostracise them for all time. I shall be glad to consider whether the proprietors of any papers in connection with which the Crimes Act has been violated have expiated their offences to an extent that would justify Public Offices in advertising in those newspapers.

MR. FLYNN: This raises a very important question. We dispute the right of the Local Government Board to frame any such rule. Advertisements should be distributed in the interest of the public, not merely of the newspapers. I maintain the right of any newspaper managers to take up any line of action in regard to the Coercion Act, and it is no part of the consequences, or should not be, that they should be penalised by being deprived of official advertisements. The action of the Government in this matter is mean and vindictive. Advertisements relating to the public service ought to be inserted in all important newspapers, no matter what their politics may be. Yet, I know cases, as in the instance of advertisements relating to the water supply of Dungarvan, where advertisements have been withheld from the Nationalist newspaper circulating among nineteen-twentieths of the population, and have been given to two obscure Tory prints. The offence for which newspaper editors and proprietors have been punished has usually been publishing reports of so-called suppressed meetings, merely a technical breach of the law, and when you withhold advertisements from a widely circulated newspaper you injure the Public Service, defeat the very object of advertisement, and you provoke reprisal on the part of local bodies. The conduct of the Local Government Board in Ireland in boycotting Nationalist newspapers would justify Local Boards like the Cork Board of Guardians in treating Tory newspapers in a similar fashion.

(1.7.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I think we should do well in allowing the Government to take this and the next Vote. It is now past one o'clock, and I think the Government should be satisfied with the progress made. With regard to the point raised in reference to advertisements, I may observe that, whatever the Government may do or promise there will be no change in the policy of the Local Government Board with respect to advertisements until all the little Tories in Dublin Castle shall have been cleared out.

1. "That a sum, not exceeding £15,624, be granted to Her Majesty to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1892, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of Her Majesty's Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues, and of the Office of Land Revenue Records and Inrolments."

MR. T. M. HEALY: How about the debt due from the Duke of Fife?

Mr. Flynn

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I have made inquiry into that matter, and I find it is a claim on the Duke of Fife which is not admitted by him, and it is in connection with what are known as fines on succession. I understand from the Office of Woods and Forests that the Duke has offered every assistance in his power to settle the matter, and to have a complete investigation, and he has prevented costly litigation thereby. I am bound to admit that a great deal of time has been allowed to pass, but I am afraid that the law is not more speedy in Scotland than elsewhere. Only two or three points are now unsettled and they have been referred to Counsel. The Crown has not been damnified by the delay, because if the claim be sustained interest at the rate of 4 per cent. a year will be paid on the debt during the time it has been outstanding. I am satisfied that the delay is due to no fault on the part of the Duke, but the claim involves the examination of a large number of deeds referring to different parts of the estate, and hence the delay.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD PROVISIONAL ORDERS BILLS.

*LORD HENNIKER: My Lords, in moving the Resolution which is in my name, I think it right to remind your Lordships that these Bills are to confirm schemes with regard to labourers' dwellings, the compulsory purchase of land, and the extension of boroughs. It would cause very great inconvenience if these Bills, which are of great local importance, should stand over for 12 months. For various reasons it has not been practicable to introduce these Provisional Order Bills before. They form only a small proportion of the Provisional Orders prepared by the Local Government Board. These Orders come before the Local Government Board from time to time, and I must remind your Lordships that they have sometimes to be dealt with by the County Councils at their meetings, which do not take place very often, sometimes only once in three months. This must take up a considerable time, and questions also arise at a later stage of these Bills which require a great deal of correspondence, which adds to the pressure on the Department in the preparation of these Orders. Some of these Orders, I admit, might have been introduced somewhat sooner; but it was thought that it was desirable to include as many Orders as possible in the Bills, so as to reduce the number of Bills presented to the House. The same suspension of the Standing Orders was asked for in the House of Commons, and granted after full consideration by the Chairman of Committees there. I think I have shown your Lordships it is not always easy to bring in these Bills all at once. I think I have shown that there are all sorts of difficulties with regard to correspondence, and so on, as to these Provisional Orders, which come before the office almost from day to day. I know it is the desire of the President to bring these Provisional Order Bills in as much as possible at the same time, and as early in the Session as possible. Such a course would be more convenient to the Department and the House.

Moved—

"That the Sessional Order of the 5th of March last, 'That no Bill brought from the House of Commons confirming any Provisional Order or Provisional Certificate shall be read a second time after Friday, the 26th day of June next,' be dispensed with, and that the Bills be read 2^a."—(The Lord Hartismere, [L. Henniker].)

THE EARL OF MORLEY: My Lords, the noble Lord asks that the Sessional Order should be suspended, and I do not propose to make any opposition to that Motion; but I must say that I do not think the noble Lord has really given any valid excuse why these Bills should have been introduced at so late a period of the Session. One of these Bills is at present opposed, and I would point out to the House how extremely inconvenient it is to have Bills of this character, some of them containing several Orders, brought in so late in the Session, when it is hardly possible to deal with them adequately. I think it would have been desirable if the noble Lord could have told the House that arrangements would be made in future years to obviate this inconvenience. He states very truly that there is a great deal of correspondence necessary before these Bills can be completed, but I would suggest to him that these difficulties could be met by enforcing earlier attention from the Local Bodies, to enable these Bills to be passed through Parliament in any given Session. I would venture to submit this to the noble Lord, and I hope that in future every effort will be made not to bring in these Bills at so late a period as they have been at present.

On Question, agreed to.

LOCAL REGISTRATION OF TITLE (IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 209.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

Moved, "That the House do now resolve itself into Committee."

*EARL OF BELMORE: My Lords, before the House goes into Committee perhaps I may remind your Lordships that on the occasion of the Second Reading of this Bill there was an understanding come to, that in consequence of the late hour in which it came on, those noble Lords who wished to make some observations upon the Bill would be permitted to do so on going into Committee. In the few remarks that I wish to trouble your Lordships with, I do assure you that I have no intention of taking any line that could be open to be considered as aggressive as against the principle of this Bill, because it is one of very great importance, and it is one that we in Ireland who are connected with the land in that country have been looking forward to for certainly the last two years. This is, I believe, the third Session which this Bill has been before Parliament, although it is the first time that it has reached your Lordships' House. This Bill has one main object as stated in the Memorandum which precedes it. Its first object is to provide a system—an inexpensive system of land registration for those tenant purchasers who, by the actions of the various Acts connected with land in Ireland during the last 10 years have been brought under the influence of the system of registration of deeds. Having purchased under these Acts a person who has been an occupier of a farm, whether he is a judicial tenant or a leaseholder, or merely a tenant from year to year under the old system, in which case he would have been outside the system of registration of deeds, now becomes owner in fee simple, subject to the repayment of his mortgage, and comes under the system. The registration of deeds, although a system that has, no doubt, been very valuable during the last two centuries, is connected with very considerable expense. There are fees to be paid, of course, and whenever you wish to make a transfer of land you have to make search back for a considerable period at considerable expense; and the great drawback which exists with regard to this registration of deeds is the fact that all those entries are kept in manuscript, and are only made in a single folio. The consequence is there is only one book, which contains the entries for a considerable period—a year or more—and it can only be in the hands of one person at a time, whereby very great delay is caused, until persons employed by solicitors engaged in the selling and purchase of estates can get their turn to search in some particular volume, that volume containing the registration of title perhaps of a great many estates. The Bill proposes to create a new system in regard to registration of title for the new purchasers. Under the Ashbourne Act and the other Irish Land Acts. Part of the system contemplates that there shall be a central office in Dublin, but another feature of it is that there shall be in every county a local register in connection with and subordinate to the Dublin Office, in which the documents relating to that county shall be registered after they have passed through the Land Purchase Court in Dublin. So much for the first object of the Bill, which speaks for itself; but there is another very important object connected with the Bill, and that is to enable the title of any person who likes—the noble and learned Lord below me will correct me if I am wrong—and who has made his title in the Land Purchase Commission, to have it registered under the new Act instead of under the old system of registration of title; and it is proposed for this purpose to amalgamate with it the Court created by the Record of Tithe Act of 1865. There is no doubt that that Court, which might have been an extremely useful one, has been taken very little advantage of, and it has been stated that the reasons are two-fold; one was the very high fees charged. It was said that the last Duke of Leinster before the late Duke, was desirous of registering the title to his great estates in Ireland, but was deterred by the very great expense which the payment of the Stamp Duties alone would have incurred. Another reason, and probably 25 years ago it may have operated to some extent, was the unwillingness of solicitors in Ireland to fall in with the new system which, of course, interfered with the old system of conveyancing. I do not know what the Treasury intend to do with regard to the fees, but I think as regards the second point, the system connected with the land in Ireland has so entirely changed during the past 25 years, that I, on my part, look forward, not for unwillingness on the part of the solicitors, but for their cordial acceptance of the new system. I had a letter recently from a gentleman who acted as my own solicitor at one time, but who now fills the position of Clerk of the Peace and Crown, and who is consequently one of those who will have ex officio to work this new system in the counties, and the general opinion he expressed was that the new system would destroy conveyancing. In a certain sense I believe that is the case, but the solicitors must live. They naturally would turn their attention, if the old system has been destroyed, to the new system, and will seek to make their business out of it. I could have wished that as regards the title of a vendor, the Court of the Land Commission should have put that title upon the new record compulsorily, in the same way that they will do the title of the purchaser. However, I am told, and I suppose it is the case, that that could not be done in the present state of affairs; and in an Amendment, which I shall ask your Lordships to consider presently, I only go so far as to ask that instead of the vendor having to ask that his title may be put upon the record, the title shall be placed upon the record unless he formally objects to that being done. I need not follow a great deal that is in the memorandum of this Bill as regards a comparison with the state of affairs in England. All these matters have been very fully discussed in former years, and I need not take up your Lordships' time in further adverting to them at the present time, nor will I, at the present stage, go into the other matters connected with the officers who are to work the Bill. There will be some Amendments I believe moved presently with regard to them, but I am glad that your Lordships have allowed me to make these few remarks upon the general subject, and I hope my noble and learned Friend will, as I am sure he will, give a candid consideration to these Amendments which noble Lords will presently move, not in any hostile spirit but with the view of making the Bill work better than it is likely to do in its present form.

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, on the Second Reading of this Bill I troubled your Lordships with criticisms particularly on one part of it in regard to devolution in cases of intestacy. I have learned that this Bill, in the form in which it now comes before your Lordships, is the result of a compromise which was arrived at as the only chance of getting the Bill passed, and it was passed through the other House, although, undoubtedly a very complicated measure, without any considerable discussion, on the common understanding that it was a very important and urgent matter, and one which could only be passed this year if it was accepted in the form arranged on the responsibility of the Irish Department. Now, I entertain considerable objection to certain distinctions which are drawn in this Bill, and to certain of its provisions, but having regard to the circumstances under which it is passed, and to the possibility of passing it into law this Session only if the compromise arrived at is adhered to, I do not propose to trouble your Lordships with any attempt to amend it, or with any opposition to those distinctions, although

Earl of Belmore

I may regard them as unsound, and may think it very desirable to sweep them away. I accept the measure only in that way as coming before your Lordships on the responsibility of the Irish Department, and as having been accepted in the other House on that responsibility, and I do feel that it would be a matter of regret, if, owing to any action that were taken here, the commencement of an experiment of very great importance, and I trust of very considerable value, were delayed and not allowed to be commenced as is proposed very speedily. Taking that view, I feel, of course, that it would be impossible to propose any Amendments such as one would consider it right to propose if your Lordships' House were willing to, as it were, take the responsibility for a Bill of this magnitude and complexity. I think the Bill ought to be gone into very carefully in every one of its provisions, if possible, to put it into better shape, but that is impossible if the Bill is to pass this year; and having regard to the strong desire expressed in the other House that the Bill should pass into law this year, even if its shape be imperfect, I do not think it right in any way to attempt to thwart that desire; but at the same time it must not be understood that in assenting to it without further objection, one is to be taken as assenting to all the imperfections which it contains, or admitting that it is in the shape which would be most desirable. There is one other remark which I should like to make, because I think there has been some misapprehension with regard to this part of the Bill. My attention has been called to the provision under which in the case of registered land when once registered, no estate or title to it can be acquired except by an entry on the register. It has been suggested that may cause very considerable embarrassment and delay in the case of sales. It is said that neither the vendor nor the purchaser will trust the other, the one to pay the money until the registration is made, or the other to make the registration until the money is paid. I think a provision of that sort is absolutely essential, if you are to have a register at all. You cannot have absolute trust if at the same time you are to allow a title to land to be acquired by means of entries outside the register. I think some provision is necessary also with regard to other portions of the Act. Charges for the purchase money being made by entry on the register, and in other ways, give really complete protection for the carrying out of transactions between vendors and purchasers without any unnecessary delay or risk to other parties. I think the fears which have been expressed as to matters to which I have called attention arise from persons not having sufficiently weighed the provisions in the other parts of the Act, and I have said what I have with a desire to quiet those apprehensions. Though there are other points to which I shall call attention as the Bill goes through Committee, I will not press the view I entertain further upon your Lordships.

*THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: I should like to say a few words upon this Bill, as it was read a second time at so late an hour after the Report stage of the Land Bill on July 10th, that I did not wish to detain your Lordships by discussing it then. As my noble Friend Lord Belmore has pointed out to your Lordships, all parties have been looking forward to a Bill of this kind in Ireland for some time. Everybody must agree that such a Bill is absolutely necessary. You have created, and are prepared to create, in Ireland under the Bill which has just passed your Lordships' House a very large number of freeholders. These men from their position, being naturally poor men, could not possibly be able to go to the expense of registering in the Registry of Deeds Office in Ireland such of their devolutions and transfers as are likely to take place. There is no question that in the future changes must take place and charges must be created, and the greatest possible confusion will ensue, because these poor proprietors could not possibly be expected to take advantage of the Registry of Deeds Office, which is certainly very expensive. As my noble Friend pointed out, there are several other points in which we consider this Bill requires amendment. I do not propose to deal with the point which has just been raised by the noble and learned Lord opposite. I shall leave it to my noble and learned Friend who is in charge of the Bill to deal with that, because it is a matter which he can deal with much better than I can, but there is one point to which I should like to refer which was alluded to in the early part of the noble and learned Lord's speech upon the Second Reading. I was very pleased to hear the noble and learned Lord object to Part IV. of this Bill. He then pointed out that you were changing the law of inheritance in Ireland, that in cases of intestacy the purchasers would be placed on a different footing as to the law of inheritance with all the landed proprietors alongside of them; that is to say, there would be two laws of inheritance in existence in Ireland; one in the case of purchasers under the Land Act by which primogeniture would be done away with, and the other in the case of ordinary landlords in which primogeniture would remain. I believe the noble and learned Lord (Lord Herschell) said on that occasion that he wished primogeniture could be done away with altogether. I do not know whether I understood him rightly, but I do not agree in that.

LORD HERSCHELL: I meant, of course, not in favour of doing away with it altogether; but what I suggested then was that it should apply to all registered land, and not only to so much as is purchased under the Land Purchase Acts. That is my view, but I am not going to press it.

*THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: I quite understand what the noble and learned Lord would wish, but I also understood him that he would like to see primogeniture done away with everywhere, and on that point I cannot pretend to agree with him. I quite admit that there are certain arguments which must weigh with everyone of your Lordships why the law of inheritance should be changed for these tenant purchasers, and particularly I would say this to noble Lords coming from Ireland who are acquainted with the customs of the peasantry of that country. I have had a long experience of Ireland, and know perfectly that farmers in Ireland will not make a will. I have tried myself to induce many farmers to make a will when I thought it was to their interest to do so, and they have answered me, "Does your Lordship think I wish to die." I am sure that they think that by making a will they hasten their end; and I believe there are even people in this country who are so foolish as to imagine that is the case. But, at any rate, it is the fact that tenant farmers in Ireland will not make a will. Up to the present time the landlords in Ireland holding the land have prevented sub-division, and, therefore, wills have not been necessary with regard to the land, because the personal property has alone been divided under the farmer's will between the widow and children, and the land has devolved undivided to one successor. But, my Lords, you must remember you are changing all this. You are changing a tenant into an owner in fee by enabling him to purchase his property; and if he dies intestate, instead of his land being held together by his landlord preventing sub-division, everything is altered with regard to him; part of his estate is suddenly turned into real property; and if he dies intestate, his land must go to the heir-at-law. Well, that upsets the whole custom at present existing in Ireland. No doubt for 49 years the Land Commission will see that there is no sub-division, and that the land will go to one person; but as it forms part of the purchaser's property—as a part of his property will be real and part personal—it will cause the greatest confusion if, as I say, he dies and leaves no will. Part IV. of this Bill tries to deal with this great difficulty. The farmers, as I have said, will not know their position; they are accustomed to leave it to chance. They have not had the power of dividing their land before, and, therefore, they will leave it to chance in the future, not knowing that their heir-at-law must succeed to the land, as it has become real property. Part IV. attempts to deal with this; but, as I am going to point out to your Lordships, I think it will create very great and serious dangers in the future. One of the dangers is that which the noble and learned Lord (Lord Herschell) pointed out to your Lordships the other night, although I regret that he has now withdrawn his opposition to that part of the Bill. The effect is, that you will have two laws of inheritance in Ireland with regard to registered property in land lying side by side. Then, secondly, at the end of 49 years you are going to create by law the very thing which you most wish to avoid

The Marquess of Waterford

—that is, the sub-division of land in Ireland. I have been always afraid of what may take place at the end of 49 years. As many of your Lordships are aware, the inclination of the farmers in Ireland is to sub-divide their holdings among their children, and I have always been afraid that sub-division, which is of the greatest possible injury to the country, may take place; but now, by a clause in the Bill, which your Lordships are asked to pass through the Committee stage to-night, you are going to oblige sub-division by law in every case of intestacy. Well, as law and custom will then run side by side, I believe you will have Ireland cut up, sub-divided, and re-sub-divided into infinitesimal holdings. It was only the other night that you passed a Bill through this House called the Congested Districts Bill—which is a part of the Purchase Bill—to do away with this very difficulty which you are going to create. By Part IV. of this Bill you are going to create by law one of the things you have passed a Bill through your Lordships' House in order to avoid, and I think it is a most serious matter. I think your Lordships ought seriously to consider it. I may say at present there is no Amendment put down to that part of the Bill; but I do think your Lordships ought most seriously to consider the terrible effect this will have on the future of Ireland—in 49 years' time. I do not suppose it will affect many of your Lordships; but, at the same time, we must look forward to what will happen in Ireland in the future, and I do think your Lordships will agree with me that by encouraging sub-division you are doing the greatest harm you can possibly do to the country. I might point out to your Lordships that in Germany and Austria, as I am told, there has been an inducement held out for the sub-division of land for many years past. Well, in those countries it has been found to be so injurious, so destructive to the interests of those countries, that measures have been passed to try and do away with it; and I think it would be well to consider, before you pass this portion of the Bill, whether, taking it altogether, the law of inheritance with regard to this land should not be retained, as it is leaving the tenants the option, if they please, to divide by will in 49 years, but not obliging the division to take place in cases of intestacy. I think it would be well to consider whether it would not be better that the Land Commission should be directed to tell every purchaser, in cases of sale, to look to his actual position, and to warn him that if he dies intestate his land will go to his heir-at-law undivided. They will then be able to act for themselves, and if they choose to do so, make wills; and if they do not make wills it would be for the benefit of the country. Some Amendments have been put down to this Bill which I hope Her Majesty's Government will see their way to accept. We have tried, as far as possible, to limit these Amendments to important points in the Bill in which we are very much interested. In the first place, we think it is a great misfortune that the officer who is Registrar in the Land Court and principal of the Record of Title Office should be named in this Bill as the Registrar of Title. It may be stated by my noble and learned Friend that that officer is able and energetic—as, indeed, I hear from all parties he is—and that he has not got a sufficient amount of work to do at the present time; but I would point out to your Lordships that he will have a great deal of work to do under the Bill, which I hope may come up from another place very soon. There were 3,000 or 4,000 properties in the Encumbered Estates Court. Most of those properties will now be sold under the Purchase of Land Act, and that will throw a tremendous quantity of work upon this officer. I think it is a great misfortune that all these different offices should be held by one man. This is a very important Bill. We look forward with the greatest hope to its working properly, and we do not wish to see it in any way crippled at its birth. If a gentleman has a great deal more than he can do in one Department—and this is not only one, but several—I do not see how he can properly give his time and attention to the working of such a Bill as this when it becomes an Act. Then I would point out another objection: I believe that the present Land Commission Court is some way off from the Registry of Deeds Office—more than a mile; and I think it would be most important that those two offices, which must have continual reference to each other, should be separated by a mile and more. There are several other points, which I do not propose to trouble your Lordships with at this moment, which render it more than necessary that the official who is named in the Bill should not have the working of this important measure which is now before your Lordships' House. There are other Amendments that I would briefly refer to. We consider the County Court is not a proper Court for a Court of Appeal. There are no proper books of reference kept in that Court, and local solicitors are not generally able to argue the intricate questions of law which must naturally arise in proving title. We think it is absolutely essential that for such questions as will arise upon appeal on such an important subject the High Court in Ireland should be the Court referred to. That is the only proper Court to decide such important points. Again, we consider that Clauses 22 and 25 are defective in their wording; but I believe the noble and learned Lord has put down some Amendments to those clauses, which, to a certain extent, meet our objections.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: Altogether, I think.

*THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: The noble and learned Lord says altogether, but I can assure him they do not altogether meet our objections. We have several other objections to these clauses, which at the proper time will be brought before your Lordships. One of those is that we object to three interests in land being registered, each in different forms. I will not trouble your Lordships with it now; the proper time for it will be in Committee. Then there is another point which I might mention. There is a clause which I think is taken from the Bill of the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack (the Lord Chancellor). That was a Bill which enables mortgagees and encumbrancers to lodge cautions and notices. That was an excellent thing in the noble and learned Lord's Transfer Bill, but it is absolutely unnecessary in this Bill, because there is the Registry of Deeds Office in Ireland, which I am told does not exist in England. Therefore, when the title is to be proved, reference must be made in each case to the Registry of Deeds Office, and as no encumbrance is in position in Ireland unless it is registered in that office, what is the necessity of swamping this Bill by giving the power to those mortgagees and encumbrancers of lodging these notices? Naturally, what the solicitors will say will be—"Oh, lodge notices; at any rate, it can do no harm, and it will put you right if anything turns up." That will swamp the Bill and render it unworkable. I am sure my noble and learned Friend will agree to this Amendment, because when we proposed an Amendment in the Land Purchase Bill of putting in something to this effect he was strongly against it. In consequence of the noble and learned Lord's objections to that Amendment we withdrew it. This is called the Local Registration of Title Bill, and we believe it is necessary that sales should be locally registered with regard to the small farms; but I think in cases of sales which have taken place up to this time, and which go back, perhaps, to the Act of 1869, it would be absolutely impossible for the Clerks of the Peace and Crown in the different districts to investigate the register for all the 20,000 odd titles which will come upon them at once for the purpose of registration. Therefore, my Lords, we have put down an Amendment which will, at any rate, necessitate that those 20,000 titles should be registered in the Central Office. There is another point upon a most extraordinary clause—I think it is Clause 61—in which it is proposed that the most intricate questions of law should be referred to this Clerk of the Peace and Crown, who is not generally a man who could take charge of an extraordinarily difficult legal question. It is proposed that when two persons apply to the Registrar for the same piece of land the Clerk of the Peace and Crown is to adjudicate upon it. Of course, there is an appeal from him; but we maintain that upon such an important point as that, a point that is generally settled by the highest tribunal in the land, the High Court, or, at any rate, the Central Authority, should decide it. We do not believe the Clerk of the Peace and Crown—and they do not believe themselves—capable of dealing with the very important problems which will arise under this Bill. There are several other Amendments, but I will not detain your Lordships with them now. I only hope my noble and learned Friend will deal kindly with us in regard to them in Committee.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: My Lords, I only desire to say in reference to the short discussion which has now taken place that when we proceed to consider the clauses, of course I will pay every deference and respect to Amendments moved and to the arguments advanced in support of them. I have been very carefully considering the Amendments which noble Lords have placed on the Paper, and it may be sufficient for me to say that in reference to the Amendments which the noble Lord who opened the discussion, and the noble Marquess who has just sat down, have mentioned they will receive every attention. With regard to what the noble and learned Lord (Lord Herchell) has said, I quite understand the attitude he takes, and which he very fairly and temperately sketched in the few remarks he made. It would not be reasonable to expect him to guarantee the perfection of so long and complicated a measure as this. To a certain extent, as a Bill dealing for the first time with a very important topic, it may be regarded, to use his words, as experimental. My noble Friends from Ireland have gone into this Bill very carefully. It has been for a long time subjected to an acute criticism, and many of its clauses correspond with, or are similar to, clauses in the Bill which was introduced by my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack, which went before a very strong Committee, on which the noble and learned Lord himself sat, and on which the noble and learned Lords (the Earl of Selborne and Lord Herschell) also sat. That was a very powerful Committee which went very closely into those and other clauses. They have been specially examined over and over again by those who are most conversant with the subject, and also by my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland, who has made this matter his particular study all through his professional life, and who, as I said in moving the Second Reading of the Bill, may be regarded as the greatest authority on the subject in Ireland.

On Question, agreed to.

House in Committee accordingly.

Clauses 1 to 3 agreed to.

Clause 4.

LORD MONTEAGLE OF BRANDON: My Lords, the Amendment of which I have given notice on this clause may be very briefly explained. In fact, I think it explains itself. The clause defines the persons who are to act as officers of the Court, and the sub-section in question, Sub-section 5, deals with the local registry, and prescribes that the officers are to be the Clerks of the Crown and Peace for the counties. It provides—

("But if such person is not, in the opinion of the Lord Chancellor and the Treasury, qualified for the duties of the office, then such office shall be under the management and control of such other person being a solicitor as shall be appointed by the Lord Chancellor for that purpose.")

I move to insert after the word "solicitor," the words "or barrister." My object is simply to ensure that the best man for this important office should be appointed. It is quite possible that at some future time, if not now, there might be a barrister in the locality who might be well qualified for the office, and I hope the noble and learned Lord will see that there is no reason for excluding barristers from this office. I have no objection, of course, to a solicitor being appointed if he is the best man; but my point is that a barrister might be better fitted for the office, and for that reason I move to insert those words.

Amendment moved, in page 2, line 14, after ("solicitor") to insert ("or barrister.")—(The Lord Monteagle of Brandon.)

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: I am sorry I cannot accept this Amendment. It would be about one of the most contentious Amendments which could be sent back to the other House. All these topics were threshed out ad nauseum when the County Court and Officers Act, 1877, for which I was largely responsible, was passed. It was then framed distinctly on the lines that only a solicitor should fill the office, and we must, I think, keep to the same lines here in the event of a deputy being appointed to fill an office under the Bill. The question will seldom arise; amalgamation has taken place in a great many counties in Ireland; in many places where it has not taken place the gentlemen are qualified, and in the few cases in which this power has to be exercised it would, I think, be invidious to vary the qualifications laid down for the united offices.

LORD MONTEAGLE OF BRANDON: I do not wish to raise anything that would be contentious or would cause difficulty in the other House. Of course, I accept what the noble and learned Lord has stated, that it would be departing from the principle laid down in the previous Act of Parliament.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause 4 agreed to.

Clause 5.

*THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: My Lords, I have an Amendment down for this clause. I touched upon this Amendment in the few words I said before we went into Committee. The Amendment is with the view of not having the principal officer who is named in the Bill. The Record of Title Office is an office which has not worked very well, I believe, but this is for the purpose of providing that this particular officer shall not of necessity have the working of this Bill. It does not at all exclude him or prevent the Government appointing anybody they like, but I think it is not of necessity that he should be named as having the working of this Bill under this Act if it becomes law. I beg, therefore, to move the Amendment that is down in my name.

Amendment moved, in page 2, line 28, after ("office") to insert ("with the exception of the officer who has heretofore acted as principal officer in such office.")—(The Lord Tyrone [M. Waterford].)

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: I hope the noble Marquess will not press this Amendment. I can only say, if I were asked to make the appointment—if the appointment was in myself, as the strongest way of putting it—I would feel myself very fortunate if I could induce an officer of the standing of Mr. M'Donnell to accept this post. He is at present the highest official of the Landed Estates Court, and has been there for a great many years, and he is about one of the ablest officials in Ireland. If you went through the whole country you could not get as able a man for the purpose, one with richer or greater experience or with greater mastery of the subject. He is at present in a highly paid office, and is willing to undertake the duties, and it would be unreasonable and unbecoming to say you want to give a wider choice to the Executive. I repeat that if the patronage was in myself, and I were desirous of finding the best man I could obtain for doing this work in the best way, I should be proud and gratified to think I could secure the services of an official so able, so loyal, so energetic as Mr. M'Donnell. I hope the noble Lord will, in that state of things, think the Amendment is not desirable.

*VISCOUNT DE VESCI: I must confess I think the noble and learned Lord's answer is hardly satisfactory.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: In what way?

*VISCOUNT DE VESCI: I am going to state. The noble Marquess pointed out, in the few words he spoke before going into Committee, that a great amount of work has to be done by this officer—not only the work with regard to this registering, but that there will be 20,000 cases under the Purchase Acts which will have to pass through his hands. There will, therefore, be an enormous amount of work at the commencement, and, besides that, there will probably be a large number of voluntary registrations. I should not wish to say a word against the present holder of the office. I believe he is one of the best public officers in Ireland, but I hardly believe that he will be able to do all this work. I hope, therefore, the noble and learned Lord will re-consider it.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: I cannot say that I will re-consider it, because I know he is thoroughly master of the subject. I know the man, and I know the work, and I say it would be impossible to find through the whole of Ireland a man who can bring to the performance of these duties skill, and willingness, and ability, to a higher degree than Mr. M'Donnell. I cannot do it, and nobody else can, and I think it is unreasonable we should take the power of an alternative appointment when we have a perfectly able officer willing to perform the duties.

*THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: My Lords, the noble and learned Lord has told you what an able official the gentleman who is named in this Bill is. I do not gainsay that at all. The only objection that we take to the appointment is that we consider this gentleman will not be able to give sufficient time to the working of this important Bill, and that the appointment will strangle the Bill at its birth. We are so much in favour of this Bill that we are most loth to allow anything to come into the way of its really efficient operation. I would like to ask the noble and learned Lord one question—whether the principal of the Record Title Office comes under the Civil Service Rules? Then I would draw your Lordships' attention to the noble and learned Lord's (Lord Ashbourne's) statement that he would appoint this gentleman if he had the whole of Ireland open to him. I think it is very hard upon the Civil servants in Ireland. I have come across a great number of them, who are protesting most strongly against the rule that they are to be retired when they are 65 years of age. I know many of them who are perfectly able to perform their duties at present; but they are removed at the age of 65, and therefore I believe that if this gentleman is appointed, or if the noble and learned Lord would do as he says he would—that is, appoint a gentleman of the age of the present Registrar—he would be doing a thing which would upset the whole Civil Service of Ireland. I am not aware of what the actual age of the Registrar is, but I believe he would come under these Civil Service Rules; and I would ask the noble and learned Lord whether he would not consider this fair, that he should agree upon Report to put something into this Bill to the effect that the Civil Service Rules should apply to the officer who has to work this Bill? If the noble Lord will do that I will at once withdraw my Amendment. But I do think the rule is very hard upon the officers in the Civil Service. I do not understand the reason, but very able men very often retired when there can no doubt they have many more years' work in them, and I think, under the circumstances, for Her Majesty's Government to go out of their way to appoint a man of the age of the Registrar is a very extraordinary thing to do.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: Her Majesty's Government would be going out of their way if, by appointing a highly paid, highly trained, and willing officer who has performed the duties so long, they passed up the opportunity to find out somebody else, I do not know who, and create a brand-new office for him with a great big salary. The gentleman there now, Mr. M'Donnell, is performing the very duties which are cognate with the duties to be performed under the Bill; and under the provisions in the Bill there is a power given to the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, myself, with the sanction of the Treasury, if the work prove too heavy, to appoint gentlemen to assist in the performance of these duties. I have nothing to say about the working of the Civil Service, but I can say that the gentleman who saw Mr. M'Donnell and who would say I was the older man of the two; and I am thankful to say that I am very far from being incapacitated yet.

THE DUKE OF ABERCORN: I would like the noble and learned Lord whether the gentleman in question will receive an appointment for life?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: He will receive it for the same period as that on which he holds his present office. I can assure the noble Duke that I do not think Mr. M'Donnell will, in one way or the other, about the continuance of his tenure of office; he is a gentleman pressed by circumstances to the slightest degree; he is very fond of the work he has been engaged in, and will hold his new office under exactly the same tenure as he holds his present office. I should say myself, if he has any health, he will retire in due time, so as to give himself a little interval of rest before the inevitable comes upon him.

Amendment negatived.

MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: The next Amendment which stands in my name is really more or less consequential, but I would ask my noble and learned Friend this: I will withdraw my Amendment if he will allow me to ask him whether he will accept this Amendment in lieu of it, which is in page 3—that is, to put in "ten" instead of "six." We consider the appointment should be of a barrister or solicitor of at least 10 years' standing. The other point is that I would move to leave out from "standing" to the end of the paragraph, because I think it is a great misfortune that a Land Judge should have the power of appointing anybody who was not a lawyer at all, as it seems to me. It is most important that the men who should be appointed to this office should be the best lawyers, and I therefore suggest that these three lines at the end of the clause should be left out which empower the Land Judge to appoint any man who has been five years in his office. Although the noble and learned Lord thought my first Amendment unreasonable, I think he will consider this is most reasonable.

Amendment moved,

In page 2, line 41, to leave out sub-clause (2) and insert —(" (2) The Registrar of Titles shall be a barrister or solicitor of not less than ten years' standing, and shall be appointed by the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury.")—(The Lord Tyrone [M. Waterford].)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: The noble Marquess has no doubt some reason in his mind, of which I have no knowledge, as to the patronage of this office, but I am most anxious to meet him, if possible, and I will meet him half way, as they do at the Irish fairs. I will put in "eight" years in each place, but you must leave it to the head of the Department, who is the man best able to exercise the responsibility. If it will satisfy the noble Marquess I will put in eight years.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: I would be quite content to accept eight years in the first place, but will the noble and learned Lord agree to leave out the words—

(" Or such officer being attached to the office of the Land Judge for a period of at least five years as the Land Judge shall from time to time appoint.")

I object to the Land Judge appointing anybody he may think fit. I think the noble Lord mistook me before, because I do not mean to object to anybody. I only object to the Land Judge appointing a Registrar of Titles who is not a lawyer. This clause does not prescribe that he should be a lawyer at all.

Amendment moved to the proposed Amendment, to leave out the word ("ten") and insert ("eight.")—(The Lord Tyrone [M. Waterford].)

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: As I understand, the second Amendment of the noble Marquess seeks to take away the patronage from the Land Judge, who is the head of the Department, and to give it to nobody else. All I can say is that when the patronage in this Department was talked of, I suggested myself that it should not be in the Lord Chancellor, because the Lord Chancellor would, in any case, at once apply to the head of the Department, who is responsible for the rules and everything else; and the patronage was then rightly put in the Judge, who is the head of the Department, who must revise everything, and who is answerable for the whole discipline. I cannot accept any Amendment which will substitute the Lords of the Treasury, or any other authority, for the Land Judge, who is given discretion in respect of the Department of which he is the head. I have put in the word "eight" years' standing.

*THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: Will you also put in "shall be a barrister"?

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: I do not object to that.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 5, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 6.

LORD MONTEAGLE OF BRANDON: My Lords, I had an Amendment to leave out Sub-section 4, but I do not desire to move it.

Clauses 6 to 12 agreed to.

*THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: Now, my Lords, I move a new clause, to come in after Clause 12, providing that all titles shall be originally registered in the Central Office. This Amendment is in view of having these 20,000 titles registered, and that they shall be originally registered in the Central Office. I move the Amendment as a new clause,

The Marquess of Waterford

"Provided that all titles shall be originally registered in the central office."

Clause 13.

*THE EARL OF BELMORE: My Lords, I have an Amendment in Clause 13, but I think my noble and learned Friend has one before me. That must be so, because my Amendment is to omit the sub-section, and you must amend a clause before you move to omit it.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: Mine are mainly drafting Amendments.

Verbal Amendments made.

*THE EARL OF BELMORE: Now, my Lords, I move to leave out the first sub-section of Clause 13 for the purpose of inserting another one, the object being to make the appeal, not to the County Court, but to the High Court. The County Court, for many reasons, would not be a good Court of Appeal; but there is one reason which seems to me to be very strong indeed, if not unanswerable, that is that it only meets three or four times in the year for a few days at a time. I hope the noble and learned Lord, therefore, will be able to accept this Amendment either as it stands; or if he thought that a question of fact would be better tried in the country, where the witnesses might be, I should be willing to allow a matter of fact to be remitted to the County Court instead of bringing the witnesses up to Dublin; my noble and learned Friend might suggest that Amendment afterwards.

Amendment moved, in Clause 1, page 6, line 5, to leave out sub-section (1.) and substitute as follows:—

("The High Court of Justice in Ireland shall have jurisdiction for the purposes of this Act, and the expression 'the Court' or 'the High Court' shall have that meaning.")—(The Earl of Belmore.)

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: I have considered the Amendment of my noble Friend, with every desire to meet it as far as I could. The Amendment which I have just made is more or less drafting; but, on the other hand, there is a great deal in what the noble Lord says, because there must be rules prescribing what is to be done, and great care will have to be taken to see that nothing goes to the County Court except what would be suitable considering the time of the year. As the noble Lord has pointed out, they only sit four times in the year, and great care will have to be taken to save the time of suitors. It is all to be prescribed by rules; and I would also point out that there is an Amendment in my name upon Sub-section 3 of a later clause.

*THE EARL OF BELMORE: I withdraw my Amendment after what the noble Lord has said.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause 13 agreed to.

Clause 14.

*VISCOUNT DE VESCI: With your Lordships' permission I will move all the Amendments which stand in this clause in my name, as they all practically hang together. The main object of them is to provide that any person aggrieved by any decision of the local registration authority may apply to the central authority, and in the same way persons aggrieved by decisions of the central registration authority, either in the first instance or on appeal, may apply to the Court as provided in Clause B. I think we may fairly assume, and we have tried to insist upon it in most of our Amendments, that the person holding office as the central authority should be a person who is thoroughly competent to decide by himself all the questions of law and fact which may be brought before him, without reference to the Superior Court, leaving it only for the persons aggrieved to take what steps they think proper, as provided in the Amendment. I think there is some little difficulty, but if the noble and learned Lord will accept the Amendment as I propose it, some alteration may have to be made in the Report stage in order to meet the objection which has been pointed out by my noble friend the Earl of Belmore with regard to the County Courts; but the main object of my Amendment is to make the appeal from the county authority to the central authority, and from the central authority to the Court.

Amendment moved, in page 6, line 12, leave out ("a") and insert ("the central"); line 26, after ("the") insert "central"; line 27, leave out Sub-clauses (2.) and (3.), and to substitute as follows:—

("Any person aggrieved by an order or decision of a local registering authority, may appeal to the central registering authority, in the prescribed manner and under the prescribed conditions, and the central registering authority may annul or confirm, with or without modification, such order or decision.")—(The Lord de Vesci [V. De Vesci.])

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: I can quite understand the object which the noble Lord has in view, but this has to be read in connection with the Amendment moved by my noble Friend the Earl of Belmore, which sought to interfere with the jurisdiction of the County Court Judge. I do not think it would be expedient and desirable to do what the noble Lord who has moved this Amendment now proposes to do, that is to make the appellate tribunal the central registry officer. I think it is better and wiser to leave it as it is in Sub-section 1 of Clause 14, that is to leave it to the highest body having the highest jurisdiction, that that shall be the authority unless the rules prescribe that in a certain limited number of cases, and at convenient times, it is desirable to adopt another course. This matter has been considered carefully both before and since these Amendments were put on the Paper; the Amendments which I have put down, and that which has just been moved, go as far as I think it would be wise to go in trying to meet the objections taken. I do not see any necessity why the appeal should not go straight from the county official as proposed. Surely any question upon which it was necessary to hear evidence, might be referred back to the County Court by the High Court, all these things can be done by rules. At present the appeals are to be taken to the High Court, and the rules provide that any questions which may be investigated cheaply, and on the spot where the County Court is sitting may be investigated by them, I think it will be found the cheapest and best system, is that provided in the Bill as I have amended it.

*VISCOUNT DE VESCI: Then I move the first Amendment. I do not think the noble Lord will have any objection to that; that is to say, in line 22 to leave out "a" and insert "the central." That will enable them to appeal to the Court.

notwithstanding any actual or constructive notice, be entitled to priority as between themselves according to the date of registration, and not according to the date of the instrument. No instrument, until registered in the prescribed manner, shall be effectual to pass any estate or interest in any land subject to the operation of this Act, or to render such land liable to any mortgage or charge."—(The Earl of Belmore.)

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: I may say this Amendment is with regard to something that has got in by mistake in drafting. It does not read in with the rest of the Act, and that I am sure accounts for the Amendment which was put down by my noble Friend, but when they have been struck out, I think my noble Friend will see that the Amendment he has proposed does not read in, and I hope, therefore, he will not move it.

*THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: I really should like the noble and learned Lord to re-consider this, because it appears to me that, if the words are left out, the land to be voluntarily registered will be cut out from the operation of this Bill. The clause runs at present—

"The following provisions shall apply to the registered freehold land, and all freehold land, the registration of which by this Act is declared to be compulsory."

Why you are to leave it in this way I cannot understand. It applies to all registered freehold land. The words to be left in only apply to land to be registered by tenants compulsorily in future, but what is to happen to the many cases in which the landlords will have voluntarily registered their land? Are they to be cut out from the advantages of this Bill?

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: I am not in the least surprised at the noble Lord putting it, because I went through it very fully, and my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, who is answerable for this clause, went through it particularly, and it was discovered that by some accident in drafting these words had got in. I may tell the noble Lord that this particular clause is taken from the Land Transfer Bill. It is there put in as a kind of mild pressure, as much pressure as could be put on without undue harshness to induce people to register who should register. As your Lordships have seen, by reference to Clause 22, the earlier provisions relate to compulsory registration, and if the noble Lord will look at Clauses 25 and 40 he will see that adequate provision is there made with reference to registration generally. Those words would not be in form, and I think this matter will be right when they go out, and the word "title" is substituted for "transfer." The clause will then read in with the rest of the Bill.

*THE EARL OF BELMORE: As the noble Lord has referred to my Amendment, which he said would not have been necessary if his Amendment had been previously made, I may explain this: It is a legal matter I do not profess to understand myself, but I was advised that something of this sort was necessary; and for this reason. The Bill deals in three different ways with three sorts of property. As regards estates in possession and the conveyance thereof it provides that no estate shall be acquired until registration, but that then the title shall relate back to the date of conveyance. That is one thing. Then in Clause 40 the Bill provides that as regards charges and encumbrances no estate shall be acquired until registration, but there is no relation back. That is different to the other case; and then in the third case, as regards conveyances of remainders it says nothing at all. The result is that the points are left undetermined, and the Bill in that clause is defective. That is the reason of my Amendment.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: With the words in I quite understand the noble Lord's Amendment.

*THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: It is a technical Amendment; but why should these people who have registered before this Bill, and voluntarily, be cut out from the advantages of this clause?

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: They are fully dealt with in other clauses. If my noble Friend will read closely he will see it is essentially most technical thing; but I have had examined with the greatest attention and have investigated its whole history. They are not in the Land Transfer Bill and ample protection is given in reference to all voluntary registers.

Amendment negatived.

there was no such thing as a Treasury there might be little difficulty, but I am afraid this is hardly within our competence. Clause 8 points out the fees which are to be paid, their limits, and that they are never to do more than pay the expense of the transaction, and so on. But I am afraid if we were to yield to this sympathetic appeal it would make a tremendously big hole in the returns at first. I am afraid it is outside our province, and a great deal would have to be said about it elsewhere, and I do not think the topic open to us in this House.

LORD HERSCHELL: I confess, with all my desire to see it, I should be far from suggesting that, and I cannot on that ground press it.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Verbal Amendments made.

THE DUKE OF ABERCORN: My next Amendments on this clause are merely consequential, and I withdraw them; but I have an Amendment in line 21 which is the same as the new clause proposed by my noble Friend the Marquess of Waterford. The object is to expedite the working of this Bill when it becomes an Act by making the compulsory registrations to be effected by the Central Office instead of the local offices. I shall, therefore, withdraw that Amendment in favour of the clause moved by my noble Friend.

Clause 22 agreed to.

Clause 23 agreed to, with verbal Amendments.

Clause 24.

*THE EARL OF BELMORE: My Lords, I have an Amendment on Clause 24. There are two Amendments on the Paper in reality, although they are printed as if they hung together. I think there is some mistake about that. The second one is rather an alternative Amendment in case the first one should not be carried out. The object of the first Amendment is to do what I alluded to in my opening remarks, and that is to change the presumption in this way, that instead of the purchaser being called upon to request that his title may be registered, the presumption shall be reversed, and that, unless he objects, the Court should issue a certificate and put him upon the register. I will not touch upon the second Amendment until I know the fate of the first. If the noble Lord objects to the first, then the second one would come in suitably, I think, as a sub-section to the clause. I, therefore, move the first Amendment.

Amendment moved, to leave out lines 18 to 22, and insert—

("And shall, unless the vendor lodges an objection thereto in writing, cause a certificate of the title to such last-mentioned land to be forthwith registered in the central office.")—
(The Earl of Belmore.)

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: I will accept the second Amendment on the Paper.

*THE EARL OF BELMORE: Under those circumstances I will withdraw this Amendment, and move a second, to add a new sub-section to the clause.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Amendment moved, after line 22, to add as a new sub-section—

"(2.) In any case in which land has been sold to a tenant through the Land Commission, and the title to other land held under a common title has been investigated at the same time by the Land Commission, it shall be lawful for the vendor or his successor in title to apply to the Land Commission to issue to him a certificate in the prescribed form of the title of the vendor to such last-mentioned land, and if the Land Commission are of opinion that such title has been sufficiently investigated, they may, if they think fit, issue such a certificate, and such certificate shall have the same effect in all respects as a certificate issued under the preceding sub-section."—(The Earl of Belmore.)

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 24, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 25.

*THE EARL OF BELMORE: My Lords, I have Amendments on this clause, but I think they have been, to some extent, dealt with by what has been done already.

Amendment moved, in line 24, to leave out ("transfer of") and insert ("title to"); in line 26, to leave out sub-section (1.) and insert—

"(1.) Every instrument presented for registration shall be registered in the order, and as from the time at which the same is produced for that purpose, and instruments purporting to affect the same estate or interest, shall, ment which I have placed upon the Paper does everything, I think, that can be required as a precaution against danger.

*THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: I must correct my noble Friend Lord Monteagle. I did not say that I wished to legislate for what may take place in 49 years' time. All I said was that you had better leave the law of inheritance as it at present exists, and that if you are going to alter the law I think something should be done as far as possible to prevent sub-division. I agree with my noble and learned Friend below me as to what he has stated is the case, and I do not think the Amendment is necessary.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: I will now move my Amendment.

Amendment moved, in Clause 38, page 17, at end of Clause, to insert as a new Sub-section—

("(2.) It shall be the duty of the registering authority to note upon the register in the prescribed manner the prohibitive or restrictive provisions of any such Act of Parliament; but such provisions shall be deemed to be burdens to which, though not registered, all registered land is by this Act declared to be subject.")—(The Lord Chancellor of Ireland.)

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 38, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 39 agreed to, with verbal Amendments.

Clauses 40 to 54 agreed to.

Clauses 55 to 57 agreed to, with verbal Amendments.

Clauses 58 to 60 agreed to.

Clause 61.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: My noble Friend Lord Arran has an Amendment down to strike out the whole of this clause, and I must say I think this Amendment of mine is intended to meet the inconveniences which he believes to exist in the clause, and which were pointed out so forcibly by the Marquess of Waterford in his speech on going into Committee. What was stated then was that solicitors would with a light heart, whenever they had a mortgage, say to the persons for whom they were acting, "Oh, you may as well serve a notice; it will be safer;" and that, consequently, there would be a bundle of cautionary notices served without the slightest necessity, and lead probably to a great deal of trouble. My Amendment proposes to except from the scope of this clause all registered instruments which might turn out on a search in the Register Office, and to leave it to operate only on documents which were not unregistered, or were incapable of registration, and were not, therefore, on the register. My noble Friend will see that I have gone as far as I can to meet the necessities of the case upon these Amendments.

LORD MONTEAGLE OF BRANDON: After what has fallen from the noble and learned Lord, I shall, of course, not move my Amendment, as the one he has put down, in his opinion, meets my objections to the clause.

Amendment moved, in Clause 61, page 28, line 1, after ("may") insert (if claiming otherwise than under an instrument registered in the Registry of Deeds.)—(The Lord Chancellor of Ireland.)

Clause 61, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 62.

*THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: This Amendment is for the purpose of doing away with a difficulty which I alluded to in an address to your Lordships earlier in the evening. The clause will read "subject to general rules," and leave out "registering" where two or more persons are applying to be registered as owner of the same land, I presume.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: Certainly.

*THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: I am making them apply to the Central Registry Office instead of leaving the Clerk of the Peace to decide such an important question of law as would arise when two persons are claiming the same estate. I think the wording of my Amendment will make it clear that the application should be to the Central Register Authority, and, therefore, I would propose to move the Amendment as it stands upon the Paper. In addition to that, I move to leave out "or may refer to parties to the Court."

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: I move, in line 23, page 11, to leave out from "apply" to "all" in line 24, and then in line 24 to leave out "transfer" and insert "ownership."

Amendments agreed to.

Clause 25, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 26 and 27 agreed to, with verbal Amendments.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: After Clause 27 I have to move a new clause.

Amendment moved, at end of clause to insert as a new sub-section—

"Provision may be made by general rules for the transfer of the registration of any land from a local to the central office, or from the central to a local office, on the application of the owner, and with the prescribed consents, and after such transfer has been effected in the prescribed manner the register as regards any such land shall mean the register kept in the office to which registration has been so transferred."—(The Lord Chancellor of Ireland.)

Amendment agreed to.

Clauses 28 to 34, agreed to.

Clause 35 agreed to, with verbal Amendments.

Clauses 36 and 37, agreed to.

Clause 38.

LORD MONTEAGLE OF BRANDON: My Lords, the object of my Amendment is to take every safeguard that can be taken against the danger which my noble Friend the Marquess of Waterford alluded to in his remarks on going into Committee—the danger of sub-division in the future. The scheme of the Bill, as I understand, is to rely on the prohibition in the Act of 1881 against the sub-division of land during the time it is subject to a charge to the Land Commission. I do not altogether agree with the noble Marquess that we should seek to legislate for the future 50 years ahead, but I think, during the 49 years over which these payments will extend, that your Lordships will agree everything possible should be done to guard against the danger of sub-division. I propose to insert words making the consent of the Land Commission necessary for having more than one person registered as owner of any holding he has subject to such a charge to the Land Commission. The noble and learned

Lord has, since I put down my Amendment, proposed an Amendment which, as far as I understand it, has a somewhat similar object in view; but I confess I should prefer my own, because it goes further, and justifies the Land Commission in putting an absolute veto on any sub-division of the land. It almost compels the intervention of the Land Commission—such is my object at any rate—whereas the Amendment of the noble Lord, as I understand it, would admit anybody else, or the public generally, upon the register. The fact is, that such sub-division is a contravention of the Act of 1881, and it would then be a case of caveat emptor, and anyone dealing with the land would know he did so at the peril of having the Land Commission claiming to sell the land. I beg to move the Amendment of which I have given notice.

Amendment moved, in line 6, after ("restricted") to insert—

("And the registering authority shall not without the consent of the Land Commission register more than one person as owner of any holding which remains subject to any charge in respect of an annuity in favour of the Land Commission.") — (The Lord Monteagle of Brandon.)

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: I have considered very closely the Amendment of my noble Friend, and I think the Amendment which stands in my own name does everything which can be suggested in the way of precaution. Under the law as it at present stands ample provision is taken pending the existence of any instalment. Under the Land Act of 1881, the 31st section, and subsequent Acts, the first precaution is taken that there shall be no sub-division whatever; and in order to draw attention to them I have adopted the suggestion of the noble Lord. The requirement there is that it is to be stated on the face of the Record what are the controlling charges. Then Sub-section 94 draws the attention of the Land Commission specially to the necessity of taking the greatest possible precautions by Rules, and, therefore, I hope the noble Lord will not press this, for I think the matter is amply dealt with by this clause, and I feel that certain suspicions would be engendered by such an Amendment as he suggests, and would lead to discussion. The Amendment which I have placed upon the Paper does everything, I think, that can be required as a precaution against danger.

*THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: I must correct my noble Friend Lord Monteagle. I did not say that I wished to legislate for what may take place in 49 years' time. All I said was that you had better leave the law of inheritance as it at present exists, and that if you are going to alter the law I think something should be done as far as possible to prevent sub-division. I agree with my noble and learned Friend below me as to what he has stated is the case, and I do not think the Amendment is necessary.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: I will now move my Amendment.

Amendment moved, in Clause 38, page 17, at end of Clause, to insert as a new Sub-section—

Amendment moved, in line 13, to leave out ("the registering authority"); line 15, to insert ("the central registering authority"); lines 15 and 16, to leave out ("or may refer the parties to the court").—(The Lord Tyrone [Marquess of Waterford].)

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: I think the Government proposals are sounder and would work better, cheaper, and in a more expeditious way. These are mainly small properties, and we are now providing for local registry. If there is any dispute there must be "an aggrieved person." If the Registrar thinks the matter out of his purview he may refer the parties to the Court. This Amendment would oblige him to say, "I really can't hear you," and although he is of opinion that the matter is one which he can well decide, and the parties so desire, you are not to allow the trained professional men to decide it, but to send the parties to Dublin. I think it is better to trust our officials. All our life depends upon our officials being able to do their duty. If you give the officer the power to refer the question, or if he does not do that and takes upon himself the decision, and you then give an appeal against him, it seems to me you have done everything the parties have a right to expect. You have provided a cheap, simple, and fair tribunal to which the parties can go, and if they acquiesce in the decision it is their own look out.

*THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: I think it would be a great misfortune if this clause were left in the Bill in its present form. The noble and learned Lord places great confidence in the Clerks of the Peace throughout Ireland. The noble and learned Lord thinks it is right they should be called upon to decide these questions, but I can only tell him that a great many are afraid they will be called upon to decide such important matters as would be involved in the question as to whom a certain portion of land belongs. The question cannot possibly be referred in a proper way to counsel; they cannot possibly have any proper books of reference in such courts, and it would be better this Amendment should be adopted in the interests of everybody. I do not think it affects the landlords at all, and that it merely affects the tenants. Knowing how very litigious the peasantry of Ireland are, I believe those cases would be continually arising. I know how the peasantry of Ireland do engage in litigation, and the end of it will be they will have to go to the Central Court because the Clerks of the Peace will very properly refuse to decide such questions; and, therefore, I do think it would be a great improvement if at once the parties at issue were obliged to go to the Central Registry Department, I believe it would prevent a certain number of men making these applications, if they knew they had to go to the Central Registry Department, because they would feel that they would be thrown out there, and put to expense and trouble; whereas, if they can easily do it in their own district, knowing how very much disposed to law they are, I fear they will be rushing to these Courts and applying to be registered for land which does not belong to them. It is for the protection of the tenants and has nothing to do with the landlords.

LORD MONTEAGLE OF BRANDON: I would ask my noble Friend is it optional upon them? It seems to me to compel them to go to the Local Authority.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: It is all subject to the governing rules, and I would assume myself they would provide for a certain class of cases. It would be wise of them in many cases to go to the local registry, and the whole object of the Bill is for the local registration of title. If they have not the power of going cheaply to the local tribunals to decide, they will in many cases think the game is not worth the candle, and it will not be worth their while to go up to Dublin to argue the question, employing counsel at an expense of £10 or £20, which they cannot afford. Therefore, unless you enable these small proprietors to have a cheap decision on the spot by a tribunal which satisfies them, and which will give them a speedy decision, you might be practically denying them justice by obliging them to go up to Dublin and engage counsel which they cannot afford. Under those circumstances I can well understand that many of them would suffer the loss of their rights, or what they believe to be their rights, rather than incur the expense.

LORD HERSCHELL: I entirely agree that it would be very undesirable to do away with the power of the Local Authority to determine these disputes. Both parties may desire it, and it is obviously the cheapest tribunal for them. I would only suggest this: Might it not be worth while to allow the matter to be determined as the parties desire? Because where the Registrar takes upon himself to decide they cannot go to the Central Authority; they can only go to the Court. Might it not, therefore, be well to give them power to go to the Central Authority, and not only to the Court, in case it is not decided by the Central Authority?

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: I will consider the suggestion, but at present I think the clause sufficient.

*THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: No doubt it is a local registration of title, but these points will arise, and knowing the country as I do, I know perfectly well that where a man has not the smallest shadow of claim to land he will claim it if he can do so at no great expense to himself; whereas, if he knows he has to go at great expense to Dublin he will not do it. Therefore, I believe it would be a great protection to the real owners of land, if, upon such points as this, they were obliged to refer to the Central Registering Authority. I know in these districts men will make claims to land they have no right to whatever, and it is to prevent that in the interests of the real owners that I thought it necessary to put down this Amendment.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause 62 agreed to.

Clauses 63 to 82 agreed to, with verbal Amendments.

Clause 83.

LORD MONTEAGLE OF BRANDON: My Lords, this clause, as it now stands, makes Part IV. of this Bill apply to freehold registered land, which is compulsorily to be registered under the Act. It has been several times stated in the course of this evening that there is an accumulation of cases, a great number of cases, to be registered where sales have already taken place under the provisions of the Acts, and those cases will all come on with a great rush to the Registrars. They cannot be registered without considerable delay, at least the whole of them, and, in the meantime, cases must arise in which Part IV. would come into operation with regard to these lands which are liable to be registered, or which are compelled to be registered, but the registration of which may not be completed; and in those cases, as the clause now reads, this Act would not apply unless the registration has taken effect. The object of my Amendment to leave out the word "registered" is to make Part IV. apply to all cases where the lands are compelled to be registered, whether the registration has taken effect or not. Otherwise, as it appears to me, confusion would arise between those two classes of persons, and that I hope the noble and learned Lord would admit would be undesirable.

Amendment moved, in line 16, to leave out ("registered"); line 20, to leave out ("registered") twice.—(The Lord Monteagle of Brandon.)

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: I quite understand the object of my noble Friend; he has stated it with great plainness. But I am not in a position to accept the Amendment, because this is prospective, and my noble Friend would seek to make it retrospective. It might be that after purchase, and before this Bill came into operation, the lands had devolved according to the freehold tenure in the case of a man who had married and had children in the faith of that devolution. You would have this retrospective provision, but you could not unmarry the man, and there he would be with the wife and the children and no freehold land, it might be, a very uncomfortable position.

LORD MONTEAGLE OF BRANDON: I thought the clause was retrospective as it now stands.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to order).

Clauses 1 and 2 agreed to.

Clause 3.

*LORD BELPER: My Lords, I have a small Amendment upon this clause which I think is almost consequential. It is after the word "authorities," to insert "and the Council of any adjoining County," and the object of it is to give power to a County Council to make agreements with a neighbouring County Council in the same way as the clause gives power to the County Council to make agreements with any Highway Authority. It frequently happens that a river is the boundary of a county, and the bridges are generally kept up by the two counties on each side. It is, of course, clear that as to county bridges there would be no necessity for any power of this sort as they have it already; but in respect of other bridges it would be necessary, supposing it were desirable to free, or improve, or enlarge those bridges, that the power should be given to one County Council to deal with the other. As it stands, I think the clause is really quite anomalous, because it gives power to the Council in one county to deal with another authority in another county, and does not give power to deal with the County Council, leaving out, therefore, the most important body with whom it is necessary it should have power to deal.

Amendment moved, in Clause 3, line 10, after ("authorities,") to insert ("and the Council of any adjoining County.")—(The Lord Belper.)

RANGES BILL.—(No. 238.)

Read 3^a (according to order), with the Amendments.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Earl BROWNLOW): My Lords, I have an Amendment after Clause 13 to insert a new clause. The object of this Amendment is to place regiments of Yeomanry Cavalry in the same position as Volunteer Corps.

*LORD BELPER: May I ask the noble Lord, in thanking him for putting the Yeomanry in the same position as the Volunteers, whether it would not be advisable to alter Clause 2, in order to enable the Yeomanry to request the County Councils to buy ranges for them?

EARL BROWNLOW: I think not. The Amendment I have moved will cover the whole thing. The Volunteers can call upon the County Councils to help them, and in the same way the Yeomanry Cavalry will be in the same position. They are put in the same position exactly as the Volunteers.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): Is it not possible to present all these Returns in a complete volume together?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith): I think the course suggested by the hon. Member is a very desirable one. The reason why they are moved for in their present form is that we are asked by the County Councils to proceed as rapidly as possible, and as soon as the Return for each county is complete, we come down to the House and move for a Return. I will see whether they may not be given together in a complete form when all the counties are finished.

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, North-wich): Is it not possible to deposit them in the public libraries of the country?

*MR. J. W. LOWTHER: That is a matter which does not rest with us, but with the Treasury.

QUESTIONS.

GILGIT AND CHITRAL.

MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he will lay upon the Table the Papers that explain the circumstances under which British Political Officers and Indian troops came to be stationed in the remote valleys of Gilgit and Chitral, in the Himalayas, far beyond the boundaries of British India, or will he give references to the Despatches showing under what authorities that occupation of these remote districts was undertaken; and will he state what troops and officers are now stationed there?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): Neither a Political Officer nor Indian troops are stationed at Chitral. Gilgit is part of Kashmir; and a Political Officer and Kashmir troops are stationed there. An Agent was first stationed at Gilgit in 1877; he was withdrawn in 1881, and re-established two years ago. There are no Papers which, in the opinion of the Secretary of State, can be laid before Parliament without injury to the Public Service.

SCOTCH POLICE BURGHS.

MR. T. ELLIS (Merionethshire): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he can state the number of police burghs containing a population under 3,000; and how many of these have a population under 1,500?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): According to the figures of the last Census, there are 72 police burghs with a population under 3,000, and 30 of these have a population under 1,500.

NONCONFORMIST SCHOOL IN DENBIGHSHIRE.

MR. T. ELLIS: I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he is aware that the inhabitants of Gellioedd, in the parish of Llangwm, County of Denbigh, being almost all Nonconformists, established a school to provide education for children who would otherwise be compelled to attend a distant Church of England school; and whether he will state on what ground the Government grant was withheld from this school?

*THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): The Gellioedd School was started in 1889 by a certificated master who had been dismissed from the Llangwm National School, but a grant was refused on the double ground that the school was unnecessary (Elementary Education Act, 1870, Section 98), in which opinion the School Board concurred, and that the building was unsuitable. A triennial election having taken place in the interval, an application was subsequently made by the School Board for leave to build a new school at Gellioedd, when the Department informed them of the grounds upon which they considered the school to be unnecessary, and inquired whether the Board were able to adduce any further evidence in support of their allegation that the school was necessary. No reply has been received to this letter, nor has any further application been made to the Department on behalf of the school. I may add that the claim for a grant to a school in this place has been based all along on its geographical position, and it has never been stated that it was specially supported by Nonconformists.

MR. PICTON (Leicester): May I ask upon what ground the school was considered unnecessary?

*SIR W. HART DYKE: If a new school is proposed to be built in a place where there is a School Board, it is the custom of the Department to inquire whether, in their opinion, a new school is necessary. In this case the School Board replied that it was not necessary, and it was ascertained further that the building selected for the purpose was unsuitable.

MR. T. ELLIS: May I remind the right hon. Gentleman that in the first instance the School Board supported the application for the school, the nearest school being a Church of England school three or four miles off?

*SIR W. HART DYKE: It may be true that in the first instance the School Board supported the application, but they subsequently changed their mind.

PUBLIC HOUSE LICENCES.

MR. TALBOT (Oxford University): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been drawn to the conditions under which Justices of the Peace now are with regard to appeals against refusals to grant or renew licences for the sale of intoxicating liquors, whereby they are in some instances liable, in the event of their decisions being overruled, to the personal payment of costs; and whether he will consider the propriety of indemnifying Justices in such cases, so that they shall be able to exercise their jurisdiction without risk of personal loss, as is now the case with Her Majesty's Judges when their decisions are appealed against?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): There is no appeal against a refusal to grant a new licence. In the event of an appeal for the renewal of a licence being successful, the Court of Quarter Sessions may order the Treasurer of the county to pay the costs incurred by the Justices. Section 66 of the Local Government Act also makes provision for repayment out of the County Fund of expenses incurred by Justices in defending legal proceedings in certain cases. It has not been brought to my notice that these provisions are insufficient for the protection of Justices in proper cases. I should not be prepared to advise any subvention from Imperial funds.

LOANS TO CROWN COLONIES.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies what is the amount realised by the 10s. per £100 charged by the Crown Agents on all loans obtained for Crown Colonies during the last five years; what is the amount realised by the 5 per cent. commission charged by the Crown Agents on all supplies purchased by them for the Crown Colonies during the last five years; what is the amount of the discounts given for cash payments by those from whom the supplies are purchased during the last five years; what is the actual cost per annum of the Agency, and whether the excess of receipts (if any) over expenditure goes to the Crown Colonies, or is paid into the Imperial Exchequer; and whether any firm of repute applying to the Crown Agents to be put on the list of firms allowed to tender is put on the list?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. DE WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): The 10s. per £100 charged by the Crown Agents on the issue of loans has realised £21,230 5s. in the last five years. The commission charged by the Crown Agents on supplies is not 5 per cent., but 1 per cent. This rate came into force in October, 1886, and since that date has realised, to the 30th June last, £32,816 17s. 7d. The amount of the discounts for cash payments on the purchase of supplies cannot be given, as it cannot be ascertained without the examination of all the documents relating to the transactions of the past five years, which are many thousands in number. The Crown Agents invariably obtain, for the benefit of Colonial Governments, the full rates of discount under all heads. The cost of the Crown Agents' establishment for the year ended 30th June last was £16,969 18s. 6d. Any excess of receipts over expenditure does not go to the Crown Colonies or to the Imperial Government, but to the formation of an Office Reserve Fund to provide for pensions, and to meet fluctuations in business. I may explain that there are other receipts besides those referred to in the question, namely (a) the charge for paying dividends and for paying off loans; (b) the fixed contributions by Colonial Governments for paying pensions, salaries, and numerous other charges; and (c) the half brokerages on investments and sales of securities. The scale on which all these charges are made is settled and carefully revised from time to time by the Secretary of State. The Crown Agents place on their list of contractors the name of any firm applying to them, of those repute they are satisfied.

TITHES IN WALES.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the fact that Mr. E. H. James, a Magistrate acting for the Petty Sessional Division of Kemmaes, in Pembrokeshire, who is a leader of the anti-tithe agitation, insisted on sitting on the Bench of the Petty Sessional Division of Kilgerran, in order to try a case arising out of a disturbance which occurred in the collection of arrears of tithe rent-charge; whether it is according to usage for a Magistrate to take part in hearing a case at Petty Sessions outside his own district in which he is personally or politically interested; and whether he will call the attention of the Lord Chancellor to the case?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed that Mr. E. H. James claimed to sit on the Bench of the Kilgerran Division on the ground that the alleged offences were committed in the Division of Kemmaes, and alleged that he was present to see justice done. It is not usual for Magistrates to sit outside their own Petty Sessional Division unless they are requested to do so in order to make up a Bench. This is not, however, a matter to which I should think it necessary to call the attention of the Lord Chancellor.

HOURS OF LABOUR IN COLLIERIES.

MR. D. THOMAS (Merthyr Tydvil): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in view of the interest taken by a large number of miners in the proposal to limit by legislation the hours of labour to eight from bank to bank, he will cause a Return to be made, showing for every colliery in the United Kingdom, and for every day in the week, the present customary hour for commencing and ceasing to wind or draw coal, the time allowed for meals, the shaft (upcast or downcast) through which the men are let down and brought up, the shaft through which the boys are let down and brought up, the time occupied both in letting down and in bringing up all the persons employed underground during the coal shift, also showing whether the pit is worked on the single or double coal shift system; and whether the upcast shaft is used for winding coal; and, if so, to what extent?

*MR. MATTHEWS: I cannot consent to give this Return. I laid on the Table last year a Return the compilation of which involved very considerable expenditure of time and labour by Inspectors, who have other important duties to fulfil, and which exhibited with reference to the eight hours' question the average number of hours and days worked by men at collieries arranged by counties. The miners are themselves acquainted with every detail referred to in the question, and I would refer the hon. Member to the exhaustive Statistical Report published by the Miners' Federation last autumn, which practically supplies the information now asked for, except at collieries in Northumberland, Durham, and Cleveland, in which districts the men are opposed to the Eight Hours Bill.

MR. T. E. ELLIS: Does not the right hon. Gentleman think that the House should be made acquainted with the opinion of the miners?

*MR. MATTHEWS: Last year I laid upon the Table a Paper which contained the hours and days of their employment, and hon. Members can consult the elaborate Return prepared by the men themselves.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): Is there not a Return this year which gives the views of the miners?

*MR. MATTHEWS: I am not aware.

POISONING BY EATING TINNED SALMON.

DR. TANNER (Cork, Co. Mid): I beg to defer until Thursday my question—To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been directed to the poisoning of six persons, resulting in the death of one, in consequence of having eaten tinned salmon; whether it is a fact that many cases of acute gastric irritation and tin poisoning have been reported from time to time consequent upon the consumption of tinned fish and shell fish (lobster); and whether, having regard to the evidence given in the case referred to by Dr. Arthur P. Luff, an expert, before Dr. Danford Thomas, steps will be taken to inquire into the subject for the protection of the public and the safeguarding of legitimate trade?

CENSUS ENUMERATORS.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether enumerators for the Census of 1891, i.e., William Baxter, Alex. Alexander, and James Christie, Old Meldrum Parish, Aberdeenshire, have yet been paid; and, if not, will he explain why?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I must ask the hon. Gentleman to put down the question for Thursday.

KEW GARDENS.

MR. CREMER: I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether his attention has been called to the character of the refreshments served at the kiosk in Kew Gardens; what are the terms upon which the contractor holds possession of the kiosk; whether the conditions permit margarine to be sold for butter, the selling of bread and pastry which people are occasionally unable to eat, and serving tea from the bulk after promising fresh tea to each customer; and whether he will see that additional shelter and a little more comfort is provided the public?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, Dublin University): I cannot say that I have received any serious complaints as to the character of the refreshments supplied at the kiosk in Kew Gardens. The pavilion was erected by the contractor at his own cost; he holds an exclusive licence for the sale of refreshments for seven years from August 1, 1888, at a graduated rent rising from £100 per annum at first to £150, and then to £200 per annum. His tariff of prices is to be approved by the Office of Works, and he is to carry on his business to our satisfaction. He has to surrender the pavilion to us in good repair at the expiration of his licence. The contractor emphatically denies the allegations as to margarine being used for butter, and as to the other matters suggested in the question of the hon. Member, with reference to the quality of the refreshments served, I should think it would be for his interest to make such complaints impossible. I had not heard that additional shelter was required; but I shall make inquiries on the subject.

JOHN BANKS' BEQUEST.

MR. CREMER: I beg to ask the hon. Member for Penrith (Mr. J. W. Lowther) whether the attention of the Charity Commissioners has been drawn to the following statement, which appeared in the City Press of 15th July, with regard to the people who have been in receipt of John Banks' bequest of £5 per annum:—

"The pensioners, who were appointed by the parish of St. Benet, Paul's Wharf, met as usual last Wednesday at Haberdashers' Hall, thinking that their pensions would, as a matter of course, be paid to them. No money was, however, forthcoming, they being told that the income hitherto devoted to the payment of pensions had been appropriated by the Charity Commissioners, who intended diverting it into quite different channels. A pensioner writes: 'I am 61 years of age, and since last October I have been confined to bed with paralysis, and have no hope of ever walking again or being able to earn anything. I am entirely dependent on this pension and another of £20 a year from Christ's Hospital, which they have also taken;'"

if he would state to what purposes these funds have been applied, and by what authority these funds were diverted from the former recipients; and whether anything would be done to mitigate the hardship to them of being suddenly deprived of this resource?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith): The parochial charities of the parish of St. Benet, Paul's Wharf, like those of the other City parishes comprised in the Second Schedule to the City of London Parochial Charities Act, 1883, are now administered by the Governing Body appointed by the central scheme approved by Her Majesty in Council under that Act upon February 23 last. That scheme contains elaborate provisions for satisfying the claims, whether legal or merely equitable, of persons who, prior to a certain date long subsequent to the passing of that Act, were in receipt of pensions from the charities now administered under that scheme. Application should therefore be made to that Governing Body in respect of any claims in respect of such a pension.

Mr. Plunket

INCOME TAX.

COLONEL LLOYD ANSTRUTHER (Suffolk, Woodbridge): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is prepared to reconsider the recent decision of the Treasury, declining to allow rebate beyond the statutory period of three years of Income Tax paid in error for many years past on the invested funds of the Samford Hundred Benefit Society, thereby causing a severe loss and great hardship to a Friendly Society composed of 1,500 members, principally agricultural labourers, who can ill afford the loss the decision entails upon them?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's Hanover Square): I can only repeat the answer which I have already given to my hon. and gallant Friend by letter, namely, that the law forbids any claim for repayment of Income Tax to be allowed unless made within three years after the end of the year of assessment to which the claim relates, and that I have no power to set aside this provision.

POSTAGE OF TRADE SOCIETY CIRCULARS.

MR. HOWELL: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether it is his intention, under the new Act, to include in the Post Office Regulations, as to the transmission of circulars, registered trade unions in the same category as Friendly Societies, in so far as official notices are concerned?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): It is not intended, in any alterations which may be made in the Book Post Rules, to confer any peculiar and exceptional privilege on Friendly Societies. One of the alterations contemplated, however, which will admit of circulars and accounts being combined on one document, is an alteration much desired by Friendly Societies; but it will be open to Trade Unions and to the public generally to forward similar documents at the Book Post rate.

POUNDAGE ON POSTAL ORDERS.

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he can state the departmental or public reason for charging poundage on postal orders presented three or more months after the date of issue, especially in view of the fact that the money is in the hands of the Post Office?

*MR. RAIKES: The period of circulation for postal orders was restricted to prevent their becoming a paper currency. In the original Postal Order Bill the period was fixed at 12 months, and was not renewable; but, in deference to the wishes of the House, this period was subsequently reduced to three months, and a commission charged for renewal.

THE RIVER NENE.

MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he has received Memorials from the Corporation of the City of Peterborough, and from an association of merchants and traders interested in the navigation of the River Nene, praying for an inquiry into the state of that river; whether he is aware that the County Councils of the soke of Peterborough and Huntingdonshire have appointed a Committee to promote the objects of the Memorialists; and whether, having regard to the great importance of the subject in the interests of arterial drainage and navigation, he will grant the inquiry as desired?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): Yes, Sir; I have received the Memorials, but I was not aware of the appointment of the Committee to which the hon. Member refers. I have given directions for Major Marindin to make such an inspection of the condition of the navigation under the jurisdiction of the Nene Navigation Commissioners (3rd Division) as is authorised by Section 41 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888.

HANOVER CHAPEL BILL.

SIR J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, in view of the declaration of the First Lord of the Treasury that the Government would not promote any fresh legislation of a contentious character during the present Session of Parliament, he will refuse to give his assent to any further progress being made with the Hanover Chapel Bill, which proposes to make use of public money for a purpose, with regard to which there exists great difference of opinion amongst Members of this House?

MR. GOSCHEN: The Hanover Chapel Bill is a Private Bill, and, as I said before, it must take its chance with other Private Bills. It lies entirely outside any of the pledges given by the Government as to contentious measures or any action contemplated by them.

DUKE OF NORFOLK'S MISSION TO THE VATICAN.

• MR. ATKINSON (Boston): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the account of an informal Mission to the Pope by the Duke of Norfolk is intended to be followed by the appointment of a permanent representative of Great Britain at the Vatican; and whether it is usual, in any such document as is now printed, to set forth in full the letters of the Foreign Secretary signifying approval of the appointment of the gentlemen temporarily attached to the Mission; and, if not, why it has been done in this case?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): The Mission in question was not informal, though it was special. There is no intention to appoint a permanent Representative of Her Majesty at the Vatican. It is usual to set forth in full the letters of the Secretary of State in cases of Special Missions, and in the present case an Address was adopted by the House for "a Return of all Papers relating to the Mission of the Duke of Norfolk to the Vatican."

OLD HEAD OF KINSALE.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the Commissioners of Irish Lights, acting upon the suggestion of trans-Atlantic Steamship Companies and others, have applied for the sanction of the Board of Trade to increase the power of the light at the Old Head of Kinsale, and to place a powerful fog-signal at that station; and whether the Board of Trade have, in compliance with this request, sanctioned the erection there of the most powerful light applicable for important headlands and landfalls, as recommended in the Report of the Trinity House on the South Fore-land experiments, and also a fog-signal of the most improved construction?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: In compliance with an application of the Commissioners of Irish Lights, the Trinity House and the Board of Trade have sanctioned an increase in the power of the light at the Old Head of Kinsale by the substitution of a ten-wick burner for the present four-wick burner. They have declined to sanction the suggested installation of the electric light at this station, as they are advised that the position is neither a "salient headland" nor an "important landfall," as specified in the Report referred to by the hon. Member, and that, therefore, the very large expenditure of establishing an electric light station could not be justified. No application for a fog signal is before the Board of Trade.

THE IRISH FISHERIES.

MR. MORROGH (Cork, S.E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has received a copy of a Memorial addressed to the Member for South East Cork, and signed by a large number of fishermen and boat owners connected with the Kinsale fisheries, who complain of the great injury done to the mackerel and hake fisheries (owing to the destruction of immature fish) by persons engaging in herring fishing before the proper season, 20th June; is he aware that Sir Thomas Brady, Inspector of Irish Fisheries, is of opinion that this premature fishing for herrings is ruinous to the hake and mackerel fisheries; and if, under the circumstances, the Government will order an inquiry, with a view to dealing with a matter that so largely concerns an important Irish industry?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The Inspectors of Irish Fisheries had made representations on the subject of the injury done to the mackerel and hake fisheries by the destruction of immature fish. He had carefully considered the matter in question, and found that there were considerable difficulties in the way of dealing with it, as it could only be done by legislation, and that of a far-reaching character.

POSTAL FACILITIES IN COUNTY CORK.

MR. MORROGH: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he has received a copy of a Memorial from the residents of Roberts Cove and Ballindeasig, County Cork, asking for further postal facilities; and whether, in view of the circumstances therein set forth, he will endeavour to comply with the request of the Memorial?

*MR. RAIKES: Since putting this Notice on the Paper, the hon. Member has been good 'enough to send me the Memorial referred to. As soon as the necessary particulars can be collected, I will give the matter full consideration, and will inform the hon. Member of the result.

TULLAMORE PRISON.

MR. D. SULLIVAN (Westmeath, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with regard to the fact that prisoners sentenced to short terms of imprisonment, in many cases to seven days, at Athlone Petty Sessions Court, and neighbouring towns in the County Westmeath where Petty Sessions are held, are now sent for their term of imprisonment to Kilkenny Gaol since illness broke out in the Tullamore Prison, if he can state whether the cost of the removal of those prisoners, and the escort of police accompanying them, is borne by the ratepayers of Westmeath; and whether, under those circumstances, he would recommend that the Mullingar Prison, formerly the county prison, be again made available for the confinement of offenders tried and sentenced in the County Westmeath?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The expenses connected with the removal of prisoners are wholly defrayed by the Prisons Board, and are not chargeable upon the county ratepayers. In this case the removal is of a temporary character, and would not justify the outlay that would be involved in rendering Mullingar Prison again available as a long sentence prison.

CASE OF MR. M'CULLUM.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has been made aware that

Mr. M'Cullum, who has been and is now an inmate of a lunatic asylum in Belfast, and whose wife pays for his maintenance in the asylum, is reported by his friends to be perfectly sane, and capable of looking after himself; and if he will direct the Board of Control to communicate with the authorities in charge of the asylum, with a view to learn whether this man is sane, and entitled to his discharge?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Resident Medical Superintendent reports that there is no patient in Belfast District Lunatic Asylum of the name mentioned in the question; but that there is a patient named Robert M'Connell, whose maintenance is partly defrayed out of his private income. If the friends of the patient to whom the hon. Member refers, or the hon. Member himself, will furnish to the Inspectors of Lunatic Asylums, Dublin Castle, the exact name and particulars of his case, they will inquire into it.

FAIR RENTS.

MR. CAREW (Kildare, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will give his consent to the insertion in this year's Expiring Laws Continuance Bill of the provision for extending, for 12 months from the 31st December, 1891, the time within which leaseholders in Ireland may apply to have fair rents fixed on their holdings?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The enactment relating to leaseholders referred to by the hon. Member has been already inserted in this year's Expiring Laws Continuance Bill.

THE LAND COMMISSION.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will lay upon the Table of the House, before the Purchase Bill is reconsidered, copies of the Reports made by the respective Land Commissioners for the information of the House of Lords, respecting the proposed exclusion of the Land Commissioners from a voice in the permanent organisation of their staff?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As soon as I saw the question on the Paper I gave directions that the correspondence should be prepared, and I hope to lay it upon the Table at once.

REGISTRY OF DEEDS OFFICE, DUBLIN.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether the Government intend to make any provision for the transcribing clerks in the Registry of Deeds Office, Dublin, whose position will be seriously affected by the Local Registry of Title (Ireland) Bill, should it become law?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): The matter is one which is under the control of the Treasury, and any question relating to it should be put to my right hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury.

KINSALE PIER.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether it is true that there is considerable subsidence in consequence of a crack or fissure at the point of Kinsale Pier; whether the repeated repairs executed on this structure are effective; whether the coping, as shown by the enlarged plan, shows that there has been considerable displacement since the adjacent coping was re-set in August, 1888; and whether any, and if so what, steps will be taken to remedy all defects in this pier?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): An examination was recently made of the Kinsale works, and it was found that so far as could be ascertained there has been no subsidence at the point or outer end of the new pier. The repairs hitherto found necessary to the pier only cost the trifling amount of £47, and are quite effective. At a point about 600ft. from the head of the pier there has been a slight subsidence of the quay wall, but this is not considered of importance, and there are no defects in the pier requiring immediate attention.

DR. TANNER: Then there has been a slight subsidence in the sea wall?

MR. JACKSON: No, Sir; I said the quay wall.

LIGHT RAILWAY TO SCHULL PIER.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if it is true that the proposed extension of the light railway to Schull Pier has been abandoned; and, if so, whether this proposed work, having had the full approval of the Lord Lieutenant, having consideration for the great employment it will give in a distressed district, and the future effect it will have in relieving the baronial guarantee in a very poor locality, can be proceeded with after reconsideration?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The proposed Schull light railway extension has received careful consideration, but it has been found that there are serious difficulties in the way of promoting it as a relief work. The Lord Lieutenant has expressed himself anxious to see this work carried out as being one of considerable benefit to the locality, and we are in communication as to whether some means might not be devised for the purpose.

MR. DE COBAIN.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I wish to ask whether the Government have yet arrived at any determination with regard to the case of Mr. de Cobain?

MR. GOSCHEN: I was about to rise to make a statement with regard to that case. I have not put down any Motion in the name of the Government, because we are anxious we should not appear to prejudice the feeling of the House with regard to the documents which have been put in by any such course. But I feel that we are bound to state our opinion to the House. A careful review of the documents which have been put in has led us to the conclusion that it would not be agreeable to the House, in the face of the documents before it, that we should, without further inquiry or without further step, proceed to expel the hon. Member on Thursday. On the other hand, we have a strong feeling, which we do not know whether the House will share, that it would be very unsatisfactory to leave the matter precisely in the position in which it stands. The facts are well known to the House; but I would recall this point, that we do not charge the hon. Member with any offence, but there is a prima facie case that he has evaded justice by escaping from the country. I say a prima facie case, for the House will observe that the declarations that have been made to us, the certificates which we have received from the legal representative of the hon. Member, give no explanation whatever to this House how it is that during all the months that have elapsed he has made no effort whatever to surrender himself to justice to take his trial. No such information is before us; all that we have is a certificate, the bona fide character of which it is not for me to impugn, but which I scarcely think the House will regard as entirely satisfactory. It is extremely vague in its terms—it gives no explanation whatever of the ailments from which the hon. Member may have suffered, and which may have kept him during these three months from attending to meet the charges brought against him. Under these circumstances we feel, subject to the better judgment of the House, that further steps ought to be taken. For our part, if such be the feeling of the House—we should wish to carry the House with us in anything that may be done—we would respectfully suggest that Mr. Speaker should be desired to obtain independent medical evidence with regard to the health of Mr. de Cobain and his alleged inability to attend. He is at present close to our shores, so that no time need be lost. I should, therefore, propose to postpone for some days, which will constitute the necessary time, the summons to the hon. Member to attend in his place, and in the meantime I would suggest that such additional medical evidence as may be obtainable should be procured. I should expect the view of the House would be this: they would certainly not wish to prejudice the case against the hon. Member, to abridge any privileges he may possess, or to take any harsh measure with regard to him; on the other hand, it is a serious matter that for all these months one Member of this House has been conveying the general impression that he is evading justice. This surely is a matter which we should endeavour, if we can, to bring to a termination as soon as possible.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I have held all along that the House is under a great obligation to Mr. Speaker for the way in which he has intervened and protected the rights of private Members. I agree with a good deal of what the Chancellor of the Exchequer has said, but I believe that if the Government had, at the time this matter first arose, appointed a small Select Committee to act the part of a kind of Grand Jury—composed possibly of the Chairman of the Committee of Selection (the right hon. Member for the University of Oxford (Sir J. Mowbray) and the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread), together with one or two other Members of experience and authority—a great deal of difficulty would have been saved to the House. The position is that the Government adopted a precedent from the case of Mr. Sadleir, which, in my judgment, was altogether unsuited to the case of Mr. De Cobain, and, had it not been for the intervention of Mr. Speaker, a more precipitate course would have been adopted than was afterwards followed. What occurs to me is this: If the House had precipitately moved and proceeded with the expulsion of Mr. De Cobain, and if he were afterwards to appear before a jury in Ireland or elsewhere, and were to be acquitted, the House would be placed in an absolutely ridiculous position; because, although they would be technically justified in having taken note of the absence of Mr. De Cobain, they could not appeal to the general sense of equity in the country if afterwards there was a verdict of acquittal, and it had been preceded by a Motion of expulsion. Under these circumstances, it appears to me that a little further delay would not be unjust to the hon. Gentleman. There is much force in what the Chancellor of the Exchequer has said as to Mr. De Cobain's flight from justice; but, at the same time, the House ought to be warned by a notorious case that occurred recently, in which a gentleman occupying a high position was so overwhelmed by a false charge of a similar character to this that he not only gave a false name and address, but actually tried to commit suicide. One could understand that a gentleman occupying the position of Mr. De Cobain, confronted by this terrible accusation, the most terrible that can be brought against a man, might in the first moment of his confusion take flight from the country. The proper course to take under these circumstances is, I think, a considerate course. As one who never spoke to the hon. Gentleman, and who is one of his most determined political opponents, I think it would not be unworthy of the great position this House occupies if it allowed further time to elapse before taking any step. The next Assizes will be the Winter Assizes, and the House will only sit 10 days or a fortnight longer. What, then, is to be gained by haste? What is to be lost to our dignity by delay? Nothing. While I am quite prepared to follow any steps that the Government may take, I say, speaking as an Irish Member of an Irish Member differing from me in politics, that the best course will be to allow the Session to close without taking any steps. If, after that, Mr. De Cobain should not present himself to justice, we should have the united sense of the Three Kingdoms with us in expelling him from the House the moment that the House re-assembles.

MR. J. LOWTHER (Kent, Isle of Thanet): It seems to me that the House is placed in a somewhat embarrassing position. If the Medical Report was to the effect that compliance with the Order of the House would imperil the health and life of the hon. Member, the House would have no doubt as to what its course should be, but, as I read the document, nothing of the kind is contained in it. No medical adviser would be prepared to describe the dock of the Old Bailey as a good tonic for a person suffering from temporary ill-health, but the House has nothing to do with ulterior consequences before other tribunals. The Order of the House is precise—that the hon. Member is to attend in his place on a given date—and I trust the House will not establish the dangerous precedent of allowing other considerations to be imported into a very simple matter. If another medical authority is to report upon the case it ought to be clearly pointed out to that authority that what is to be reported upon is whether the attendance of the hon. Member in this House would involve any peril to his life. Of course, if the final Report of a competent and independent medical officer is to the effect that it would be injurious to the health and life of the Member—I mean that it would be seriously injurious to his bodily health—that the Order of the House should be obeyed, I should say the House would do well to let the matter drop, at any rate for the Session; otherwise it seems to me that the duty of the House is to see that its Order is obeyed.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I do not see what would be gained by sending over other medical men to make an investigation. We may assume that they would take the same view as to the excitement of a trial. We have, I think, only two courses—either to accept the medical certificate or not accept it. I certainly should accept it. I do not think much of medical certificates. There may be a certain amount of exaggeration, but, as has been said, the Session will close in 10 days. The hon. Member may surrender before next Session—in fact, he assures us that he will do so. I think, therefore, that the best thing will be to leave the matter alone, and not send over medical men. Let it rest until next Session, and then at the commencement of next Session, if the hon. Member has not fulfilled his promise, we can expel him.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I have listened attentively to what has been said by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I agree with him on many points. I think the certificate is most unsatisfactory. To say that a man over whose head is hanging a grave criminal charge is suffering from nervous prostration is to say what would be said about any other man in a similar condition. What Judge would accept that as a reason for saying that a trial should not go on? I can understand and sympathise with the feelings of the hon. Member who has said if there is any doubt do not let us proceed. I understand this to be the general feeling of the House—that under the circumstances of the close of the Session and this certificate and affidavit having been delivered, and the Member in question having promised after a short interval to present himself and stand his trial, the House is disposed to postpone the matter until next Session, when it would be absolutely in a position to judge how far the allegations are true, and how far the hon. Member has made good his promise to stand his trial. As to sending over two medical men, I am disposed to agree with the two hon. Members who have spoken since the Chancellor of the Exchequer sat down. It seems to me that that would be hardly a dignified course. We might be led into an awkward position if one medical man thought that the Member might come over and the other thought he might not. We should then be embarked in a conflict of medical testimony in a matter which does not touch any disease, but merely deals with the moral effect of the charge on the Member's mind. What could we gain by a proceeding of that description? I was much struck with the remark of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that there is a strong feeling against prejudicing this man on his trial. The wisest course would be to leave the matter over until next Session.

MR. GOSCHEN: I am sorry that the right hon. Gentleman does not agree as to the expediency or propriety of the course which I suggested, of having a further medical examination. I venture respectfully to protest against the idea that it would be an undignified course. There can be no indignity at all. If there is an unsatisfactory certificate before us, I apprehend that in a matter of this great gravity, touching the honour of this House, it is right that further inquiry should be made. I have no doubt that that course, if adopted, will not reflect in the slightest degree on the character of this House or the dignity of its proceedings. I take note of the views which have been expressed by the right hon. Gentleman and by several right hon. and hon. Members, and I should be most anxious, and I am sure that all my Colleagues would be most anxious, that in a matter of this kind we should proceed as far as possible unanimously. I think that the course I suggested would be the wisest course. Still, it is not our desire to force that course on the minority by the majority. From the beginning of this matter I have said that we did not wish to prejudge the question. I thought it my duty to give the House an opportunity of considering whether it would treat this matter as we suggested, and so bring it to an issue. I see, however, there is a difference of opinion on this point, and I take note of that difference. I shall, therefore, ask the House to allow the subject to drop for the moment. After the way in which the House has been good enough to treat the question we shall consider the course which ought to be taken.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES,
1891-2.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS II.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

(4.18.) MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): I beg to move the reduction of this Vote by the sum of £1,000, being the salary of the Chairman of the Board of Works, and my object in doing so is to call attention to a matter of considerable importance affecting my own constituency, namely, the Lough Erne drainage scheme. I propose to explain what that drainage scheme is, how it came to be undertaken, and what my reasons are for moving this reduction in connection with the mal-administration of the scheme which has undoubtedly taken place. I do not think the Government will deny that there has been mal-administration. In the first place, the people of the locality petitioned for a drainage scheme, and the Board of Works caused an inquiry to be made, and they are responsible for carrying out the plans and for seeing that the Estimates were sufficient. After the inquiry was held in the locality they decided that a drainage district should be constituted; that certain lands mentioned in the Schedule should be included, and that certain persons should form the Drainage Board. The persons chosen were almost exclusively representatives of the landlords, and among them was Mr. Frederick Ridge, now a member of the Land Commission, who was at the time agent of Lord Lanesborough. It was the duty of the Board to see that the money was expended for the benefit of the district, to ascertain, as soon as the works were completed, the total cost, including the interest which had accrued, and then to divide it among the reputed proprietors in proportion to the value of the improvement so far as it affected the land.

The petition for the scheme was first launched in 1879, and the Board of Works sent down an engineer—Mr. Thomas Hawkesley—to conduct the inquiry. Mr. Hawkesley prepared an Estimate, giving the entire cost at £104,000, but the scheme was supposed to have a certain value for navigation purposes as well as for drainage, and on that account it was agreed that £30,000 should be contributed by the Treasury. Upon that Estimate the Board of Works drew up an Order and constituted a Drainage Board, placing Mr. Ridge upon it, who went there, as he has said himself, with the direct object of obstructing and putting an end, if possible, to the scheme. The works were directed to be completed within five years, but they occupied 10 years, and the locality found themselves burdened with £180,500 instead of £74,000. A great want of business capacity was displayed by the Board. In the first place they appointed a Scotch contractor.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I have no wish to interrupt the hon. Gentleman, but I wish to remark that the Board of Works were not responsible for carrying out the scheme.

MR. KNOX: I understand that they paid the money.

MR. JACKSON: They only advanced it.

MR. KNOX: If I am wrong in my reading of a very complicated Act of Parliament, I think it only shows that it requires to be amended, if not repealed altogether. Whatever was the form of the mal-administration, whether it was in consequence of the action of Mr. Ridge or the Board of Works in Dublin, it is an undoubted fact that there was mal-administration. A Scotch contractor was employed, who did little or nothing towards carrying out the scheme. The signatures of his sureties were never obtained to the contract, and when he ultimately threw up the contract the Local Board found they had no remedy. The result of this jobbery of one kind and another has been to double the cost of the works. In the year 1887 the amount spent became so alarming that the Grand Jury of the County of Fermanagh, by a large majority, demanded an inquiry at Enniskillen, upon oath, into the whole circumstances of the case. That inquiry has never been granted, but it is still demanded by the people of the district, by the landlords as well as the tenants; and I venture to think that it would be extremely useful, not only to the people of the district, but as a guide to this House for future legislation. The work having been completed, an award has been made, a copy of which I hold in my hand. The Board of Works give in one column the increase in the value of the land which has resulted from carrying out the scheme; and in another column they set out what is to be paid by each proprietor. The repayment of the capital sum is spread over 49 years, and there is a charge for the maintenance of the works. The net result is that the sum which has to be paid every year by the proprietors is almost exactly equal to the sum which the Board of Works estimate to be the value of the improvement. The farmers say that although there may be some improvement it will be very trifling, and they are living now in imminent fear that their rents will be raised to pay for it, because Clause 46 of the Act of 1863 allows an application to be made, in certain cases, for an increase of rent where expenditure has been incurred for drainage improvements, and where no judicial rents have been fixed. I am not quite sure whether it can be done where judicial rents have been fixed, and I would certainly advise the tenants to raise the point in a Court of Law. But, in any case, there are numerous tenants who will have to pay charges which, in some instances, are greater than the total value of the land they occupy. It is not the fault of the people that this expenditure was incurred. They were not represented upon the Board, and certainly they would never have chosen a man like Mr. Ridge. The Local Board was originally appointed by the Board of Works without consulting the people, and year by year, as vacancies occurred, they were filled up by the proprietors, and not by the occupiers. Lord Lanesborough, before the award was made, tried to get his tenants to make agreements for sale before they knew that this charge was to be placed on the land. If these agreements had been entered into the tenants would have been bankrupt in a very short time, and the fact that such a proposal should have been made throws some light on the character of Mr. Wrench. Lord Lanesborough has not been regarded as a bad landlord, and I cannot but think it was by the advice of Mr. Wrench that he attempted to play this dirty trick on the tenants. It is clear that the tenants have had no share in incurring the burden. There has been mal-administration, or there was an insufficient estimate. From whatever cause, however, the amount levied is more than twice what it was originally thought would be levied. Under these circumstances, we have a strong case against the Board of Works, and the Imperial Government as represented by the Board of Works. I beg to move the reduction of the salary of the President of the Board of Works by £1,000 in order to call attention to the mal-administration of the Board of Works, first, in passing an insufficient estimate; secondly, in appointing a Board not capable of carrying out the works; and, thirdly, in not spending moneys wisely for the benefit of the locality.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item A, Salaries, be reduced by £1,000, part of the Salary of the Chairman of the Board."—(Mr. Knox.)

(4.33.) MR. JORDAN (Clare, W.): I rise to support the Amendment of my hon. Friend for the reduction of the Vote, and to protest against the incompetence of the Board of Works. The officers of the Board of Works seem to be incapable of initiating, executing, or finishing any public work. They are always muddling what they take in hand, and as the Church long ago was the happy hunting-ground of incompetents of a certain class, so the Board of Works now seems to be the happy hunting-ground of incompetent men who could not earn an honest living in any other sphere. The Board squanders public money, and its servants, who have earwigged and button-holed themselves into office, produce the smallest amount of result for the largest amount of outlay. In fact, it is a disgrace to the English administration of Ireland. The estimates for which it is responsible are nothing more or less than guess-work. Any private firm in this country which had such men as its servants would dismiss them if they presented estimates like those prepared by the engineers of the Board of Works in Ireland. With reference to the Lough Erne drainage scheme, I am sorry to say I am one of the men who are taxed unduly for it in the locality. The lake is 52 miles long, and, owing to the continued loss of crops by floods, an effort was made about 15 years ago to drain it. The first estimate of the cost was £69,000, but the Board thought that was too low an amount, and the matter dropped for some time. In 1888 a Court presided over by Mr. Roberts, then County Surveyor of Sligo, but now a member of the Board of Works, was held in Enniskillen, the county town of Fermanagh, and an estimate of £104,000 was submitted by Mr. Hawkesley. On that estimate the landlords gave their assent, a Drainage Board was formed, and the drainage proceeded with. The estimate was divided into two portions—£30,000 for navigation, and the remainder for arterial drainage. When the works were completed, to the amazement of every taxpayer they were found to have cost £210,000, or more than double the original estimate, and the Board of Works sanctioned the payment of this sum. There was nothing unusual in the character of the work to account for the estimate being so far exceeded. My opinion is that the officials who sanctioned such an outlay should be cashiered and drummed out of the public service. The last award of the Board of Works assessed £7,262 per annum, and £1,000 a year for maintenance, making £8,262 per annum for 49 years on 17,500 acres said to be affected by the drainage. This is an average of 9s. 6d. an acre on good and bad land alike for half a century. In some cases it is equal to, if not more, than the rent. The whole district has been in a state of consternation since the award was made. Many of the poor farmers will be ruined if they can be legally called upon to pay. Personally, I am the holder, as tenant, of some land in the district on which the tax will be 15s. an acre, and rather than pay it I will certainly give up the land. But what is to become of men who have nothing to live on but their farms? A sovereign is valuable, but it is not worth 40s. The drainage scheme may have been value for £74,000, but it is not value for £180,000. The cure is, indeed, worse than the disease. To all parties the outlay is unjust. It is unjust to the landlords who assented to an estimate for £104,000, and however bad landlords may be, the Government has no right to treat them unjustly. It is unjust also to the tenants that they should be taxed for expenditure over which they had no control, either personally or by delegation. This excessive expenditure has disturbed the relations of landlords and tenants, not merely as regards the rent, but also as regards the prospects of sale under the Bill now before the House, and also as regards sales arranged for but not completed under the Ashbourne Acts. Those who have bought under those Acts in ignorance of the taxation that has been imposed upon them are simply wild, and feel that they have been entrapped. They thought that the Government would have stood between them and such an extravagant outlay. I wish to show what incompetence has marked the action of the Local Drainage Board. They advertised for a contractor and got a Scotch contractor, who did a little work and took away with him £2,129. Seeing it was not a very good job he simply walked away. It was found that Mr. Pomeroy, the aristocratic local Secretary of the Board, who took the money, but I suppose did not want to earn it, had not got the securities signed, so that the Board was unable to inflict any penalty on the contractor. Mr. Pomeroy was, however, continued in his position as Secretary, and he has taken £900 out of the award. Just imagine any private establishment permitting such a man to remain Secretary. Having no contractor, the Board let the easy part of the work to a new contractor and became contractors themselves for the most difficult part of the work. Mr. Price, who not long since lost his situation under the Midland Railway Company of Ireland, took away £7,085 for his contract. One item appears in the accounts as follows:—"Trespass, right of way, solicitor's costs, £28,654." Just imagine that! The fact is the money came easy, and they let it go easy. The works are still in an unfinished condition. Surely the least the Board of Works should have done would have been to see that the works were finished. The Local Board seek now to impose a sum of £1,000 a year for maintenance. It is not maintenance at all. They intend to finish the work out of it, and to give the Local Secretary, who messed the job, £100 a year as long as he is alive. The irresponsible Local Board squanders the public money, and the Board of Works pays the piper. The Government now expect that men who are already paying too much rent should pay this monstrous tax. I am almost tempted to say I hope they will not, but I refrain from saying that. I do not know, however, how the people of the locality will be able to pay this additional tax. I have here a resolution passed at a public meeting at Enniskillen Court-house a week or 10 days ago asking for a public inquiry into the matter. I say the very least the Government can do is to give a public inquiry. It is not an unreasonable thing to ask, and it is a necessary thing if it be true, as I believe it is, that the final award made by Mr. Roberts, the officer of the Board of Works, was made upon data which were not vouched for by audit, date, or signature. I implore the Government to grant an inquiry on behalf, not only of the Nationalists, but on behalf of the loyal supporters who have stuck to them through good report and evil report. These are the men who are the primary complainers in this case. They ask for an inquiry before you pauperise the community by imposing this 9s. 6d. tax. What you ought to do is to pay down the money, and I ask the Government to do so. They are paying large amounts for the Shannon and the Suck, but Fermanagh has got nothing, and the least the Government can do is to pay the money down. I support the Motion for a reduction.

(5.0.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I wish to join in the protest made by the hon. Member, because other drainage schemes are under consideration, and what happened in this case may occur in other cases. It is most extraordinary that an estimate for £104,000 should have grown into an expenditure of £210,000. Who was responsible for the making of this contract? Was it the Drainage Board or the Board of Works? If the Drainage Board, had the Board of Works no control whatever over the matter? It is certain that the people in the locality had no control; all they did was to sanction the smaller estimate, and now they are called upon to pay more than double the amount. I know that the Board of Works charges the amount on the respective proprietors, but that is only in the first instance, because the proprietors in their turn get an order charging the sum upon the occupiers. I know of a drainage scheme in my own district for which the occupiers have been called upon to pay. They have paid willingly, because they got value for their money. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will be able to throw some light on the question of responsibility, in the interest of future drainage schemes, which are badly wanted. It certainly is not a good beginning that the estimate of cost should prove to be less than half the actual outlay. I think the responsibility must rest with the Board of Works. I am not going to make any charge against that Board, further than that it is either most incompetent or most unfortunate. I have never visited any part of Ireland where I have not heard every class of the community protesting against the Board of Works. Now, the whole community may be wrong, and the Board of Works may be right, but I do not think that the right is altogether on the side of the Board. The Secretary to the Treasury ought to look into the matter, for it is most undesirable that the new purchasers under the Ashbourne Act should have this extra levy of 9s. 6d. thrown upon them. I shall support the reduction.

*(5.5.) MR. JACKSON: I do not think there is any question as to the correctness of the figures which have been quoted, either in regard to the original estimate or to the actual cost. The whole question turns upon one fact, whether the Board of Works or the Local Drainage Board is responsible. The real difficulty is not one of administration by the Board of Works, but a question of the law which the Board merely carries out. But there can be no doubt that the responsibility for what has happened does not rest with the Board of Works, but entirely with the Local Drainage Board. An Act was passed in 1863 with the object of removing from the Government and the Board of Works the responsibility for carrying out the drainage works. The distinct intention was to give the local people the full control.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): The local landlords.

*MR. JACKSON: At all events, the control was given to the persons who were responsible for the repayment of the money. Surely that was not unreasonable, and itself a good security that the work would be carried out as economically as possible. The initiative, as Lord Crichton's Commission of 1878 reported, was left entirely to the proprietors, the desire being that they should carry out the work with the least amount of official control; they having, however, placed at their disposal the advice and experience of the Board of Works, and public money being advanced for the undertaking. After the plans and estimates have been prepared, the Board of Works send down an Inspector to hold a local inquiry, at which all interested parties are heard. The duties this Inspector has to discharge are defined by Statute law; and the Board of Works is only responsible for seeing that he is a competent man. Upon his Report the Board of Works has to say if the scheme is one that should be carried out.

MR. JORDAN: The Board of Works are called upon to sanction the estimates as well as the plans.

*MR. JACKSON: They have no responsibility for the amount of the estimate beyond checking the figures supplied to them. It is not for me to excuse the large excess of the actual expenditure over estimate in this particular case. I contend that the responsibility for that does not rest with the Board of Works; it lies entirely with the Local Drainage Board, the names of the members of which are included in the 'first scheme submitted to the Board of Works. Those names are chosen by the Memorialists who petition for authority for the scheme. The hon. Member for Cavan spoke of the Board of Works having appointed Mr. Hawkesley, the engineer. Mr. Hawkesley stands high in the engineering world. He has a great reputation. The hon. Member has spoken in a light and airy way of the difficulties of dealing with boulder clay under water. Those who have had any engineering experience know it is not such an easy matter to deal with it.

MR. JORDAN: I said he knew the boulder clay was there and would have to be dealt with.

*MR. JACKSON: I was told a year ago that there was an enormous amount of it to be dealt with. A large amount of hard rock was unexpectedly met with, then there were heavy claims for compensation, and a large amount was spent in litigation. From what I have seen of drainage works in Ireland I have come to the conclusion that they ought only to be entered upon after very careful consideration, for there has been scarcely one of them which it has been found possible to keep within the original design, or to carry out at anything like the original estimate.

(5.17.) MR. T. M. HEALY: The right hon. Gentleman has referred to "light and airy" statements, but, surely, nothing could be less light and airy than the fact that the original estimate for this scheme has been exceeded and the outlay proved to be more than double that estimate. The right hon. Gentleman has proceeded on the assumption that the Board of Works has no responsibility for this. Is that so? If it is, then I ask what is the good of having a Board of Works? If £250,000 is to be taken from the Board of Works and handed over to Local Bodies simply because they cry "Shovel out the sovereigns, hang the expense," and if the unfortunate occupiers are subsequently to be called upon to repay money which has been expended without proper supervision, then what is the use of the Board of Works? It is really absurd. At one time you cannot extract a paltry sum of £5 10s. for repairing some public work, although the expenditure of that sum would have saved £12,000, yet in this case enormous sums are forthcoming and the Board of Works take no responsibility.

*MR. JACKSON: The money was advanced on certain security.

MR. T. M. HEALY: There speaks the spirit which permeates these transaction. As long as the British Treasury have the power to screw the cash out of the tenants of Ireland they do not care how it is expended.

*MR. JACKSON: The landlords give the security.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Yes, the charge is upon the landlords in the first instance; but they have power under the Act to shift the burden to the shoulders of the occupiers. Does the right hon. Gentleman think that the tenants of the counties of Cavan and Monaghan will submit to an addition of 15s. an acre to their rent in order to pay for jobbery of this kind? Knowing what I do of the people of Cavan, who are good, honest Celtic people, I believe they will not pay it. I say it is a public scandal that the Drainage Board, composed as it is, should have had so much money handed over to it to spend. The right hon. Gentleman disclaims all responsibility for the Board of Works; but surely its duty is to prevent estimates being exceeded as in this case. The Board ought to have seen that the work was properly executed. The Drainage Board is very similar to the Grand Jury. That body makes roads and constructs bridges, and does not care what jobbery is perpetrated, for it does not have to pay the money. In the same way, the Board of Works lends out money for these schemes to landlords who do not have to pay a shilling of the expenditure.

*MR. JACKSON: If the hon. and learned Member inquires into the matter he will find that the burden does not necessarily fall on the tenant. He is inaccurate when he says the landlords do not have to pay any money.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The Board of Works has the power of fixing what the tenant shall pay, and how does the Board fix it? It sends a young gentleman down to the county. He calls on several landlords, spends a few days in the district, and having found out the total charge spreads it like butter on bread over the entire district. And that is called ascertaining the charge on the tenants. I should not complain so bitterly were it not for the fact that this year we were enabled to pass through this House a small Bill which would have remedied this system, but it was choked in the Upper House, although the Government might have secured its passing if they liked. Its clauses were taken out of a Drainage Bill of their own, and it was not, therefore, a revolutionary Land League proposal. Last year we had good reason to complain of the jobbery, mal-administration, and excessive expenditure of the Drainage Board. The Board was constituted in order to serve the purposes of the landlords and their agents. The Government gave us a pledge last year that they would effect some improvement in the administration of the Board of Works, but they have done nothing in the matter. Of course, we could not expect the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury, with his multifarious duties, to exercise effective control over the Board of Works, and, therefore, we suggested that it should be brought under the control of some Irish Department. On the 14th of July, 1890, the right hon. Gentleman said (Hansard, Third Series, Vol. CCCXLVI., page 1,643)—

“It may be that some better plan might be found than that of making the Secretary to the Treasury answer for the Board of Works in Ireland. That is a question of policy which has been present in the minds of the Government for some time, and possibly arrangements might be made which would give the Government the assistance of some one with more detailed knowledge of the works of the Board than the Secretary to the Treasury can have.”

That was a year ago. From that time to the present have the Government done anything to carry out that pledge? No, Sir, and they have not carried it out. The fact is that English Ministers are quite satisfied with their day's work, and do not care to add to it. They cannot take anything like the paternal interest in our country which any man who was racy of the soil would do. This is a serious question for the occupiers in this locality. Are they to pay this £210,000? If so, it will create a great grievance in the district. The hon. Member for Clare (Mr. Jordan) says he will surrender his land. Of course he can do so, being a tenant from year to year, but if he were a leaseholder he could not surrender it. What is the humble occupier who has no other means of livelihood than his farm to do? Is he to be turned out of his farm because he cannot pay for jobbery of this kind? Mr. Price certainly made more out of the drainage scheme than he made out of the Midland Railway of Ireland. It is certainly not more than two years since he lost his place under the railway company, and I gather that he has got £7,000 out of the Drainage Board. Had not the Government better remit this money altogether? If they will not do this, will they wipe off part of the sum and fix the amount somewhere between the estimate and the actual expenditure, or will they make the landlords pay the entire sum? I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not allow these districts to be harassed and driven almost into a state of insurrection over this unfortunate case. I hope, at all events, that if the tenants are made to pay, they will pay no more than their land will have gained by the scheme. The principle that the Board of Works has hitherto gone upon is practically to levy the charge on the farms of the tenants, and as this is a very large impost, I trust the right hon. Gentleman will see that some steps are taken in connection with it.

(5.37.) MR. KNOX: The right hon. Gentleman says the Board of Works act under Statute. That is, of course, a truism, but I think the right hon. Gentleman has not given the Committee the full effect of the statute under which they do act. We say the Board of Works are responsible for the estimate which is approved by their Inspectors, and are responsible for the men who are appointed to carry out the work. If the right hon. Gentleman refers to the statute he will see that if the Board of Works had done what they are bound to do by statute, they would not have let the district get into the present condition. Under the statute, the Inspector is in no case to be the same person who has previously reported to the petitioners. The Board of Works say that they appointed Mr. Thomas Hawkesley as Inspector to hold an inquiry. I think the right hon. Gentleman has been misinformed on this point, and it is possible we have unearthed another job, because Mr. Hawkesley first inquired into the matter, and then went down as Inspector.

MR. JACKSON: That is not the case.

MR. KNOX: Of course, the right hon. Gentleman is incredulous of any charge of mal-administration. Of course, Mr. Hawkesley is an eminent engineer, and I do not want to say he was guilty of jobbery, but I do say that if the Board of Works acted as the reports show they did, they have been guilty of the grossest mal-administration. I think that as this gentleman was appointed by the Board of Works, we have a strong case for saying the Board of Works are responsible for the estimate. The right hon. Gentleman denied that the Board of Works appointed the members of the Local Drainage Board, but it is bound expressly to do so by the terms of the statute, which says, "The Members of the first Drainage Board shall be named by the Commissioners." Under the circumstances, I say we have a strong case for an inquiry on oath into this mal-administration. It is a very serious thing that a charge, amounting altogether to over £180,000 should be placed upon the occupiers of these 17,000 acres. The right hon. Gentleman has said that the amount will only be the improved value of the land, but that really means nothing. The Board of Works knows that this is a glaring instance of its mal-administration. It is the largest drainage scheme that has been carried out in Ireland. The Board is well acquainted with the many failures which have taken place in other districts. Between the years 1848 and 1860 advances to the extent of £2,500,000 were made for these drainage schemes, and so wastefully was the money used that at least £1,000,000 of this money had to be remitted. So it will be with at least half of the present amount. I differ from my hon. Friend the Member for Longford on one point. He seems to think that because there are some Orangemen in Fermanagh the money will be found there. I do not think the money will be better found by Orangemen than by our own supporters. I have had more complaints on the subject from Tories than from my own supporters, and the Tories are just as averse to pay the money as are the Nationalists. Two landlords—Mr. Porter, who is not attached to any party, and Mr. Graham, who is a Conservative—refuse to pay and are going to force the Commissioners, to sell them up rather than pay. If the landlords refuse to pay how much more will the tenants refuse? The tenants have everything to lose by the imposition of this tax, and they know that if the money has to be paid in the locality their chance of purchasing on any fair terms will be taken away from them. The very least that can be demanded is an inquiry by an impartial tribunal. If the Board of Works has no responsibility they should court inquiry; but if they resist it the inference is that they fear the disclosures an inquiry will bring. If they do decline to grant an inquiry, I think the people of the district will be amply justified in refusing to pay the charge.

(5.49.) MR. JORDAN: I regret exceedingly that my manner and bearing seem to Gentlemen opposite to be so light and airy. It is a very serious matter and by no means one of a light and airy character. It is no pleasure to me to come down to the House and address the Committee, but I am compelled to do so by the sense of responsibility that presses upon me. I am neither an official nor am I paid to advocate the cause of the people. I come here because I am one of the people and know their wants. I am sorry that my speech made such a light impression upon the right hon. Gentleman. As I have said, there were no unforeseen natural causes for this large excess of the expenditure over the estimate. The engineer who went down to inspect the place ought to have seen the condition of affairs. I am not here to cast reflections on Mr. Hawkesley or any other engineer, and I should be doing so if I assumed that he did not estimate properly for the work to be done. The right hon. Gentleman has admitted the whole case, but has said that the Board of Works is not responsible. I cannot understand how it is they are not responsible. The person sent down to hold the inquiry had as much right to express an opinion on the estimates as on the plans and specifications. Mr. Roberts actually refused to sanction a lock which it was proposed to put across Lough Erne. If he could do that surely he could refuse to pass the estimates. I wish the right hon. Gentleman would come down and see the lough. We would treat him kindly; he need not be afraid. I hold that the Board of Works have made themselves responsible for these Estimates and for the very large and excessive outlay that has taken place. Has the right hon. Gentleman no remedy to offer to the people of the locality for this admitted grievance? Surely he is not going to tax them with such a vast sum of money as this. When he has admitted the grievance, the least we can expect from him is an inquiry. I think an inquiry would end in the Treasury itself providing the £106,000 excess over the Estimates. The right hon. Gentleman is not treating us as he ought to do. Has he no concern for the loyal and Orange voters of the country? Will he give no redress to people who are threatened with fresh taxation to such an enormous extent that they will not be able to pay it?

(5.58.) MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): It seems to me that the case made out by my hon. Friend is absolutely unanswerable. He has proved beyond a doubt that the Board of Works are responsible for the scheme. Are they not responsible for the official they sent round? Are they not also responsible for the appointment of the Local Drainage Board? No denial on the part of the right hon. Gentleman will absolve the Board of Works from responsibility for this terrible muddle and this mismanaged scheme. If it be proved to the Committee, as I think it has been proved to demonstration, that the charge of 9s. 6d. an acre would have to be met by the present occupants, what then are the Government going to do? My hon. Friends do not ask the Treasury to wipe off this £100,000 at once, though they have a just claim to do that—all they ask is that the right hon. Gentleman will order an inquiry on the spot into the entire circumstances of the case. Surely nothing could be fairer than that. Hon. Members from the South of Ireland, with myself, pressed the question of Ballycotton Pier upon the right hon. Gentleman. The Chief Secretary at first refused to do anything, but after he had visited the spot the Commissioners made a Report in favour of doing part, though not all, of what we asked. That was the result of an inquiry on the spot by the right hon. Gentleman, assisted by a capable man, an independent expert, on behalf of the Board of Works. I think my hon. Friends will be justified in dividing the Committee, considering the terrible grievance suffered by those whom they represent, and if they do not get redress this Session, I hope they will persist in pressing the matter on the attention of the right hon. Gentleman until justice is done to the inhabitants.

(6.4.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid.): I think we are justified in pressing the right hon. Gentleman upon this point. I agree with my hon. Friend it is very hard to get anything out of the Board of Works. In Ireland, rightly or wrongly, I think the Board of Works is a big jobbing and robbing institution. There you have all sorts of jobbery perpetrated at the expense of the unfortunate taxpayers and ratepayers of the country. This is one of the biggest schemes ever perpetrated by this jobbing Board of Works in Ireland, which have authority to charge 9s. 6d. per acre, and it may reach about 15s. an acre. The right hon. Gentleman in Committee of Supply up to the present year has shown himself considerate when we have been able to make bond fide charges against any portion of his Department. The right hon. Gentleman referred to the light and airy way in which my hon. Friend the Member for Clare spoke, but I remember that when we pressed the question of Ballycotton Pier upon the attention of the Minister we were sneered at in a similar manner. But when the Grand Jury of the County of Cork, consisting of Tories, took this matter up, the right hon. Gentleman went down to the place quickly. In this instance I understand that the original estimate for the drainage works was £104,000, but the actual cost has been £210,000, and whereas it was stated that the work would not occupy five years, it has taken 10 years. Really, if we were to go into this Vote in a conscientious manner, we should be occupied upon it for the next week. It is not our purpose to delay the progress of the Estimates upon any particular point. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will give us some small satisfaction, and then we will be able to meet him in a friendly spirit, and get through these Votes rapidly. I hope he will give us some assurance that an inquiry will be granted into this matter. Charges have been made, and it would be better for all parties concerned if there were a simple inquiry.

(6.10.) MR. JACKSON: I do not understand what good object would be served by an inquiry; further, I do not think we have the power to hold one. I have no desire in any way to stand between hon. Members and their desire for the fullest information, and I say frankly and at once, that I am ready to give any information which hon. Members may desire. If I had the power to grant such an inquiry as that which is desired, I do not see what good purpose it would serve. If hon. Members will specify what further information they want I will most willingly do all in my power to get it for them.

(6.14.) MR. KNOX: I do not think the right hon. Gentleman could give us the information which we desire. Take one point. The right hon. Gentleman in the course of the discussion said the fault was that of the engineer.

MR. JACKSON: I did not say that. I said that unforeseen difficulties had arisen.

MR. KNOX: But our point is that the engineering difficulties were not of a kind which could not easily have been foreseen when the estimate was made and approved by the Board of Works. That is a question to which it is impossible to get any satisfactory answer across the floor of the House. The only way of ascertaining that fact is by a local inquiry by a competent person. I thank the right hon. Gentleman for his courtesy in offering all the information in his power; but what we want is some form of inquiry. I will cite the precedent of the inquiry, held in 1886, into the working of the Act for the relief of distressed unions in the West of Ireland. That inquiry resulted in getting at the main facts of the mal-administration. I believe inquiry in the present case would result in getting at the facts. As the question stands, there is a difference of opinion as to who is responsible. There has undoubtedly been a great deal of blundering, for which the tenants of the whole country will have to suffer. We want to fix the responsibility for that blunder. The right hon. Gentleman has tried to put it on the Local Board, but I think he cannot get out of the matter in that way. The Local Board is created by the Board of Works. I will again read the Act.

MR. JACKSON: I do not deny that the Board of Works is responsible for constituting the Local Board, but the Local Board is responsible for its own works and for looking after all the details, and not the Board of Works.

MR. KNOX: But the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary appoints the Prisons Board, but the Home Department is responsible. Surely we know that the various Departments are responsible, though they delegate their powers. The Act says—

“The members of the first Drainage Board shall be named by the Commissioners, by order, constituting the Drainage Board, and such order shall fix the number of which the Board is to consist, the mode of summoning the first meeting of the Board, the qualification of subsequent members of the Board, and the time at which the first and subsequently appointed members are to vacate their offices.”

Surely there never was a body in the world more directly the creation of another Board than this Local Board is the creation of the Board of Works in Ireland. We only want to get at the facts. There is a plain question arising: Are the Board of Works responsible for the acts of the body they have created? The facts can only be got at by local inquiry, and in that demand we are backed by a resolution of the Grand Jury of the County Fermanagh, who four years ago demanded such an inquiry as we are now demanding. I venture to hope that the right hon. Gentleman will make us some satisfactory answer. If he refuses, we can only draw the conclusion that the Board of Works have from the beginning of this matter been jobbing the public money, laying such a terrible burden upon the people that they are afraid to open the inquiry.

MR. JACKSON: I am very sorry that the hon. Member has made these charges, for I think he ought to have some regard to the reputation of the permanent officials, who endeavour to do their duty. They are unable to defend themselves against these charges. I feel unable to grant the inquiry for which the hon. Gentleman asks, but I invite him and his friends to be good enough to state the information they require, and I will undertake on my part to supply it if it is in my power.

(6.30.) MR. JORDAN: The right hon. Gentleman is willing to give us something which we do not ask for, but will not give us what we do ask for. If he will not give us a sworn inquiry, will he give us one without the oath? If a man cannot state the truth save upon oath I am not much disposed to believe him upon oath. We do not want anything unfair. We are actuated by no hostility; all we require is an inquiry into this exaggerated and enormous outlay; we wish to know where the responsibility lies. We ask—though it is going rather far—whether he will consider the matter with a view to its being settled before the end of the Session?

MR. JACKSON: If there is any information to be obtained which I can put into a shape in which I can give it, all I can say is that I am ready to consider the means of getting it.

MR. KNOX: I have not made the charges of jobbery on my own authority, but on the authority of gentlemen of the County of Fermanagh, who say that they are prepared to come forward to substantiate their charges against the Board of Works; and if the Board of Works care for their reputation for honesty they will not stand in the way of this inquiry.

(6.35.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 94; Noes 144.—(Div. List, No. 367.)

Original Question again proposed.

(6.45.) DR. TANNER: I wish to call attention to the way in which this Vote tends to increase each year, without conferring any increased benefit on the Irish people. For the year 1890-91 the amount is put down at £25,511, and anyone looking at the appropriation accounts will see that the Vote has been steadily on the increase. I should like to have some information as to the stores accounts, which have been reported on in a manner showing that something ought to be done in the matter. I hold in my hand the Report made by the Auditor General, and also that made by the Exchequer and Audit Department, which show that the general administration of Mr. Parker is very faulty and lax. In the Committee of Public Accounts on which I have had the honour to serve, the audit of the Public Works Office of Ireland raised a Debate year after year. In fact a great portion of the forenoon was frequently spent in trying to rectify various points in connection with that office. It is stated in the Report I have before me that in 1888-9 the Board of Works undertook to have a more effective control over the stores under their charge, and that has not been done yet; and it added that, with a view of ascertaining whether that undertaking had been carried out, the officers of the Auditor General's Department were ordered to visit certain store depôts in Ireland in order to inquire into the method of keeping the accounts. The result of that investigation was that the Kingstown Depôt alone showed any sign of an efficient control being kept over the stores; while in all the other stores the system had undergone no change. This is a Department which, it is said, does not stoop to jobbery, and yet in regard to this question of stores the officials do not seem to know what they have under their charge. The Report goes on to call the attention of the Board of Works to the failure at the depôts mentioned to adopt a complete plan of keeping the accounts at the depôt in a uniform manner. In the Report having reference to the Exchequer and Audit Department, it is stated that, while recognising with satisfaction the efforts made in the Kingstown Depôt towards instituting more effectual control over the stores, it was reported that no steps had apparently been taken to extend that system to the other depôts. It would consequently appear that on this question of stores the Department has, generally speaking, been very lax in the performance of its duties. I should like to hear what the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury has to say on this subject.

(6.52.) MR. JACKSON: The hon. Member has raised two questions, the first being that there is a tendency to increase the Vote year by year. The hon. Member is not strictly accurate in that statement, because I find that, as a matter of fact, the Vote is slightly less this year than it was last year. Moreover, the attention of the Board of Works has been given to the question the hon. Gentleman has raised in reference to the stores. I have no doubt he is correct in his allusion to the superior method of keeping the accounts adopted at Kingstown, and that is probably accounted for by the fact that that is one of the chief depôts in the country. I quite agree with the hon. Member that it is very desirable that the best system should be devised and adopted for the care of the stores.

DR. TANNER: It would appear that most of these young Inspectors employed in the Department are very unsatisfactory officers. I should like to know how they are appointed. Are they appointed by the Lord Lieutenant or the officials at Dublin Castle, and have they to pass an examination, or are the appointments open to the general public? Are they appointed because of their knowledge of the business they have to do, or is their appointment, in reality, part and parcel of a Dublin Castle job?

MR. JACKSON: I believe they are appointed because of their special fitness for the work.

DR. TANNER: Do they pass any examination?

MR. JACKSON: Yes; they pass an examination.

DR. TANNER: Is it a competitive examination?

MR. JACKSON: I think not.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I should like to ask a question as to the appointment of local engineers, and whether anything has been done to cheapen the cost of inspection by the employment of local engineers instead of having them sent from Dublin? The right hon. Gentleman will remember that I drew his attention to this matter last year.

MR. JACKSON: Yes; the hon. and gallant Member did draw my attention to this matter last year, and I called the attention of the Chairman of the Board of Works to the subject. I asked him whether it would be possible to employ local engineers to a larger extent than hitherto, and he pointed out that there would be a difficulty in obtaining the requisite men in all cases in the immediate locality demanding inspection, but there appears to be no indisposition on the part of the Board to employ local engineers where it is advisable to take that course.

COLONEL NOLAN: I have in my mind a case in which that course was not resorted to, although there was a local engineer of considerable standing within 15 or 20 miles of the spot.

(7.0.) DR. TANNER: I should like to ask how it comes to pass that there is such a considerable cutting down of travelling expenses under this Vote? I am distinctly pleased to see it, because, usually, this item in connection with Public Departments in Ireland reaches too high a figure. I should like, however, to know how the reduction comes about.

MR. JACKSON: The explanation is very simple, and, from some points of view, very satisfactory. The travelling expenses are less than they were last year in consequence of a less number of loans having been applied for, and a less number of inquiries and inspections having been necessary in consequence.

Question put, and agreed to.

2. £17,433, to complete the sum for the Registrar General's Office, Ireland.

(7.3.) COLONEL NOLAN: I should like to have some figures from the Secretary to the Treasury as to how much is given for each of these registrations—births, marriages, and deaths—and I should like to know whether there is any difference in the method of registering Catholic marriages and Protestant marriages?

MR. JACKSON: Yes, Sir. Last year the hon. and gallant Member drew attention to this matter, and I brought it under the notice of the Department subsequently. The question was, whether the imperfections in the registration of Catholic marriages were due to any financial inequalities of the payments to the Registrars, and I was informed that that was not the case. I am afraid that if there are any imperfections they can only be remedied by legislation. In the case of marriages celebrated by the Roman Catholic clergy the parties are required to have a certificate, and a fee of 6d. is paid to the Registrar before he enters the certificate on his register. In the case of marriages that occur amongst all other denominations, they are entered in register books supplied by the Registrar General, and the parties are required to forward particulars to the Registrars of marriages, who are required to forward Returns to the Registrar General's Office. No fee is attached to this duty.

COLONEL NOLAN: Is there no salary attached to it?

MR. JACKSON: I think not. In the case of Roman Catholic births and deaths the Roman Catholic clergy are usually the Registrars themselves, and 1s. is paid for the entry of a birth or death under Section 54 of the 26th Vic. For each marriage registration 6d. is charged under Section 21 of the Act, and 3d. is charged for an entry on the vaccination register, where the Registrar is the dispensary medical officer. Where the Registrar is not the dispensary medical officer he is entitled to a fee of 2d. for his services.

(7.8.) COLONEL NOLAN: I certainly think the fee ought to be raised. But is it not possible that the registrations are imperfect, owing to negligence on the part of the clerks? There are some marriages, I am told, that are not registered at all.

MR. JACKSON: I speak without knowledge on the subject, but I gathered from the conversation that followed the discussion we had last year that there was some ground for believing that many marriages are not registered. It is the duty of the parties to send the Registrar notice, but there is no power to compel them to do so. There is no question about the accuracy of the Registrar, so far as he gets particulars, but he has no power to compel the parties to furnish him with particulars.

COLONEL NOLAN: My point is that, owing to the extremely low fee paid, some of the notifications of marriages are not sent by the Registrar. If the same fee were given as is paid in the case of Protestant marriages, I believe that more care would be taken in the registration. I was informed by one gentleman to whom I spoke on the question that he believed there were a good number of marriages that were not registered, and he immediately dwelt on the extremely low fee. He said the fee for registration of marriages ought to be equal to that for the registration of births.

(7.12.) DR. TANNER: I should like to ask whether the amount put down here is the total amount for the taking of the Census, or whether the Constabulary also got a large amount in connection with gathering up the statistics? If the Constabulary got a fee, I should like to know what it amounted to.

MR. JACKSON: I am afraid we have not yet received information showing the total cost of the Census.

COLONEL NOLAN: Has the right hon. Gentleman not received an approximate estimate?

MR. JACKSON: Of course, we must have an estimate of the cost. The total cost we estimated at £22,000. The amount which will come in course of payment during the present financial year we estimated at £15,850.

Vote agreed to.

3. £12,809, to complete the sum for the Valuation and Boundary Survey, Ireland.

COLONEL NOLAN: There are three or four counties of Ireland which have been surveyed, and of which large maps are being prepared. I should like to ask when we may expect these maps to be finished?

MR. JACKSON: I am afraid I cannot give any definite information, but I may say we have increased the amount this year in order to make more rapid progress.

COLONEL NOLAN: Can the right hon. Gentleman say whether the maps or a portion of them will be published, say in a year's time?

MR. JACKSON: Will the hon. and gallant Member specify the counties?

COLONEL NOLAN: Galway, particularly.

MR. JACKSON: I will inquire.

Vote agreed to.

CLASS I.

4. Motion made, and Question proposed,

(7.18.) MR. JORDAN: Earlier in the evening I stated that the officers of the Local Government Board are incompetent to initiate any proceedings or to execute any work, and I reiterate that upon this Vote. For the most laudable objects they refuse to do anything; or, if they do anything, they do it so badly that it would be better undone. At other times, for purposes not so laudable, they indulge in a most lavish expenditure. They cannot even make a correct estimate. For instance, in the case of barracks, their original estimate was £18,605, but there have been additions and alterations, for which £11,000 is taken. Again, the sanitary works were estimated at £2,000, but there have been additions and alterations costing £1,000, half as much again. For electric lighting they estimated £10,400; but additions and alterations have cost £4,808, and so it was throughout the Vote. Surely the engineers of the Board of Works ought to be able to estimate with some degree of accuracy. The Board of Works in Ireland rarely ever finish anything they take in hand, and I rose particularly to complain of the action of the Department in regard to the pier at Liscannor, in West Clare. Under the Relief of Distress Act, 1880, the Board of Works made some additions to the pier. It was thought they would make a harbour, but in reality they have only made a pond for ducks to swim in. They have made a complete muddle of the pier. There has been silting up, with the consequence that only vessels of very small tonnage can be loaded there. Messrs. Tuke & Maxwell, of Manchester, and Messrs. Hampson & Co., of Huddersfield, have opened up in the neighbourhood two very valuable flag quarries. These firms memorialised the Lord Lieutenant concerning the condition of the pier. They pointed out that if the harbour were completed, they would be able to ship 1,000 tons of flags a week, to employ 500 workmen, chiefly natives, and to pay between £30,000 and £40,000 annually in wages. It is only those who know the district who can appreciate what such a large sum in wages would mean to that district. The harbour resembles a dry dock more than anything else, and in the interest of my constituents and of the trade and commerce of the district, I ask the Government to finish the work they have begun. What is the use of a pier if there is no harbour? We ask the Government to complete the harbour so that an industry of importance to the district may be carried on with success. I also desire to direct attention to the condition of the Seaford Pier.

THE CHAIRMAN: There is no provision in this Estimate for this pier, and it is not competent for the hon. Gentleman to enter upon the consideration of new works.

MR. JORDAN: These are works which the Government have not finished. A contractor named Mahoney undertook to construct the pier, but failed to complete the work. The Government have not paid him for what he did. He claims £400. Last year they offered him £8, and now they offer him £38.

THE CHAIRMAN: Such a question cannot be raised on this Vote.

MR. JORDAN: I abstained from mentioning these things on another Vote; it seems I have lost my opportunity of raising them. Perhaps, however, I may be permitted to refer to other items. I see that £8,000 and £1,600 additional are taken for a "map store, with fittings," and £2,000 is set down for the "Clare Slob Lands, Road and Fence and other Works." £2,000 is a large sum to spend on such objects. I really do not see why the cost of these roads and fences should not be put on the county. Then £4,409 is to be voted for "Dublin Castle Residences and Chapel Royal." I do not see why you should put these together except on the old principle of Church and State. What do you want with a Chapel Royal at all? You have two magnificent cathedrals in Dublin, and I think the Lord Lieutenant or his household would be well enough served by one or other of them. £2,772 is asked for the "Maintenance and supplies" of the Viceregal Lodge, Gardens, &c. That must be a very comfortable residence when so much is required for its maintenance. The cost of the maintenance of the Chief Secretary's Lodge is estimated at £864, and that of the Under Secretary's Lodge, £416. £212 is required for the Geological Survey Office; but I would advise the abolition of the Office unless it is more efficiently conducted. Allowances are made for horses, but in one case I notice the allowance is £40 and in another only £20. A horse is a horse, and I should think the same amount of food ought to do one horse as another. There is an item for handy men. You have carpenters, glaziers, stonemasons, gardeners, and other artisans, and then you have handy men. What they do, except being handy in spending money, I do not know. You have an organ-blower, but I do not know where the organ is that he blows. There really ought to be more care exercised in the preparation of these extracts. Let me again point out that an estimate is made in the first place, and then large sums spent in alterations and additions.

MR. JACKSON: If the hon. Gentleman will look at the Estimates he will see one column relates to the total estimated cost of the works, and the other column to the amount it is proposed to spend during the year. There are no additions.

(7.35.) MR. FLYNN: I hope the Secretary to the Treasury will not be panic struck at the mention of Ballycotton Pier, concerning which I want some information. It is about 12 months since we heard from the Government how the pier is getting on, but quite recently Mr. Wolff Barry made a most comprehensive report concerning the structure to the Board of Works. That gentleman made four recommendations. In the first place he recommended that the pier head should be strengthened, and that the readiest way of doing that was to surround it with stout galvanised iron. I believe that that has not been done. Secondly, Mr. Wolff Barry recommended that certain cavities in a certain number of the upper tier of blocks should be filled by bags of concrete. Of course, if the local Clerk of the Works had done his duty properly, and if the Board of Works had exercised proper supervision, these complaints would not be made. In the opinion of experts the work is one of the least discreditable of those for which the Board of Works are responsible, it is one of their best pieces of work on the South Coast. The right hon. Gentleman has himself seen the work, and he knows that I am speaking from plans and facts, and am not relying upon imagination. Large sums of money have been spent upon the work, and it would be lamentable if a public work of great utility should fail from defects of detail when they could be remedied at comparatively small cost. Mr. Wolff Barry called attention to the defective character of the "hearting"—filling up between the masonry. After heavy rains or storm from the south-east when the sea dashes over the pier, the water lodges in the depressions caused by subsidence. This is bad for the fishermen's nets, and bad for the stability of the structure itself. In the original specifications this was provided for by a fall outwards of 1 in 1-

Another recommendation has reference to the depth of water outside the old pier, and this, I understand, has been attended to. I should be glad to know if the work is finished. I should be agreeably disappointed to learn that the Board of Works have dealt with the other points in Mr. Wolff Barry's Report. With every desire not to touch on the good humoured toleration of the right hon. Gentleman, so long as we have reason to suppose that any of these defects remain unremedied so long shall we have to press these matters upon his attention. Also, I should like to ask before we pass from the subject, if the Grand Jury have taken over the pier or not. With substantial grounds for their refusal the Grand Jury more than once declined to take over the pier and to be responsible for its maintenance. They alleged the work was incomplete. In this connection it should be borne in mind, as has been before observed, the Grand Jury is not a revolutionary body, and is unlikely to act in what I suppose the Chief Secretary would consider the spirit of "cussedness" animating a Nationalist representative body. The Grand Jury is composed of gentlemen of the landlord class and others not prone to act in opposition to a Government Department, so that the defect must have been serious when they refused to take over the pier. Then, on the other side of the bay, I may mention the boat slip at Knockadoon, in relation to which the Grand Jury have had a great deal of correspondence, some 75 feet of the concrete have been washed away, and this, as in the case of Ballycotton Pier, is due to the defective state of the "hearting" used by the contractor; indeed, I understand that instead of a specified class of stone or rubble being employed ordinary earth was used, with the result that the wash of the sea caused the blocks to fall in, with danger of the whole structure going to pieces. Then, some 12 months ago, we drew attention to the works at Greystones Harbour, and here I have no recent information, though recently I noticed a letter in a newspaper commenting on the neglect of the Board of Works. In the recent Report of the Board Greystones is mentioned as one of the works practically complete and about to be handed over to the Grand Jury. I know that much local dissatisfaction has been expressed at the way in which the Board of Works ignored local opinion in relation to the design and works, and, indeed, this is one of the cardinal and besetting sins of the Board exemplified all round the coast. At this Greystones Harbour, I believe, in the first instance, the work was undertaken by a contractor, Mr. Taylor, who worked away for a year upon plans universally condemned, when he failed, and Mr. Brown then took the contract and hammered away for another year. Greystones is favoured with deep water close in shore, and in the opinion of local experts what is required is the construction of a groyne on the north side to prevent the silt up of shingle from the heavy seas from the north-east, and the works on the south side are not required. But it would seem that the Board insist upon doing the very thing local experts declare should not be done.

MR. JACKSON: I do not know if the hon. Member is aware of it, but the required work has been undertaken.

MR. FLYNN: I am delighted to hear it. Passing from Greystones I desire to ask for a little information which perhaps the Chief Secretary would be better able to supply, in reference to the item "Repair and maintenance of constabulary barracks." This Vote covers what I do not hesitate to call so much jobbery that it is necessary to ask for information on many points. The amount asked for under the head of constabulary barracks is £4,360 as compared with £3,733 last year. In relation to this question of barracks I, some months ago, asked questions of the right hon. Gentleman as to the erection of new barracks at Teelin, and at the village of Taur, in my constituency. I was informed no such barracks were being constructed, but in this case, as in reference to other parts of Ireland, we have good reason to complain of the evasive and incorrect character of the information furnished from official sources to Ministers in this House. I was informed there were no such new barracks being constructed. My question was prompted in connection with the administration of the Coercion Act, and the commentary furnished on the result of the administration of that Act, the necessity for further barrack accommodation. I was told that no such new barracks were being constructed. But this was a mere quibble in reference to Teelin, for, as a matter of fact, a new building has been erected into which the contractor has removed, and his house has been converted into barracks. Then also at Taur I find, as a matter of fact, a new barrack has been constructed. For this misleading information the Board of Works are responsible; they must have known of these new works, and should have furnished the proper information.

MR. JACKSON: I do not think the hon. Member is justified in assuming that. If he knows it it is another matter.

MR. FLYNN: I assume it, I do not make the positive assertion, for I find some difficulty in determining under which head this expenditure is included. I now only ask for information, and do not move a reduction of the Vote.

(8.0.) MR. JACKSON: I think there must be a little misunderstanding. The hon. Member apparently refers to the item, "Constabulary barracks throughout Ireland." That does not refer to new barracks, but to maintenance. Ballycotton Pier is not quite a new subject. The hon. Member may rest assured that the structure is in no danger. Very careful measurements have been taken from time to time, and there is no cause to apprehend the smallest trouble. In the opinion of those competent to form an opinion, there is no movement, and all the work is good and substantial. The hon. Gentleman has asked whether the Grand Jury have taken over the pier. I have said already, on several occasions, that the pier has been handed over to the Grand Jury. The Board of Works after giving proper notice, have power to hand the pier over, and that power has been exercised.

MR. FLYNN: To offer is one thing, to accept is another.

MR. JACKSON: The Board of Works have given the proper notice, and the maintenance rests with the Grand Jury. I do not anticipate there will be any difficulty about the matter. It is a lasting piece of useful harbour work. The old foundations have been removed, and with satisfactory results. As to Knockadoon boat-slip, the full particulars are not in my mind just now, but if I remember rightly the question was raised on a previous occasion in some form. There was, I believe, some defect in the concrete; from some unexplained cause, the cement did not turn out as expected, but that, I understand, has been effectually remedied.

MR. FLYNN: I am glad to have this information in reference to Ballycotton Pier. Of course, time alone can show if what is necessary has been done. In relation to the barrack buildings, I do not find the entry I want.

MR. JACKSON: The only new buildings will be found on page 60, in the total amount of £11,200. I have no recollection of new buildings in the places mentioned by the hon. Member. Possibly it may be that the buildings are only rented.

MR. FLYNN: I am informed that in the one case the contractor moved into a new building, and his house was then used as a barrack, and in Taur a new building was erected.

(8.15.) MR. P. J. POWER (Waterford, E.): In many cases the Grand Jury are adverse to taking over these piers, because they say they have been improperly constructed. I do not know whether the Board of Works at present have any power to see that when the works are handed over to the Grand Jury they are kept in proper order. In all matters affecting the sea, it may be said that a stitch in time often saves nine. I trust that where work has been satisfactorily done in the first instance, the Board of Works will see that it is properly preserved. I can understand in some cases the Grand Jury objecting to take over defective works; but, in the interest of the ratepayers as well as in the interest of the localities, the Board of Works would do well to see that the works which are taken over are properly maintained. I should like the right hon. Gentleman to tell me whether the East Passage Pier, which is in my constituency, has yet been handed over to the Board of Works. Further, I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman a question as to the Naval Reserve Station at the village of Tramore, in Waterford. When I was last there I saw no signs of work going on, and I should, therefore, like to know when it is likely to be set on foot. I must say that one of the most important things to render such a station efficient would be that you should have some sort of place where the men can launch a boat without danger to their lives. I have already called the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to this matter, and he has informed me that he can hold out no hope that a pier will be constructed at Tramore; but I would point out that Naval Reserve men have to go there for practice at certain periods of the year. I do not know how these men have been able to put out their targets owing to the want of a harbour. The surf runs so high there that on the majority of days during the winter season it is impossible for anyone to venture out in a boat with any degree of safety. I maintain that it is the duty of the Board of Works to keep up this pier. The people in the locality subscribed a large sum of money for the erection of the pier, the balance being given by the Board of Works. The construction of the pier was carried out by the Board of Works, but so defective were the plans and the works that the pier was swept bodily away, and the money spent on them has been literally thrown into the sea. The works have ceased to exist and are now at the bottom of the sea. I am anxious to know the exact site where the naval station is to be erected. Has the contract been entered into, who is the contractor, and at what date may we expect the works to be commenced? I think, sometimes, that the Board of Works might use a little discretion as to the time of the year when they commence their works. Very often they commence them at improper seasons. I also think that the time for drilling the men should be changed. The Naval Reserve in that district, as well as in others, should be brought for drill when employment is scarce, and when the men are least wanted for purposes of trade.

(8.23.) MR. JACKSON: With regard to the East Passage Pier I believe it has been completed, and will soon be handed over. As to the Naval Reserve station at Tramore, I understand that a contract has been entered into for new work, but that work has not yet been commenced. It is not usual to commence work until the Vote has been taken. The hon. Member asks me if we will construct a pier at Tramore, and in reply I have simply to say that we have no money for the purpose.

The pier was constructed 30 years ago, and I am afraid it was neglected and has suffered in consequence. But the question is entirely one for the locality, as we have no money at our disposal for such work.

MR. P. J. POWER: I am sure that if the right hon. Gentleman saw the condition of the place, and was acquainted with the conditions under which stores have to be landed there, he would see the absolute necessity of doing something. A tender comes round from Cork periodically and is obliged to land men and ammunition at Tramore. I have often seen men put off in a boat to take people to the ships, but return again unable to make a passage. In this Bay I suppose more wrecks take place than at any other part of the southern coast. We have a lifeboat there, but it is a very risky thing to launch it in bad weather. I have myself assisted in launching it, and have been considerably knocked about, whilst I have seen other men seriously injured.

(8.26.) DR. TANNER: I should like some information as to what are the "repairs and alterations" which are said to be made in the Ordnance Survey Office at Cork. £1,000 is taken for these repairs and alterations at Limerick and Cork, and I want to know the precise character of the alterations. I also want to know who is the contractor, and when the contract is to be completed? I see that at last we have got something done in connection with the Dundrum Criminal Lunatic Asylum. For the last two years the place has been tinkered with, and very little has been done. According to the medical reports the sanitary condition of the establishment has been anything but satisfactory, therefore, I am glad to see that £1,000 is to be spent on it this year, the total estimate being £2,000. I should like to know whether it is proposed to complete all the works necessary to put the asylum on a satisfactory sanitary footing. It seems rather amusing to me to find that this year we are passing a Vote of £150 to enlarge the fern house at the Botanical Gardens, Dublin. We have hammered and hammered and hammered away at the Government for this Vote for years, and now we have got it. This shows that although we may appear rather tedious in making our demands, by our persistency we serve a very useful purpose, and act as a stimulant to Her Majesty's Government, who otherwise would not be able to get on at all with the works we wish to have carried out. Another thing I want to ask is, why, when contracts are given out in the South of Ireland, the condition is not laid down that the contractor shall employ local labour? When a contractor brings men into a district from a distance it creates great jealousy and impedes work. The landlords make application from time to time, and they are constantly granted, while we, who are not landlords, but simply the representatives of the people, make applications on behalf of our constituents, and find that in the words of the popular song, "It may be for years, and it may be for ever," that we have to await an answer. In reference to another subject, I see an item of £100 for work in connection with Cork College. As an old graduate of Queen's University, and having been connected with Queen's College, Cork, for many years, I must object to the system of tinkering and patching which is going on there, and is anything but satisfactory. It would be far better to make one complete job of the work, and I am quite sure that that would be a far more economical system. Passing to another point, I wish to ask a question on the subject of the Suck arterial drainage. The late lamented Member for Galway frequently raised this question, which is a very important one in connection with the locality to which it relates. It is a very poor locality, and few persons are aware of the distress and trouble undergone by the inhabitants almost daily and hourly. I should be glad if the right hon. Gentleman would give us some information as to the progress of the Suck drainage works. In regard to another matter—Ballycotton Pier—the Grand Jury took issue with the Government, and Mr. Wolff Barry was ordered to make a Report; but I ask, what is the use of getting Mr. Wolff Barry to make a Report if his suggestions are not to be carried out? It is all very well to say that there has been no subsidence at Ballycotton Pier; but it was found on sounding the pier at several points that the earth was being washed away in consequence of a hollow which existed in the centre of the pier. If hon. Members would take the trouble to inspect the piers around our coast they would see that that coast is being studded with models of the incapacity of the officers of the Board of Works. I really hope that after the time expended in debating the subject of Ballycotton Pier, it will be patched up in such a way as to make it withstand the storms which visit our coast. I have spoken of Glendore, and I am afraid I cannot get much done in that case. I am not sure whether some of the fault is not attributable to the action of the Grand Jury; but if that be so, I ask the right hon. Gentleman to add his representations to my own remonstrance, so that the pier may be available during the fishing season. I now come to Castletown, where I think [something ought to be done. The Royal Commission of 1886 recommended certain improvements to that harbour.

MR. JACKSON: That subject does not come within this Vote.

DR. TANNER: I am aware of that; but I wish to be allowed to make a brief appeal on behalf of the inhabitants of Castletown, where there is a splendid deep-water channel running up a fine natural basin. The old pier there is practically useless, although the Royal Commission called attention to the subject in 1886, and although the Lighthouse Commissioners sanctioned the creation of a lighthouse there nothing has been done. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will see that something is done next year. I would also ask whether something cannot be done to render the pier at Lewisburg, in County Mayo, more useful? Although a great deal of money has been spent upon it it is practically useless at present. It is possible, however, to render it useful by a little further expenditure, and in that case it would be of the greatest benefit to the fishing population of that district. I would also ask the kind consideration of the right hon. Gentleman on behalf of the large fishing population on the south side of the Island of Achill. It would be an enormous boon to the people of that district if something could be done to enable them to reap the rich harvest of the sea which is available on that part of the west coast. It would be far more to their advantage to improve their facilities for sea fishing than to spend large sums of money on the population of what is called a congested district. (8.45.)

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

*(9.20.) MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.): There are a few observations I think it right to make upon this Vote. In the first place, I notice there is a reduction in the expenditure upon the harbour of Howth, and in regard to this I would observe that this is a harbour of increasing importance. For many reasons it is being more frequented by fishermen, and more and more is it becoming a place of resort for packets and visitors. I therefore hope there is no intention to effect a saving here, with any risk to the efficiency of the harbour. It is not many years since there was good reason to complain that the condition of the harbour was not such as it should be, and I hope that this reduction will not tend to any neglect of the harbour, for that would be a penny wise and pound foolish policy. Next I would refer to what I must call some unprofitable expenditure in connection with the new and handsome Science and Art Buildings at Dublin, of which the city may be proud, but I notice in the Estimates an item of £500 for a screen and gateway. Now, this is a most unfortunate addition to the building, this gateway in Molesworth Street. It is difficult to understand how the architect of such really beautiful buildings could dwarf and spoil the effect by such an addition. I would certainly rather vote the money to have it removed. Then there is an amount of £8,000 for the map store and fittings in connection with the Ordnance Survey Office. I would strongly urge the rapid completion of this work, for at present, if any particular map is required, the delay is excessive and most vexatious. I hope with the completion of the arrangements we shall have a better system, and that it will not be necessary that all maps should be procured from one agent in Dublin. I would desire to call attention to the item of £336, less the rest of rent of a house for the Deputy Ranger of the Curragh of Kildare. If such a sum is necessary for the Deputy Ranger, one feels some curiosity to learn what the payment to the Ranger is. What Vote that comes under I do not know. The Curragh of Kildare is common land; it does not require the care given to the Phoenix Park, and yet the bailiff of Phoenix Park receives a smaller salary. Altogether the supervision of the Curragh of Kildare appears to be a costly arrangement, for there are, in addition to above charge, six bailiffs receiving from 12s. to 21s. per week each. These are all the remarks I have to make with reference to this Vote.

(9.26.) MR. JACKSON: There will be no neglect of Howth Harbour. The entrance has been dredged, and I think there is now no cause for complaint. As to the Deputy Ranger of the Curragh of Kildare, I must confess the details have not come to my knowledge. As to the increase in the Vote for Ordnance Survey, that is due to the necessity for providing for the accommodation of the larger staff now engaged in the Ordnance Survey in Ireland. With reference to the expenditure at Dundrum Asylum, the £1,000 this year is part of the £2,000 estimated for improving the sanitary condition of the buildings. [The remainder of this speech was inaudible in the Gallery.]

(9.33.) MR. KNOX: I notice that the amounts put down for the repair and maintenance of the harbours of Donaghadee and Ardglass are rather smaller than those put down in previous years. So far as I have been able to judge, there is need for even larger expenditure upon Ardglass Harbour than has been hitherto made, if the harbour is to be maintained in any sort of efficiency. A railway is now being made between Ardglass and Downpatrick, and it is very desirable there should be ample harbour accommodation in connection with the railway. A great deal more money has been spent on the Ardglass Harbour than the harbour is worth; but, apart from that question, it is well that such a sum should be spent as will keep it in proper repair. There is one other point on which I should like information from the Secretary to the Treasury. I am anxious to know whether the Resolution proposed by the hon. Member for Poplar (Mr. Buxton), and accepted by the House, as to all Government contractors being required to make a declaration that they pay the standard rate of wages, is to be applied to Ireland, and, if so, in what way? There may be some difficulty in applying that rule to Ireland, where the standard rate of wages is lower than that in London; but I think something should be done in the direction of requiring the declaration referred to in the case of Irish contracts. It is an undoubted fact that many contracts in Ireland are taken much too cheaply, with the result that the cheapest labour is employed.

(9.38.) MR. JACKSON: As to Donaghadee Harbour, I agree something ought to be done. There has been some silting up, but I do not know that there has been any great inconvenience, as there is not much traffic there. There was a difference of opinion as to the work necessary, and it seemed to us very undesirable we should begin to do anything unless it was going to be accepted as satisfactory. As to Ardglass, when I was there I was told that the one thing necessary was a railway. Now, the hon. Gentleman says it is absolutely necessary we should enlarge the harbour. I am aware of the condition of the harbour, and probably some day it may be necessary to do something. I believe there are one or two other places which have a prior claim. I am not possessed of information as to the application of the Resolution proposed by the hon. Member for Poplar to Ireland, but I will make inquiries. I do not know that we have gone so far as to set up any particular standard, but it would not be unreasonable that we should take the same course in Ireland, as far as the circumstances are similar, as we take in England.

(9.42.) MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I was glad to hear what fell from the right hon. Gentleman on the question on contracts. The Secretary to the Treasury will recollect that the Resolution accepted by the House was not intended by any means to be confined to England, but was to extend to all public contracts in whatever part of the Kingdom they may be made. There may be some difficulty in certain cases in discovering what is actually the standard rate of wages, but at all events——

MR. JACKSON: The hon. Gentleman will bear in mind that "standard" was not the word used, but "current."

Mr. Knox

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: Yes, "current." It may be somewhat difficult to discover that, in places where Trades Unions are not strong, and where current rates are not fully recognised; but, at the same time, I think the Board of Works should be held as responsible for carrying out the Resolution in Ireland as the Department is in England. When any contract is given out we should know what wages are going to be paid.

MR. JACKSON: As to general contracts, there is no specified rate of wages. The question of wages only arises in the case of particular contracts, such as those for buildings.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: In the case of maintenance and repairs, for instance, labour will form the principal part of the contract. I trust it will be quite as possible to carry out the object of my Resolution in Ireland as it is in England.

MR. KNOX: The right hon. Gentleman met the matter in a very conciliatory way, but I should like to have something more. In some parts of Ireland it may be difficult to discover what is the current rate of wages, but there are other parts of the country in which it is quite as easy to discover that as it is in England. In Belfast, Dublin, and Cork—especially Belfast—labour is quite as well organised as it is in any part of England—in some trades, at any rate. A new constabulary barracks is to be built in Belfast. That will be built by contract, and one of the main items will be labour. I think that just as the quality of the bricks used is specified in the contract the rate of wages paid should be specified, so that in the course of the work the Government can receive penalties from the contractors if they find labour is being paid worse than it is usually paid.

(9.48.) DR. TANNER: I confess it is difficult, owing to the form of the estimate, to arrive at any definite conclusion as to what is being done; but, at all events, I am convinced that a great deal of money is uselessly spent. £4,409 is asked for the Dublin Castle Residences and the Chapel Royal, as against £3,855 taken last year. I cannot make out why more money is required this year than last. But, in any case, the Chapel Royal is of very little use. Occasionally you have a fashionable service there; but as an Irish Protestant, I think the Chapel might be done away with. I also think too much money is spent on Dublin Castle itself. I could well understand large sums of money being voted in Committee of Supply for the maintenance of Dublin Castle when it was used as an examining establishment for the Queen's Universities, and subsequently for the Royal University; but now you have got new Royal University buildings, and there is no longer any necessity for Dublin Castle to be used as an examining institution. £3,856 is asked for the Viceregal Lodge and Gardens, as against £3,889 last year. I cannot understand how it comes to pass that there is less money spent on the place occupied by the Lord Lieutenant than upon Dublin Castle, a place very seldom used. The Chief Secretary does not very often favour our green island with his presence, but, all the same, his residence has to be kept up, and for the Chief Secretary's Lodge and Gardens, &c., we are called upon to provide £864. The utensils at the lodge seem to wear out very quickly, because for utensils and fittings and furniture we are asked for £217. We cannot object to cleaning, but £120 seems a very excessive amount for such a purpose. In all, £1,201 is asked for the right hon. Gentleman's lodge, as against £1,245 last year. The Chief Secretary was hardly ever in Ireland last year. It is true there was a little golfing, and the right hon. Gentleman paid one or two visits in connection with that game and also in connection with the administration of the Coercion Act. This year, however, he has been more frequently in Ireland, and yet I find a less sum is asked for the maintenance of his lodge. I want some explanation respecting this expenditure, and unless I receive it and consider it satisfactory I shall feel obliged to move to reduce the Vote by £500—I will allow £364. I also wish to receive some information respecting the preservation of ancient monuments. £250 is asked for in regard to ancient monuments, and I am anxious to know to whom the money goes. I also want to know what is being done to preserve the splendid national monuments at Achonry, which are rapidly decaying? Only the other day questions were asked concerning the preservation of the monuments of Egypt. Charity begins at home, and I and my colleagues, who come from a country that is full of historical relics, wish to have our relics preserved for the benefit of those who delight in the investigation of antiquarian monuments. I also wish to know what is being done in regard to the interesting monuments at Clonmacnois on the Shannon and the round tower at Clones. Another point I have to raise relates to the stupid gate that has been put up at the entrance to the Science and Art Buildings in Dublin. You have erected very fine buildings, but the gate makes them look ridiculous. The sooner you clear it away and erect something in keeping with the immediate surroundings the better. We are pretty fair judges of what ought to be done; and if it is not done, why, we shall hammer away until we remove the obstruction.

(10.0.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I shall have great pleasure in supporting the hon. Member if he does move a reduction of the Vote by £500. I have often complained of the money spent upon this residence in Dublin, although I have seldom had the support of hon. Members for Ireland, for they seem to think it is an advantage to get all the Saxon money they can for Ireland. It would be wiser, I think, if they were to consider these matters in a broader view, whether the money is wasted or profitably spent, and if they joined us in our protest against all wasteful expenditure. It must be admitted, I think, that this expenditure is excessive. For the maintenance, furniture, and utensils of this building the cost is £10,400 a year; and all this is to lodge five gentlemen, one of whom is certainly for the greater part of the year elsewhere, and does not, I suppose, spend more than 30 days out of the year in Ireland. The Viceregal Lodge is not far from Dublin Castle, and it is an absurdity to have two buildings maintained not more than two miles apart at this large expenditure. I can guarantee the hon. Member that he will not get a satisfactory answer, and I hope he will carry out his intention to move a reduction of the Vote. If he does divide I shall certainly vote with him.

(10.5.) DR. TANNER: I press for an answer to the questions I have raised, and for assurance in respect to the Chief Secretary's Lodge. The lodge is seldom occupied, and I ask how it comes to pass that a larger sum is expended upon it than upon either of the Queen's Colleges. How does it come to pass that so much more money is required for Dublin Castle this year than last year? To emphasise my questions I move a reduction of the Vote by £500 under Sub-head C.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item C, Maintenance of the Chief Secretary's Lodge, &c., be reduced by £500."—(Dr. Tanner.)

MR. JACKSON: The hon. Member can hardly think it is possible to maintain these important buildings for precisely the same amount every year. The reason why a larger amount is charged for Dublin Castle this year than last year is that a system of alterations and repairs has been going on for several years, and this year it will be finished. As to the Chief Secretary's Lodge, when I was in Dublin I went most carefully into the expenditure, and I am bound to say that, as far as I am able to judge, it is not possible to reduce the amount. Whether or not the house should be kept up is a matter of policy, while we do keep it up, it is economical to maintain it in repair.

MR. MORTON (Peterborough): So far as I can understand, this is Imperial money wasted. It does seem to me sometimes that Irish Members are quite satisfied so long as public money is spent in Ireland, but I look upon this as a matter of principle; it is our duty to prevent the waste of public money. I could understand the expenditure if it were the habit and policy of the right hon. Gentleman to reside for a certain part of the year in Ireland. No such charge as this arises in relation to the government of Scotland, and I believe the government of Scotland is more satisfactorily administered. I hope a Division will be taken as a protest against the expenditure. There is no excuse or explanation for it, and our duty to the taxpayers requires we should do what we can to wipe away this expenditure.

(10.10.) MR. FLYNN: I support the protest for the reason that all these items in the Estimates are charged in the accounts as against Ireland. Although it may seem strange for an Irish Member to object to the expenditure of Government money in Ireland, yet, when we reflect, we find there is no guarantee that the money is spent to the advantage of Ireland or that we get the value of it. We shall in a short time, if the Government adhere to their pledge, have an inquiry into the financial relations between the three Kingdoms, and in the general reckoning Ireland will be debited with these items as payments from the Imperial Treasury, and it is our duty as economists and Irish Members to keep these items down to a reasonable amount. The Secretary to the Treasury does not understand the items, and I am sure the Chief Secretary could not explain the meaning of £270 odd for utensils. A lump sum, once for all, for furnishing the lodge we could understand; but year after year these amounts are paid, and we are forced to the conclusion that it is systematic jobbery, and we may be quite sure that a considerable part of the money percolates into the pockets of people who do not appear in the matter. In my opinion, a large amount of the money voted under these heads for expenses of the Lord Lieutenant and the Chief Secretary is jobbed away in a highly respectable manner, and nobody connected with the Board of Works knows exactly how. The system is handed down from Government to Government, and nobody is sufficiently interested in economy to check it. In view of the inquiry into the financial relations between England and Ireland, I desire to see such wasteful expenditure cut down that it may not help to swell the amount set down to our debit, and for which we do not get value.

DR. TANNER: It might save much discussion and many Divisions if, in addition to the Estimates, Papers were prepared for the use of Members showing the miscellaneous items that go to make up these amounts. I am sure it would materially assist our deliberations in Committee of Supply.

(10.15.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 62; Noes 96.—(Div. List, No. 368.)

Original Question again proposed.

(10.27.) MR. T. M. HEALY: To enable us to arrive at the total of the effective charge for Constabulary would it not be well that the accounts should be so kept that we should see the total charge without a long examination of the various heads? Barrack accommodation, for instance, is charged under the Vote for the Board of Works, and other charges are to be found under the head of public buildings. When we are dealing with the Constabulary Vote would it not be well to have a memorandum showing the items on constabulary account under other Votes, that we may know what the total effective charge is?

(10.28.) MR. JACKSON: If the hon. and learned Member will refer he will see that on the face of the Estimate, Class 3, the information is given.

Question put, and agreed to.

(5.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

(10.30.) MR. T. M. HEALY: Last year the Secretary to the Treasury made a very interesting and lucid statement in regard to the Light Railways Act, and we shall be grateful if he will give us a little further enlightenment now.

MR. JACKSON: The hon. Member's request for a statement rather puts me in a difficulty, because I had expected to have to answer questions. I think I may say generally that pretty good progress has been effected, and, with the exception of two lines, satisfactory arrangements have been made with regard to the construction, maintenance, and working of the lines. I have had Reports from time to time of the progress of the works, and I believe they are all well under weigh now; and it may be reasonably expected that by the end of next year most of the railways will be, if not completed, nearly completed. That will be a satisfactory statement to the Committee, because, as everybody is aware, the work had to be started in a hurry under pressure and to some extent under great difficulties. The object was to meet an emergency, or rather to prevent an emergency arising. Therefore, works were pushed on under provisional contracts so as to give employment. A very large amount of employment has been given. A record has been kept of the number of men employed each week, and for the weeks beginning with the 4th of April and ending with the 4th of July the average numbers of men employed in each of the weeks were as follows:—5,505, 6,056, 5,845, 5,935, 5,339, 5,453, 6,664, 6,085, 6,720, 7,175, 7,395, 7,710, 7,967, and 7,624. These figures show that energy has been put into the work, and that care has been taken to obtain information of all that is being done every week. I believe I am entitled to say that great progress has been made. The engineer writes to me that, on the whole, about 100 miles of line have been brought to the formation level ready for ballasting. He also says that one-third of the rock-work is completed, and 5 per cent. of the brickwork and masonry. And then he goes into detail as to the various lines. I think the Committee may take it from me that, so far, no unforeseen difficulties have arisen. Contractors, Railway Companies, and all concerned have worked cordially to make the undertakings successful.

(10.35.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I think the right hon. Gentleman may, on the whole, be congratulated on the manner in which the works have been carried out. I feel some uneasiness that I do not like to give expression to as to the Clifden line. And, then, there is a matter upon which I had expected some information. Some explanation may perhaps be given by the Government of the fact that they are proceeding with some lines for which Parliamentary powers have not been obtained. Of course, buying land without Parliamentary powers must always be more or less an expensive operation, and I should like to know from the Government whether they can state what are the lines in regard to which they have proceeded without Parliamentary powers, and whether there is any necessity for applying to Parliament to sanction what they have done. I am glad to see that in consequence of the struggle we had last year, the Government have determined to remit the entire claim they were going to make in Galway—some £40,000. As to Donegal, the Chief Secretary has been there, I understand, and pledged words providing against the delay arising from the obstructive action of persons other than the lessor or grantor? I regard this as one of the best Land Bills the Government ever introduced, and that it will be satisfactory to both landlords and tenants, but I wish to prevent a denial of justice through the action of mortgagees and others.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR was inaudible in the Gallery.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I presume the Government will undertake to bring up words of their own, and therefore I ask leave to withdraw my Amendment.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I undertake to bring up words going the length I have stated.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I think the drafting here is not the happiest. "Shall be deemed to be the tenant of the present tenancy" involves two separate applications to the Court. In the first place, the tenant has to go to the Land Commission and get them to declare that his rent is a full agricultural rent, and, having got that done in the prescribed manner, he has to go to the landlord and get an agreement between himself and the landlord. When these processes have been gone through a gale or six months will have gone. Suppose the landlord objects to the prescribed manner. Then, and then only, the tenant is to be deemed the tenant of the present tenancy, and he is to go through the operation of filing a fair rent notice. It appears to me that the original application to the Land Commission ought to be treated pro tanto as an application to fix a fair rent.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 23, after "to" to insert "have made the prescribed application under Section 1 of the said Act of 1887, and shall be held to."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 25, after "1881," to insert "and Section 1 of the said Act of 1887."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Mr. T. M. Healy

Clause 2 agreed to.

Clause 3.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 19, after "means," insert "'The Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881.' Part V."—(The Attorney General for Ireland.)

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, at end, add "and this Act shall be read and construed with the Land Law (Ireland) Acts and the Land Purchase (Ireland) Acts."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Question, "That those words be there added," put, and agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 4 agreed to.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to move the new clause standing in my name. In a great many of the leases there is very frequently a covenant giving the landlord the option to take away an acre or so for the purpose of building. It was held until a recent case that that ousted the jurisdiction of the Land Commission. In a more recent case that view of the law was practically reversed. In the case of a holding of 65 acres the landlord reserved five acres, and the Court of Appeal held, after a long argument, that that ousted the jurisdiction of the Land Commission. The matter remains in very considerable doubt, and it is well it should be cleared up. As to the second part of the clause, let me say I know a case in County Louth where there was a salmon fishery. The right to take salmon was not worth £1 a year, yet the tenant was excluded from the benefits of the Act because the Court had no power to fix a rent on the fishery.

New Clause—

(Jurisdiction of Land Commission.)

"The jurisdiction of the Land Commission under the said Acts or this Act shall not be ousted by the existence of a covenant or agreement to surrender portion of the holding for any purpose, nor by the fact that a trivial portion is non-agricultural, if in the opinion of the Land Commission such portion is severable for the purposes of the application,"—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed. "That the Clause be read a second time."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

MR. A. J. BALFOUR was inaudible in the Gallery.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I am sorry the Government will not accept the clause. Without it a great many tenants will be excluded.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill, as amended, to be considered upon Thursday, and to be printed. [Bill 426.]

POST OFFICE ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.
(No. 405.)

(12.45.) Order read for resuming Adjourned Debate on further Amendment to new Clause (Criminal diverting of letters from the addressee) proposed on Consideration, as amended—

“Any person not in the employment of the Postmaster General who wilfully and maliciously, with intent to injure any other person, either opens or causes to be opened any letter which ought to have been delivered to such other person, or does any act or thing whereby the due delivery of such letter to such other person is prevented or impeded, shall be guilty of a misdemeanour, and be liable to a fine not exceeding fifty pounds, or to imprisonment not exceeding six months.

Nothing in this section shall apply to a person who does any act to which this section applies where he is parent or guardian of the person to whom the letter is addressed.

A prosecution shall not be instituted in pursuance of this section except by direction of the Postmaster General.

A letter in this section means a post letter within the meaning of ‘The Post Office Protection Act, 1884,’ and any other letter which has been delivered by post.”—(Mr. Raikes.)

And which Amendment was, to leave out from the word “months,” in line 7, to the word “A,” in line 11.—(Mr. Raikes.)

Question again proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause.”

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed to the Clause, in line 9, after “parent,” to insert, “or in the position of a parent.”—(Mr. Raikes.)

Question, “That those words be there inserted,” put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed to the Clause, in line 10, after the word “addressed,” to insert the words “or is acting for him on account of mental or bodily incapacity or infirmity.”—(Mr. Tomlinson.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): I hope my hon. and learned Friend will not press this Amendment at this stage. I undertake that the matter shall be looked into, so that it may be dealt with in another place if necessary.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): On that intimation I beg to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin): I should like to leave out lines 11 and 12. I will not press the matter to a Division, but I should like the Amendment to be put.

Amendment proposed to the Clause, in line 10, to leave out from the word “addressed,” to “A,” in line 13.—(Mr. Courtney.)

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause.”

MR. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I wish the House to remember that the other night it was urged, and urged with considerable force, that if these words are taken out we should be better without the clause. The one single protection against the abuse of a most dangerous clause is that people shall not be dragged up before the Queen’s Courts on a charge of tampering with letters unless the Postmaster General has given his consent.

MR. COURTNEY: I am not going to press the Amendment.

MR. KELLY: I trust the Postmaster General will not give way in this matter.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Amendments made to the Bill.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

TRUSTEE BILL (Lords).—(No. 413.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): After communication with the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Stockton (Sir H. Davey) and others, I do not think we should be justified in pressing this Bill this Session, and therefore, railways, and the effective work done on them, I gathered from another portion of the right hon. Gentleman's observations that only one-third of the rockwork was completed, and of the brickwork only 5 per cent.—from which I should conclude that the work in connection with the railways, which requires only thoroughly unskilled labour, has been pushed on as much as possible. Probably the whole of it that could be done up to the present date has been completed. But I also conclude that the most expensive part of the work, which requires technical skill, has not yet been substantially taken in hand. Under these circumstances, it occurs to me that the expenditure to be incurred in future, although it will not be so useful for the prevention of distress and famine as that incurred in the past, will prove very considerable, and that the estimates will be considerably exceeded. The right hon. Gentleman has mentioned the fact that in the case of two lines the arrangements have not been satisfactory, but he has not mentioned their names. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will tell us which these two companies are. As to the railways in Donegal, that is a large district, with a very large population, who suffer more from the want of means of locomotion and communication than the people of other parts of Ireland. The north-west district of Donegal has been left without any steps whatever being taken to open it up. I hope, however, that the line referred to as being in contemplation, but in regard to which the arrangements are not satisfactory, will touch this district. The Chief Secretary has intimated the intention of the Government to push forward further lines in Donegal, and I should like to know is the Gweedore line one of the lines included in that intention; and, if so, how soon are the works to be undertaken?

(11.2.) MR. JACKSON: I did not wish to convey the impression that unsatisfactory arrangements had been made with respect to any of the lines, but the two lines to which he referred were the Claremorris line and the Achill line. I have no reason to think that the sums for which we have contracted would be exceeded by a single shilling. One satisfactory feature of the case is that the large companies, on condition that the Government pay a certain sum have accepted the full responsibility of completing and working the lines, we may rely on their carrying out their part of the bargain.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: Is it intended to proceed with the Gweedore line?

*MR. JACKSON: I daresay the Member is aware the Grand Jury have passed a presentment which they have known would not be accepted. They proposed to limit the guarantee to a period of six years, and it is doubtful if any Company would undertake to construct a line in that country on a guarantee limited to six years.

(11.5.) MR. A. O'CONNOR: A large number of persons, encouraged by observations made by the Chief Secretary some time since, are looking forward to the starting of works in Donegal. There has been a good deal of surveying and correspondence, and rival schemes have been put forward for this very extensive and distressed district. Is there any intention of starting further work to open it up? I quite understood the Chief Secretary to say there was.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have stated that the railway scheme for Donegal will not be completed, as the funds provided by Parliament are already exhausted. I have undoubtedly said that the time may come when we may add to the railway scheme already completed, but I do not hold out any hope that an additional Vote will be asked for from Parliament during this Session.

MR. JORDAN: There is an impression that the Chief Secretary is about to compel the Sligo and Enniskillen Railway Company to sell its undertaking to the Great Northern Railway Company, and also that he proposed to get that company to work the Colloony and Claremorris line. I would tell him that such an arrangement would be strongly objected to in the districts concerned, because they do not want the Sligo and Enniskillen Line worked by the Claremorris Company.

COLONEL NOLAN: The hon. Member speaks in two characters — as a private capacity (as evidenced by his last remarks, which dealt with politics) and as representative of the district. I am very glad to find Government is treating with the Great Northern Railway Company, and that they have two strings to their bow in this respect. I want the Great Northern Railway to come direct to the West of Ireland. We want competing lines there.

(11.13.) MR. JORDAN: I deny that this is a question of local politics. I do not think the hon. and gallant Members should interfere in matters which do not concern him. He has admitted he knows nothing about the Great Northern Railway Company: why, then, should he dilate on its merits? If he knew as much about it as I do he would not be so anxious to see it secure the working of any new lines. This is a matter of vital interest to the whole north-west of Ireland. We want to secure direct communication between that district and the large towns and cities of Ireland, and we do not like that the Great Northern Company should hold us in its grasp. We shall fight against that as long as we can.

COLONEL NOLAN: My constituency is affected by this just as much as is my hon. Friend's. I have said I know nothing about the Great Northern line, but we want to get it into the district, so that we may secure better terms from the Midland Company. It appears to me the hon. Member for Clare spoke more as a northern Member than as a western Representative.

MR. P. J. POWER: I think that on an important Vote like this it would be well to have a short statement from the Government giving an account of the work which has been done on the different lines, and of the rate of the wages paid to the men employed. How many lines are in course of construction, and what is the mileage. How many men have been employed? A statement on these points so far from lengthening the Debate would expedite it.

(11.18.) MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, Rollox): I think we are entitled to discuss this matter from a Scotch as well as an Irish point of view. Apparently 5½ miles of light railway are being constructed in Ireland at a cost of £1,000,000, or over £7,000 a mile, and towards this sum £800,000. I am not saying whether Ireland is or is not entitled to that relief, in view of the distress prevalent in the country, but I cannot allow this enormous sum to be given to Ireland without pointing out that there are similar districts in Scotland which are equally entitled to assistance out of the Imperial purse. When these large sums are granted to Ireland out of the Imperial purse, I think it well to point to the distress in the Western Highlands of Scotland, where railways are required to open up the resources of the country just as much as in Ireland. I do not complain of the £800,000 going to Ireland, but I plead for Scotland being treated by a Unionist Government in a similar spirit of liberality; yet Scotland is only to receive a paltry sum of £50,000 to meet similar distress in the Western Highlands. I think that that is monstrously unfair treatment, bearing in mind the exceptional distress in the crofting counties. Again, the contribution to Scotland is taken out of her share of the Probate Duty, whereas not a single penny is deducted from Ireland's share.

(11.25.) SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I concur with my hon. Friend. I think he was quite right in drawing attention to the excessive liberality of the Government towards Ireland, and its great want of liberality towards Scotland. But I desire to say a few words on behalf of that much despised individual the British taxpayer. It may seem an impertinence for me as a British taxpayer to interfere in this matter, but we have to find the money. The Government have been making these grants to Ireland with great profuseness, and no doubt the Irish Members are wise in not looking a gift horse in the mouth and in accepting these grants without criticising them at any length. But I do not quite like these gifts. We know that, as Mr. Biggar used to tell us, there are too many jobs perpetrated in connection with these railwayschemes. I shall be very much surprised if many of the schemes now in hand do not turn out to be jobs, and if experience does not prove that the lines are utterly unable to pay working expenditure. I utter this protest on behalf of that insignificant person the British taxpayer.

(11.30.) MR. MORTON: I do not intend to object to this Vote, but I submit we have embarked on a shockingly bad policy in these matters. I look forward to the day when Ireland will be allowed to manage her own affairs, and will be expected to defray her own expenditure. I agree with the hon. Member for Glasgow as to what he said of the claims of the crofters, and having visited the crofting districts I think the people there are entitled to help just as much as the Irish. If Ireland had not been reduced by Government mismanagement to the condition in which that country now is, there would be no occasion for Votes of this kind. I think we ought to be ashamed of the results of our government in Ireland. Coercion having failed we find the only way to manage the country is to make extraordinary Votes of public money. So far as I can see, there is no chance of its ever being repaid. I say the system is bad. There are other districts in the United Kingdom besides Ireland. Why should not light railways be built for the benefit of the Scotch crofters, and if the Government have any money to spare, why not give it to the City of Peterborough?

(11.36.) DR. TANNER: I think we ought to have an assurance from the Government that the light railways will be well constructed. If the construction is faulty the money expended will be merely wasted. I cannot say that I sympathise with the hon. Member for Peterborough. He appears to want further railway accommodation for that city. I thought it was already well provided for. But to return to the question of the construction of the light railways, may I point out that faulty construction will entail a great loss on the ratepayers, as was proved in the case of the Kanturk Railway. These lines in the West of Ireland are more or less prospected by the Midland Company and must be carefully watched. We do not want a repetition of the case of the Kanturk line, on which last year there was a loss of 14s. 6d. per mile per week.

*MR. JACKSON: That has nothing to do with this Vote.

DR. TANNER: I know that. I was only citing that as an example to be guarded against. Unless the Government take warning from what occurred in that case, worse results may follow the construction of some of these new lines. I believe the hope of the men at the head of the Midland and other great Railway Companies is that these lines, which are being built at the expense of the public, will finally be incorporated in their undertaking. I do hope the Government will see that the lines are properly constructed, because if they are they will be of great benefit to the country. It is very important that these districts should be opened up. We do not want another fiasco like that of the Schull and Skibbereen line.

Mr. Morton

(11.47.) MR. FLYNN: I agree that under ordinary circumstances it would not be wise to make advances from Imperial funds towards light railways in Ireland. I should much prefer that Ireland should be allowed to manage its own affairs and to develop its own resources. Of course, if this money is forced on Ireland the Irish Members cannot resist it; but I confess that it is not without some humiliation that I see these gifts made. I believe that that feeling is shared by large numbers of Irishmen, who think State charity is degrading. I believe if these things were done with Irish capital the people would benefit to a greater extent, and there would be less jobbery. In regard to the new lines, I hope the Government will see that proper arrangements are made for working them, and that the large Railway Companies will not absorb all the benefits to be derived from them.

*SIR J. COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.): That has been done.

MR. FLYNN: Well, the Kerry people know nothing of the arrangements which have been made. I do not know whether the hon. and gallant Member gets his information through underground channels, but certainly the public ought to be made acquainted with what has been done. With regard to the guarantees for railways constructed under the Tramways Act—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! That is not relevant to the Vote.

MR. FLYNN: Well, I will content myself with pressing on the Government the importance of making beneficial working arrangements for these new lines. I am glad to see the lines are being constructed. The Irish Members have not opposed or voted against the schemes, although I repeat that it is with a sense of shame and humiliation that we accept these Imperial boons. We should prefer to be able to develop the resources of our country without such assistance.

(11.56.) COLONEL NOLAN: I entirely disagree with the hon. Gentleman. I do not regard these grants in aid of railways as in the nature of gifts or charity. On the contrary, I look on them as some amount of restitution made by England to Ireland for the excessive taxation, amounting to something like £8,000,000 sterling, that has for many years been drawn from Ireland.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Hon. Members below the Gangway who say that they have not opposed the construction of these railways must have forgotten that they once kept the House sitting until daylight in endeavouring to prevent the measure which authorised their construction being carried.

MR. FLYNN: We did that in order to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to certain points in which the schemes could be improved.

DR. TANNER: I think the hon. Member for South Tyrone, who is not an Irishman, ought not to make such an assertion. It was utterly uncalled for. All we did was to endeavour to improve the Government schemes, and that was our duty. We are not here simply to sit with our mouths open and to swallow everything that the Government offers us. What we want to do is to make everything practically beneficial to the people we represent. We know perfectly well that these railways are not designed for the benefit of the poor people, but mainly to enrich the landlords of Ireland, who pay nothing towards the construction of the lines. We treat such taunts as those which have come from the hon. Member for South Tyrone in the way they deserve, and that way is with contempt. There are two matters I wish to mention: they occur to me in consequence of the interruption of the hon. and gallant Member (Sir J. Colomb), who I understand occasionally visits the place where he was born—the Kingdom of Kerry. I should like to ask the hon. and gallant Gentleman what is the highest bridge——

THE CHAIRMAN: Order! The hon. Member must be aware he is trifling with the Committee. If he does not cultivate a little more conciseness I shall be obliged to direct him to resume his seat.

DR. TANNER: I desire to put questions in connection with two railways, and I was alluding to a very hurtful remark made by the hon. Member for South Tyrone.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

DR. TANNER: And I presume in this House we are allowed to answer what is said. But I want to know what is the total liability in connection with the Killorglin and Valencia line and the Headford and Kenmare line? I find that in addition to the sum of £85,000 in connection with the former line, and £50,000 in connection with the latter line, there is a liability in respect of capital of £70,000 and £60,000 respectively. I want some explanation. I always regret being brought into any conflict with the Chair, and if my temper occasionally gets the better of my judgment——

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

DR. TANNER: I was saying that——

THE CHAIRMAN: Order! The hon. Gentleman has put his question: he might allow it to be answered.

DR. TANNER: I shall, of course——

*MR. JACKSON: I think the question can be answered very briefly. The amount of liability is accurately stated on the Estimate.

Question put, and agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported.

CLASS VII.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £160,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1892, for certain expenditure in connection with the Relief of Distress in Ireland.”

(12.7.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I think we have arrived at an hour when the Government might reasonably consent to report Progress, and allow this Vote to be taken first thing to-morrow. An important Irish Bill stands as the next Order, and as the House must adjourn at 1 o'clock it is only reasonable we should take that Bill at once.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): It would not be reasonable to enter upon a Vote that would occupy a considerable time, but if hon. Members wish this Vote might be withdrawn, so that we might continue another half-hour with the Votes in Class II.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I understand the Government are pledged to proceed with the Votes in their order. I do not think it would be right to take Class II. at this time.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I hope the Government will consent to report Progress now. There are two important Irish Bills on the Paper, and the Government must bear in mind that they have got a good deal of money to-night.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There is no intention of pressing this Vote to-night, nor did my right hon. Friend suggest that we should. The suggestion of my right hon. Friend was that the non-contentious Vote in Class III., which is next in order, should be taken. Of the two important Irish Bills on the Paper only one is to be taken to-night—the Redemption of Rent Bill. It would be a strong order to take the Training Colleges Bill; besides, the hon. Member for West Belfast, who has got Amendments to that Bill on the Paper, is not able to be in his place. The present stage of the Redemption of Rent Bill will not take many minutes, and, therefore, I think we might be permitted to take two or three more Votes.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: I do not know what the Chancellor of the Exchequer considers a contentious and a non-contentious Vote, but some of us will occupy some time in discussing Vote 1 in Class III., which contains the salary of the Attorney General.

COLONEL NOLAN: I hope that the Prisons Vote will not be taken on Thursday, as the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell), who has an important Amendment down to that Vote, has an important engagement in Ireland, which will prevent him from being present in the House on that day.

MR. GOSCHEN: I have just been reminded that the pledge of the Government is to take the Votes in their order, and it would be extremely difficult to make an arrangement to suit the convenience of any hon. Member, however important he may be. But Thursday has been set apart for the discussion of the Lords' Amendments to the Land Purchase Bill, and after they are disposed of, it is not intended to take Supply during the remainder of the sitting, but to proceed with the Bills on the Paper. Therefore, without disturbing the general order of the Votes, the Prisons Vote will not be taken on Thursday.

Question put, and agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported to-morrow.

Committee also report Progress; to sit again to-morrow.

SUPPLY—REPORT.

Resolutions [20th July] [see page 1773] reported and agreed to.

REDEMPTION OF RENT (IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 377.)

COMMITTEE.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 14, after the word "rent," to insert the words "whereupon, if the lessor or grantor, as the case may be, signifies his consent within the prescribed time and in the prescribed manner, including consent to such sum being retained as guarantee deposit as the Land Commission may think necessary, then such redemption shall be effected."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): There is no objection to the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman except to the words "including consent to such sum being retained as guarantee deposit as the Land Commission may think necessary." The only objection to those words is that a clause was inserted in the Land Purchase Bill making it imperative that the Land Commission should in every case retain the guarantee deposit.

(12.20.) MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): I do not find in the Bill the provision to which the right hon. Gentleman alludes.

MR. MADDEN: Yes; it is imperative upon the Land Commission to retain the guarantee deposit in such cases.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I went through the Bill with my hon. Friend, and I am bound to say I did not see anything in it corresponding to the statement of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. I would suggest to him that he should let the words go in now, and if afterwards on Report stage we find it is as the right hon. and learned Gentleman says, then the words can be struck out.

MR. MADDEN: I assume that the Bill is as present to the hon. and learned Member's recollection as to mine. Upon the understanding that we may possibly find it expedient to omit the words later, there is no objection to the insertion now.

Question put, and agreed to,

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 14, after "payment," insert "subject to the Rules of the Land Commission."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Amendment agreed to.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): I do not know whether the provision that this section shall not apply to any holding a portion of which has been sub-let already exists, but if it does not, I presume the right hon. Gentleman will not object to my Amendment to that effect.

MR. MADDEN: Yes; the general provisions of the Act of 1881 will apply. Sub-letting, unless of a trivial character, would be excluded, and, therefore, I think the Amendment would be unnecessary.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 19, at end, add, "The signification of consent by the lessor or grantee shall have the same effect as the lodgment of an agreement to purchase under the Purchase of Land (Ireland) Acts, and, except as herein otherwise provided, all subsequent proceedings shall be carried on, and with the like consequences, as upon such an agreement."

Amendment agreed to.

(12.25.) MR. T. M. HEALY: The Amendment I have now to propose is necessary to provide against delays and obstructions which may be placed in the way if the lessee or grantor objects to the redemption, or by a mortgagee or interested party. Such obstruction may be introduced by retarding the investigation of title, and I have known such to arise and delay the elucidation of title for years, it may be from default of solicitor or landlord. It is necessary to provide against this, and therefore I suggest that where, in the opinion of the Land Commission, such delay is unfair or unreasonable the tenant shall not be required to go on paying the unfair rent, but following the precedent set in the 5th section of the Act of 1887 the lessee shall be deemed to be a present tenant.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 22, leave out "the redemption shall not be made but," and insert "or such delay, default, or refusal, not due to the action of the lessee or grantee, arises as is calculated to prevent such redemption, or is, in the opinion of the Land Commission, unreasonable or unfair, then."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I think the hon. and learned Gentleman will see that the object of the Bill would be greatly imperilled by the introduction of this Amendment. Undoubtedly, in the opinion of many persons a great concession is made to the leaseholder by allowing him compulsorily to redeem his rent if the landlord refuses to allow any alteration in the terms. If the Amendment were accepted, should there be any delay not necessarily due to the action of the landlord but to the stress of business, the number of cases in Court, the landlord would lose the advantage given him by the Bill, he would, against his own wish, be obliged to keep as a present tenant the man who wished to redeem his holding.

(12.30.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I admit that the Amendment is not felicitously expressed, and is open to the objection of the right hon. Gentleman. I should be quite willing to leave out the words "not due to the action of the lessee or grantee." I submit that the Government ought in some degree to assent to the Amendment. It may happen that the mortgagee may be the cause of the obstruction, he wishing to continue drawing his 5 or 6 per cent. Of course, we cannot express all this in the clause, but I am quite willing to amend the words. Would the right hon. Gentleman agree to accept words providing against the delay arising from the obstructive action of persons other than the lessor or grantor? I regard this as one of the best Land Bills the Government ever introduced, and that it will be satisfactory to both landlords and tenants, but I wish to prevent a denial of justice through the action of mortgagees and others.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR was inaudible in the Gallery.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I presume the Government will undertake to bring up words of their own, and therefore I ask leave to withdraw my Amendment.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I undertake to bring up words going the length I have stated.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I think the drafting here is not the happiest. "Shall be deemed to be the tenant of the present tenancy" involves two separate applications to the Court. In the first place, the tenant has to go to the Land Commission and get them to declare that his rent is a full agricultural rent, and, having got that done in the prescribed manner, he has to go to the landlord and get an agreement between himself and the landlord. When these processes have been gone through a gale or six months will have gone. Suppose the landlord objects to the prescribed manner. Then, and then only, the tenant is to be deemed the tenant of the present tenancy, and he is to go through the operation of filing a fair rent notice. It appears to me that the original application to the Land Commission ought to be treated pro tanto as an application to fix a fair rent.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 23, after "to" to insert "have made the prescribed application under Section 1 of the said Act of 1887, and shall be held to."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 25, after "1881," to insert "and Section 1 of the said Act of 1887."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Mr. T. M. Healy

Clause 2 agreed to.

Clause 3.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 19, after "means," insert "'The Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881.' Part V."—(The Attorney General for Ireland.)

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, at end, add "and this Act shall be read and construed with the Land Law (Ireland) Acts and the Land Purchase (Ireland) Acts."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Question, "That those words be there added," put, and agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 4 agreed to.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to move the new clause standing in my name. In a great many of the leases there is very frequently a covenant giving the landlord the option to take away an acre or so for the purpose of building. It was held until a recent case that that ousted the jurisdiction of the Land Commission. In a more recent case that view of the law was practically reversed. In the case of a holding of 65 acres the landlord reserved five acres, and the Court of Appeal held, after a long argument, that that ousted the jurisdiction of the Land Commission. The matter remains in very considerable doubt, and it is well it should be cleared up. As to the second part of the clause, let me say I know a case in County Louth where there was a salmon fishery. The right to take salmon was not worth £1 a year, yet the tenant was excluded from the benefits of the Act because the Court had no power to fix a rent on the fishery.

New Clause—

(Jurisdiction of Land Commissioners.)

"The jurisdiction of the Land Commission under the said Acts or this Act shall not be ousted by the existence of a covenant or agreement to surrender portion of the holding for any purpose, nor by the fact that a trivial portion is non-agricultural, if in the opinion of the Land Commission such portion is severable for the purposes of the application,"—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed. "That the Clause be read a second time."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

MR. A. J. BALFOUR was inaudible in the Gallery.

MR. T. M. HEALY : I am sorry the Government will not accept the clause. Without it a great many tenants will be excluded.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill, as amended, to be considered upon Thursday, and to be printed. [Bill 426.]

POST OFFICE ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.
(No. 405.)

(12.45.) Order read for resuming Adjourned Debate on further Amendment to new Clause (Criminal diverting of letters from the addressee) proposed on Consideration, as amended —

“Any person not in the employment of the Postmaster General who wilfully and maliciously, with intent to injure any other person, either opens or causes to be opened any letter which ought to have been delivered to such other person, or does any act or thing whereby the due delivery of such letter to such other person is prevented or impeded, shall be guilty of a misdemeanour, and be liable to a fine not exceeding fifty pounds, or to imprisonment not exceeding six months.

Nothing in this section shall apply to a person who does any act to which this section applies where he is parent or guardian of the person to whom the letter is addressed.

A prosecution shall not be instituted in pursuance of this section except by direction of the Postmaster General.

A letter in this section means a post letter within the meaning of ‘The Post Office Protection Act, 1884,’ and any other letter which has been delivered by post.”—(Mr. Raikes.)

And which Amendment was, to leave out from the word “months,” in line 7, to the word “A,” in line 11.—(Mr. Raikes.)

Question again proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause.”

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed to the Clause, in line 9, after “parent,” to insert, “or in the position of a parent.”—(Mr. Raikes.)

Question, “That those words be there inserted,” put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed to the Clause, in line 10, after the word “addressed,” to insert the words “or is acting for him on account of mental or bodily incapacity or infirmity.”—(Mr. Tomlinson.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): I hope my hon. and learned Friend will not press this Amendment at this stage. I undertake that the matter shall be looked into, so that it may be dealt with in another place if necessary.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): On that intimation I beg to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin): I should like to leave out lines 11 and 12. I will not press the matter to a Division, but I should like the Amendment to be put.

Amendment proposed to the Clause, in line 10, to leave out from the word “addressed,” to “A,” in line 13.—(Mr. Courtney.)

MR. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I wish the House to remember that the other night it was urged, and urged with considerable force, that if these words are taken out we should be better without the clause. The one single protection against the abuse of a most dangerous clause is that people shall not be dragged up before the Queen’s Courts on a charge of tampering with letters unless the Postmaster General has given his consent.

MR. COURTNEY: I am not going to press the Amendment.

MR. KELLY: I trust the Postmaster General will not give way in this matter.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Amendments made to the Bill.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

TRUSTEE BILL (Lords).—(No. 413.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): After communication with the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Stockton (Sir H. Davey) and others, I do not think we should be justified in pressing this Bill this Session, and therefore, though with regret, I ask that the Order be discharged and the Bill withdrawn.

Order discharged ; Bill withdrawn.

FOREIGN MARRIAGES BILL.—(No. 408.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid.): I object.

MR. WOODALL (Hanley): May I appeal to my hon. Friend to allow the Bill to pass: it is a perfectly non-contentious measure.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I join in the appeal to my hon. Friend, but I am bound to say this Bill shows the folly of passing Bills late at night. A Foreign Marriages Bill was passed last Session, and now we are asked to pass another Bill explaining the first. Why should not the Bill of last year have been properly drawn? This time 12 months we may be asked to pass another Bill amending this one.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): The difficulty has not arisen from the drafting of last year's Act, but only from the working of it.

DR. TANNER: If it is the wish of the House that the Bill should be read a second time now, I will not stand in the way.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday.

CONVEYANCING AND LAW OF PROPERTY ACT (1881) AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 427.)

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 3.

It being One of the clock, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again to-morrow.

And, it being after One of the clock, Mr. Speaker adjourned the House without Question put.

House adjourned at one minute after One o'clock.
